candidates brought forward by the nominating conventions; whether other persons of the same name resided in the district from which the officer was to be chosen; and if so, whether they were eligible or had been named for the office; if the ballot was printed imperfectly, how it came to be so printed, and the like,—is admissible for the purpose of showing that an imperfect ballot was intended for a particular candidate, unless the name is so different that to thus apply it would be to contradict the ballot itself, or unless the ballot is so defective that it fails to show any intention whatever, in which case it is inadmissible." See on this point, 4 Wis. 430; 8 Cow. 102; 27 N. Y. 64. The case in 1 Dougl. Mich. 65, which is contra, was overruled in 16 Mich. 283, and the rule above laid down by Judge Cooley approved and followed. Thus votes for "E. M. Braxton," "Elliot Braxton," and "Braxton" have been counted for Elliot M. Braxton in the 42d Congress. See McCrary, Elect. 296. Ballots cast for "D. M. Carpenter," "M. D. Carpenter," "M. I. Carpenter," and "Carpenter" were counted for Mathew H. Carpenter; 4 Wis. 430. Ballots for "Judge Ferguson" were counted for Fenner Ferguson; 1 Bartl. 267. Ballots cast for "E. Clark" and "Clark" were counted for E. E. Clark; those cast for "W. E. Robson," "Robertson," "Robers," and "Robin—" were counted for W. E. Robinson. Where the only candidates for an office were Caleb Gumm and Joel D. Hubbard, votes for "J. D. Huba," "J. D. Hubba," "J. D. Hub," and also one for "Huber," and one for "D. Huber," are properly counted for Hubbard; 97 Mo. 311. See opinion of judges of supreme court of Maine, printed in Maine Laws, 1880, App. p. 225.

A ballot containing the names of two candidates for the same office is bad as to both, but is not thereby vitiated as to other names of candidates on the same ballot; 4 Wis. 420; s. c. Bright. Elect. Cas. 258; 29 Neb. 341; where a ballot contains the names of three persons for the same office, and there is only one vacancy to be filled, it should be rejected; 67 Hun 169.

Where there are statutory provisions as to the marking of ballots, the paper on which they are printed, etc., a ballot not complying with the law should not be received; the direction is mandatory; 3 S. & R. 29; 130 Ind. 561; but see 15 Ill. 492, where the law required white paper without any marks, and blue-tinted paper, ruled, was used, and the ballot declared legal; and where the law required the marking of the ballots with ink, if otherwise regular and marked with a pencil, they were counted; 34 Neb. 116. In 46 Cal. 396, the court held, in this connection, that as to those things over which the voter has control, provisions as to the appearance of ballots are mandatory; and as to those things that are not under his control, such provisions are directory. Ballots on which a printed name is erased and another name written in its place are valid; 22 N. Y. 309; 17 Oreg. 189; but see 44 La. Ann. 796.

Where a law provides that the voter may insert in the blank space provided therefor any name not already on the ballot, it was held that such insertion might be made by the use of a "sticker" as well as by writing the name of the candidate; 146 Pa. 529. The fact that some of the ballots cast at an election were marked, and thereby rendered void by the election law, does not invalidate the ballots that were regular; 69 Hun 596.

Australian Ballot. This system, the leading features of which have now been adopted in many of the states, is the first important gift to civilization from the continent of Australasia. It originated in South Australia soon after the beginning of the present century as the result of the efforts of Mr. Francis S. Dutton, and thence passed from state to state in Australasia, then to the mother country in Europe, afterward to Canada, and eastward to continental countries, and finally westward again to the United States within the last few years. It has been said that a somewhat similar system had been in vogue in England in Maryport for many years before the modern system was introduced in Australasia. But the Australasian system seems to have been purely indigenous, and was developed without any copying or even knowledge of the system at Maryport.

The cardinal features of the system, as everywhere adopted, are an arrangement for polling by which compulsory secrecy of voting is secured and an official ballot printed and distributed by government authority containing the names of all candidates. The details of the system include methods by which candidates may be nominated, prescribing the number of persons necessary to nominate a candidate, forms in which the various party nominations and information for the voters shall be printed on the ballots, arrangements for small closets or rooms into which the voter can retire and mark his ballot in secret, regulations for allowing him to take into the closet with him when he so desires a person to assist him in marking his ballot, and regulations for the numbering and counting of the ballots. See Wigmore, Australian Ballot System.

The system now generally in vogue in the United States is in most cases not the Australian ballot pure and simple. One feature of that system is the enumeration of candidates for a particular office alphabetically and without designation of party name or emblem. This was adopted in Massachusetts. But in most states the plan, better adapted for the American states, is to use an official ballot, but, when many officers are voted for on a single ballot, to have the column of each party indicated by name or sign or both, and permit the voter to vote a "straight" ticket by a single mark for all officers voted for. This, in various forms, may be termed the American modification of the Australian ballot.

The novel features of this system of voting have given rise to much litigation, and a considerable body of law has already accumulated, which involves not so much new principles as the application of old ones to new conditions. It is, nevertheless, desirable to consider these decisions separately from those under the old system, as thereby a clearer impression is received, both of the system and the method of its enforcement, which is necessarily committed very largely to the courts, and, like cases of railroad receiverships, devolves upon the courts the exercise of functions often to some extent administrative as well as judicial.

It may be said without reserve that the courts have, as a rule, been true to the fundamental doctrines of the law of elections: to give effect to the intention of the voter, where it can be done without defeating the purpose of the legislation,—to enforce party rules with respect to nominations and test the integrity and fairness of those made by petition,—to disregard mere technical irregularities and hold valid elections carried on in good faith rather than to permit them to be defeated by the carelessness, ignorance, or fraud of officials,—to enforce rigidly the safeguards against bribery and intimidation, and the provisions to secure the secrecy of the ballot which lie at the foundation of the system.

For an extended discussion of the Australian ballot laws of England and some of the American states, see Bowers v. Smith, 111 Mo. 45, in which it is held that the system should be construed in subordination to the constitution and laws of the state wherein it is adopted.

Such laws have been held constitutional; id.; 146 Pa. 529; 90 Mich. 538; 54 N. J. L. 446; 106 Mo. 155; 159 Mass. 487; 104 id. 486; 41 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 681; 42 Pac. Rep. (Wyo.) 1049; 21 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 483. The objections taken will be found to include general ones and also features of particular statutes. The statute forbidding the counting of a ballot not officially stamped and marked with the initials of a judge of election is in conflict with the constitutional provision that all persons duly qualified are entitled to vote and that all elections shall be by ballot; 12 Wash. St. 377. In Illinois the new ballot law is held to have repealed all other laws respecting voting on municipal affairs and ballots; 147 Ill. 204; but it is held to apply only to the election of officers and not to special elections to determine other matters, in Wisconsin; 62 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 933; and Pennsylvania; 3 Pa. Dist. Rep. 385.

Questions as to the regularity of nomination papers under the Australian ballot system are usually settled by the courts either under express statutory provisions or under their general jurisdiction when applicable. A number of such questions decided in reference to the then pending election are reported in 5 Dist. Rep. Pa. 860-865, 677-681.

Where conflicting nominations have each certain claims to superiority, if technical rules only are applied, the court will give weight to the fact that one candidate carried the district by a decisive majority. The desire of the court in such cases is to reach what is substantial; id. 660. If, under the rules of the party, the county committee has power to fill vacancies and did not act, but only certain members of it residing within the representative district, such action is a clear violation of the party rules and the nomination by such irregular body is void; id. 660. Where congressional conferees from one county of a congressional district were appointed in violation of the party rules, the conference in which they took part was not a regular body, and the nomination made by it was void; id. 661. Nominations attended by fraud and the exercise of arbitrary power will not be upheld by the courts. A minority of delegates cannot nominate, and a faction may not arbitrarily select their meeting-place in defiance of a clear majority of the Ward Executive Committee; id. 661. Where persons who are not delegates are permitted upon the floor of a convention and the evidence justifies the conclusion that their presence was not harmless, the nomination is invalid; id. 662. A nomination paper which attempts to name presidential electors, representatives at large in congress, and other state officers, as well as candidates for separate congressional, senatorial, and representative districts, by a single paper is bad; id. 665. A court will not, however, in the exercise of its equitable powers, enjoin the printing of a certain column on the official ballot on a mere allegation that the nomination papers are defective, false, and fraudulent. Proof of such allegation must be made before the court will find it so a fact; id. 667. Where an adequate remedy exists and a sufficient opportunity has been given to present to the court objections to a nomination paper, the court will not intervene by injunction in relief of a complainant who has failed to avail himself of such a remedy; id. 681.

Whenever an official ballot is provided for by statute the secretary of state will not decide which of two rival conventions of the same organization is the regular one, but all such nominations should be certified and left to the voters for their decision; 43 Neb. 651; 18 Colo. 26; 68 Mich. 164. See also 39 N. Y. Supp. 119; 5 Misc. Rep. 369; 6 id. 245; nominations by a bolting convention are invalid; 3 Pa. Dist. Rep. 194; in case of a tie vote in a nominating convention neither the candidates nor the election officers can determine the result by lot; 61 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 346.

The offence of falsely making or signing a nomination certificate must be charged in the words of the statute, being unknown at common law, and the want of criminal intent is no defence, and the voter must sign in person, or be present, and request it to be done; 40 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 862.

As to defects in statement of names of candidates in nomination papers, see L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 506; L. R. 15 Q. B. Div. 273; 12 id. 257; they are not invalidated by ordinary abbreviations of names; 10 N. S. Wales L. R. 59.

Provisions as to filling vacancies are not always mandatory, and after a fair election, an irregularity will not be permitted to invalidate it; 40 Pac. Rep. (Mont.) 80.

For the form of ballots prescribed in a number of states, see 10 Lawy. Rep. Ann.

180. For inserting names under the Australian ballot law in the official ballot, not legally entitled to insertion, see 35 Cent. Law J. 305.

Courts will not interfere with the discretion of the officer charged with the preparation of the official ballot, as to details; 63 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 23.

Prohibiting the printing of the name of a candidate in more than one column is constitutional; 64 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 406; 63 id. 564; but where the act provides that names shall be grouped by parties, a candidate named by more than one party is entitled to have his name appear in the column of each; 33 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 447; contra, 43 Pac. Rep. (Wyo.) 750.

A construction which makes the error of a single official disfranchise large bodies of voters must be avoided if the language is susceptible of any other; 111 Mo. 45; and where, by the negligence of the officer, the name of a candidate and of the office is omitted from the ballot, the voter may write them, and his vote will be valid; 39 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 641.

The provision requiring the voter to make a cross with a stamp opposite each name voted for is mandatory; 38 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 447; 36 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 204; 29 Atl. Rep. (Me.) 930; 130 Ind. 561; but in other states the courts are disposed to be more liberal and permit marking outside of the square if to the right of the name; 17 R. I. 813; 13 Pa. Co. Ct. 41; id. 205; 41 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 454; id. (Nev.) 762; 64 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 190; 186; 41 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 1002; 84 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 6 (in which cases the subject of marks is fully considered). A provision for marking with ink is directory only, and pencil will answer; 94 Neb. 116; a blanket paper is not legal in Pennsylvania, but a single sticker may be used; 30 Atl. Rep. 935. As to what distinguishing marks on ballots will vitiate them see 41 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 1002; id. (Ind.) 796; 91 Cal. 526; 129 N. Y. 395; 31 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 547; and where by mistake "spoiled ballots" were counted the result was not thereby ascertained and the returns of the county clerk were prima facie evidence which should be considered by the court; 60 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 1034; voters are not confined to the names on the official ballot but may write other names thereon; 40 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 290; signing a ballot invalidates it; 41 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 1002. The failure of a voter to retire to the booth to mark the ballot does not make the marking illegal if not wilful; 31 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 97. In Michigan the supreme court have with much detail considered this subject and enumerate seven methods of marking which are defective by reason of their being in effect distinguishing marks; 61 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 648.

The provision that an officer or person designated by law may assist a voter physically or educationally unable to vote should be liberally construed; 21 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 493; the voter is the sole judge of his disability; 12 Pa. Co. Ct. 227; contra, under the same statute, 2 Pa. Dist. Rep. 1; the disability must be one contemplated by the statute and not drunkenness or ignorance; id.; nor that he left his glasses at home; 60 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 676; a ballot is good if the voter asks assistance though he can read; 42 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 474; where the voter is required to make oath, this is mandatory, and failure to take it invalidates the vote; 90 Mich. 538; but if no form of oath is prescribed any sufficient form of words will suffice; 60 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 676; if the statute does not restrict the voter's choice of an assistant the election officers cannot do so; 12 Pa. Co. Ct. 227; but when the statute designates a particular officer, it is mandatory; 21 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 493; and irregularities in the services of the voter's assistant, as having one where two were required, or if the assistant had received money from a candidate, will not invalidate the vote; 31 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 547; if the assistant prepares a ballot contrary to the direction of the voter, if fraudulently done, it will avoid the vote, but if it does not appear whether it was fraud of the assistant or mistake of the voter it will not be rejected; id.

When an interpreter was permitted by law but not asked for, the presence of one inside the railing, conversing with voters, was held to vitiate the election; 66 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 388.

Irregularities in taking the ballot must be gross to defeat the election; L. R. 10 C. P. 731; L. R. 16 Q. B. Div. 739; 7 Can. S. C. 247. When the statute declares a certain irregularity fatal courts will give effect to it, otherwise they will ignore such innocent irregularities as are free from fraud and have not interfered with a fair expression of the voter's will; 111 Mo. 45.

Irregularities which have been held harmless, are where two voting places in a precinct by law entitled to one; 17 Kan. 347; 111 Mo. 45; where ballots were received by officers near a house appointed whose owner refused to permit its use; 58 Cal. 198; errors or irregularities in printing; 17 Colo. 338; 31 Pac. Rep. (Or.) 830; ballots improperly prepared by the officers are not marked "ballots" and may be counted; 42 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 536.

When candidates and voters have participated in an election and acquiesced in the result failure to give notice may be disregarded; 84 Mich. 420; and other irregularities may be so far acquiesced in by the defeated candidate that he will be disqualified to complain; L. R. 1 Q. B. 433; 17 Colo. 338.

Contested Elections. At common law the right to an office was tried by a writ of quo warranto; in modern practice, an information in the nature of quo warranto is usual, in the absence of a statute; McCrary, Elect. 199. See 3 Bla. Com. 263; 2 Jurist N. S. 114. An act for trying contested elections without a jury is not unconstitutional; 43 Pa. 389. As to whether the declarations not under oath of illegal voters is evidence as to the votes cast by them, is doubtful, see 23 Wis. 319; 1 Bartl. 19, 230; 9 Kan. 569; 27 N. Y. 45. The ordinary rules of evidence apply to election cases; McCrary, Elect. 231; Paine, Elect. 824. A legal voter may refuse to testify for whom he voted, but he may waive this privilege; 2 Pars. 380. It is competent for witnesses to testify that they were under age at the time of voting, and that their votes were cast for the candidate receiving the largest number; 183 Ind. 11.

In all contested elections, the tribunal will look beyond the certificate of the returning board; 20 Wend. 12. See 50 Mo. 107.

In purging the poll of illegal votes, unless it be shown for whom the illegal votes were cast, they will be deducted from the total vote; 2 Brewst. 128.

Where the laws have been entirely disregarded by the election officers and the returns are utterly unworthy of credit, the entire poll will be thrown out, but legal votes, having been properly proved, may be counted; Bright, Elect. Cas. 493. "Nothing short of the impossibility of determining for whom the majority of votes were given ought to vacate an election;" Cl. & H. 504.

Where another than the person returned as elected is found to have received the highest number of legal votes given, he is entitled to the office; 86 Ky. 596.

See BALLOT; ELECTORAL COMMISSION; ELIGIBILITY; MAJORITY; VOTER.

Senators and Representatives. Final choice of an officer by the duly qualified electors. Primaries are in no sense elections for office, but merely methods by which party adherents agree upon candidates whom they intend to offer and support for ultimate choice by all qualified electors. Congress may at any time by law make or alter regulations as to the times, places, and manner of holding elections as prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof. 256 U. S. 232, 233. See GENERAL ELECTION; SPECIAL ELECTION; PRIMARY ELECTION.

ELECTIONS IN CORPORATIONS.

—The power of election by corporations may apply either to corporate officers generally, or to the selection of new members to fill vacancies in those corporations, whose nature and composition require them to consist of members and not of holders of capital stock, as eleemosynary corporations. The election of members of a corporation of the former class is, in general, regulated by the charter, or other constituent law of the corporation, or by its by-laws, and their provisions must be strictly followed. In the absence of express regulations it is a general principle that the power of election of new members, or when the number is limited, of supplying vacancies, is an inherent power necessarily implied in every corporation aggregate. It is said to result from the principle of self-preservation; 2 Kent 293; 1 Rolle, Abr. 518; 8 East 272.

If the right and power of election is not adequately prescribed by the charter, a corporation has power to make by-laws consistent with the charter, and not contrary to law, regulating the time and manner of elections and the qualifications of electors, and manner of proving the same; 3 Term 180; 3 S. & R. 29; 131 Pa. 614; and if there be no by-law, established usage will be resorted to; 20 Pa. 434. In many states there are general statutes on this subject, and in such case they must be strictly followed; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 745.

Unless under express provision as to special meetings, or filling vacancies, elections of officers are held at regular meetings of the corporation. The time is nearly, if not always, regulated by statute, charter, or by-laws, and such cases as are found on the subject are not as to any general principle; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 701; the date cannot be changed by directors so as, by postponement of an annual election, to lengthen their terms; 23 Md. 482; a business meeting of a benevolent corporation may be held on Sunday; 65 Barb. 337; and a charter provision requiring the choice of directors at an annual meeting was held to be directory and not exclusive; 20 N. H. 58.

The place of meeting for elections is also usually regulated by the law of the corporation itself, and if there be none, it should unquestionably be done at its usual and principal place of business, or where it exercises its corporate functions. This is for corporate purposes its domicile, (q. v.) and the term residence is also applied to corporations, as the place where its business is done; 15 Ill. 436; 82 id. 493; while it is a citizen only of the state by which it was created; id. In the latter state only may constituent acts be done; 13 Pet. 519, 588; 11 Wall. 459, 476; 14 N. J. Eq. 380. See also 36 Vt. 750; 35 Mo. 13. Accordingly it has been held that votes and similar acts outside of the state creating it are void; 27 Me. 509; even under a provision authorizing the calling of a first meeting at such a time or place as they think proper; id.; but the appointment in one state of a secretary, by the directors of a manufacturing corporation of another state, has been held valid; 6 Conn. 428; and a corporation created by a concurrent legislation of two states may hold meetings for elections in either; 81 Ohio St. 317. In some states, as Minnesota, the Dakotas, and Colorado, the holding of such meetings is permitted outside of the state; and in the latter state it is held that the fact that the annual meeting was held outside of the state cannot be raised in a collateral proceeding; 5 Colo. 282. Under an authority to call special meetings on notice of time and place, they may be called by the president at a place other than the regular place of business; 5 Sawy. 403; and at such a meeting an election may be held if otherwise legal. Where no place is named in the charter, the directors may designate it, and officers elected at such meeting will be such de facto; 45 Pa. 59.

Meetings for the election of officers following the law of the corporation must be called by the person or persons designated for that purpose; 10 Conn. 200; 25 W. Va. 36; though it has been held that it need not always be by formal action or with strictness of procedure if it is done by their direction; 3 N. J. Eq. 68; 8 Allen 217; contra; 25 W. Va. 36; 34 N. H. 148; 12 Metc. 105; they must be duly assembled; 14 La. Ann. 799; whether of stockholders; 9 La.

397; or directors; 12 N. H. 205, 549; 47 Ia. 11; upon due notice; 5 Burr. 2681; in accordance with charter or by-laws; 18 Allen 90; 7 Conn. 214; 14 Vt. 800; 12 Bush 62; and when there is no provision as to method, personal notice is proper; 7 Conn. 214; or according to general statute law, if there be such; 19 Wend. 87; but, though it is safer and better practice to give notice, in case of stated meetings for regular elections, notice is not required, but the members are charged with notice of them; 86 Me. 78; 4 B. & C. 441; 86 N. H. 252; 11 Wend. 604; while of special meetings there must always be notice; 2 H. L. Cas. 789; 22 N. Y. 128; 6 S. & R. 469; and the failure to notify a single member will avoid the proceedings, 5 Burr. 2681; 4 B. & C. 441; 4 A. & E. 538; 22 N. Y. 128; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 708; unless notice is waived by attendance, as, if all are present, each of them waives the want or irregularity of notice; 7 Ind. 547; 11 Wend. 604. Such waiver will not operate as against a positive direction of the charter; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 264; and when there is no provision as to notice it must be personal; 8 Conn. 191; 8 Metc. 301; 40 Cal. 77; 31 N. J. L. 107.

As to what constitutes a quorum at elections, see MEETINGS; QUORUM.

As to all the details of the conduct of elections, the provisions of state statutes, charters, or by-laws, must be strictly pursued and will generally be found to cover the subject. Where a statute provided for three inspectors, it was held that two could act; 16 Abb. Pr. N. S. 8. The method of appointment prescribed must be strictly followed; 11 Wend. 604; though in certain emergencies the corporators may appoint; 2 Abb. Pr. N. S. 361; and a candidate has been held not disqualified; 7 Cow. 402; but this is so contrary to well settled and judicious legal principles that it cannot be considered desirable. An election otherwise valid will not be avoided because inspectors were not sworn; 19 Wend. 635; or the oath taken not subscribed by them; 2 Abb. Pr. N. S. 361. In the absence of a statute to the contrary, their duties are ministerial, and they cannot act upon the challenge of a vote except to follow the transfer books; 19 Wend. 37; 4 Cow. 382; or put the challenged party on oath; id. note; or pass judicially upon proxies regular on their face; 44 N. J. L. 529; because not acknowledged or witnessed; 36 How. Pr. 477; but this would be otherwise if, as is often the case, the charter requires witnesses. They may not reject votes once received; 10 Abb. Pr. N. S. 331; nor go beyond the ballot to ascertain the intention of the voter; 15 id. 14. Ballots in which only the initials of a candidate were inserted have been held sufficient when it was determined by a verdict who was intended thereby; 5 Denio 409. If the statutes provide that only a certain number are to be chosen, ballots containing more names will not be counted; 27 Mo. 365; 38 N. Y. St. 217; 8 Wend. 396; 2 Burr. 1020; votes for ineligible candidates were formerly held to be "thrown away;" 2 Burr. 1021 note; but it has been held in a later case that such votes will not give the election to a minority candidate unless the voters knew of the ineligibility; 44 N. J. L. 529.

There is no common-law right to vote by proxy, except in England in case of peers; 1 Bla. Com. 168; 181 Pa. 623; and in public or municipal corporations, voting can only be done in person; 2 Kent 294; in private corporations, the right of voting by proxy is usually conferred by charter and the weight of authority is that, if not so conferred, it may be done by by-law; id. 295; 5 Day 329; 181 Pa. 614; 69 Ill. 195; Moraw. Corp. § 486; Cook, Stockh. § 610; contra; 18 Hun 427; 14 N. J. L. 222. See 8 Grant, Pa. 209; 103 Pa. 134; 1 Paige 598; 2 Pa. Co. Ct. 280; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 787; 4 L. R. A. 421; 8 Dessaus. 557. A proxy may be revoked, even if given for a valuable consideration, if about to be used fraudulently; 6 Paige 337; and voting by proxy in fraud or violation of the charter may be restrained by injunction; 6 Gill & J. 94. A certificate of election is not essential; 11 Wend. 604; but it is, when valid on its face, prima facie evidence of election; 10 Abb. Pr. 331; but a court on quo warranto, may go behind it; 20 Wend. 12.

It is probable that at common law each stockholder is entitled to but one vote without respect to the number of shares held. In public and municipal corporations undoubtedly each member has but one vote, and it is said in connection with the statement of this principle: "This rule has been applied to stockholders in a private corporation, and it has been held that such a shareholder has but one vote, although he be the owner of many shares of the capital stock;" Cook, Stock & Stockholders § 608. But this writer, after adverting to the almost universal practice of providing by constitution, statute, or charter for a vote to each share of stock adds, "at the present day it is probable that no court, even in the absence of such provision, would uphold a rule which disregards, in the matter of voting, the number of shares which the shareholder holds in the corporation;" id. And after a reference to the same common-law rule it is said: "But there are good reasons for holding that this rule has no application to ordinary joint stock business corporations of the present day;" Moraw. Corp. § 476. Where the charter did not regulate the voting, but declared that the by-laws may make provision for the conduct of elections, it was held that a corporation might enact a by-law giving to stockholders a vote for each share of stock, and that one providing that they should have one vote for each share up to ten and fixing the proportion which the shares should bear to the votes above that number, "is a reasonable regulation; it is uniform in its operation; it conflicts with no law, and it is binding on all the shareholders;" 181 Pa. 614.

In some states cumulative voting is authorized by statutory or constitutional provision; and such provision in a state constitution is self-executing; 104 Pa. 160. See, generally, works on corporations; Thompson, Corporations, Ch. XV.; 18 L. R. A. 582; MEETINGS; PROXY; QUORUM.

ELECTION DAY. An "election day" or the day of any general or primary election, would, in legal contemplation, mean twenty-four hours, including the period during which the election is actually held. 95 Ky. 38, 23 S. W. 655.

ELECTION PETITIONS. In England. Petitions for inquiry into the validity of elections of members of Parliament, when it is alleged that the return of a member is invalid for bribery or any other reason; heard by two judges of the King's Bench Division. Byrne.

ELECTION OF RIGHTS OR REMEDIES.—The obligation imposed upon a party to choose between two inconsistent or alternative rights or claims, in cases where there is clear intention of the person from whom he derives one that he should not enjoy both. 2 Sto. Eq. Jur. § 1075.

Etymologically, election denotes choice, selection out of the number of those choosing. Thus, the election of a governor would be the choice of some individual from the body of the electors to perform the duties of governor. In common use, however, it has come to denote such a selection made by a distinctly defined body—as a board of aldermen, a corporation, or state—conducted in such a manner that each individual of the body choosing shall have an equal vote in the choice, but without regard to the question whether the person to be chosen is a member of the body or not. The word occurs in law frequently in such a sense, especially in governmental law and the law of corporations. But the term has also acquired a more technical significance, in which it is often used as a legal term, which is substantially the choice of one of two rights or things, to each one of which the party choosing has equal right, but both of which he cannot have. This option occurs in fewer instances at law than in equity, and is in the former branch, in general, a question of practice.

At Law. In contracts, when a debtor is obliged in an alternative obligation to do one of two things, as to pay one hundred dollars or deliver one hundred bushels of wheat, he has the choice to do one or the other until the time of payment; he has not the choice, however, to pay a part in each. Pothier, Obl. part 2, c. 8, art. 6, no.

247; 11 Johns. 59. Or, if a man sell or agree to deliver one of two articles, as a horse or an ox, he has the election till the time of delivery,—it being a rule that, "in case an election be given of two several things, always he which is the first agent, and which ought to do the first act, shall have the election;" Co. Litt. 145 a; 7 Johns. 485; 3 Bibb 171. On the failure of the person who has the right to make his election in proper time, the right passes to the opposite party; Co. Litt. 145 a; Pothier, Obl. no. 247; 1 Des. Ch. 460; Hopk. Ch. 337; 40 Ohio St. 539; 56 Vt. 588; 66 How. Pr. 806; 21 Fed. Rep. 883.

When one party renounces a contract the other party may elect to rescind at once, except so far as to sue upon it and recover for the breach, and he may immediately bring an action, without waiting for the time of performance to arrive or elapse; (in such case he cannot treat the contract as subsisting for any other purpose); 2 E. & B. 678; L. R. 7 Exch. 114; L. R. 16 Q. B. 460; 158 Pa. 107; 111 U. S. 264; 11 Fed. Rep. 372; contra, as to a contract for the sale of land, 114 Mass. 530. See the cases collected, Ans. Cont. (8th ed., 855) n. 1. It is a maxim of law that, an election once made and pleaded, the party is concluded: electio semel facta et placitum testatum non patitur regressum; Co. Litt. 146; 11 Johns. 241.

In many cases of voidable contracts there is a right of election to affirm or disavow them, after the termination of the disability, the existence of which makes this contract voidable. So all contracts of an infant, except for necessities, may be avoided by him within a reasonable time after he comes of age, but they are voidable only, and he must elect not to be bound by them; 48 N. H. 251; 18 Neb. 54. See 102 U. S. 300. And bringing suit is an election to rescind; 50 N. H. 235; 13 Daly, N. Y. 227. See INFANT.

Whenever, by law or contract, a party has laid before him a variety of steps, the taking of one of which excludes another, or the rest, he must choose between them. After his choice is made, and by words or acts expressed in a manner suited to the particular case, he cannot reverse it; he is said to have elected the one step, and waived the other; Bish. Cont. § 808.

Other cases in law arise: as in case of a person holding land by two inconsistent titles; 1 Jenk. Cent. Cas. 27; dower in a piece of land and that piece for which it was exchanged; 3 Leon 271. See Sugd. Pow. 498.

In Equity. A choice which a party is compelled to make between the acceptance of a benefit under a written instrument, and the retention of some property already his own, which is attempted to be disposed of, in favor of a third party, by virtue of the same paper. The doctrine of election presupposes a plurality of gifts or rights, with an intention, express or implied, of the party who has a right to control one or both, that one should be a substitute for the other; 1 Swanst. 394, note (b); 3 Woodd. Lect. 491; 2 Rop. Leg. 490; Snell, Pr. Eq. 287.

The doctrine of election rests upon the principle that he who seeks equity must do it, and means, as the term is ordinarily used, that where two inconsistent or alternative rights or claims are presented to the choice of a party, by a person who manifests the clear intention that he should not enjoy both, then he must accept or reject one or the other; and so, in other words, that one cannot take a benefit under an instrument and then repudiate it; 133 U. S. 695.

Where an express and positive election is required, there is no claim, either at law or in equity, to but one of the objects between which election is to be made; but in many cases there is apparent, from the whole of an instrument, the intention that the party to be benefited shall be benefited on certain conditions. In such cases, equity will require the party to elect; Bisph. Eq. sec. 205.

The question whether an election is required occurs most frequently in case of devises; "because deeds being generally matters of contract, the contract is not to be interpreted otherwise than as the consideration which is expressed requires; "L. R. 8 Ch. 578; but it extends to deeds; 1 Swanst. 400; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1075, n.; and it has been held to apply to "voluntary deeds, to cases of contracts for valuable consideration resting in articles, to contracts for value completely executed by conveyance and assignments; per Selborne, Ld. Ch. L. R. 8 Ch. 578, where the authorities are collected. The doctrine also applies to powers of appointment; 2 Ves. Jr. 367; L. R. 9 Eq. 519; 22 Ch. D. 555; 27 id. 606; 34 id. 180.

In the case, not strictly of election, but often so treated, of two distinct gifts of a testator's own property, one onerous and the other not, it is the general rule that the donee may take one and reject the other, unless it appear that it was the testator's intention that the option should not exist; 22 Ch. D. 573, 577; and where a gift is made by a deed of which the consideration is partly invalid by reason of the disability of the parties, the parts of the deed are read together and the burden is treated as the consideration for the benefit; Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 283. When a married woman made a valid appointment by will to her husband under a power, and also bequeathed personal property (not her separate estate) to another person to which the power did not extend, the husband was not put to his election, but took both under the power and jure mariti, as to the property ineffectually bequeathed; 9 Ves. 369.

There must be a clear intention by the testator to give that which is not his property; 1 Sim. 103; 18 Ves. 41; 1 Ed. Ch. 532; L. R. 7 Eq. 291. And if the testator has some interest in the thing disposed, the presumption that he intended to dispose only of his interest must be overruled in order to make a case of election; 6 Dow. 149, 179; 1 Ves. 515.

The intention of the testator to put the devise to his election must appear from the will itself; but surrounding circumstances may be shown by parol; 41 Ark. 64; 30 Beav. 14. The time in which election may be exercised must be reasonable; 80 Beav. 235; 77 Va. 198; 19 Ves. 663; 34 Ala. 558; 30 Ia. 465; 4 McLean 99.

The doctrine applies to every species of property or interest, whether the donor does or does not know of his right to dispose of it; Wata. Comp. Eq. (2d. ed.) 177; cases of transactions involving property of the wife; 23 Beav. 457; 30 Gratt. 83; satisfaction of dower; Amb. 466, 682; 8 Paige, Ch. 323; 2 Sch. & L. 452; 14 Sim. 258; 1 Drur. & W. 107. The doctrine does not apply to creditors; 12 Ves. 354; 1 Pow. Dev. 437.

As to the right or duty of election by persons under disability, there is much apparent confusion in the cases both as to theory and practice. Story states the rule generally that married women, infants, and lunatics are not bound by election; 2 Eq. Jur. § 1097. The statement would seem too broad even before the great changes made in all matters affecting the property rights and powers of married women by the trend of recent legislation, and before the changes characterized by a careful commentator as a "brand new invention of equity not fifty years old, and made exclusively for the benefit of married women under the old law—a breed which is rapidly becoming extinct;" Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 257. This writer considers the old and true doctrine of election to apply only to the acceptance of gifts under an instrument made by another, while the new doctrine involves the confirmation or repudiation of voidable instruments made by the person electing, who, in the cases referred to, is always a married woman. The rule, so far as there is one, has been stated thus:—Parties competent to make an election must usually be sui juris, but election may sometimes be made by a court of equity on behalf of infants and married women; Bisph. Eq. § 804; but this is really no rule and probably none can be exactly defined; the cases must be resorted to, and a large measure of judicial discretion has been exercised in dealing with them as they arose. In some it is held that a married woman may be permitted to elect; 4 Kay & J. 409; 69 Wis. 483; 85 Pa. 451; in others that she cannot; 8 Myl. & Cr. 171; Lord Cairns in L. R. 7 H. L. 67; 9 Ch. D. 863; but it may be referred to a master to inquire what is best for her; 2 Ves. 60; L. R. 7 H. L. 67 (but in this case there were also infants). It was held that she must elect by Lord Hatherly in 2 J. & H. 344 (which Brett says "led to the new departure"); followed by Kay, L. J., in 28 Ch. D. 124; contra; by Sir George Jessel in 18 Ch. D. 531; followed by Chitty, L. J., in 27 Ch. D. 606. The decisions of Lord Hatherly and Sir George Jessel were referred to without disapproval by Lord Selborne, one in L. R. 8 Ch. 578, and the other in 8 App. Cas. 420. Finally in 31 Ch. D. 275, (reversing 28 Ch. Div. 124,) it was held that the wife would not be compelled to elect, but was entitled to retain both funds, on the ground that the settled fund had a restraint on anticipation. This case reviews the conflicting decisions and considers that they leave the question to be determined on principle. It is treated as deciding that but for the fact on which the case was put it was one for election; Snell, Fr. Eq. 247; and it assumed without discussion that election applied to married women, and thereby as Brett considers "sealed the triumph of the new election"; Lead. Cas. Mod. Eq. 257.

With regard to infants, the practice has varied very much, and the cases are collected in 1 Swanst. 413, note (c). The infant has been permitted to elect after coming of age in some cases; cas. t. Talbot 176; id. 130; 2 Ves. Jr. 12; 3 Bro. P. C. 173; in others an inquiry has been directed; 2 Sch. & Lef. 266; and this may be considered the usual practice; 1 Bro. P. C. 800; 2 Eq. 481; though the court has elected for them without reference; 26 L. J. N. S. Ch. 148; 2 Bland, Ch. 606; and the same practice is adopted when the persons to elect are unborn; Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 260. See, generally, on this subject, Serrell, Equit. Doct. Elect. 184.

Persons not under disabilities are bound to elect; 79 N. Y. 478. Positive acts of acceptance or renunciation are not indispensable, but the question is to be determined from the circumstances of each case as it arises; 21 Beav. 447; 13 Price 782; 1 M'Clel. 541; 15 Pa. 480. And the election need not be made till all the circumstances are known; 1 Bro. Ch. 188, 445; 2 V. & B. 223; 1 M'Clel. & Y. 589. See, generally, 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1075; 1 Swanst. 402, note; 2 Rep. Leg. 480-578; Bisph. Eq. 295.

A widow has a right, regulated by statute in the several states, to declare her election between the provisions in her favor under the will of her husband and her right of dower. When bound to elect she is entitled to full information and ascertainment of the values of the two interests, and she may file a bill in equity to obtain them; 2 Scribn. Dow. 497, and cases cited at large in note 1. The right must be exercised by the widow herself, being purely personal; 6 Gray 807; 6 Ired. L. 274; and the rule is not subject to exception even if she is insane; 7 Ired. L. 72; 5 Md. 508. After the widow's death within forty days without election, her representatives could not make a renunciation of the will; 8 Har. & McH. 95; 87 Ohio St. 460; 71 Ind. 455; 90 Pa. 384. For the statutory provisions on the subject see 2 Scribn. Dow. 505, notes.

There must be an intention to elect and knowledge of her rights so as to constitute a deliberate choice; 43 Pa. 474; 2 Gr. Ch. 504; and an election made under a mistake does not conclude her; 1 Bro. C. C. 445; 12 Ves. Jr. 136; 4 Dessaus. 274; but if she is acquainted with the material facts the election will bind her even though she do not understand her legal rights; 21 Pa. 407. But see 6 Humph. 220; 11 Ohio St. 388. Nor is she concluded by an election procured by fraud; 10 Yerg. 94; 2 Dana 13. In some cases an election is implied, but so much difficulty is found to exist with respect to what constitutes an implied election that it will generally remain to be determined by the circumstances of each case. See 1 Lead. Cas. in Eq. 537, 570, and cases cited;

5 Call 481; 2 Hen. & Mun. 381; 12 Pick. 146; 43 Pa. 474; 6 Ohio St. 480; 14 Gratt. 518. In many states, if deprived of the provision given in lieu of dower, the widow is entitled to demand her dower; 2 Scribn. Dow. 525; 2 Harris, N. J. 459; if the deprivation be substantial though not total; 32 Me. 183; or if a previous application for dower has been refused; 1 Metc. 66; or the statutory period for demand has passed before she was advised of the failure of her provision; 32 Me. 133; or she had previously elected to take under the will; 20 Wend. 564, affg. 7 Paige 231. In taking a testamentary provision in lieu of dower the widow becomes a purchaser for a valuable consideration; 1 Lead. Cas. in Eq. 511, 570; 2 Scribn. Dow. 527, and cases cited in note; 4 Del. Ch. 289.

In cases not covered by statute a widow may be required to elect upon general equitable principles. In the case last cited, she being also a legatee of one-third of the estate "according to law," was held to be put to her election, not under the statute but under the general doctrine of equity which is thus stated by Bates Ch. This doctrine precludes a party taking a benefit by deed or will from asserting any title or claim clearly inconsistent with the provisions of the instrument under which he takes—putting him to his election between the two. In its application to dower it is nowhere better stated than by our court of appeals in 8 Harring. 474. "In regard to dower it seems from all the cases to be an established rule that a court of equity will not compel the widow to make her election, unless it be shown by the express words of the testator, that the devise or bequest was given in lieu of satisfaction of dower; or unless it appears that such was the testator's intention, by clear and manifest implication arising from the fact that the dower is plainly inconsistent with the devise or bequest, and so repugnant to the will as to defeat its provisions. If both claims can stand consistently together, the widow is entitled to both, although the claim under the will may be much greater in value than her dower." 2 S. & L. 451; 5 Ves. Jr. 249; 1 Drew. 411 (17 E. L. & Eq. 382); Drur. & War. 107; 3 Kay & J. 257; 2 John. Ch. 451.

Of Remedies. A choice between two or more means of redress for an injury or the punishment of a crime allowed by law.

The selection of one of several forms of action allowed by law.

The choice of remedies is a matter demanding great care and judgment, upon which the whole best secure the end to be attained. Thus, a remedy may be furnished by law or equity, and at law, in a variety of actions resembling each other in some particulars. Actually, however, the choice is greatly narrowed by statutory regulations in modern law, in most cases. See 1 Chit. Pl. 207-254.

A person may often choose whether he will sue in tort or contract. If his goods are taken from him by fraud he may sue for the price in assumpsit, or bring an action of replevin or trover; 1 Paige, N. Y. 192; 99 Mass. 255; 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 501; 29 Ala. 332; 25 Mich. 386; 25 Ark. 100; 43 Cal. 380; 30 Vt. 277; 57 Me. 441. And when two actions are pending at law or in equity between the same persons and for the same subject-matter, the plaintiff is usually compelled to elect which one he will maintain; 32 N. J. Eq. 67; 29 Minn. 252; 85 Ala. 297. But an election is not usually compelled between domestic and foreign suits; 7 Blackf. (C. C.) 159; 13 Wis. 94; and a foreclosure of a mortgage and a suit on the bond as well as actions to enforce admiralty liens and at the same time recover on the debt are also exceptions; 53 Ill. 171; 5 Cal. 48; 10 Wall. 204.

It may be laid down as a general rule that when a statute prescribes a new remedy the plaintiff has his election either to adopt such remedy or proceed at common law. Such statutory remedy is cumulative, unless the statute expressly or by necessary implication takes away the common-law remedy; 1 S. & R. 32; 5 Johns. 175; 16 id. 220; 1 Call 248; 2 Me. 404; 6 H. & J. 883; 4 Halst. 384; 3 Chit. Fr. 130; 16 Hun 556; 74 N. Y. 437; 61 Ind. 290; 47 Ia. 602.

The commencement and trial of an action on a contract is not such an election of remedies as would estop plaintiff from suing on the notes; 89 Mich. 287; 90 id. 476.

Where a plaintiff has separate and concurrent remedies against a number of parties, he loses no rights by suing some and afterwards discontinuing his action; 82 Wis. 120. See 141 N. Y. 437. An unsatisfied judgment on a note will not bar an action on notes taken as collateral security; 59 Fed. Rep. 817.

By joining his wife in a suit for her legacy, a husband exercises his election to treat it as joint property; 4 Del. Ch. 117.

After a suit in replevin has been discontinued before judgment without obtaining any benefit, because plaintiff has paid the value of the goods to satisfy his replevin bond, this suit does not constitute such an election of remedy as to stop him from claiming payment of the purchase price out of the assets of the purchaser's estate; 82 Md. 50.

In Criminal Law. The choice or determination by a prosecuting officer, upon which of several charges, or counts, in an indictment he will proceed to trial.

No objection can be raised, either on demurrer or in arrest of judgment, though the defendant or defendants be charged in different counts of an indictment with different offences of the same kind. Indeed, on the face of the record, every count purports to be for a separate offence, and in misdemeanors it is the daily practice to receive evidence of several libels, several assaults, several acts of fraud, and the like, upon the same indictment. In cases of felony, the courts, in the exercise of a sound discretion, are accustomed to quash indictments containing several distinct charges, when it appears, before the defendant has pleaded and the jury are charged, that the inquiry is to include several crimes. When this circumstance is discovered during the progress of the trial, the prosecutor is usually called upon to select one felony, and to confine himself to that, unless the offences, though in law distinct, seem to constitute in fact but parts of one continuous transaction. Thus, if a prisoner is charged with receiving several articles, knowing them to have been stolen, and it is proved that they were received at separate times, the prosecutor may be put to his election; but if it is possible that all the goods may have been received at one time, he cannot be compelled to abandon any part of his accusation; 1 Mood. 146; 2 Mood. & R. 524. In another case, the defendant was charged in a single count with uttering twenty-two forged receipts, which were severally set out and purported to be signed by different persons, with intent to defraud the king. His counsel contended that the prosecutor ought to elect upon which of these receipts he would proceed, as amidst such a variety it would be almost impossible for the prisoner to conduct his defence. As, however, the indictment alleged that they were all uttered at one and the same time, and the proof corresponded with this allegation, the court refused to interfere; and all the judges subsequently held that a proper discretion had been exercised; 2 Leach 577; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 934. See 11 Cl. & F. 155; Dearell. 427; 12 Cush. 612; 12 S. & R. 69; 2 H. & J. 426; 12 Wend. 426; 118 Mass. 443; 29 Mich. 61; 75 Mo. 355.

The state need not elect on which count of an indictment it will proceed to trial, where the several counts relate to the same transaction; 109 Mo. 654.

The artificial distinction between felonies and misdemeanors is, in most jurisdictions, obsolete, and in most states several distinct offences to which a similar punishment is attached may be joined. It usually rests with the court whether it will compel a prosecuting officer to elect which count to proceed on; 31 Me. 363; 104 Mass. 332; 39 Ill. 571; 30 Mo. 682; Whart. Crim. Pl. & Pr. § 258. The election should be made before opening the case of the defence; 31 Me. 363; 35 Ga. 449; 107 Mass. 219.

ELECTION DISTRICT. A subdivision of territory, whether of state, county, or city, the boundaries of which are fixed by law, for convenience in local or general elections. 41 Pa. 403; 2 Pa. L. J. R. 82.

ELECTOR. One who has the right to make choice of public officers; one who has a right to vote. See 10 Minn. 107. See PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS.

One who exercises the right of election in equity. The term is sometimes used in this sense. Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 257.

In the German Empire the name was given to those great princes who had the right to elect the emperor or king. The office of elector in some instances became hereditary and was connected with territorial possessions as, elector of Saxony.

ELECTORAL COLLEGE. A name given to the presidential electors, when met to vote for president and vice-president of the United States, by analogy to the college of cardinals, which elects the pope, or the body which formerly selected the German emperor. It is, according to the more general usage, applied to the electors chosen by a single state, but is also used to designate those chosen throughout the United States.

This term has no strict legal or technical meaning, and being unknown to the constitution and laws of the United States, its use is purely colloquial. Accordingly the term is not clearly defined, and it is employed by approved writers in both the senses stated, though more frequently when reference is made to the entire body of electors the plural is employed, as, "the expectations of the public . . . (have) been so completely frustrated as in the practical operation of the system, so far as relates to the independence of the electors in the electoral colleges;" 2 St. Const. § 1463. " . . . would be chosen as electors, and would, after mature deliberation in their respective colleges," etc.; 1 Hare, Am. Const. L. 219; "the electoral colleges have sunk so low"; id. 221. So in speaking of the electors the phrase "state colleges" is used by Stevens; Sources of the Constitution of the U. S. 183, note. Following this view is a very recent definition: "A name informally given to the electors of a single state when met to vote for president and vice-president of the United States, and sometimes to the whole body of electors." Cent. Dict.

On the other hand, the other use is well sustained by authority, and we find this equally recent definition: "The body of electors chosen by the people of the United States to elect their president. Encyc. Dict. This is supported by Webster and Worcester as well as some authorities on constitutional law. "The presidential electors chosen as therein directed constitute what is commonly called the 'electoral college';" Black, Const. L. 66; and again, "by an electoral college appointed or elected in the several states"; id. "In case the electoral college fails to choose a vice-president, the power devolves on the senate to make the selection from the two candidates having the highest number of votes." 1 Calhoun's Works 175. See PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS.

The Presidential electors from each state shall be appointed in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, (Const. U. S., art. 2, § 1) reserving to Congress the power of determining the time of choosing the electors. (Rev. Stat. U. S., tit. 3, c. 1.) No senator or representative or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector. (Const. U. S., art. 2, § 1.) This includes a person holding an office by appointment of the President made pursuant to an act of Congress, and on whom is imposed the duty of assisting in managing and directing an exposition held under the auspices of the federal government. 22 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed. 1230; 11 R. I. 638.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION. A commission created by an act of congress of January 29, 1877, to decide certain questions arising out of the presidential election of November, 1876, in which Hayes and Wheeler had been candidates of the republican party and Tilden and Hendricks of the democratic party. The election was very close, and depended on the electoral votes of South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana. It was feared that there would be much trouble at the final counting of the votes by the president of the senate according to the plan laid down in the Constitution. The republicans had a majority in the senate and the democrats had a majority in the house of representatives. A resolution was adopted by congress for the appointment of a committee of seven members by the speaker to act in conjunction with a similar committee that might be appointed by the senate to prepare a report and plan for the creation of a tribunal to count the electoral votes whose authority no one could question and whose decision all could accept as final. The joint committee thus appointed reported a bill providing for a commission of fifteen members, to be composed of five members from each house appointed viâz voce, with four associate justices of the supreme court, which latter would select another of the justices of the supreme court, the entire commission to be presided over by the associate justice longest in commission. This body has since been known as the Electoral Commission.

Justices Clifford, Miller, Field, and Strong were named in the act as members, and they chose as the fifth justice Justice Bradley. The other members were Senators Bayard, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Morton, and Thurman, and Representatives Abbott, Garfield, Hoar, Hunton, and Payne.

The commission began its sessions February 1, and completed its work March 2, 1877. Various questions came before it in regard to the electoral vote of South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana, as to which of two state returns was valid, and as to the eligibility of certain of the presidential electors. The most important decision of the commission and the one which has caused most comment and criticism was to the effect that the regular returns from a state must be accepted, and that the commission had no power to go behind these returns; or, as the commission itself expressed it, "that it is not competent under the Constitution and the law as it existed at the date of the passage of said act, to go into evidence aliunde the papers opened by the president of the senate in the presence of the two houses, to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the governor of the state of Florida in and according to the determination and declaration of their appointment by the Board of State Canvassers of said state prior to the time required for the performance of their duties, had been appointed electors, or by counter-proof to show that they had not, and that all proceedings of the courts or acts of the legislature or of the executive of Florida subsequent to the casting of the votes of the electors on the prescribed day are inadmissible for any such purpose." Curtis, Constitutional History of the United States, vol. 2, 419.

The result of the controversy over the election of 1876 was the passage, after long and earnest consideration, of the Act of Congress of Feb. 8, 1887, to regulate the counting of the electoral votes for president and vice-president. U. S. Rev. St. 15upp. 525. See PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS; PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

ELECTRIC CORPORATION. A company formed under general or special laws, with the right, expressly or by necessary implication, to generate, produce, develop, supply or use electricity for effectuating the purposes for which its charter powers are conferred. To this end the courts have looked with favor upon a construction of charters of such corporations whereby the scope of their provisions has been held to include, by implication, the use of electricity when such right is not conferred in express terms. 1 Joyce, Elec. Law, 2nd ed. 1.

ELECTRIC LIGHT. Light produced by electricity. It is furnished either by municipalities or by corporations formed for the purpose of manufacturing it for hire.

The Nature of Electric Light Companies. Such companies, although not public corporations in the sense that the term is applied to municipal corporations; Crowell Elec. § 20; and being unable without statutory authority to claim an exemption of property from the ordinary mechanic's lien; 48 Kan. 182; (see FIXTURES), are held to exercise a public use and are of a public character similar to telegraph and telephone companies; 150 Mass. 592; 153 Id. 129; 160 Pa. 511; 42 Fed. Rep. 723; 130 Ind. 149; but when poles are set for this purpose by a company for furnishing light commercially as well as for lighting streets, the abutting owner of land on a street used by such companies may demand compensation for such use, as it is held to create an additional servitude; 13 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 369; 51 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 280; 32 Hun 96; contra; when controlled by the municipality; 65 How. Pr. 407. But this subject can scarcely be considered as finally and definitely settled on principle; see Crow. Elec. § 126. In New York they are held to be manufacturing companies with reference to taxation; 129 N. Y. 543 (reversing 15 N. Y. 718); contra; 145 Pa. 103, 131; but by paying a state tax they are exempt from local taxation; 8 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 626.

Implied Powers of the Municipality. The right of a municipality to light the streets is generally conceded as a part of the police power and while usually enumerated in the charters, its omission would not deprive the city of such right, whether by electricity or other means; 130 Ind. 149; 83 S. C. 1; 53 Kan. 477; 37 Fed. Rep. 683; 146 U. S. 258; and the right of the municipality, not only to own, operate, and control an electric light plant, but to raise money for such purpose by taxation has been upheld by the courts; 130 Ind. 149; 38 S. C. 1; 53 Kan. 477; 29 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 243; and to issue bonds for that purpose; 121 Ind. 212; 49 Hun 560; but the town must follow strictly the provisions of the statute authorizing such issue, and keep within the limits of such statute or the issue is void; 111 Mo. 865. The contrary view of such implied powers was taken in 153 Mass. 129, where the court decided that the existing statute giving towns the right to maintain street lamps and to raise money by taxation for such purpose did not carry with it the right to maintain the more costly electric light plant, and that to authorize such a purchase an express statute must be passed, thus settling a question raised but not decided in 150 Mass. 592. An act was accordingly passed in that state granting this power to the municipality and limiting and defining the conditions under which it should be exercised; act 1891, c. 870; 1893, c. 454; 1892, c. 259. The states of Connecticut, Iowa, Michigan, Mississippi, Nebraska, Ohio, and Pennsylvania have also conferred this right by statute.

Commercial Lighting by the Municipality. Where the right of maintaining an electric light plant has been conferred upon towns by statute, it has been usually held to apply as well to private property as to public streets, lanes, highways, etc.; 42 Fed. Rep. 723; 130 Ind. 149; but where public lighting by electricity has been only implied from existing statutes the implication will not extend to a commercial use by the municipality; 83 S. C. 1; 121 Ind. 212. This right has been created by statute in Massachusetts, Michigan, Nebraska, New York, Pennsylvania, and Tennessee, and the courts have declared the constitutionality of these acts; 150 Mass. 592; 160 Pa. 511.

As to Rights and Privileges. A municipality may grant a franchise to an electric light company to use its streets without making such right an exclusive one; 28 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 94; 48 N. W. Rep. (La.) 1005; but it must have legislative authority to grant such franchise; 5 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 340; 33 Fed. Rep. 659; and in Iowa it must be submitted to a vote of qualified electors; 48 N. W. Rep. (La.) 1005; 57 id. 669. It may confer the right on one company to use poles erected by another company; 95 Mich. 551; and may fix the compensation to the latter for their use; 10 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 531; but unless the limit of such use is fixed and the manner of stringing the wires prescribed such a permission is unreasonable and void; 53 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 452; and a company will be enjoined from use of another's poles without permission from the city, the court, or the other company; 23 Wkly. Law. Bul. 137. In Louisiana a grant to an electric light company included the right to remove poles erected under a preceding contract with a gas company; 40 La. Ann. 474. A contract with a gas company to light the streets with gas was held not to deprive the city of the power to contract with another company to furnish electric lights for the same purpose; 80 W. Va. 435; 28 Fed. Rep. 529. The right of the city to grant franchises for electric lighting carries with it the right to purchase or operate a plant even if there be an existing organized corporation and the city violates no contract by so doing; 42 Fed. Rep. 728. As a rule, however, the statutes provide for the purchase of an existing plant by the municipality and for arbitration in case of disagreement as to the price. In Massachusetts an existing company is not compelled to sell its property to the town; 161 Mass. 432.

Conflicting Electrical Companies. Where

a telegraph and an electric light company had each obtained a franchise for the use of the same street, it was held that the company which first obtained the franchise was entitled to priority, and the other company must so adjust its wires as to prevent danger from juxtaposition or interference with the business of the first company; 46 Mo. App. 120; and that where the street was already occupied by the telegraph company the electric light company would be enjoined from placing its wires so near as to interfere with the transmission of messages; id. The distance at which a wire will affect the wires of the telegraph company need not be stated in the bill; 76 Fed. Rep. 178; but where the electric light company had already strung its wires the telegraph company could not compel their removal; 46 Mo. App. 120. In the case of a telephone and an electric light company, both having valid franchises, the telephone company was refused an injunction against the latter company on the ground that they had first occupied the streets, but on streets not occupied by either company, the electric light company was enjoined from using the same side of the street for lights and from stringing wires within such a distance as to injure the service of the telephone company; 27 Neb. 284; 12 Ont. 571; 27 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 903. If two electric light companies have the use of the same street, the first to occupy them has the prior right, and the second company will be restrained from stringing its wires so near as to interfere with the business of the first company or cause danger to the public; 65 Vt. 337; 94 Ala. 372. In the latter case the decision was based rather on the ground that such juxtaposition of the wires was dangerous to public safety, than on any business consideration.

As to the liability for negligence as applied to electrical companies regarding both the employees of such companies and the general public, see POLES; WIRES.

ELECTRICITY. A natural force utilized mainly for the production of heat, light, and power.

A powerful physical agent which makes its existence manifest by attractions and repulsions, by producing light and heat, commotions, and chemical decompositions, and other phenomena. Encyc. Dict.

The great increase in the use of this force and its application to the purposes of everyday life not only for power to be used for transportation and manufacturing, but also for lighting and heating, have naturally brought it constantly before the courts. As a result there is a large and constantly increasing body of law on the subject which will be found under the several titles which deal directly with electrical appliances. As to trolleys see RAILROAD; and with respect to telegraph, telephone, electric light, poles, and wires, see those titles.

ELECTROCUTION. A method of punishment of death inflicted by causing to pass through the body of the convicted person a current of electricity of sufficient force and continuance to cause death. See 1 With. & Beck. Med. Jur. 663.

It is in use in New York under the act of 1893, and in Ohio was adopted by Act of April 9, 1896, to go into effect on July 1 of that year.

Punishment by death is not cruel within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits the infliction of unusual and cruel punishments; and while the infliction of the death penalty by a new agency is unusual, the adoption of such an agency which is not a certainly prolonged or extreme procedure is not violative of this constitutional provision; 119 N. Y. 569.

This act of New York is not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States when applied to a convict who committed the crime for which he was convicted after the act took effect, 136 U. S. 486. See 119 id. 564; CRIMES.

ELEEMOSYNARIUS (Lat.). An almoner. There was formerly a lord almoner to the kings of England, whose duties are described in Fleta, lib. 2, cap. 28. A chief officer who received the eleemosynary rents and gifts, and in due method distributed them to pious and charitable uses. Cowell.

ELEEMOSYNARY. Relating to the distribution of alms, bounty or charity; charitable. See CORPORATIONS.

ELEEMOSYNARY CORPORATIONS. Such private corporations as are instituted for purposes of charity, their object being the distribution of the bounty of the founder of them to such persons as he directed. Of this kind are hospitals for the relief of the impotent, indigent, sick, and deaf or dumb; Ang. & A. Corp. § 39; 1 Kyd, Corp. 26; 4 Conn. 272; 3 Bland 407; 1 Ld. Raym. 5; 2 Term 346. The nature of eleemosynary corporations is discussed in the Dartmouth College case. They are in no sense ecclesiastical corporations as understood in the classification of Blackstone; as Marshall, C. J., said that if the act created a civil institution to be employed in the administration of the government, it would be a public corporation, but it was in fact a private eleemosynary institution created for purposes unconnected with government, — and none the less so because for public education; 4 Wheat. 681. See, also, 8 id. 464; 1 Bla. Com. 471.

A recent writer says: "In the English law corporations are divided into ecclesiastical and lay; and lay corporations are again divided into eleemosynary and civil. It is doubtful how far clear conceptions of the law are promoted by keeping in mind these divisions. They seem, for us at least, to have an historical, rather than a practical, value. In a country where the church is totally disassociated from the state, there is little room for a division of corporations into ecclesiastical and lay; and while charitable corporations have many features which distinguish them from other private corporations, as will hereafter appear, it is very seldom that the word 'civil' is used in our American books of reports in order to distinguish corporations other than charitable."

ELEGIT (Lat. eligere, to choose). A writ of execution directed to the sheriff, commanding him to make delivery of a moiety of the party's land and all his goods, beasts of the plough only excepted.

The sheriff, on the receipt of the writ, holds an inquest to ascertain the value of the lands and goods he has seized, and then they are delivered to the plaintiff, who retains them until the whole debt and damages have been paid and satisfied. During that term he is called tenant by elegit; Co. Litt. 289. See Pow. Mort.; Wats. Sheriff 206; 1 C. B. N. s. 508.

The name was given because the plaintiff has his choice to accept either this writ or a fi. fa.

By statute, in England, the sheriff is now to deliver the whole estate instead of the half. See 3 Bla. Com. 418, n. The writ is still in use in the United States, to some extent, and with somewhat different modifications in the various states adopting it; 4 Kent 431, 436; 10 Gratt. 580; 1 Hill, Abr. 555; 3 Ala. 560.

ELEMENTS. A term popularly applied to fire, air, earth and water, anciently supposed to be the four simple bodies of which the world was composed. Encyc. Dict. Often applied in a particular sense to wind and water, as "the fury of the elements." Cent. Dict. It has been said that "damages by the elements," and "damages by the act of God," are convertible expressions; 35 Cal. 416.

ELEMENTS, DAMAGES BY. Usually means damages by fire, air and water. These are ordinarily excepted from a lessee's covenant to keep in repair, and refers to damages by these occurring without fault or negligence in the lessee. Has been held to refer only to some sudden, unusual or unexpected action of the elements, as floods, tornadoes, and the like. 10 A. & E. Ency.

2nd ed. 895; 40 Minn. 106. "Damages by the elements," and "damages by the acts of God" have been held to be convertible expressions in the law of leases. Id.; 35 Cal. 416.

ELEVATED RAILWAYS. See RAILWAYS.

ELEVATOR. A building containing one or more mechanical elevators, especially a warehouse for the storage of grain; a hoisting apparatus; a lift; a car or cage for lifting and lowering passengers or freight in a hoistway. Cent. Dict.

An elevator is a platform, car, cab, or cage, propelled vertically in a hoistway, hatchway, or shaft, by cables, moved generally by either hydraulic pressure, electricity, steam, or compressed air. In its upward and downward course it is usually conducted by a motorman on board, who stops and starts it at will. In comparatively recent years the elevator has come into general use in the factory, mill, warehouse, mercantile and office building, and apartment house. It may be constructed and used for the carriage of passengers, or freight, or both. 10 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 945.

A passenger elevator is not a device dangerous, to life, per se; 90 Wis. 497.

A landlord who runs an elevator for the use of his tenants and their visitors thereby becomes a common carrier; 41 Minn. 207; and is charged with the highest degree of care which human foresight can suggest, both as to the machinery and the conduct of his servants; 54 Fed. Rep. 637; 80 Cal. 595. A carrier of passengers by elevator is not an insurer, but is required to exercise the highest degree of care; 62 Fed. Rep. 139; 114 N. Y. 312; 159 Mass. 26. In constructing an elevator the utmost care must be exercised; 41 Minn. 209; competent workmen must be employed and suitable material used; 20 Col. 292. In case of a casualty, it is not enough to show that the elevator is one of a kind in ordinary use; 50 Mo. 890; 138 Ill. 170. But the absence of safety appliances is said not to be conclusive evidence of negligence; 142 Mass. 83. An elevator is not supposed to be a place of danger, to be approached with great caution; but when the door is opened a passenger may enter it without stopping to make a special examination; 114 N. Y. 318. One who habitually rides on a freight elevator, in contravention of a posted notice, does so at his own risk; 156 Mass. 511. See as to injury to passengers, 25 L. R. A. 33, as to freight id. 34.

The business of elevating grain is a business charged with a public interest, and those who carry it on occupy a relation to the community analogous to that of a common carrier, and may be controlled by public legislation for the common good; Munn. v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 118; 143 U. S. 517.

For liability of owners of buildings for accidents at elevator shafts, see 9 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 640, n. See, generally, Webb, Elevators; L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 80.

Operators of Elevators. The proprietor or operator of an elevator is a carrier. Id.; 62 Fed. Rep. 139, et al. A carrier by elevator of passengers, is not an insurer, but is required to exercise the highest degree of care in everything calculated to insure the safety of his passengers. There is no distinction in law between the duties and liabilities of a carrier by elevator and one by railroad. Id.

ELIGIBILITY. The constitution of the United States provides that no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either house. The acceptance by a member of congress of a commission as a volunteer in the army vacates his seat; Cl. & H. 122, 895, 637. But by a decision of the second comptroller of the treasury, of Feb. 24, 1894, it was held that there was no incompatibility of office between that of a member of the house of representatives and the military office held by an officer of the United States army on the retired list, and that he was entitled to pay for both offices. A centennial commissioner holds an office of trust or profit under the United States, and is thereby ineligible as a presidential elector; 16 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 15; s. c. 11 R. I. 638. A state cannot by statute provide that certain state officers are ineligible to a federal office; J. Bartl. 167, 619.

Duelling has been made in some states a disqualification for office; see DUELLING. In Kentucky, it was held that the doing of any of the prohibited acts was a disqualification for office without a previous conviction; 14 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 22; but this opinion has been questioned in a note to that case. See McCrary, Elect. 189.

An alien cannot, even in the absence of any provision forbidding it, hold an office; 14 Wis. 497; 54 N. W. Rep. (La.) 525. See Cooley, Const. Lim. 748, n.; but he may be elected to an office; 28 Wis. 96; 50 id. 103. And members elect of congress, who were ineligible on account of participation in the rebellion, have been admitted to a seat, their disqualification having been subsequently removed; McCrary, Elect. 193.

As to the effect of the ineligibility of the candidate having the highest number of votes, see ELECTION.

ELIGIBLE. This term relates to the capacity of holding as well as that of being elected to an office; 15 Ind. 327. See 15 Cal. 117; 3 Nev. 566; 14 Wis. 479.

ELIGIBLE TO THE OFFICE. The words "eligible to office" relate to the time the candidate is about to assume office, and not to the time of his election. They mean "qualified for the office." 97 Ky. 558, 31 S. W. 137.

ELISORS. In Practice. Two persons appointed by the court to return a jury, when the sheriff and the coroner have been challenged as incompetent; in this case the elisors return the writ of venire directed to them, with a panel of the jurors' names, and their return is final, no challenge being allowed to their array. 3 Bla. Com. 355; 1 Cow. 32; 8 id. 296. See CHALLENGE.

ELL. A measure of length.

In old English the word signifies arm, which sense it still retains in the word elbow. Nature has no standard of measure. The cubit, the ell, the span, palm, hand, finger (being taken from the individual who uses them), are variable measures. So of the foot, pace, mile, or mille passuum. See Report on Weights and Measures, by the secretary of state of the United States, Feb. 22, 1821.

ELOGIUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A will or testament.

ELOIGNE. In Practice. (Fr. éloigner, to remove to a distance; to remove afar off.) A return to a writ of replevin, when the chattels have been removed out of the way of the sheriff.

ELONGATA. In Practice. The return made by the sheriff to a writ of replevin, when the goods have been removed to places unknown to him. See, for the form of this return, Wats. Sheriff, Appx. c. 18, s. 3, p. 454; 3 Bla. Com. 148.

On this return the plaintiff is entitled to a capias in withernam. See WITHERNAM; Wats. Sheriff 300, 301. The word éloigné is sometimes used as synonymous with elongata.

ELONGATUS. The sheriff's return to a writ de homine replegiando, q. v.

ELOPEMENT. The departure of a married woman from her husband and dwelling with an adulterer. Cowel; Blount; Tomlin.

To constitute elopement the wife must not only leave the husband, but go beyond his actual control. For if she abandon the husband, and go and live in adultery in a house belonging to him, it is said not to be an elopement; 3 N. H. 42; 1 Rolle, Abr. 680.

While the wife resides with her husband and cohabits with him, however exceptionable her conduct may be, yet he is bound to provide her with necessities and to pay for them; but when she elopes, the husband is no longer liable for her support, and is not bound to pay debts of her contractine.

when the separation is notorious; and whoever gives her credit, does so, under these circumstances, at his peril; 3 Pick. 239; 6 Term 608; 11 Johns. 281; Bull. N. P. 185. It has been said that the word has no legal sense; 2 W. Bla. 1080; but it is frequently used, as is here shown, with a precisely defined meaning. An action may be maintained by the husband, against a third person, for enticing away his wife, where nothing in the nature of criminal conversation is alleged. See Schoul. Hus. & W. 64; ENTICE.

ELSEWHERE. In another place.

Where one devises all his land in A. B. and C. three distinct towns, and elsewhere, and had lands of much greater value than those in A. B. and C. in another county, the lands in the other county were decreed to pass by the word "elsewhere"; and by Lord Chancellor King, assisted by Raymond, C. J., and other judges, the word "elsewhere" was adjudged to be the same as if the testator had said he devised all his lands in the three towns particularly mentioned, or in any other place whatever. 3 P. Wms. 66. See, also, Chanc. Prec. 202; 1 Vern. 4, n.; Cowp. 860, 808; 5 Bro. P. C. 496; 1 East 456. As to the effect of the word "elsewhere" in the case of lands not purchased at the time of making the will, see 3 Atk. 264; 2 Ventr. 361. As to the construction of the words "or elsewhere" in shipping articles, see 2 Gall. 477.

ELUVIONES. Spring-tides.

EMANCIPATION. An act by which a person who was once in the power or under the control of another is rendered free.

This is of importance mainly in relation to the emancipation of minors from the parental control. See 3 Term 355; 8 id. 479; 11 Vt. 258, 477; 2 Ind. App. 264; 37 W. Va. 242. See Cooper, Justin. 441, 480; 2 Dall. 57, 58; Ferrière, Dict. de Jurispr. Emancipation; MANUMISSION.

An infant husband is entitled to his own wages, so far as necessary for the support of himself and family, even though he married without his father's consent; 157 Mass. 73. Where children contract for, collect, and use their own earnings, emancipation is to be inferred; 29 Wkly. Law Bul. 389; and so when they become of age, no other facts being shown; 28 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 633.

EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION. See BONDAGE.

EMBARGO. A proclamation or order of state, usually issued in time of war or threatened hostilities, prohibiting the departure of ships or goods from some or all the ports of such state, until further order. 2 Wheat. 148.

A civil embargo is the act of a state detaining the ships of its own citizens in port, which amounts to an interdiction of commerce, accompanied, as it usually is, by a closing of its ports to foreign vessels. Such an embargo is enumerated under the head of reprisals. A hostile embargo is a seizure, as before mentioned, of foreign vessels and property which may be in the ports of the wronged state. This may also be a prelude to war. Snow, Int. Law 78.

The detention of ships by an embargo is such an injury to the owner as to entitle him to recover on a policy of insurance against "arrests or detentions." And whether the embargo be legally or illegally laid, the injury to the owner is the same, and the insurer is equally liable for the loss occasioned by it. Marsh. Ins. b. 1, c. 12, s. 6; 1 Kent 60; 1 Bell, Dict. 517.

An embargo detaining a vessel at the port of departure, or in the course of the voyage, does not of itself work a dissolution of a charter-party, or of the contract with the seamen. It is only a temporary restraint imposed by authority for legitimate political purposes, which suspends for a time the performance of such contracts, and leaves the rights of parties untouched; 1 Bell, Dict. 617; 8 Term 258; 5 Johns. 308; 7 Mass. 325; 8 B. & P. 405; 4 East 546; Triss' Law of Nations, part ii. s. 12.

EMBARGO, HOSTILE. See HOSTILE EMBARGO; EMBARGO.

EMBASSAGE or EMBASSY. The message or commission given by a sovereign or state to a minister called an "ambassador," empowered to treat or communicate with another sovereign or state; also the establishment of an ambassador. Black, L. Dict.

EMBEZZLEMENT. In Criminal Law. The fraudulent appropriation to one's own use of the money or goods entrusted to one's care by another. 40 N. Y. Super. Ct. 41.

The fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted or to whose hands it has lawfully come; it is distinguished from larceny in the fact that the original taking of the property was lawful or with the consent of the owner, while in larceny the felonious attempt must have existed at the time of the taking. 160 U. S. 268.

The principles of the common law not being found adequate to protect general owners against the fraudulent conversion of property by persons standing in certain fiduciary relations to those who were the subject of their peculations, certain statutes have been enacted, as well in England as in this country, creating new criminal offences and annexing to them their proper punishments. The general object of these statutes doubtless was to define and embrace, as criminal offences punishable by law, certain cases where, although the moral guilt was quite as great as in larceny, yet the technical objection arising from the fact of a possession lawfully acquired by the party screened him from punishment. 2 Metc. Mass. 345; 9 id. 142. See 34 La. Ann. 1163.

In order to constitute embezzlement, it must distinctly appear that the party acted with felonious intent, and made an intentionally wrong disposal, indicating a design to cheat and deceive the owner. A mere failure to pay over money intrusted to such party as agent for investment is not sufficient, if this intent is not plainly apparent; 62 Mich. 276. The money appropriated need not have been intrusted to the accused by the owner; it is sufficient if it were intrusted to the employer of the accused and appropriated by the latter; 27 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 811; and that the money was taken without any attempt at concealment is no defence to the charge of embezzlement; 38 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 42.

Embezzlement being a statutory offence, reference must be had to the statutes of the jurisdiction for the classes of persons and property affected by them. It has been held that there may be embezzlement of bank bills; 63 Mass. 284; municipal or city bonds; 91 N. Y. 5; 66 Wis. 843; grain; 88 Ia. 321; an animal; 72 Ala. 272; commercial securities; 24 Ia. 102; [1891] 1 Q. B. 112; and of a mortgage; 5 Allen 502; and by public officers, placed in a fiduciary relation as such; 10 Gray 173; 10 Mich. 54. See 11 Allen 439; 81 Cal. 108; 15 Wend. 581; 86 Pa. 416; 22 Minn. 87; 6 How. Pr. 59; 81 Ia. 587; 111 Mo. 413. Where one withdraws from the money drawer of a cash register money that he had deposited a moment before without registering the sale of the article for which it had been received, he is guilty of embezzlement; 155 Mass. 523. Where an attorney collects money for his client, he acts as agent and attorney, and in either case, if he appropriates the money collected to his own use with the intention of depriving the owner of the same, he is guilty of embezzlement; 74 Mich. 478. In a prosecution for the embezzlement of money held by defendant as bailee, it is immaterial that it was deposited in a bank for a time, so that the money actually converted was not the identical bills delivered to the bailee; 160 Mass. 319.

A taking is requisite to constitute a larceny, and embezzlement is in substance and essentially a larceny, aggravated rather than palliated by the violation of a trust or contract, instead of being, like larceny, a trespass. The administration of the common law has been not a little embarrassed in discriminating between the two offences. But they are so far distinct in their character that, under an indictment charging merely a larceny, evidence of embezzlement is not sufficient to authorize a conviction; and in cases of embezzlement the proper mode is to allege sufficient matter in the indictment to apprise the defendant that the charge is for embezzlement. And it is often no less difficult to distinguish this crime from a mere breach of trust. Although the statutes declare that a party shall be deemed to have committed the crime of simple larceny, yet it is a larceny of a peculiar character, and must be set forth in its distinctive character; 6 Metc. 347; 9 id. 139; 9 Cush. 284; 63 Ill. 426; 26 Ohio St. 265. See 81 Ill. 599; 18 Ark. 168; Bish. Cr. L. § 839.

When money is embezzled, the owner has a right to settle as for an implied contract, and such settlement is no bar to a criminal prosecution; 66 N. Y. 526; 111 Mo. 473.

A partner is not guilty of embezzlement in appropriating the funds of the firm to his own use; 58 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 1066. See 3 Tex. App. 522; 12 Cox, C. C. 96.

When an embezzlement of a part of the cargo takes place on board of a ship, either from the fault, fraud, connivance, or negligence of any of the crew, they are bound to contribute to the reparation of the loss, in proportion to their wages. So too the embezzlement of property saved is a bar to salvage. When the embezzlement is fixed on any individual, he is solely responsible; when it is made by the crew, or some of the crew, but the particular offender is unknown, and, from the circumstances of the case, strong presumptions of guilt apply to the whole crew, all must contribute. The presumption of innocence is always in favor of the crew; and the guilt of the parties must be established beyond all reasonable doubt before they can be required to contribute; 1 Mas. 104; 4 B. & P. 847; 8 Johns. 17; Dane, Abr. Index; Weak. Ins. 194; 8 Kent 151; See Fare. Sh. & Adm.

Stringent provisions are made by several acts of congress against the embezzlement of arms, munitions, and habiliments of war, property stored in public storehouses, letters, precious metals, and coins from the mint.

Embezzling Money. One who embezzles money from an estate forfeits his right to commissions, irrespective of whether he is or is not convicted of any crime in respect thereto, and his conviction does not involve the pecuniary amount of the commissions which he forfeits by reason of the embezzlement. 205 U. S. 292. See LARCENY AND EMBEZZLEMENT.

EMBLEMENTS (Fr. emblem, or emblem, to sow with corn. The profits of the land sown). The right of a tenant to take and carry away, after his tenancy has ended, such annual products of the land as have resulted from his own care and labor. The term is also applied to the crops themselves. Co. Litt. 55 b; 4 H. & J. 189; 8 B. & Ald. 118; 64 Pa. 184.

It is a privilege allowed to tenants for life, at will, or from year to year, because of the uncertainty of their estates and to encourage husbandry. If, however, the tenancy is for years, and its duration depends upon no contingency, a tenant when he sows a crop must know whether his term will continue long enough for him to reap it, and is not permitted to re-enter and cut it after his term has ended; 4 Bingham 202; 10 Johns. 361; 5 Halst. 129; 46 Mo. App. 480. Whenever a tenancy, other than at sufferance, is from the first of uncertain duration and is unexpectedly terminated without fault of the tenant, he is entitled to emblements; 86 Ala. 508.

This privilege extends to cases where a lease has been unexpectedly terminated by the act of God or the law; that is, by some unforeseen event which happens without the tenant's agency; as, if a lease is made to husband and wife so long as they continue in that relation, and they are afterwards divorced by a legal sentence, the husband will be entitled to emblements; Oland's case, 5 Co. 116 b; or where the lessee of a tenant for life has growing crops unharvested at the time of the latter's death, he is entitled to them; 56 Conn. 874. A similar result will follow if the landlord, having the power, terminates the tenancy by notice to quit; Cro. Eliz. 460; but not where, under the terms of the lease, the landlord re-enters, and takes possession because the tenant fails to pay rent; 69 Hun 568. See other cases of uncertain duration, 9 Johns. 112; 8 Viner, Abr. 864; 8 Pa. 496. But it is otherwise if the tenancy is determined by an act of the tenant which works a forfeiture; as if, being a woman, she has a lease for a term of years provided she remains so long single, and she terminates it by marrying; for this is her own act; 2 B. & Ald. 470; 1 Price 53; 8 Wend. 584. A landlord who re-enters for a forfeiture takes the emblements; 7 Bingham 164. Where a tenant wrongfully retains possession of land after his term has expired, crops planted by him so long as they remain unsevered, belong to the landlord; 45 Mo. App. 505. See LANDLORD AND TENANT.

All such crops as in the ordinary course of things return the labor and expense bestowed upon them within the current year become the subject of emblements,—consisting of grain, peas, beans, hemp, flax, and annual roots, such as parsnips, carrots, turnips, and potatoes, as well as the artificial grasses, which are usually renewed like other crops. But such things as are of spontaneous growth, as roots and trees not annual, and the fruit on such trees, although ripe, and grass growing, even if ready to cut, or a second crop of clover, although the first crop taken before the end of the term did not repay the expense of cultivation, do not fall within the description of emblements; Cro. Car. 615; Cro. Eliz. 463; 10 Johns. 361; Co. Litt. 55 b; Tayl. Landl. & T. § 534; Woodf. Landl. & T. 750.

But although a tenant for years may not be entitled to emblements as such, yet by the custom of the country, in particular districts, he may be allowed to enter and reap a crop which he has sown, after his lease has expired; Dougl. 201; 16 East 71; 7 Bingham 465. The parties to a lease may, of course, regulate all such matters by an express stipulation; but in the absence of such stipulation it is to be understood that every demise is open to explanation by the general usage of the country where the land lies, in respect to all matters about which the lease is silent; and every person is supposed to be cognizant of this custom and to contract in reference to it; 2 Pet. 188; 5 Binn. 285. The rights of tenants, therefore, with regard to the away-going crop, will differ in different sections of the country; thus, in Pennsylvania and New Jersey a tenant is held to be entitled to the grain sown in the autumn before the expiration of his lease, and coming to maturity in the following summer; Mitch. R. P. 24; 64 Pa. 142; 2 South. 460; 13 Conn. 59; 24 N. J. L. 89; while in Delaware the same custom is said to prevail with respect to wheat, but not as to oats; 1 Harr. Del. 522; and trespass will lie against one who interferes with the land to the injury of the outgoing tenant; 6 Houst. 684.

Of a similar nature would be the tenant's right to remove the manure made upon the farm during the last year of the tenancy. Good husbandry requires that it should either be used by the tenant on the farm, or left by him for the use of his successor; and such is the general rule on the subject in England as well as in this country; 15 Wend. 169; 2 Hill, N. Y. 143; 2 N. Chipm. 115; 1 Pick. 871. A different rule has been laid down in North Carolina; 2 Ired. 820; but it is clearly at variance with the whole current of American authorities upon this point. See MANURE. Straw, however, is incidental to the crop to which it belongs, and may be removed in all cases where the crop may be; 22 Barb. 568; 1 W. & S. 509.

There are sometimes, also, mutual privileges, in the nature of emblements, which are founded on the common usage of the neighborhood where there is no express agreement to the contrary, applicable to both outgoing and incoming tenants. Thus, the outgoing tenant may by custom be entitled to the privilege of retaining possession of the land on which his away-going crops are sown, with the use of the barns and stables for housing and carrying them away; while the incoming tenant has the privilege of entering during the continuance of the old tenancy for the purposes of ploughing and manuring the land. But, independently of any custom, every tenant who is entitled to emblements has a right of ingress, egress, and regress to cut and carry them away, and the same privilege will belong to his vendee,—neither of them, however, having any exclusive right of possession. See 46 Barb. 278; Tayl. Landl. & T. § 543; Woodf. Landl. & T. 754. LANDLORD AND TENANT; WAY-GOING CROP.

EMBRACEOR. In Criminal Law. He who, when a matter is on trial between party and party, comes to the bar with one of the parties, and, having received some reward so to do, speaks in the case or privily labors the jury, or stands there to survey or overlook them, thereby to put them in fear and doubt of the matter. But persons learned in the law may speak in a cause for their clients. Co. Litt. 380; Termes de la Ley.

EMBRACERY. In Criminal Law. An attempt to corrupt or influence a jury, or any way incline them to be more favorable to one side than to the other, by money, promises, threats, or persuasions, whether the juror on whom such attempt is made give any verdict or not, or whether the verdict be true or false. Hawk. Pl. Cr. 250; Bacon, Abr. Juries, M 3; Co. Litt. 157 b, 389 a; Noy 102; 11 Mod. 111, 118; 5 Cow. 503; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 389; 2 Nev. 268; 5 Day 260. 8 Vt. 57; 20 Vt. 9.

Such an attempt is a misdemeanor at common law; 1 Cr. Cr. L. 326.

EMENDA (Lat.). Amends. That which is given in reparation or satisfaction for a trespass committed; or, among the Saxons, a compensation for a crime. Spelman, Gloss.

EMENDALS. In English Law. This ancient word is said to be used in the accounts of the inner temple, where so much in emendals at the foot of an account signifies so much in bank, in stock, for the supply of emergencies. Cunningham, Law Dict. But Spelman says it is what is contributed for the reparation of losses. Cowel.

EMENDATIO PANIS ET CERVISIE. The power of supervising and correcting the weights and measures of bread and ale. Cowel.

EMERGENCY. An unexpected condition demanding immediate action. English.

EMIGRANT. One who quits his country for any lawful reason, with a design to settle elsewhere, and who takes his family and property, if he has any, with him. Vattel, b. 1, c. 10, § 224. See 2 Cra. 302.

EMIGRANT AGENT. A person engaged in hiring laborers to be employed beyond the limits of the State (as used in a revenue act of the State of Georgia). 179 U. S. 270.

EMIGRATION. The act of removing from one place to another.

It is sometimes used in the same sense as expatriation; but there is some difference in the signification. Expatriation is the act of abandoning one's country; while emigration is, perhaps not strictly, applied to the act of removing from one part of the country to another. See 2 Kent 84, 44; EXPATRIATION. See IMMIGRATION.

EMINENCE. A title of honor given to cardinals.

EMINENT DOMAIN. The superior right of property subsisting in a sovereignty, by which private property may in certain cases be taken or its use controlled for the public benefit, without regard to the wishes of the owner.

The power to take private property for public use. 6 How. 586.

The right of every government to appropriate otherwise than by taxation and its police authority (which are distinct powers), private property for public use. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 584.

Different theories are advanced as to the precise nature of the power, and it has been defined to be the right retained by the people or government over the estate of individuals, to reclaim the same for public use,—a kind of reserved right or estate remaining in the sovereign as paramount to the individual title. This conception of the right was at one time very generally accepted. The result of this view is derived from the fact that, theoretically at least, as so much of the original proprietorship retained by the sovereign power in granting lands or franchises to individuals or corporations, wherever the common-law theory of original proprietorship prevails. An argument by analogy in support of this view is derived from the fact that, in the explanation of the origin of the ius publicum in 7 Cush. 90. See, also, remarks of Daniel, J.; 6 How. 588. Perhaps no better statement of this doctrine is to be found than this: "The highest and most exact idea of property remaining in the government, or in the aggregate body of the people in their sovereign capacity, giving a right to resume the possession of the property in the manner directed by the constitution and the laws of the state whenever the public good requires it." 3 Paige, Ch. 73; or, "The true theory and principle of the matter is, that the legislature resume dominion over the property, and having resumed it, instead of using it by their agents, to effect the intended public good, and to avoid entanglement in the common business of life, they re-vest it in other individuals or corporations to be used by them in such manner as to effect, directly or indirectly, or incidentally, as the case may be, the public good intended." 34 Conn. 78; see also 8 Yerg. 41; 8 Barb. 486; 118 N. Y. 276; 28 Mo. 567.

But this theory of resumption of original proprietorship is disapproved by the most authoritative writers, and with reason; the weight of authority and of argument are both against it. In this country the right is exercised by two governments, each sovereign, operating on the same property; the federal power can, upon no hypothesis, be based upon original grant in the older states, nor perhaps the state power, in the new states; a new sovereignty by acquiring territorial rights succeeds to this right over property, of which the original grant was from the prior government, and no sense in which a second time after the power has been already exercised and, upon the theory under consideration, necessarily exhausted; personal property is subject to the right, although the doctrine of reserved right cannot apply to it, while the reversion of the state will supply an argument, as it applies equally to personal property in which the state never had any title; and any paramount reserved right could be granted, but this right never can; 118 Ill. 427; 36 Conn. 196. All these considerations are inconsistent with the theory suggested and seem to leave no alternative but to recognize the right as an attribute of sovereignty and not as an incident to or estate. See Lewis, Em. Dom. § 8; Rand. Em. Dom. § 3; 32 La. 66; 2 Dev. & B. L. 451; 18 Wend. 9, 57; 2 Redf. Railw. 229.

This right is distinguished from public domain, which is property owned absolutely by the state in the same manner as an individual holds his property; 37 Am. Jur. 121; 2 Kent, Com. 339; 3 Yerg. 869; 6 How. 540; termed by Cooley "the ordinary domain of the state"; Const. Lim. 642.

The right of eminent domain is not to be confounded with cases in which there exists a sovereign right to take or destroy private property without making compensation. The familiar case of taxation is readily distinguished. An owner is not entitled to compensation for damage or loss to property taken or destroyed during war. As to the distinction between the war power and eminent domain see 13 Am. L. Reg. 263, 337, 401; Mills, Em. Dom. § 3. So property may be taken under a controlling necessity, or to prevent the spread of a fire; 12 Co. 63; 28 N. J. L. 605; 50 Tex. 614; 7 Meto. 462; 13 Minn. 88; 18 Wend. 128; or, under the police power, to abate a nuisance (q. v.); 7 Cush. 53 (in which Shaw, C. J., draws the distinction between the police power and eminent domain); 126 Mass. 433; or by restraining the owner of land from making a noxious use of it; 105 Ill. 888; or by removing sand, etc., from beaches; 11 Meto. 55; compelling railroads to erect cattle guards; 27 Vt. 140; or holding them responsible for damages by fire (q. v.) from locomotives; 41 La. 297; compelling riparian owners to keep up a levee; 2 Mart. La. N. S. 455; or changing the course of a river; 47 Cal. 536; or as a forfeiture for violation of law; 3 R. L. 64; 3 Mich. 380; 26 Pa. 287; 12 La. Ann. 432.

History and nature of the power. The phrase "eminent domain" appears to have originated with Grotius, who carefully describes its nature; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 8, n.; Mills, Em. Dom. § 5; 1 Thayer, Cas. Const. L. 945. The power is a universal one and as old as political society, and the American constitutions do not change its scope or nature but simply embody it, as described by Grotius, in positive, fundamental law.

The language of Grotius is: "We have elsewhere said, that the property of subjects is under the eminent domain of the state; so that the state, or he who acts for it, may use it, and even alienate and destroy such property; not only in case of extreme necessity, in which even private persons have a right over the property of others; but for ends of public utility, to which ends those who founded the society must be supposed to have intended that private ends should give way. But it is to be added, that when this is done, the state is bound to make good the loss to those who lose their property; and to this public purpose, among others, he who has suffered the loss must, if need be, contribute." rotius, Bel. et Pac. lib. iii. c. 20. In the last clause quoted, there seems to be an expression thus early of the doctrine which commonly forms a part of later legislation in the exercise of the right of eminent domain of the assessment of benefits on the person whose property is taken.

The term used by Grotius has been objected to by other writers, as, for example Bynkershoek, who prefers the terms imperium eminentie rather than dominium eminentie, considering the former as more accurately expressing the idea of supreme power. At the same time that he advocates the use of a terminology to give more emphatic expression to the sovereign nature and character of the power, this writer discusses the question whether it may be exercised only for necessity as he conceives Puffendorf to urge, or also on the ground of convenience, or to use the exact phrase of Grotius, utility. Bynkershoek considers either ground sufficient, but he also lays down the principle of requiring compensation not merely for a taking, but for every loss which private persons bear for the common necessity, or utility," thus anticipating the doctrine not recognized by writers of his time, but accepted by modern constitution makers, under the name of consequential damages for injury to, as well the direct loss sustained by the taking of the property. Quest. Jur. Pub. lib. ii. c. 15. Puffendorf also indicates the term employed by Grotius. He divides the term control (potestas) into dominium as used in respect to what is one's own, and imperium, with respect to what belongs to others. Accordingly he would consider that imperium eminentie is more accurate than dominium eminentie. De Jure Civ. et Gentium, lib. i. c. 1, § 19. So Heineccius says: "We confess that this use of the word is not quite apt, for the conception of dominium and that of imperium are different things; it is the latter and not the former which belongs to rulers, but he adds, that as there is no doubt about the absolute right, it is useless to condemn the word when once it has been accepted; Elem. Jur. Nat. et Gent. lib. ii. c. 8, § 108.

All these writers agree that the power is exercised as an attribute of sovereignty, and in this conclusion there is a general consensus of opinion. In a political society everything must give way to the common good; and if even the person of the citizens is subject to this rule, their property cannot be excepted. The state cannot live, or continue to administer public affairs in the most advantageous manner, if it have not the power of expropriation or dispose of every kind of property under its control. It should be presumed that when the nation takes possession of a country, property in specific things is given up to individuals only upon this reservation. So it was said by the U. S. Supreme Court: "The power to take private property for public use, generally termed the right of eminent domain, belongs to every independent government. It is an incident of sovereignty, and as said in Boon Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S., requires no constitutional recognition." Field, J., 109 U. S. 513, 518.

Blackstone rests the doctrine upon necessity, and considers the recognized right to compensation as evidence of the great regard of the law for private property; while the good of the individual must yield to that of the community, the legislature alone may interpose to compel the individual to acquiesce. Upon this interposition is not arbitrary, but upon full indemnification and equivalent for the injury thereby sustained. The nature of the transaction he states thus: "All that the legislature does, is to oblige the owner to alienate his possessions for a reasonable price; and even this is an exercise of power which the legislature is bound to use with caution, and which nothing but the legislature can perform." 1 Sharsw. Bls. Com. 139, n. 19.

This statement by Blackstone of English law is to be borne in mind hereafter in considering the nature and origin of the right to compensation. Here we have the right defined with the same limitation which, as will be seen, is sometimes claimed to rest solely on express provisions of written constitutions. And the force of this statement is strengthened not weakened, by the observation of Buiher, J., that there were many cases in which an injury is suffered by individuals for which there is no right of action, as in a case of the destruction of private property in time of war for the public defence; id.; 4 Term 704; 3 Wils. 441; 6 Taunt. 29.

Notwithstanding this recognition of the nature of the power the subject of eminent domain as understood in the United States is practically eliminated from English law and the title itself is usually not to be found in digests or text books of that country. "That there is no eminent domain in English jurisprudence," says a recent writer on the subject, "is because the power is included, and the obligation to compensate lost, in the absolutism of parliament." "The only technical term approximate to the English, is the compulsory power, as used in acts enabling municipal and other corporations to take property for their use. The multiplication of such acts led to the enactment of several general laws, notably the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (q. v.), which is a complete code of this act or one of the others of a similar class, as the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, is incorporated by reference in the various special acts." Rand. Em. Dom. § 7.

It follows of necessity that English decisions do not apply to the vast number of constitutional questions constantly arising in this country, though the adherence of English legislation to the same great principle of compensation necessarily results in producing a body of law in England covering most of the questions which are adjudicated in our own country respecting the construction and application of statutes under which the power is exercised.

The right of compensation. Though not included in the definitions of the power as usually given, the necessity for compensation is recognized by the most authoritative writers as an incident to the right, an original element of its existence, and not a superimposed limitation.

Accordingly eminent domain is said with more precision to be the right of the nation or the state, or of those to whom the power has been lawfully delegated, to condemn private property to public use, and to appropriate the ownership and possession of such property for such use, upon paying to the owner a due compensation, to be ascertained according to law; Black, Const. L. 350.

Nearly if not all of the American constitutions provide for compensation. Professor Thayer states that "now (1895) only three constitutions, New Hampshire, North Carolina, and Virginia are without a clause expressly requiring compensation." The provisions of the several constitutions are given in Randolph, Em. Dom. 401 to 416, and Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 14 to 53 (the latter including the prior as well as the last state constitutions). With respect to compensation, Kent says: "This principle, in American constitutional jurisprudence, is founded in natural equity, and is laid down by jurists as an acknowledged principle of universal law;" 2 Com. 339.

It would seem to be the most satisfactory conclusion both upon reason and authority that neither the right of the state to take nor the right of the individual to compensation required a constitutional assertion. The right to take private property for public use does not depend on constitutional provisions, but is an attribute of sovereignty; 2 Harr. N. J. 129; 2 Dev. & Bat. 451; it (the right) exists, and the only limitation upon its exercise is that imposed by the state or federal constitution; 5 Del. Ch. 524.

So also the right to compensation is an incident to the exercise of the power, inseparably connected with it; 17 N. J. L. 129; "this is an affirmation of a great doctrine established by the common law for the protection of private property;" 2 Story, Const. § 1790; "the obligation attaches to the exercise of the power, though it is not provided for by the state constitution, or that of the United States had not enjoined it;" Bald. C. C. 220. "If by the assertion that this right existed at common law independent of the declaration of rights, is meant that compensation in such case is required by a plain dictate of natural justice, it must be conceded. The bill of rights declares a great principle; the particular law prescribes a practical rule by which the remedy for the violation of right is to be sought and afforded;" Shaw, C. J., in 12 Cush. 473. In New Hampshire, although the constitution did not contain an express provision requiring compensation, "yet it has been construed by the courts, in view of the spirit and tenor of the whole instrument, as prohibiting such taking without compensation; and it is understood to be the settled law of the state, that the legislature cannot constitutionally authorize such taking without compensation;" 51 N. H. 504. It is a condition precedent to its exercise under a statute that it make reasonable provision for compensation to the owner of the property taken; 159 U. S. 380; 2 Johns. Ch. 162.

There are dicta which countenance the opinion that compensation is not of the essence of eminent domain, that the usual constitutional clause is restrictive, not declaratory, so that, were it omitted, the state could properly take property without paying for it; Rand. Em. Dom. § 226, citing 98 U. S. 403; 109 id. 513; 21 Conn. 818; 5 Del. Ch. 524; 17 Wend. 649; 54 N. H. 590, 647. In one of these cases the language used is "the provision found in the federal and state constitutions for just compensation for property taken is no part of the power itself, but merely a limitation upon the use of it, a condition upon which it may be exercised;" 109 U. S. 513.

One of the leading text writers on the subject takes this view; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 10; and argues it with great earnestness, treating it as the same question discussed by Sedgwick and Cooley and referred to supra under the title Constitutional (q. v.), whether there are limitations of legislative power other than those contained in the constitutions, federal and state. The real question involved in the relation of compensation to eminent domain is a different one. It is not whether the sovereign powers of government exercised by American state legislatures are subject to definite limitations embodied in the written constitution, but what is the sovereign power which we term eminent domain, as recognized and exercised by governments long before written constitutions were known. It is true that some courts in discussing this subject have fallen into the same confusion of ideas, but the distinction none the less exists and should be borne in mind. Is it the right to take private property arbitrarily, or only to take it on making compensation? Lewis thinks "the question has lost most of its practical interest from the fact that all states except one (North Carolina), now have an express limitation in their organic law touching the exercise of this power." It is submitted, however, that the precise definition and true limitation of so automatic a governmental power can never become a matter of indifference. So long as one state constitution is silent on the subject of compensation it remains a practical question in American constitutional law and the existence of a reserved power to amend or abolish any existing constitution, coupled with the prevalent tendency to attack and impair the right to private property, must necessarily keep it such, independently of the theoretical interest in maintaining correct definitions of the inherent rights of sovereignty.

Suggestions in the line of the cases cited by Randolph and the views expressed by Lewis, led to practical results in but few cases:—In South Carolina land was taken for roads without compensation; 2 Bay 34; 3 Hill 191; but in New York, taking wild land without compensation was held unconstitutional; 19 Barb. 1. In New Jersey and Pennsylvania, the subject rested on a statutory rather than a constitutional basis, because the grants by the proprietors included an extra allowance for roads; 42 N. J. L. 619, 30 N. J. 302; and this was held compensation; 100 Pa. 345; 101 id. 638. Under the New Jersey constitution, land might be taken for highways without compensation until otherwise directed by the legislature. In Louisiana land on the Mississippi River can be taken without compensation for the construction of a public levee under the old French law, and this applies to the land of a citizen of another state, provided he receive the same measure of right as citizens of Louisiana in regard to their property similarly situated; 180 U. S. 432.

In Thayer's Cases on Constitutional Law the editor discusses this subject in a very interesting note and reaches the somewhat metaphysical conclusion that the right to compensation is not a component part of the right to take, though it arises at the same time and the latter cannot exist without it, the two being compared to shadow and substance.

He argues that the right of the state springs from the necessity of government, while the obligation to reimburse stands upon the natural rights of the individual. "These two, therefore, have not the same origin; they do not come, for instance, from any implied contract between the state and the individual, that the former shall have the property, if it will make compensation; the right is no mere right of pre-emption and has no condition of compensation annexed to it, either precedent or subsequent. But there is a right to take, and attached to it, as an incident, an obligation to make compensation; this latter, morally speaking, follows the other, and is not distinct from it, but it is distinct from it, and flows from another source." From this he argues that for the taking the citizen cannot complain; if recompense is not made, the duty of the sovereign is violated and the individual "has an eternal right to demand, which can never be blotted out except only by satisfaction; but this claim is for compensation, and not for his former property," and, "in the absence of constitutional provisions," the loss "must be regarded as damnum absque injuria." 1 Cas. Const. L. 903, note.

The distinction between this theory and the doctrine that the right to compensation is an inherent attribute rather than a subsequent limitation of the original right would seem to be rather ingenious than practical. The citations in the same note from the civilians show clearly that, in their view, compensation was essential, and even in the states whose organic law was, at the time of the decision, either silent or contained merely a general declaration as to private rights the necessity of compensation has been recognized; Rand. Em. Dom. § 227, citing 3 N. H. 524; 35 id. 134; 1 Md. Ch. 248; Baldw. C. C. 205; 17 N. J. L. 129; 70 N. C. 550; 111 id. 278; 18 Ark. 196; see also Monongahela Navigation Case, 149 U. S. 312; 12 Cush. 473. The mistaken idea that the fifth amendment of the constitution of the United States, applied to the states, seems to have contributed to this opinion in some cases; 2 Johns. Ch. 162; 1 N. J. Eq. 106. "The true doctrine is, I think, the writer's opinion," says the author last cited, "that which requires the payment of compensation whether it be expressly enjoined or not. The modern concept of a constitutional state as realized in the United States has no room for separation of the individual." The same view is supported by Mills, Em. Dom. § 1.

Whatever view may be taken of the general doctrine of the law on this subject the necessity of compensation is firmly imbedded in American constitutional law.

It may be considered settled that the exercise of the right is not justifiable, where the statute fails to provide compensation; and the courts will, in general, substantially declare such an act unconstitutional; 2 Kent 389, n.; dicta in 4 Term 794; 1 Rice 888;

8 Leigh 887; 44 N. H. 143; 47 Me. 845; 18 Tex. 585; 21 Ohio St. 687; 26 Ill. 436; 89 Ga. 205; 44 La. Ann. 173; 116 Mo. 114; 148 U. S. 312; 133 id. 553. See contra, 3 Hill, S. C. 100; 54 Fed. Rep. 559. This compensation must be in money; 3 Mass. 125; 2 Dall. 304; 44 Cal. 51; 66 Ill. 329; 89 N. J. L. 665.

In constitutional construction the words "just," "ample," "full," "adequate," "due," etc., prefixed to the word "compensation," has been said to lend no appreciable additional weight; Rand. Em. Dom. § 223; but much stress has often been put upon it by courts. The word "just" in the fifth amendment excludes the taking into account as an element in the compensation any supposed benefit that the owner may receive in common with all from the public uses to which his private property is appropriated and leaves it to stand as a declaration that no private property shall be appropriated to public uses unless a full and exact equivalent for it be returned to the owner; 148 U. S. 326. The word "just" is not used as an antithesis of unjust, but "evidently to intensify the meaning of the word compensation;" 8 Nev. 165; it means recompense "all circumstances considered;" 5 Blackf. 384, "to save the owner from suffering in his property or estate . . . as far as compensation in money can go;" 60 Me. 290; "making the owner good by an equivalent in money;" 27 Wis. 478.

The federal power. All lands held by private owners everywhere within the geographical limits of the United States are subject to the authority of the general government to take them for such objects as are germane to the execution of the powers granted to it; 135 U. S. 641.

The right of eminent domain is one of the powers of the federal government essential to its independent existence and perpetuity. Among the purposes for which it is exercised are the acquisition of lands for forts, armories, arsenals, navy yards, light-houses, custom-houses, post-offices, court-houses, and other public uses. The right may be exercised within the states without application to them for permission to exercise it; 91 U. S. 387; the fact that the power has not been exercised adversely does not disprove its existence, nor does the fact that in some instances the states have condemned lands for the use of the general government; id. It is a right belonging to a sovereignty to take private property for its own public uses but not for those of another; hence the power of the United States must be complete in itself, it can neither be enlarged nor diminished, nor can the manner of its exercise be regulated by the state whose consent is not a condition precedent to its enjoyment; id.

This right exists in the District of Columbia, the territories, and lands within the United States acquired through cession; 4 Cra. C. C. 75; 147 U. S. 282.

The power of eminent domain in the general government as exercised for local purposes in the District of Columbia is the same as that exercised by a state within its own territory; 147 U. S. 282; there and in the territories it exists in all cases in which a similar power could be exercised by the states; 101 U. S. 129. It is among the powers derived by the territorial governments immediately from the United States; 2 Mich. 437; 20 Pac. Rep. (Ariz.) 376; 1 Chand. Wis. 71.

Within the states the United States has the right of eminent domain for federal purposes; 91 U. S. 387; 135 id. 641. This power has been exercised to condemn land for military posts; 7 How. 185; fortification; 18 Cal. 229; navigation work; 59 Fed. Rep. 9; light-house and coast survey purposes; 10 Cal. 229; 54 N. H. 590; 160 U. S. 499; the construction of interstate railroads; 127 U. S. 1; water supply; 14 Md. 444; post-office; 91 U. S. 367; 106 Mass. 856; a national cemetery at Gettysburg; 160 U. S. 668. The weight of authority is in favor of the exercise of the right by the United States directly when property is required for federal purposes and not through the right of eminent domain of the state; 14

Md. 444; 96 N. Y. 237; though the latter method is upheld in some cases: 1 Barb. 24; 108 Mass. 356; 54 N. H. 590; but it is held that the United States may delegate to a tribunal created under the laws of the state the power to fix and determine the amount of compensation to be paid by the federal government for private property taken by it in the exercise of the right of eminent domain; 109 U. S. 513. The United States circuit court has jurisdiction to entertain proceedings instituted by the United States to appropriate land for a postoffice; 91 U. S. 367. In this case there was no act of congress relating to the subject except the appropriation of money, and a direction to the secretary of the treasury to purchase a site, and the jurisdiction was objected to. The supreme court held that the proceedings were a suit at law and cognizable under the general provisions of the judiciary act. As to the federal right, see 14 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 30; 15 Am. L. Reg. 193; 91 U. S. 367. The state cannot condemn for the United States and bind the latter as to compensation; 23 Mich. 471, in which the whole subject of the exercise of this right by state and federal governments was considered by Cooley, J. Proceedings may be in the United States courts, or in state courts, in the name of the United States, and state practice should be followed; 96 N. Y. 227; 48 Wis. 385; 109 U. S. 513; or may by act of congress be made to follow some state statute; 82 Pa. 882.

Public uses of the federal government have been held to be public uses of the state; 14 Md. 444.

Proceedings under state laws for condemnation of lands, involving the ascertainment by judicial proceedings of the value of property to be paid as compensation, may be removed to the United States court; 124 U. S. 197; 75 Fed. Rep. 84; if they take the form of a proceeding before the courts; 98 U. S. 403; the preliminary proceedings are in the nature of an inquest and not a "suit," but when transferred into the state court by appeal it becomes one; id.; 115 id. 1, 18. As to removal of such proceedings, see 25 Am. L. Reg. 183.

An interesting question referred to but not decided by the supreme court is whether a state can exercise this right as to lands of the United States not held for actual public uses, without the consent of congress or of an officer having power of disposal of public lands. It has been decided in the affirmative; 6 Porter, Ala. 472; and it was also held that an abandoned military reservation is part of the public lands and that the state may use them to construct public roads or bridges, by the right of eminent domain; 6 McLean 517; but a municipal corporation has no right to open streets through property of the United States, adjacent to the city, although the ground had been laid out in lots and streets by the government; 7 How. 185. In the latter case it was said that such power would exist as to land "purchased by the United States as a mere proprietor, and not reserved or appropriated to any special purpose;" but in a later case this and other like expressions were characterized as dicta, and it was said that the view could hardly be reconciled with special railroad and general legislation of congress, and that "when that question shall be brought into judgment here, it will require and receive the careful consideration of the court;" 117 U. S. 151.

Exercise of the power through agents. The right of eminent domain is also an attribute or part of the sovereignty of the states, and is by them exercised for a great and constantly increasing variety of purposes, some of which are for governmental uses either of the state at large or of local municipal bodies, or by private persons or corporations authorized to exercise some function of such public character, technically known as a public use. When this is conferred upon private persons or corporations the right is termed by some writers the delegated power of eminent domain; 4 Thomp. Corp. ch. cxxii.; and such person or corporation is the agent of the state for its exercise. Strictly speaking it is not accurate to say that the state delegates a right of sovereignty, of which it cannot divest itself, hence it is more exact to speak of it as exercising the power through an agent. While corporations are usually selected for such agency, it may be and sometimes is conferred upon individuals; 5 Ohio 485; 50 N. H. 591; 4 Wend. 687; 70 Cal. 159; and where incorporation and a franchise were granted to an individual "and associates" it was held that he need not associate any one with him; 8 Mo. 365. It has also been held that an individual as purchaser of a railroad and franchises at the foreclosure sale acquired the right to condemn lands; 98 U. S. 217; 89 La. Ann. 417. In one case it is said that a statute neither did nor could confer this right "upon private persons, but only corporations organized for public purposes can be clothed with such privileges;" 80 Pa. 59; but this expression, so far as it concerns the power of the legislature, was obiter; and a case often cited with this only decides that under a general act, then under construction, the power could not be exercised by individuals, because there was no provision of law for its exercise by individuals; 10 Ohio St. 372.

The exercise of the power by such agencies is governed in the main by the same principles and limitations as when it is directly exerted by the federal or state government, and the exceptions to this rule readily disclose themselves in the consideration of the natural divisions of the subject. When its exercise by a private corporation is authorized it has been termed not a franchise but a means to the enjoyment of corporate franchises; 10 Ohio St. 873; but the contrary view was expressed by Bradley, J., in 127 U. S. 1, and it is remarked by a recent writer that "a power conferred upon certain corporations, which is not possessed by the citizens generally, and which is in derogation of their rights, so nearly resembles a franchise as to justify its treatment" under that title; 4 Thomp. Corp. § 5597. The use of the term franchise is not defined, by those who most use it, with sufficient precision to be conclusive against either view. It is as much a franchise, if one at all, if exercised by an individual as a corporation, though the writer quoted seems to overlook the possibility of this. It is, however, a grant of power or privilege from the sovereign to the citizen or subject, to do what would but for the grant be unlawful, and it undoubtedly does come within the usually accepted definition of the word franchise (q. v.). As is true with respect to franchises generally, the grant of the power is never presumed unless the intent to part with it is clearly expressed; id. § 5598; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 240; 93 Pa. 160; 74 Ga. 570; 42 Mo. 225; 41 N. J. Eq. 43; and its exercise by the state may determine a preceding contract made by the state without impairing the obligation of such contract, the right itself being always reserved by implication, if not expressly; 84 Va. 371.

It is no objection to a grant of the power to a corporation that the latter is seeking to effect its own private gain; 4 Thomp. Corp. § 5599; for that is said to be merely compensation for the risk assumed for the benefit of the public; 17 N. H. 47. When unrestrained by constitutional provision, the discretion of the legislature in selecting agents through whom the power is to be exercised is absolute. In a state whose constitution prohibits its exercise by foreign corporations they cannot or course act unless domesticated in the state; 53 Fed. Rep. 637; but otherwise they may do so; 89 N. Y. 171; 148 N. Y. 411; 83 Pa. 175; 145 Mass. 450; 57 Ia. 560; 81 Mo. 126; 69 Hun 615; but a constitutional incapacity cannot be avoided by acting through a domestic corporation; 27 Neb. 699 (see 22 Neb. 628; 59 Ia. 568); though by consolidating with a domestic corporation it may exercise the power; 47 Mich. 456; 36 Minn. 85; as there by the consolidated company becomes a corporation of the state; 83 Neb. 171.

mands its exercise. See remarks of Woodbury, J., and cases cited by him in 6 How. 545. But the practice of all the states and of the federal government, since this decision, in condemning land for purposes of public convenience but not necessity, has been so frequent that the legislative control over the necessity and the particular location is almost universally conceded. Mills, Em. Dom. § 11. In a proceeding to condemn land, the term "necessary" does not mean that it is indispensable or imperative, but only that it is convenient and useful; and if an improvement is useful, and a convenience and benefit to the public sufficient to warrant the expense in making it, then it is necessary; 91 Mich. 149; but it is no ground for a right to take land that its resources could be utilized at a much less expense than the land already owned; 64 Cal. 123. In 4 Thomp. Corp. § 5598, in concluding a discussion of the various theories as to what uses are public uses, the author says: "But it is a sound conclusion that the use must be a public use in the sense that it is open to such members of the public as may choose to use it upon the performance of reasonable or proper conditions; or in the sense of satisfying a great public want or exigency. On the other hand, where the public use is not compulsory, but is optional with the private corporation seeking the condemnation, it is not a public use." In U. S. v. Gettysburg Electric Railway Co., 160 U. S. 683, it was said: "The constitution provides that private property shall not be taken for public uses without just compensation. These words are a limitation, the same in effect as 'You shall not exercise this power except for public use.'"

The legislature cannot so determine that the use is public as to make its determination conclusive on the courts, and the existence of a public use in any class of cases is a question for the courts; Mills, Em. Dom. § 10; 44 Vt. 648; 59 Wis. 364; 21 W. Va. 584; 42 Ohio St. 202; 87 Md. 687; 51 Cal. 269; 84 Ala. 811.

The Missouri constitution provides, as do those of Colorado, Mississippi, and Washington, that it shall be a judicial question whether the use contemplated is public, and that question will be determined without the aid of a jury; 91 Mo. 54.

The presumption is in favor of the public character of a use declared so by the legislature; 79 Pa. 257; 21 W. Va. 584; and unless it is clear that it is not possible for the use to be public, the courts cannot interfere; Mills, Em. Dom. § 10.

In an early case it was said that in general the question whether a particular structure, as a bridge, or a lock, canal, or road, is for the public use, is a question for the legislature, and it may be presumed to have been decided by them; 12 Cush. 475; citing 4 Pick. 463; but in a later case when this position was broadly urged, it was held to be obviously untenable, and that where the power was exercised, it necessarily involved an inquiry into the rightful authority of the legislature under the organic law, and that the legislature had no power to determine finally upon the extent of its authority over private rights; 16 Gray 417. In this case what is probably the true doctrine was stated, that it is the duty of the courts to make all reasonable presumptions in favor of the validity of the legislative act. But this is simply the application to this particular subject of the general presumption of the constitutionality of legislative acts.

This right of the courts to determine the question of public use was maintained in 103 N. Y. 375; but if the court determines the matter in question to be a public use, their power is exhausted and the extent to which property shall be taken for it is wholly in the legislative discretion; 147 U. S. 232. Whether the necessity exists for taking the property is a legislative question; 87 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 487.

The grant of the right is a determination on the part of the legislature that the object is necessary; 31 N. J. Eq. 475; and of this it is the judge; 80 Ky. 259; 98 N. Y. 109; 25 Mo. 540; and parties cannot be heard on the question of necessity; 127 Mass. 408. If it is a public use there is no restraint on the legislative discretion and the judicial function is gone; Mills, Em. Dom. § 11. If the use is certainly public courts will not interfere; only when there is an attempt to evade the law and procure condemnation for private uses will courts declare it void; Mills, Em. Dom. § 11; 17 W. Va. 612. The fact that a railroad has located its line across certain land, is prima facie proof that it is necessary for it to take that land for the use of its road; 139 Ill. 151. Whether the land is reasonably required is a question of fact to be determined by the court or jury, and the burden of proof is on the plaintiff; 92 Cal. 538.

It has been held that when under the constitution a federal question arises, the supreme court will determine the law without reference to state decisions; 10 How. 433. See 16 Wall. 678; 59 N. Y. 128. But in determining what is a taking of property, the federal courts will accept the definition of the word property by the state court, where it is clearly settled; 18 Wall. 168; 147 U. S. 248; 94 id. 324; 10 Wall. 497; even following reversals by the latter; 2 Black 599; 6 Pet. 291; 16 Wall. 678.

What is a public use. Property taken for public use need not be taken by the public as a body into its direct possession, but for public usefulness, utility, or advantage, or purposes productive of general benefit or great advantage to the community; 33 Conn. 532. It is not necessary that the entire community, or any considerable portion of it, should participate in an improvement to constitute a public use; 16 Gray 417; 58 Mo. 175; it may be limited to the inhabitants of a small locality; but the benefit must be in common, not to particular persons or estates; 18 Cal. 229. See Mills, Em. Dom. § 12. If a considerable number will be benefited the use is public; 75 Me. 91; 97 Ind. 79; as a school available for use by a portion of the community taken to pay for the property taken; 33 Vt. 271.

The legislature determines the number of people to be benefited to make the use public; 2 Stew. & P. 199; but the incidental benefit of additional facilities for business, etc., will not make use public; 97 N. Y. 42.

It has been judicially decided that the following are public uses:—an almshouse; 7 N. Y. 314; a public bath; 101 N. Y. 132; a schoolhouse; 117 Mass. 584; 33 Vt. 271; 7 R. I. 545; 48 Mo. 243; 68 Pa. 170; a market; 28 Hun 515; 49 Mich. 249; telegraph and telephone lines; 103 Ill. 401; 53 N. J. L. 841; 43 id. 381; 136 Mass. 75; 53 Ala. 211; 92 Cal. 528; water-works for a town; 4 Gray 500; 126 Mass. 416; 67 Col. 659; water supply for a town; 27 Ala. 104; 139 Mass. 183; 55 N. J. L. 235; the improvement of the navigation of a river; 12 Cush. 475; and the creation of a wholly artificial system of navigation by canals; 12 Cra. C. C. 599; 20 Johns. 783; 41 Ind. 884; 89 N. H. 404; Wright, Ohio 804; the criterion being, whether the public may use by right, or only by permission, and not to whom the tolls are paid; 1 Duv. Ky. 372; cemeteries; 46 Vt. 218; 108 Mass. 106; 20 Conn. 468; even if the price of the lots therein differ; 58 id. 551; but not if used exclusively for members of a private corporation; 68 N. Y. 569; a restaurant at a summer resort; 91 N. Y. 552; parks; 127 Mass. 408; 45 N. Y. 234; 99 id. 569; 75 Me. 91; 55 Wis. 328; 61 Ill. 115; 117 U. S. 379; 147 id. 282; even if paid for by a county, though beneficial only or mainly to a neighboring city; 58 Mo. 175; the erection of a memorial hall or monumental statues, arches, and the like, the publication of town histories, decorations on public buildings, parks designed to provide for fresh air or recreation, educate the public taste, or inspire patriotism; 153 Mass. 266. A highway is a public use; 11 Ind. 420; 108 Mass. 120; but it must connect with another highway; 108 N. Y. 875; 64 Wis. 538; 84 Pa. 90; though at one end only; 66 Wis. 429; 89 Conn. 231; 24 N. Y. 559. It may, however, terminate on private property; 80 N. J. L. 226; 87 Ill. 189; 43 Conn. 437; or at a river; 53 N. H. 530; 125 Ind. 582; or at a church;

68 Pa. 471. So the improvement of a harbor is a public use, (but not the extension of harbor lines to prevent the placing of buildings on either side of a bridge); 60 Conn. 278; and the reclamation of flat land; 1 Thayer, Cas. Const. L. 1025, n. citing cases. Gas works; 63 Barb. 437; 123 Pa. 874; 2 R. I. 15; a state military encampment; 64 N. J. L. 268; a public urinal; 180 Mass. 170, are public uses.

Other instrumentalities of commerce held to be public uses are, pipe lines for the transportation of oil or natural gas; 5 W. Va. 333; dams for booms used in logging; 3 Dill. 485; 56 Me. 443; 57 N. H. 110; see also 98 U. S. 403; 38 Minn. 534; 65 Pa. 242; a flume for this transportation of lumber; 16 Ore. 67. As to the condemnation of land to facilitate mining operations there is a conflict of decisions. In some of the states the courts have refused to permit it; 51 Cal. 269; 73 id. 482; 84 Pa. 90; 13 Fed. Rep. 753; while in others they have considered it justifiable on the ground of public utility; 59 Ga. 419; 15 Nev. 147; and the owner of a mine may have land condemned for a railroad for the transportation of the products of his mine to the nearest thoroughfare by rail or water, provided such a railway shall be free to all who wish to use it; 32 Pa. 169; 47 N. J. L. 518; 37 Md. 537; 41 Fed. Rep. 294; and this latter provision will be implied from the statute authorizing the condemnation; 63 Ia. 28; but it has been held that a mine-owner cannot condemn land solely for the transportation of his own products; 56 Pa. 413; 70 id. 210; 118 Ill. 427; 40 Ohio St. 504; or to take water to the mines; 63 Cal. 73.

The right to condemn land for mill sites has been frequently granted; 3 Blackf. 286; 3 Yerg. 41; 12 Pick. 487; 12 Cush. 475; 12 Mete. 182; 44 Vt. 648; 1 N. J. Eq. 694; 33 Conn. 532. In the last case it was urged that it was against public policy to allow such great agencies as streams capable of propelling machinery to go to waste, and that to utilize such power, even for the erection of private mills, promotes the wealth of the state and is of incidental benefit to the people. But although courts have recognized this right to a certain extent, 15 Wall. 500, it has been with reluctance and it will not now probably be sustained; Mills, Em. Dom. § 15; it has been doubted; 12 Wis. 213; and by some denied; 40 Me. 317; 3 Barb. 42; 84 Ala. 311; 35 Mich. 333, in which, after reviewing the authorities, Judge Cooley holds the question not one of necessity but of comparative cost. A general statute, delegating to individuals the power to condemn land and locate mills, was held unconstitutional; 42 Ga. 500.

A railroad is a public use; 135 U. S. 641; 20 Fla. 579; 9 N. Y. 588; 2 Harring. 514; 3 Paige 45; 2 Mich. 427; 43 N. Y. 137; 143 id. 87; even where used for freight only; 47 N. J. L. 43; so also are all appurtenances essential to the reasonable, convenient, and proper construction, maintenance, and operation of the road, such as yard-room; 46 N. Y. 187; 84 Vt. 484; and terminals; 66 Me. 26; turnouts, engine-houses, depots, shops, turntables; 17 Ill. 123; 4 Ohio St. 308; and repair shops, stock-yards; 139 U. S. 128; 49 Mo. 185; paint-shop, lumber, and timber sheds; 18 Ill. 824; wharves; 77 N. Y. 248; a place of deposit for waste earth; 8 Phila. 145; but not shops for manufacturing new rolling stock; 48 N. Y. 546; 6 How. 507; 84 Vt. 484; or tenement-houses for employees; 43 N. Y. 137; 23 N. J. L. 510; as to an ordinary warehouse, it was doubted; 4 Coldw. 419; 59 Pa. 23; but a building for handling freight was not a mere warehouse; 77 N. Y. 248; so land for a track to an elevator could be taken; 47 N. Y. 150; but not for a railroad constructed solely to convey passengers to see the Niagara River and whirlpool for revenue to a private person; 108 N. Y. 375. See Lewis, Em. Dom. § 170; Rand, Em. Dom. § 45.

It is not a public use to provide for fencing a large tract of land subject to floods which carried off the fences; 12 Bush 312; or to acquire swamp land and build docks, warehouses, factories, etc.; 96 N. Y. 42; or to settle private controversies concerning title by transferring the land of one to another; 2 Dall. 804; 1 S. & R. 54. The latter cases arose under legislation to settle titles and adjust controversies in Pennsylvania under the Connecticut grant.

It is settled that the legislature cannot authorize the taking of property for a private use, but the decisions conflict as to the case of private ways, or roads laid out under statutes existing in many states. By many courts they are held unconstitutional as being a private use; 4 Hill 140; 25 Ia. 540; 82 id. 358; 43 Ind. 455; 27 Mo. 378; 40 Ill. 175; but in others such roads are held to be a public use, and the word private is construed as a word of classification and not technical or describing the use; 82 Cal. 241; 83 id. 507; 4 Harring. 580; 11 Vt. 600; 84 Ala. 311; 4 Ohio St. 494; 108 Mass. 202; 84 Pa. 90; 77 id. 39; 22 N. J. L. 366.

The latest case in the United States Supreme Court thus expresses the general principle:—"The taking by a state of the private property of one person without the owner's consent for the private use of another is not due process of law and is a violation of the Fourteenth Article of Amendment of the Constitution of the United States." An act authorizing a board of transportation to require a railroad corporation to grant to private persons a location on the right of way of a railroad for the purpose of erecting a third elevator is invalid; 164 U. S. 403. The prohibition is against taking without due process of law. So at the same term the court say:—"There is no specific prohibition of the Federal Constitution which acts upon the states with regard to their taking private property for any but a public use;" 164 U. S. 112.

What is a public use, for which private property may be taken by due process of law, depends upon the particular facts and circumstances connected with the particular subject-matter; 112 Id. See notes on this subject in which the cases are collected; 91 Am. Dec. 585; 8 Am. St. Rep. 503.

What may be taken. Every kind of property may be taken under this power. It "is attribute of sovereignty, and whatever exists in any form, whether tangible or intangible, may be subjected to the exercise of its power, and may be seized and appropriated to public uses when necessity demands it." Lewis, Em. Dom. § 262; 87 Ill. 317; 324; 39 Ala. 307; 36 Conn. 196; 41 Ind. 334; 111 Mass. 125. The general rule to be gathered from all the authorities, considered together, is, that a legislative grant of power to condemn property, expressed in general terms, confers on the grantee power to take all kinds of property except property already devoted to public use and necessary for the exercise of such use; 27 Cent. L. J. 207; it makes no difference whether corporeal property, as land, or incorporeal, as a franchise, is to be affected; 14 Wend. 51; 1 Baldw. C. C. 205; 160 U. S. 168; see 1 Rice 883; 11 N. H. 19; 17 Conn. 454; 11 Pet. 420; 8 N. H. 393; 3 Hill, S. C. 109; 8 Dana 289; 5 W. & S. 171; 2 Miss. 21; 130 N. Y. 249; 154 Mass. 579; 68 Miss. 806; 92 Cal. 528. The power has been held to exist, to build a railroad over basins maintained by a water power company for public purposes, and its franchise is not thereby destroyed; 23 Pick. 360; to take for a public road the property, easement, and franchise of a bridge company; 6 How. 507; to build a railroad over the land of a gas company not then in use but likely to become necessary; 63 N. Y. 326; over the lands and right of way of a canal company; 11 Leigh 42; 14 Ill. 314; over lands of a state asylum for deaf and dumb; 3 Ind. 421; over a turnpike which would not be materially injured; 21 Vt. 290; but not over lands, not necessary for the railway, owned and used by the state for an institution for the blind; 43 Ill. 303. In a proceeding by a railroad company to condemn for terminal warehouses the land of a steamboat company, the test whether the defendant held its land for such use as to exempt it from condemnation was said to be not what the defendant "does or may choose to do, but what under the law it must do, and whether a public trust is impressed upon it. It does not so hold its property impressed with a trust for the public use unless its charter puts that character upon it and so that it cannot be shaken off; 99 N. Y. 12. Any property belonging to a railway not in actual use or necessary to the proper exercise of the franchise thereof may be taken for the purpose of another railroad under a general power; 17 W. Va. 812; 112 Ill. 599; 63 Barb. 151; 139 Mass. 277; 140 Pa. 297; but not where the loss of the property to be taken is necessary to the exercise of the franchise of its owner; 81 Ill. 523; 8 Ore. 164. The same general principles are applied to cases where a municipal corporation attempts to condemn railroad property; if the property is not necessary to the new use and the latter is destructive of the old one it is not permitted to be taken; 23 A. & E. R. R. Cas. 38; s. c. 103 Ind. 486; 50 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 1077; otherwise, if it will leave the franchise unimpaired; 39 N. J. L. 28. A market house has been condemned for a railway terminal station, reached by an elevated railroad, and its approaches; 142 Pa. 580; but one corporation cannot take the franchise of another which is in use unless expressly authorized by the legislature, and then only by regular condemnation, and cannot take it at all, if this will materially affect its use; 53 Fed. Rep. 667. So a street may be taken; 2 L. R. A. 59; 12 N. J. L. 133; a bridge; 39 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 36; or land in custody of the law; 14 Am. L. Rev. 131.

Where the power in a charter to condemn lands is limited so as to exclude land or property of any other corporation existing under the law of the state, this restriction was not confined to lands of corporations existing at the passage of the act, but applies to those thereafter incorporated; and another corporation which acquired lands after the first corporation had filed a survey thereof according to the requirements of the laws, but before any petition for the appointment of commissioners had been presented, could claim exemption from condemnation under the limitations; 32 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 74.

See review of cases on this general subject, of the taking of a franchise; 27 Cent. L. J. 207, 231; and as to corporate property; 14 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 41.

Claims of citizens against a foreign power may be taken by the national government for the purpose of adjusting its relations with such power; 2 Ct. of Cl. 224; and a claim for damages to land by reason of an unlawful entry may be taken and adjusted in a proceeding to take the land itself; 24 Barb. 638.

It has been held that money cannot be taken; Field, J., 12 Cal. 76; contra, 151 Mass. 364; only as to money taken by the state in time of war; 4 Const. 419; 13 How. 115; 44 Mo. 484; and without any such limitation; Sharswood, J., in 65 Pa. 152, who says that "the public necessity which gives rise to it prevents its being restrained by any limitations as to either subject or occasion." "Such," the opinion continues, "would be the case of a pressing and immediate necessity, as in the event of invasion by a public enemy, or some great public calamity, as famine or pestilence, contribution could be levied on banks, corporations, or individuals."

Buildings on land condemned are parts of the realty and pass with the land, and the owner must be paid for them in full, and being so paid cannot recover from the company damages for the removal of them; 23 Neb. 465; 23 Kau. 816; nor can the owner remove them; 99 Pa. 640. See, generally, as to structures, 3 Am. R. & Corp. Cas. 181.

An act for the extinguishment of irredeemable ground rents was held not to be an exercise of the right of eminent domain and therefore unconstitutional; 67 Pa. 479. Generally a city may not condemn property beyond its territorial limits; 13 Peters 519; 38 N. H. 404; or a corporation in a different state from that of its incorporation; 58 Fed. Rep. 139; but there are exceptions to the rule as in case of a city which may condemn property beyond its borders where the necessity exists, as for a park; 44 Mich. 602; 58 Mo. 175; a sewer; 36 Mich. 474; 140 Ill. 216; or waterworks; 81 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 288; 54 N. J. L. 62; but in such case the property must be sufficiently near to the municipality to be serviceable for the purpose for which it is condemned; 99 N. Y. 569.

Indirect or consequential damages. The principle that a right of compensation exists wherever private property is taken for public use does not extend to the case of one whose property is indirectly damaged by the lawful use of property already belonging to the public. For example, it was held that an adjoining or abutting owner was not entitled to compensation for damages resulting from the change of a grade of a street; 4 Term 794; 158 Mass. 564; 82 Mo. 1; 136 N. Y. 523. Callender v. Marsh, 1 Pick. 418, was the leading American case, and gave rise to a statute to remedy the wrong suggested by it. In Pennsylvania the doctrine of these cases was followed in a case in which Gibson, C. J., expressed regret that such injustice was remediless; 18 Pa. 187 (a case referred to by the same court as of a class intended to be remedied by the constitution of 1874; 150 Pa. 589). These and the other authorities were reviewed by the United States Supreme Court, and the same conclusion reached as being "well settled both in England and in this country;" 20 How. 135. Of the law at this period, it was said that the limitation of the term "taking" to an actual physical appropriation or divesting of title was "far too narrow to answer the purpose of justice;" Sedg. Const. L. (3d ed.) 456. See 1 Thayer, Cas. Const. L. 1053, 1055; 2 Am. R. & Corp. Cas. 495. The law on this specific subject of change of grades became firmly settled, except as changed by constitutional or statutory enactments, but on the general subject of what constitutes a "taking" of property, it has since undergone very great changes, and the narrow rule of physical appropriation has ceased to afford a criterion of decision. An illustration of the tendency to treat this question liberally, rather than technically, is a decision that it is a "taking" of property to prohibit an owner of land on a boulevard from building, beyond a certain limit, on the front part of the lot; 22 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 861; 97 Pa. 242; 118 id. 593. See also 73 Mich. 522; 18 L. R. A. 166. The older cases rested upon a narrow, the later ones upon a liberal, meaning of the word "property" in the constitutions. Of the latter, Eaton v. Boston, etc., Railroad, 51 N. H. 504, is the leading case on the subject of the right to compensation where property is injured and not physically taken. Plaintiff's land was overflowed during a freshet as the result of the construction of the defendant's railroad. Damages for the land actually taken for the railroad had been paid as the result of condemnation proceedings. It was held that the right to use the land undisturbed really constituted the property in it, rather than the physical possession of the land itself, and that even if the land itself were the "property," a physical interference with it which abridged the right to use it was in fact a taking of the owner's property to that extent. The opinion of Smith, J., in this case is said to have contributed more than any other towards the change in the law extending the effect of the word taking; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 58. See also 54 N. H. 545; 77 Wis. 288; 28 Minn. 534; 14 Ch. Div. 58; 99 U. S. 635; Earl, J., dissenting in 90 N. Y. 122. It is now quite settled that the flowing of lands, against the owner's consent and without compensation, is a taking; 51 N. H. 504; 30 Mich. 321. See also 41 Ill. 502; 25 Wis. 223; 13 Wall. 166. In the latter case, Miller, J., after referring to the decisions that there is no remedy for a consequential injury from the improvements of roads, streets, rivers, etc., said: "But we are of opinion that the decisions referred to have gone to the uttermost limit of sound judicial construction in favor of this principle, and, in some cases, beyond it, and that it remains true that where real estate is actually invaded by superinduced additions of water, earth, sand, or other material, or by having any artificial structure placed on it, so as to effectually destroy or impair its usefulness, it is a taking, within the meaning of the constitution, and that this proposition is not in conflict with the weight of judicial authority in this country, and certainly not with sound principle. Beyond this we do not go, and this case calls us to go no further." This was afterwards said by the court to be a case of "physical invasion of the real estate of the private owner, a practical ouster of his possession"; 98 U. S. 408.

The interference with the rights of abutting owners by building an elevated railroad on a street was held a taking of private property for public use without compensation, to restrain which the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction; 90 N. Y. 122. This case was decided by four judges against three dissenting, whose views were expressed by Earl, J., in an opinion much referred to, contending that it was a use of the street properly incident to its purpose as a public highway. An effort to secure a re-examination of the doctrine of this case resulted in its affirmation; 104 N. Y. 268. In a subsequent case the New York court of appeals stated the law of that state to be that, although the abutting owner might have an injunction, and in the same proceeding recover full compensation for the permanent injury, he could not, in an action at law, recover permanent damages measured by the diminution in value of the property, but only such temporary damages as he had sustained at the time of commencing the action; 135 N. Y. 432; 112 id. 190. See also 118 id. 618; 137 id. 802.

In a leading case the construction of an ordinary commercial railroad along a street in front of a lot without impairing ingress and egress, but resulting in the usual injuries to the lot from steam, smoke, dust, smells, interference with light and air, jarring the ground, etc., was held to be an appropriation of the street for what was not a proper street use, for which damages were recoverable, but limited to the injury resulting from the operation of the road in front of the lot, and not including any accruing from operating it on other parts of the street; 39 Minn. 286.

The Maryland court of appeals, in reviewing the decisions on the subject, and particularly the New York cases, mentions as the only other cases holding that opinion, 7 Ohio St. 460; 39 Minn. 236; 60 Miss. 279, and considers that its own decision in 50 Md. 149 and 74 id. 383 should be adhered to as being in accord with the decided weight of judicial opinion. The conclusion is thus stated: "The New York doctrine involves this inextricable dilemma, viz., if the grading of a street by a municipal corporation cuts off all access to a person's house, albeit his property is thereby destroyed and rendered valueless, it is not taken in the constitutional sense; but if a railroad company in lawfully constructing its road does precisely the same thing that the city did in grading a street, then the abutter's property is taken, though not physically entered upon at all. The structure is therefore a lawful one. But it does not destroy the street as a street, though it may cause the plaintiff greater inconvenience in gaining access to his lots than he encountered before it was built. But this and other injuries complained of are purely incidental and consequential, though the appellant, under the statutes of Maryland, is not without a remedy therefor; 79 Md. 277; s. c. 29 Atl. Rep. 830.

The question what constitutes a taking, under the older constitutional provisions, was much considered with respect to the use of streets and highways by many other modern appliances, such as gas and water pipes, steam and electric railroads, and poles for telegraph, telephone, and electric light wires. In this class of cases, of which the elevated railroad cases have been used as an illustration, the question has turned on the consideration whether the proposed use was a legitimate incidental use of the street as such, and the tendency of the cases is in favor of a very liberal construction of the rights of the public, at least in streets of cities. In some states a distinction is made between city streets and country roads, and the public easement in the latter is much more restricted, and the rights of abutting owners to damages consequently more extended: 63 N. Y. 836; 111 Pa. 85; 167 id. 62; 134 Ind. 577.

In a general view of the subject nothing more is practicable than a mere indication or illustration of the tendency of the decisions which must be resorted to and examined for application to a special case. City streets are legitimately used, from necessity, for sewers and drains; 28 Conn. 363; 103 Ind. 372; 29 N. J. Eq. 206; 27 Miss. 357; water pipes; 29 Hun 245; gas pipes, as a practical necessity in cities, are not questioned but indirectly sanctioned; 90 N. Y. 161; 32 Vt. 371; 2 Hun 146. See 18 Allen 146, 180. As to steam railroads, from a great conflict of decisions (difficult if not impossible to reconcile), it would seem to be the best opinion that it is not a legitimate use of the street; see Rand. Em. Dom. § 405; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 111, with notes citing the cases at large; a horse railway is almost universally held to be a proper use of streets; Rand. Em. Dom. § 403; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 124; the only substantial dissent being in New York; 39 N. Y. 404; unless the fee is in the public; 50 id. 206. See 14 Ohio St. 523; 27 Wis. 194. With respect to electric railways in cities, now a current subject of litigation, the doctrine of "the right of the public to use the streets by means of street cars," was said to be "now so thoroughly settled as to be no longer open to debate," and it was extended to the poles and wires of the new system; 47 N. J. Eq. 380; and see 85 Mich. 634; 75 Md. 222; 61 Conn. 127; 147 Pa. 579; but not along a country road; 167 id. 62. See Rand. Em. Dom. § 403. Electric light poles are usually treated as proper, on the same basis as the older lamp posts; 54 Hun 469; but not telegraph and telephone poles, according to the weight of authority; 49 Fed. Rep. 113; 86 Va. 696; 16 R. I. 668; 148 U. S. 92; though in some cases it is held otherwise, and of these the leading case considered the subject within the principle of Callender v. Marsh; the opinion of the court and the dissenting one of two judges present the two views of the question very fully; 136 Mass. 75. See also 88 Mo. 258.

In the cases relating to the use of streets and highways a great diversity of decision is occasioned by the distinctions drawn between the rights of an abutting owner who has the fee and one owning merely an easement of access over a street of which the soil belongs to the public. The question is further complicated by the varied application of the doctrine that an owner whose land was taken for a street or highway is presumed to anticipate the future uses to which it may be put both over and under the surface. The confusion of the decisions is well stated by a writer on the subject: "Laying aside constitutional and statutory declarations of liability for consequential injuries we find the following anticipations imputed to one whose land is affected by a street easement. In every state except Ohio he anticipates that he may be obliged to enter his house by a second-story window when the grade is raised, or by a ladder when the grade is lowered. In New York he does not foresee any improved method of transportation from the horse-car to the electric motor; but in Pennsylvania he anticipates all methods. The Massachusetts man seems to be the only one who has clearly anticipated the telegraph and telephone. Judged by results there is no working rule of general application deducible from a presumed anticipation of future use." Rand. Em. Dom. § 414.

In some states there are constitutional provisions covering this subject, sixteen of them requiring compensation when property is damaged by such proceedings generally, and three others when the delegated power of eminent domain is exercised by corporations. Under these provisions compensation is required for property "damaged" as well as "taken," and the former word is held to include all actual damages resulting from the exercise of the right of eminent domain which diminish the market value of private property; 25 Neb. 499; 66 Cal. 492; 67 Ga. 386; 106 Ill. 511; 45 Ark. 429; s. c. 136 U. S. 121.

The treatment by the courts of the subject of consequential damages is illustrated by the course of decisions under two constitutions of Illinois, by the supreme court of that state, which is very elaborately reviewed in a judgment of the supreme court of the United States. The constitution of 1848 prohibited the taking or application to public use of property without just compensation; and the rule adopted by the courts was that any physical injury to private property, by the erection, etc., of a public improvement, in or along a public highway, whereby its use was materially interrupted, was to be regarded as a taking, within the meaning of the constitution. The constitution of 1870 provided that private property should not be taken or damaged without just compensation, and upon this it was held that the property owner was protected against any substantial damage, though consequential, and that it did not require a trespass or actual physical invasion; 102 Ill. 84, 379; 125 U. S. 161. In the judgment last cited Harlan, J., said: "We concur in that construction" and "we regard that case (102 Ill. 84) as conclusive of this question." This constitution of Illinois was the first in which the word "damaged" was inserted, but in 1894 the supreme court of Colorado enumerated fourteen other states which had then adopted the word; 36 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 789. See, generally, as to land injured; 2 Am. R. & C. Cas. 94; 5 id. 201; property damaged; 25 Am. L. Rev. 924; taken or damaged; 27 Am. L. Reg. 591; 21 Cent. L. J. 130.

What estate is acquired. Where the constitution contains no restriction, a fee or any less estate may be taken, in the discretion of the legislature; 100 Mass. 544; 89 Ind. 501; 34 Ohio St. 541; 8 Dill. 465; 79 N. Y. 293; 80 Va. 616; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 277; Rand. Em. Dom. § 203; Cooley, Const. Lim. 698; and if a fee is taken under the statute, the land may afterwards be devoted to other uses; id.; Rand. Em. Dom. § 209. If the state condemn, a fee is presumed; 50 Pa. 425; 53 id. 477; but when a private corporation does so, never; Rand. Em. Dom. § 206; when the act authorized a railroad company to take the fee for a right of way it was a qualified estate which would revert; 50 Mo. 496; s. c. 62 id. 429; but a railroad may be authorized to take a fee; 2 Dev. & B. 451. The purpose is sometimes said to indicate the estate taken; 127 Mass. 408; 45 N. Y. 234; but this is an unsafe criterion of the interest, and the better opinion is that it merely defines the use. See 31 La. Ann. 430; 32 id. 471; 90 Mich. 385; 53 N. J. L. 1. Under a provision that the title should vest, a city took a fee for sewers; 144 Mass. 803; but a turnpike company only an easement; 36 Barb. 136. An absolute power of alienation, the earmark of untrammelled and unconditional ownership, has been supported in land held by a municipal corporation for a park; 45 N. Y. 234; 137 id. 241; or an almshouse; 7 N. Y. 314; 2 Blatchf. 95; when a street which had been taken for a canal was abandoned, the right of the public and the abutters revived in the street; 88 Ind. 563; and land taken for a canal was afterwards used for a street; 42 Hun 202; 34 Ohio St. 541. It is said that a municipal corporation can condemn the fee-simple title of land for streets, but only so as to acquire the absolute control for that purpose and not a proprietary right to sell or devote it to a private use; 46 Minn. 540. When the fee is taken and the use ceases, the state may authorize a sale for other uses, but when only an easement, the land reverts; Lewis, Em. Dom. 596, citing cases; and so if there is an abandonment; id. 597.

See, generally, 8 Am. R. & Corp. Cas. 368; 32 Am. L. Reg. 563; 10 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 11; 32 Cent. L. J. 80.

The time when payment must be made varies according to the exact terms of the constitutional provision under which proceedings are taken. In the majority of states where there is no express provision it is held that compensation need not be concurrent in time with the taking, it is sufficient if an adequate and certain remedy is provided by which the owner may compel payment of damages; 18 Wend. 9; 26 id. 585; 6 Hill 359; 11 N. Y. 308; 96 id. 227; and this means reasonable legal certainty; id.; 54 N. Y. 182, 146; 89 id. 189; or if there is a definite provision or security for the payment of the compensation; 84 Ala. 461; 81 Ark. 494; 20 Fla. 597; 187 Mass. 71; 54 N. H. 590 (but 50 id. 591 seems contra); 19 Conn. 142; 5 Ohio St. 109; 17 Pa. 524 (contra, as to private roads; 81 id. 12); 11 Leigh 42; 57 Vt. 123; 88 N. C. 686; 67 Wis. 864; 23 Fed. Rep. 521. The same rule was formerly followed, in some states in which later constitutions provided for prior payment, or required compensation where none was provided for before, as Maryland; 8 Bland, Ch. 386; 19 Ga. 427; 8 Mich. 496; 52 Ind. 16; other states require that the owner shall receive compensation before entry; 45 Cal. 640 (see 81 id. 538, which reviewed the cases, established a different rule, and was overruled); 58 id. 208; 87 Tex. 447; 1 Md. Ch. 248; 67 Ill. 307; 120 id. 86; but in Maine, while title does not pass, possession may be taken before payment, and a reasonable time—three years being so held—allowed therefor; 34 Me. 247; 75 id. 91. It has been held that the state when acting directly may provide that title shall pass when the amount is ascertained, it being presumed that payment will be made by the state; 78 N. Y. 325; but any such declaration in a statute is controlled by the constitution, and it was held in a New York case that payment must be prior to or concurrent with the taking; 21 Wall. 196. In many state constitutions there is a distinction between the direct exercise of the power by the government and the delegated power conferred on private corporations. Under such a provision it was said that in both cases the sovereign power is coupled with the correlative duty; 62 N. J. L. 132; but municipal corporations must settle first when exercising delegated power; id.; 38 id. 151; 39 id. 291. And it is said by a writer of authority, "the almost invariable, and certainly the just, course being to require payment to precede or accompany the act of appropriation;" 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 615. Generally, however, when the compensation is to be paid by the state or is a charge upon the funds of a municipality that is held sufficient; 103 Mass. 120; 88 N. C. 686; 1 Pa. 309; 99 N. Y. 569; 40 Ind. 33; 40 Wis. 674; 68 Pa. 168, 170; 2 Am. Ry. & Corp. Cas. (Wis.) 424; but if the available resources are shown to be insufficient an entry may be enjoined; 26 id. 46.

The fact that there is a limitation of the amount to be expended does not invalidate the law for taking property; 91 U. S. 367; 160 id. 668.

When the title passes. It naturally follows that no title can be acquired under the proceedings until the compensation is paid or so secured as to be treated in law as the equivalent of payment. Accordingly when the title is permitted to vest before payment, it is said to be subject to a claim for compensation in the nature of a vendor's lien enforceable in equity; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 620, and note citing cases. And a sale or mortgage of the property could only be made subject to such prior right of the landowner, which is maintained by some courts on the theory of a lien, and by others on that of title remaining in the owner; id. § 621. In Pennsylvania, however, an extreme doctrine prevails; the appropriation is valid and effectual where compensation is paid or secured; 8 W. & S. 459; 66 Pa. 404; 75 id. 464; and title passes when the bond is approved by the court under the statute; 85 id. 73; and remains vested even if the bond is found to be valueless; 139 id. 168; and there is no lien for compensation; 118 id. 512. By the act of location the corporation acquires a conditional title as against the landowner, which becomes absolute upon making or securing compensation; 141 id. 407; as against third parties there is a valid location after entry made, lines run, map prepared, and a report made to the directors and adopted by them; 159 id. 331; but running a line, making a map, and a report to the directors, not acted on, did not confer title to the location to justify an injunction to restrain another company from taking the land for a railway, though the land was owned by the plaintiff company; 141 id. 407.

If a land-owner, knowing that a railroad company has entered upon his land, and is engaged in constructing its road without having complied with a statute requiring either payment by agreement or proceedings to condemn, remains inactive and permits it to go on and expend large sums in the work, he cannot maintain either trespass or ejectment, and will be restricted to a suit for damages; 158 U. S. 1.

The actual cash market value, at the time, of property actually taken must be allowed; 117 Mass. 302; 58 Mo. 491; 51 Kan. 408; 110 Ill. 414; 98 U. S. 403. It has been said that the true criterion of market value is the sum which the property would bring if sold at auction, conducted in the fairest possible way; 63 N. H. 557; but this is not the result of the best considered cases. "Market value means the fair value of the property as between one who wants to purchase and one who wants to sell an article; not what could be obtained for it under peculiar circumstances; not its speculative value; not a value obtained from the necessity of another. Nor is it to be limited to that price which the property would bring when forced off at auction under the hammer;" 119 Mass. 126; it is measured by the difference between what it would have sold for before the injury, and what it would have sold for as affected by it; 7 S. & R. 441; 112 Pa. 56; what would be accepted by one desiring but not obliged to sell and paid by one under no necessity of buying; 115 id. 325; 49 Ark. 381; it is not to be measured by the interest or necessity of the particular owner; 95 Pa. 426; nor, on the other hand, by those of the appropriator; 110 Pa. 54; 88 Cal. 50; 22 N. J. L. 193; 53 Ga. 178; 59 Ia. 243; when these principles are fairly applied due consideration may be given to auction value; 115 Pa. 325; but its availability for other special purposes to which it is particularly adapted by reason of "its natural advantages, or its artificial improvements, or its intrinsic character," may be considered as an element of value; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 479, and cases cited; as, for railroad approaches to a large city; 116 Me. 114; 58 id. 491; or for a bridge site; 17 Ga. 30; 49 Ark. 381; or a mill site; 64 Miss. 404; so also its situation and surroundings for railroad purposes; 52 N. J. L. 391; 34 Kan. 158; 111 Ill. 413; or market-gardening; 110 Ill. 414; or subdivision into village lots; 57 Wis. 332; 91 Ill. 49; 39 Ohio St. 108; 30 Minn. 227; or in case of a pond, for ice or milling, there being no other one near; 5 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 217; or for warehouse purposes; 33 Minn. 210. When the water of a stream running through a farm was taken by a village for its waterworks, the owner was entitled to damages, not only for being deprived of the water for farm purposes, but also for being deprived of the opportunity to sell water rights to prospective purchasers of village lots plotted out for sale in a part of the farm; 67 Vt. 558. So its adaptability for the particular purpose for which the condemnation is bought may be shown, as islands well situated for boom purposes; 98 U. S. 403; or the bed of an old canal desired for a railroad; 27 Hun 116. But mere speculative opinions and considerations will be excluded from consideration; 127 Mass. 358; 9 G. & J. 479; 116 Ill. 163; 107 Pa. 461; 57 Wis. 332; 17 N. J. L. 25; 18 Mo. App. 632.

See, generally, 21 L. R. A. 373; 57 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 508; 2 Am. R. R. & Corp. Cas. 74.

Assessment of benefits on the remainder of a tract of which part is taken is prohibited by the constitution in some states, either generally, as in Iowa and Ohio, in favor of any corporation, as in Arkansas, Kansas, and South Carolina, or any other than municipal, as in California, North Dakota, and Washington. In the other states there is a diversity of decisions which have been thus classified, as: 1. Not considered. 2. Special benefit is set off against damages to the remainder but not against the value of the part taken. 3. General or special, as in the last class. 4. Special, against both damages to remainder and value of part taken. 5. General and special, as in the last class. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 465.

In the first class the benefit is excluded because compensation is held to be money, and this view appears to be confined to one state; 34 Miss. 237, 241; 62 id. 807.

The second rule which obtains has been justly criticised as illogical; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 467; but it rests upon the theory that for the part taken compensation in money is required, while for incidental damage the legislature may prescribe the rule of compensation. This was the doctrine laid down in Tennessee which, with several other states, adheres to it; 2 Swan, Tenn. 422; 6 Wis. 636; 59 id. 304; 34 Md. 336; 9 Leigh 313; 21 Gratt. 164; 24 W. Va. 662; 11 Neb. 585; 25 id. 542.

The third class rests upon the same idea of requiring compensation in money for the part taken, but treating the claim for damage to the remainder as consequential and properly subject to the set-off of all advantages; and in Kentucky, from which comes the leading case, a judgment was reversed for an instruction excluding general benefits; 17 B. Monr. 173; 5 Dana 28; 50 Ga. 612 (but see 17 Ga. 30, in which a different doctrine was applied, which was passed without mention in 30 id. 43, which laid down the rule afterwards adhered to); 26 Tex. 588; 33 id. 112; 37 id. 447; 60 Tex. 215; but see 60 id. 76; 31 La. Ann. 430; 36 id. 344.

The fourth rule allows special benefits against both the value of the part taken and damage to the remainder, because just compensation is construed to mean recompense for the net resulting injury, and excludes a share of the general advantage, because to allow it would be to distribute it unequally, charging those whose land is taken for that which the rest of the community enjoy without cost; 60 Maine 290; 55 N. H. 413; 4 Cush. 291; 125 Mass. 226, 557; 57 Vt. 240; 32 Conn. 452; 55 N. J. L. 88; 95 Pa. 426; 112 id. 56 (which lays down the rule with great clearness not only on this point but in confining the consideration of inconvenience and advantage to the effect of both upon the market value); 4 Jones, N. C. 89; 74 N. C. 220; 70 Mo. 629; 91 id. 26; 11 Minn. 515; 28 id. 61, 503; 59 Wis. 374; 18 Ore. 283 (but see 6 id. 328). See L. R. 2 C. P. 638.

The last class permits all benefits to be set off against all damages of either kind, placing the rule on natural equity, and in a leading case (17 Ga. 30, afterwards apparently overruled as stated supra), it is argued that the term compensation comes from the civil law which so construes it. This rule is accepted by many courts which, among other reasons, hold that compensation does not mean money but includes any means of recompense; 46 Cal. 85; 2 Harring. 514; 5 Ohio St. 140; 43 id. 228 (before the constitution of 1851); 97 Ind. 79; 130 id. 219; 5 Rich. 428; 6 Rich. 47. See 60 Tex. 76. In New York this rule applies to cases where land is taken by the state and municipal corporations; 99 N. Y. 296; 120 id. 309; but in the case of private corporations the third rule seems to apply; 68 id. 591; 118 id. 618; 129 id. 576. See 60 id. 302. In Illinois the cases prior to 1870 were under the fifth rule; 14 Ill. 190; and since the constitution of that year and a subsequent statute it has been held that benefits were prohibited as against the value of land taken; 77 Ill. 250; that general benefits cannot be set off against either value or damage; 79 id. 290; and that special damage may be charged against the damage to the residue; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 470, where the cases are collected and analyzed.

The last rule enumerated seems to be approved by the federal courts; 8 Cra. C. C. 599; 103 U. S. 599; and upon candid consideration it must be admitted that if benefits are to be allowed at all it is the only logical doctrine. This seems also to be the conclusion of the writer whose classification of the decisions is here given, and to whose discussion of the whole subject reference may profitably be made; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 471.

Damage to property injured but not physically taken. A question of great importance which yet remains to be settled arises either under the later constitutional provisions for compensation for injury as well as actual taking, or under the extension of the meaning of the word taking to include consequential damages so called, when the injury to property is so great and permanent as practically to deprive the owner of all use and enjoyment of it.

In such cases the only remedy of the property owner, in the absence of legislation, is a common-law action, and for permanent or continuing injury trespass is totally inadequate, as is evidenced by the fact that to restrain it when continuous is a recognized ground of equitable interference. In many cases it is held that prospective damages cannot be recovered, and the property owner is thus put to the necessity of resorting to repeated actions, but when the trespass is the result of the exercise of a public use authorized by statute this remedy is not only unsatisfactory but illogical. Accordingly it is held in many cases that such damage being of a permanent nature there should be but one recovery for all damages past, present, and future; and it has been held that they may be allowed. An action on the case is the proper remedy in such cases, but the measure of damages applied is not uniform, though when the liberal rule referred to is adopted the payment vests in the defendant a right to maintain its works and operates as a bar to further suits. In some cases such an action has also been held to have the effect of statutory proceedings for the assessment of compensation; 118 Ill. 203; 141 id. 33. This subject is, however, involved in great confusion, which should undoubtedly be removed by legislative enactments providing for the acquisition of the right to cause, and the assessment of compensation for, permanent injury to property whenever consequential damages are provided for by constitution or statute, or recognized by the courts. As to this subject, see discussions with copious citations of cases in Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 624, 625; Rand. Em. Dom. §§ 308-311; 26 Am. L. Reg. 281, 315.

Who are proper and necessary parties. The compensation must be paid to the true owner as on that the title depends; 82 N. Y. 430; 112 Ill. 379; 133 U. S. 533; and if paid to the wrong person, it may be recovered from him by one having an interest; 92 N. Y. 202; 109 Ind. 411; but if title is doubtful, it may be paid into court; 41 Fed. Rep. 70; 73 N. Y. 586; and if afterwards paid out wrongly the person who paid it in is not liable; 146 U. S. 338.

The general principle is that the necessary parties to a proceeding, independent of statutory requirements, are all persons having an interest in the property taken, as proprietors, or such as is recognized by the law of the state as property; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 317. When the ownership is divided, each is entitled to his share, as life-tenant and remainderman; 112 N. C. 759; 86 Mo. 478; dower after admeasurement; 117 Pa. 174; but not before the dower is assigned; 43 Ill. 401; and only as against the award when it is inchoate; 27 N. J. Eq. 534. The interest of a tenant must be compensated; 4 Whart. 86; if the lease has actual value to him; 144 Ill. 537; sometimes separately; 127 Ill. 144; and sometimes by apportionment of the entire amount; 108 Mass. 535.

When part of land under lease is taken, the lease is not terminated or the tenant discharged; 134 Ill. 37; but both he and the lessor are entitled to compensation for their respective losses; 20 Pick. 159; 11 Ohio 408; 30 Pa. 362; 1 Thayer, Cas. Const. L. 968. See Rand. Em. Dom. § 304; 21 L. R. A. 212, with note on rights of tenants, reversioners, life-tenants, remaindermen, etc., in such cases; 5 Am. R. R. & Corp. Cas. 208, as to grantor and grantee, and 29 Am. St. Rep. 304, as to leased premises. See also 29 Am. L. Rev. 851, as to the abatement of rent when leased premises are appropriated.

As to mortgagees the decisions lack both uniformity and consistency, and this result is largely due to the differing views taken of the position of a mortgagee before the law. As between the parties to the mortgage the award takes the place of the land and the lien attaches to it; 3 Paige 68; 59 Ind. 433; 103 Mo. 560; 123 Ill. 93; as to all rights and interests; 112 N. Y. 610. The damages should be apportioned by the jury between owner, lessee, mortgagee, etc.; 48 Mich. 547. In some cases the remainder of the land must be exhausted before the mortgagee can resort to the fund; 44 N. Y. 192; or to the condemned land; 20 Neb. 281; and the mortgagee, if not a party to the proceedings, may appropriate the fund; 56 Ia. 422; 32 N. J. Eq. 370; but when the land has been sold and bought in by the mortgagee he loses all claim to the fund and new proceedings must be taken to condemn his interest; 35 N. J. Eq. 379. As affecting the title of the appropriator who has been said to take no better title than an innocent purchaser for value; 88 Ia. 463; and must protect himself against the claim of the mortgagee; 57 Wis. 311; the more reasonable opinion would seem to be that the mortgagee is a necessary party; if in possession he certainly is; 36 N. H. 84; 5 Gray 463; or after condition broken; 57 Vt. 248; in other cases to be bound he must have notice; 24 Minn. 25; 29 N. J. Eq. 128; 12 R. I. 144; 55 Vt. 207; 57 Wis. 311; 109 Ind. 441; 40 Mich. 333; 67 Me. 358; L. R. 1 Eq. 145; contra; 11 N. H. 293; 13 W. Va. 476; 45 Conn. 303; 126 Mass. 1, 427; 56 Cal. 508; 44 N. Y. 192. See Lewis, Em. Dom. § 324; 18 L. R. A. 113. It was held that the appropriator must see to the discharge of the mortgage and may pay it off or keep the money until it is due; 19 Wend. 659; and he may require or provide for its satisfaction; 131 N. Y. 127. It has even been held that a mortgagee cannot move for consequential damages to mortgaged property when the mortgagor has without fraud settled with the company; 121 Pa. 467.

Judgment liens may be divested by the proceedings, and the creditor need not be made a party; 47 N. Y. 157, 162. This is the leading case and well states the reasons on which this settled principle is based. See also 59 Ind. 446; 7 Phila. 650; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 325; Rand. Em. Dom. §§ 302, 340. Notice and procedure. It is a general rule that notice of proceedings must be given to the owner of property to be taken; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 363; Rand. Em. Dom. § 338; though a few cases hold contrary to the otherwise uniform course of decisions; 5 Del. Ch. 524; 40 Md. 425, 437; 25 Miss. 479; 35 Ind. 17; 23 Ill. 202. In the Delaware case there was actual notice, though it was held that the act need not require it; in the Mississippi cases the proceeding is considered as in rem, which is treated as actual notice, and the Illinois case is in effect though not expressly overruled in 59 Ind. 276 and 78 Ind. 96. These cases have been termed "sporadic decisions," by which the current of authority is not disturbed; Rand. Em. Dom. § 338. See also Lewis, Em. Dom. § 364; where the cases are cited, and for other cases cited in support of the view that notice need not be required in the act; 21 N. Y. 596; 2 Dana 227; 2 Mich. 441; 5 Ohio St. 140; 3 Paige 75. The questions whether the property shall be taken and what compensation shall be paid need not be tried by a jury; 2 Dev. & Bat. 451; 2 Harring. 514; the constitution does not describe the mode or means by which compensation shall be ascertained; these therefore can only be prescribed by the legislature; 5 Del. Ch. 524; under the constitution of the United States, a jury is not necessary; 46 Fed. Rep. 176; and it cannot be demanded as a matter of right; 100 N. C. 497; 11 N. H. 19; 54 N. J. L. 268.

It was recently held that due process of law is furnished and equal protection of the law given in such proceedings when the course pursued for the assessment and collection of taxes is that customarily provided in the state, for then the party charged has an opportunity to be heard; 164 U. S.

112; and where by state law a burden is imposed upon property for the public use, "whether it be for the whole state or some more limited portion of the community, and those laws provide for a mode of confirming or contesting the charge thus imposed, in the ordinary courts of justice with such notice to the person, or such proceeding in regard to the property as is appropriate to the nature of the case, the judgment in such proceedings cannot be said to deprive the owner of his property without due process of law, however obnoxious it may be to other objections;" id.

As to procedure generally, see Rand. Em. Dom. ch. xi.; Lewis, Em. Dom. ch. xvii.-xix.; Mills, Em. Dom. ch. xi.; 3 L. R. A. 83; 14 A. & E. R. R. Cas. 378, 384, 392; and for some cases as to the necessity of notice and a hearing, to constitute due process of law, see 2 L. R. A. (Ind.) 653, note; 3 id. (Mont.) 194, note; 11 id. 224.

The power need not be exhausted in the first instance; 88 Conn. 196; 87 Ala. 50; and a railroad may subsequently take land for laying additional tracks when necessary; 57 Ark. 359; 4 Montg. Co. Rep. Pa. 102; or a canal company for a new supply of water; 23 Pick. 36; or a company may take more than at present required, having view to future and other needs, and use of part is not an abandonment; 152 Pa. 488.

EMISSION. In Medical Jurisprudence. The act by which any matter whatever is thrown from the body; thus, it is usual to say, emission of urine, emission of semen, etc.

Emission is not necessary in the commission of a rape to complete the offence; 1 Hale, P. C. 628; 4 C. & P. 249; 5 id. 297; 6 id. 251; 9 id. 31; 1 Const. 354; 30 Tex. App. 510; 30 Pac. Rep. (N. M.) 861; 106 Mo. 468; [1891] 2 Q. B. 149. It is, however, essential in sodomy; 12 Co. 36; 94 Mich. 27. But see 1 Va. Cas. 807.

EMIT. To put out; to send forth.

The tenth section of the first article of the constitution contains various prohibitions among which is the following: "No state shall emit bills of credit." To emit bills of credit is to issue paper intended to circulate through the community for its ordinary purposes, as money, which paper is redeemable at a future day. 4 Fed. 410, 438; 11 id. 257; 23 Ark. 568; 1 Scan. 67; Story, Const. § 1383. See BILLS OF CREDIT.

EMMENAGOGUES. In Medical Jurisprudence. The name of a class of medicines which are believed to have the power of favoring the discharge of the menses. These are "savine (see Juniperus Sabina), black hellebore, aloes, gamboge, rue, madder, stirring goosefoot (chenopodium olidum), gin, parsley (and its active principle, apio), permanganate of potassium, cantharides, and borax, and for the most part substances which, in large doses, act as drastic purgatives or stimulating diuretics." They are sometimes used for the criminal purpose of producing abortion (q. v.). They always endanger the life of the woman. 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 316; Dunglison, Med. Dict.; Farr, Med. Dict.; 8 Par. & F. Med. Jur. 68; Taylor's Med. Jur. 164.

EMOLUMENT. The profit arising from office or employment; that which is received as a compensation for services, or which is annexed to the possession of office as salary, fees, and perquisites; advantage; gain, public or private. Webster. It imports any perquisite, advantage, profit or gain arising from the possession of an office. 105 Pa. 303. See 113 id. 108. See ALL BACK PAY AND EMOLUMENTS.

EMPEROR. This word is synonymous with the Latin imperator; they are both derived from the verb imperare. Literally, it signifies he who commands.

EMPHYTEUSIS. In Civil Law. The name of a contract, in the nature of a perpetual lease, by which the owner of an uncultivated piece of land granted it to another, either in perpetuity or for a long time, on condition that he should improve it, by building on, planting, or cultivating it, and should pay for it an annual rent, with a right to the grantee to alienate it, or transmit it by descent to his heirs, and under a condition that the grantor should never re-enter as long as the rent should be paid to him by the grantee or his assigns. Inst. 3, 25, 8; 18 Toullier, n. 144.

EMPHYTEUTA. The grantee under a contract of emphyteusis or emphyteusis. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.; 1 Hallam, c. ii. p. 1.

EMPIRE. The territory or jurisdiction of an Emperor. A nation composed of what was previously several separate countries but which have been brought by conquest, compact, or colonization under one government at the head at which is an Emperor. Extensive dominion or influence. English.

American Empire. A term used by Chief Justice Marshall to mean the United States, inclusive of its states, territories, District of Columbia, etc. 132 U. S. 261.

EMPIRICISM. In Medicine. A practice of medicine founded on mere experience without the aid of science or the knowledge of principles. 108 Ky. 769.

EMPLAZAMIENTO. In Spanish Law. The citation given to a person by order of the judge, and ordering him to appear before his tribunal on a given day and hour.

EMPLOY. In 169, Rev. Stats., used as the equivalent of appoint; 252 U. S. 515, quoting 21 Ops. Atty. Gen. 356.

EMPLOYEE or EMPLOYEE. From the French. A term of rather broad significance for one who is employed, whether his duties are within or without the walls of the building in which the chief officer usually transacts his business. 3 Ct. Cl. 267, 280. It is not usually applied to higher officers of corporations or to domestic servants, but to clerks, workmen, and laborers, collectively.

Strictly and etymologically, it means "a person employed," but in practice, in the French language, it ordinarily is used to signify a person in some official employment, and as generally used with us, though perhaps not confined to any official employment, it is understood to mean some permanent employment or position. It may be any one who renders service to another; 30 N. J. Eq. 586; and has been extended so far as to embrace attorney and counsel; 58 N. Y. 338. The servant of a contractor for carrying mail is an employee of the department of the post-office; Brock. 260; also one who received five per cent. of the cost for superintending the erection of a warehouse was held an employee; 14 Md. 558. See MASTER AND SERVANT.

Usually embraces a laborer, servant, or other person occupied in an inferior position. Anderson; 75 N. Y. 41. Not restricted, however, to any particular employment or service. One engaged or used as an agent or substitute by another in transacting business, or the performance of some service. It may be skilled labor or the service of the scientist or professional man as well as servile or unskilled manual labor. Id.; 58 N. Y. 371.

Clerk. In 169, Rev. Stats., the term clerks and employees sufficiently broad to include persons filling positions which require technical skill, learning and professional training. 252 U. S. 515, quoting 29 Ops. Atty. Gen. 123.

Officer. The distinction between officer and employee in 169, Rev. Stats., does not rest upon differences in the qualifications necessary to fill the positions or in the character of the service to be performed. Whether the incumbent is an officer or an employee is determined by the manner in which Congress has specifically provided for the creation of the several positions, their duties and appointment thereto. 252 U. S. 516, quoting 15 Ops. Atty. Gen. 3 et al.

In the Employers' Liability Act the words "employee" and "employed" were used in their natural sense, and were intended to describe the conventional relation of employer and employee. 252 U. S. 479, quoting 237 U. S. 94.

EMPLOYED. The act of doing a thing, and the being under contract or orders to do it. 14 Pet. 464, 476; 2 Paine 721, 745.

Where persons were employed "in and about the works," it was held that although their work as miners was at the bottom of a mine, the term covered them as employees until they arrived safely at the top, even although they discharged themselves; 2 C. P. Div. 397.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACT. The English statute of 43 and 44 Vict. c. 42, regulating the liability of employers in actions for negligence by their workmen and greatly limiting and modifying the common-law doctrine of common employment. The act is said to be "on the face of it an experimental and empirical compromise between conflicting interests." Poll. Torts 127. It was enacted for a limited time only, and has been since renewed from time to time. The effect is to put a "workman," "as against his employer, in approximately the same position as an outsider, as regards the safe and fit condition of the material instruments, fixed or movable, of the master's business," and to hold the latter responsible for the conduct of those in delegated authority under him; id.

Similar statutes have been enacted in many of the states. See Reno, Emp. Liab. Acts; MASTER AND SERVANT; FACTORY ACT.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY INSURANCE. A recent and important extension of the insurance principle, for protection against the legal liability which one assumes in becoming the employer of others; not a mere contract of indemnity against damages, but a contract to discharge liability for damage. 11 A. & E. Ency. L. 2nd ed. 9. See MASTERS' LIABILITY; INSURANCE.

EMPLOYERS AND WORKMEN ACT. The English statute of 38 and 39 Vict. c. 90, regulating the jurisdiction of certain courts over disputes between masters and employees. See MASTER AND SERVANT. Under this act of 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 90), justices of the peace have jurisdiction in many cases where questions arise as to the rights or liabilities of either party to a contract of service, and County Courts also have jurisdiction in some of those matters. But this act does not apply to domestic or menial servants. Byrne.

EMPLOYMENT. "Employment" does not always begin or end with the actual work of the day in which the employee is engaged, but may begin when the employee enters the premises of his employer for the purpose of going to his work and may continue while he is going from his work at the end of the day on the premises of the employer. 162 Ky. 215, 172 S. W. 517.

Profession or Trade. The words "employment, profession or trade" means some business, employment, profession or trade in which one is engaged. The position of a juror is not an office or employment within the meaning of the words. 163 Ky. 144, 173 S. W. 380. See COURSE OF EMPLOYMENT.

EMPRESTITO. In Spanish Law. A loan. Something lent to the borrower at his request. Las Partidas, pt. 3, tit. 18, l. 70.

EMPTIO, EMPTOR. (Lat. emere, to buy; Emptio, a buying; Emptor, a buyer; Emptio et venditio, buying and selling.)

In Roman Law. The name of a contract of sale. Du Cange; Vocat, Voc. Jur.

EN AUTRE DROIT (Fr.). In the right of another.

EN DECLARATION DE SIMULATION. A form of action used in Louisiana. It is one of revindication (q. v.), and has for its object to have the contract declared judicially a simulation and a nullity; 5 La. Ann. 1; 20 id. 169.

EN DEMEURE (Fr.). In default. Used in Louisiana. 3 Mart. La. N. s. 574.

EN OWEL MAIN (L. Fr.). In equal hand. The word owel occurs also in the phrase owelty of partition. See 1 Washb. R. P. 427.

EN TESMOIGNANCE (L. Fr.) (Lat. in testimonium). In testimony or witness. En tesmoignances des queux choses nous avons fait faire cestes nous lettres ouverts; in testimony whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patent (open).

EN VENTRESA MERE (Fr.). In its mother's womb. For certain purposes, indeed for all beneficial purposes, a child en ventre sa mere is to be considered as born; 5 T. R. 49; 1 P. Wms. 329. Its civil rights are equally respected at every period of gestation; it is capable of taking under a will, by descent, or under a marriage settlement, may be appointed executor, may have a guardian assigned to it, may obtain an injunction to stay waste; 3 Johns. Cas. 18; 5 S. & R. 38; Bing. Inf. ch. vii; 1 Ves. 81; 2 Atk. 117; Bacon, Abr. Infancy (R); 2 H. Bla. 399; 2 Vern. 710; 4 Ves. Jr. 227. In a recent English case it was held that such a child is to be considered as living so as to vest in the parent on the death of the life tenant a devise made by a testator to A for life, and on her death to the parent of the child, "for her absolute use and benefit in case she has issue living at the death" of A, "but in case she has no issue then living," then over, when the parent was en ciente at the time of A's death; [1895] 2 Ch. 497. The right of an unborn infant to take property by descent or otherwise has been said by a learned commentator to be an inchoate right, which will not be completed by a premature birth; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 130, n.; but as the word premature is used in the authorities, the rule accurately stated is that it must be born alive or after such period of foetal existence that it might reasonably be expected to survive; 4 Sm. & M. 99; 5 S. & R. 38; 4 Kent 248; 2 Paige 35. See Tyler, Inf. & Cov. ch. xiv., POSTHUMOUS CHILD; FETUS; NEGLECTANCE.

ENABLE. To supply with adequate power or means; give authority; power. Stand. Dict. In itself it has the primary meaning, in the case of a person under any disability as to dealing with another, of removing that disability, not of conferring compulsory power as against that other. 66 L. J. ch. 203.

ENABLING POWERS. A term used in equity. When the donor of a power, who is the owner of the estate, confers upon persons not seized of the fee the right of creating interests to take effect out of it, which could not be done by the donee of the power unless by such authority, this is called an enabling power.

ENABLING STATUTE. The act of 32 Henry VIII. c. 28, by which tenants in tail, husbands seized in right of their wives, and others, were empowered to make leases for their lives or for twenty-one years, which they could not do before. 2 Bla. Com. 319; Co. Litt. 44 a. The phrase is also applied to any statute enabling persons or corporations to do what before they could not.

ENACT. To establish by law; to perform or effect; to decree. The usual formula in making laws is, Be it enacted.

ENAJENACION. In Spanish Law. The act by which one person transfers to another a property, either gratuitously, as in the case of a donation, or by an owner's title, as in the case of a sale or an exchange.

In Mexican Law. This word is used in conveyancing to convey the fee, and not a mere servitude upon the land. 26 Cal. 88.

ENQUINTE (Fr.). Pregnant. See PREGNANCY.

ENCLOSURE. An artificial fence around one's estate. 39 Vt. 84, 326; 96 Wis. 42. See CLOSE.

ENCOMIENDA. A charge or mandate conferring certain important privileges on the four military orders of Spain, to wit, those of Santiago, Calatrava, Alcantara, and Montesa. In the legislation of the Indies, it signified the concession of a certain number of Indians for the purpose of instructing them in the Christian religion and defending their persons and property.

ENCOURAGE. To intimate, to incite to anything, to give courage to, to inspire, to embolden, to raise confidence, to make confident. 7 Q. B. Div. 258.

Encourage, Aid or Abet. "Encourage, aid or abet" were said to be words in appropriate use to describe the offense of a person who, not actually doing the felonious act, by his will contributes to or procures it done, and thereby becomes a principal or accessory. 95 Ky. 361, 25 S. W. 596. See ADVISE.

ENCROACH. To gain unlawfully upon the lands, property, or authority of another; as if one man presseth upon the grounds of another too far, or if a tenant owe two shillings rent-service and the lord exact three. So, too, the Spencers were said to encroach the king's authority. Blount; Plowd. 94 a. Quite a memorable instance of punishment for encroaching (accroaching) royal power took place in 21 Edw. III. 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 80. Taking fees by clerks of the courts has been held encroaching; 1 Leon. 5.

ENCUMBRANCE. See INCUMBRANCE.

END. See AT THE END.

END LINE. Within the intent of the mining law, Rev. Stats., § 2322, with respect to the right to pursue a vein extralaterally on its dip, the "end lines" of a lode location are those that cut across the strike of the vein, if it crosses the location. 256 U. S. 25.

ENDEAVOR. In Crim. Code, § 135, the term embraces any effort or essay to accomplish the evil purpose that the section was enacted to prevent, namely, corruption of a juror. The term is not subject to the technical limitations of "attempt." An experimental approach through a third person to the corruption of a juror is enough to constitute an "endeavor." 255 U. S. 143.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACTS. In English Law. Beginning with the stat. 3 & 4 Vict. c. 77, parliament has passed a series of acts for improving the condition of, and extending the system of education in, the endowed schools. Moz. & W.

ENDOWMENT. Now generally used of a permanent provision for any public object, as a school or hospital, but more technically, of the assigning dower to a woman, or the severing of a sufficient portion for a vicar towards his perpetual maintenance. 1 Bla. Com. 387; 2 id. 135; 3 Steph. Com. 99; 27 Me. 381; 32 N. J. L. 860; 4 Har. & M. 429.

ENDOWMENT INSURANCE. See INSURANCE.

ENDORSE. See INDORSE.

ENEMY. A nation which is at war with another. A citizen or a subject of such a nation. Any of the subjects or citizens of a state in amity with another state who have commenced or have made preparations for commencing hostilities against the latter state, and also the citizens or subjects of a state in amity with another state who are in the service of a state at war with it. See Salk. 635; Bacon, Abr. Treason, G; 43 Pa. 491.

By the term enemy is also understood a person who is desirous of doing injury to another. The Latins had two terms to signify these two classes of persons: the first, or the public enemy, they called hostis, and the latter, or the private enemy, inimicus.

An enemy cannot, as a general rule, enter into any contract which can be enforced in the courts of law; but the rule is not without exceptions: as, for example, when a state permits expressly its own citizens to trade with the enemy; and perhaps a contract for necessities, or for money to enable the individual to get home, might be enforced; 7 Pet. 586. See also 4 Op. Atty. Gen. 81; 4 Sawy. 457; 24 Ark. 387; 4 Dall. 87.

ENFEOFF. To make a gift of any corporeal hereditaments to another. See FEOFFMENT.

ENFRANCHISE. To make free; to incorporate a man in a society or body politic. Cun. Dict.

ENFRANCHISEMENT. Giving freedom to a person. Admitting a person to the freedom of a city. A denizen of England, or a citizen of London, is said to be enfranchised. So, too, a villein is enfranchised when he obtains his freedom from his lord. Termes de la Ley; 11 Co. 91; Jacob, Law Dict.

The word is now used principally either of the manumission of slaves (q. v.), of giving to a borough or other constituency a right to return a member or members to parliament, or of the conversion of copyhold into freehold. Mox. & W. L. Dict.

ENFRANCHISEMENT OF COPYHOLD. The change of the tenure by which lands are held from copyhold to freehold, as by a conveyance to the copyholder or by a release of the seigniorial rights. 1 Watk. Copy. 362; 1 Steph. Com. 632; 2 id. 51.

ENGAGE. To embark; to take a part to devote attention and effort. 11 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 33.

In a by-law prohibiting a member of a life insurance association from engaging in certain occupations, "to engage" held to be equivalent to "carry on," and applies to one who is a partner in a business, although he takes no active part in it. 199 N. Y. 401.

ENGAGEMENT. In French Law. A contract. The obligations arising from a quasi contract.

The terms obligation and engagement are said to be synonymous; 17 Troullier, n. 1; but the Code seems specially to apply the term engagement to those obligations which the law imposes on a man without the intervention of any contract, either on the part of the obligor or the obligee; art. 1870. An engagement to do or omit to do something amounts to a promise; 21 N. J. L. 339.

Promises or debts of a married woman, not expressly charged on her separate estate, are termed her general engagements, not binding it unless made with reference to and upon the credit of it. L. R. 4 C. P. 593; L. R. 2 Eq. 182; 3 DeG. F. & J. 518.

ENGLESHIRE. A law was made by Canute, for the preservation of his Danes, that, when a man was killed, the hundred or town should be liable to be amerced, unless it could be proved that the person killed was an Englishman. This proof was called Engleshire. It consisted, generally, of the testimony of two males on the part of the father of him who had been killed and two females on the part of his mother. 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 447; 4 Bla. Com. 195; Spelman, Gloss.

ENGLISH MARRIAGE. This phrase may refer to the place where the marriage was solemnized, or it may refer to the nationality and domicile of the parties between whom it was solemnized, the place where the union so created was to have been enjoyed. 6 Prob. Div. 51.

ENGROSS (Fr. grow). To copy the rude draught of an instrument in a fair, large hand. To write out, in a large, fair hand, on parchment. The term is applied to statutes, which, after being read and acted on a sufficient number of times, are ordered to be engrossed. Anciently, also, used of the process of making the indenture of a fine. 5 Co. 89 b.

In Criminal Law. To buy up such large quantities of an article as to obtain a monopoly of it for the purpose of selling at an unreasonable price. The tendency of modern law is very decidedly to restrict the application of the law against engrossing; and is very doubtful if it applies at all except to obtaining a monopoly of provisions; 1 East 143. And now the common-law offence of the total engrossing of any commodity is abolished by stat. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 34. Merely buying for the purpose of selling again is not necessarily engrossing. 14 East 406; 15 id. 511. See TRUSTS; COMBINATIONS.

ENGROSSER. One who engrosses or writes on parchment in a large, fair hand.

One who purchases large quantities of any commodity in order to have the command of the market and to sell them again at high prices.

ENGROSSING. The offence committed by an engrosser.

ENHANCED. Taken in an unqualified sense, it is equivalent to "increased," and comprehends any increase in value however caused or arising. 32 Fed. Rep. 812.

But, it has been held to include only the value caused by improvements made upon land, and not that which arises fortuitously, or from what may be called natural causes. Id. See FORSTALLING THE MARKET.

ENTIA PARS (L. Lat.). The part of the eldest. Co. Litt. 166; Bacon, Abr. Coparceners (C).

When partition is voluntarily made among coparceners in England, the eldest has the first choice, or primer election (q. v.); and the part which she takes is called entia pars. This right is purely personal, and descends: it is also said that even her assignee shall enjoy it; but this has been doubted. The word entia is said to be derived from the old French eisme, the eldest; Bac. Abr. Coparceners (C); Kailw. 1 a, 49 a; Cro. Eliz. 18.

ENJOIN. To command; to require; as, private individuals are not only permitted, but enjoined, by law, to arrest an offender when present at the time a felony is committed or a dangerous wound given, on pain of fine and imprisonment if the wrong-doer escape through their negligence. 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 587; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 298; Ry. & M. 93.

To command or order a defendant in equity to do or not to do a particular thing by writ of injunction. See 55 Ch. Div. 418; INJUNCTION.

ENLARGE. To extend; as, to enlarge a rule to plead is to extend the time during which a defendant may plead. To enlarge means, also, to set at liberty; as, the prisoner was enlarged on giving bail.

ENLARGING. Extending, or making more comprehensive; as, an enlarging statute, which is one extending the common law. Enlarging an estate is the increasing an estate in land, as where A. has an estate for life with remainder to B. and his heirs, and B. releases his estate to A. 2 Bla. Com. 324. See RELEASE.

ENLISTMENT. The act of making a contract to serve the government in a subordinate capacity, either in the army or navy. The contract so made is also called an enlistment. See, as to the power of infants to enlist, 4 Bing. 437; 5 id. 428; 6 id. 255; 1 S. & R. 87; 11 id. 93. A drafted man is said to be "enlisted" as well as a volunteer, but the term does not apply to one entering the army under a commission; 107 Mass. 282; 48 N. H. 280. See 8 Allen 480; 2 Sprague 103; 40 Conn. 286. The contract of enlistment involves a change in the status of the recruit, which he cannot throw off at will, though he may violate his contract; 137 U. S. 147. See MILITIA; MILITARY LAW.

ENORMIA (Lat.). Wrongs. It occurs in the old Latin forms of pleading, where, after a specific allegation of the wrongs done by the defendant, the plaintiff alleges generally that the defendant did alia enormia (other wrongs). to the damage, etc. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 278; 1 Chit. Pl. 379. See ALIA ENORMIA.

ENQUETE or ENQUEST. In Canon Law. An examination of witnesses in the presence of a judge authorized to sit for this purpose, taken in writing, to be used as evidence in the trial of a cause. The day of hearing must be specified in a notice to the opposite party; 9 Low. C. 392. It may be opened, in some cases, before the trial; 10 Low. C. 19.

ENROLL. To register; to enter on the rolls of chancery, or other courts; to make a record.

ENROLMENT. In English Law. The registering or entering on the rolls of chancery, king's bench, common pleas, or exchequer, or by the clerk of the peace in the records of the quarter sessions, of any lawful act; as, a recognizance, a deed of bargain and sale, and the like. Jacob, Law Dict. For the terms "enrolment" and "registration" as used in the United States merchant shipping laws, see R. S. tit. 50; 21 Stat. L. 271; 18 id. 80; 3 Wall. 566; VESSEL. See REGISTER OF SHIPS.

ENS LEGIS. A being of the law. Used of corporations.

ENTAIL. A fee abridged or limited to the issue, or certain classes of issue, instead of descending to all the heirs. 1 Washb. R. P. 68; Cowel; 2 Bla. Com. 112, n.; Wms. R. P. 61.

To restrict the inheritance of lands to a particular class of issue. 1 Washb. R. P. 66; 2 Bla. Com. 113. See FREE-TAIL. See QUASI-ENTAIL.

ENTENCION. In Old English Law. The plaintiff's declaration.

ENTER. To go upon lands for the purpose of taking possession; to take possession. In a strict use of terms, entry and taking possession would seem to be distinct parts of the same act; but, practically, entry is now merged in taking possession. 1 Washb. R. P. 10, 32; Stearn, Real Act. 2.

To cause to be put down upon the record. An attorney is said to enter his appearance, or the party himself may enter an appearance. See ENTRY.

A provision in a post-office appropriation act referring to the entering of mail matter refers to second class mail as that is the only class to which the word "enter" can apply. 229 U. S. 288; § 2 Post-Office Appropriation Act of 1912.

ENTERTAINMENT. Something connected with the enjoyment of refreshment rooms, tables, and the like. It is something beyond refreshments; it is the accommodation provided whether that includes musical or other amusements or not. L. R. 10 Q. B. 595. It is synonymous with board; 2 Miles 323; but it may include refreshment, without seating accommodation; 1 Ex. Div. 885.

ENTICE. To solicit, persuade, or procure. 12 Abb. Pr. U. S. 187. The enticing desertions from the army or navy or arsenals of the United States is punishable with fine and imprisonment. R. S. §§ 1553, 1668, 5455, 5525.

A husband may recover compensation for enticing his wife away. 36 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 609; 153 Mass. 146; 26 Vt. 273. It is no defence to show that they had not lived happily together, though it may go in mitigation of damages; 121 Mass. 236; 63 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 341. Stronger evidence is required where a parent harbors his daughter; it ought to appear that there were improper motives; 5 Johns. 196; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 64; 89 Tenn. 478; 47 Mich. 172. So of a wife's action against her husband's parents for enticing him away from her; 6 Ind. App. 817; and probably of a brother's harboring his sister; 89 Tenn. 479. It has been held that neither at common law nor under statutes giving a wife the right to sue has she a right of action for enticing away her husband; 76 Wis. 874; 83 Me. 503; 88 Tenn. 270; but the weight of authority is that the action will lie at common law; 188 Ind. 286; 45 Fed. Rep. 315; 43 Neb. 369; 116 N. Y. 584; 9 H. L. Cas. 377. See 60 Mich. 128, with citations.

A person has a right of action against one who improperly entices his minor child away from him; 71 Ind. 451; 50 Barb. 351; L. R. 2 C. P. 615; in tort or assumption; Tiffany, Pers. & Dom. Rel. 294. The action is on the theory of loss of services, and the relation of master and servant, either actual or constructive, must be proven; id.; 27 N. J. L. 81.

A master has a right of action for knowingly enticing his servant; 2 El. & Bl. 316; 56 N. H. 456; s. c. 23 Am. Rep. 473 and note; 48 Ga. 381; 88 S. C. 328; even though the contract of employment was one which the servant could terminate at will; 70 N. C. 60; L. R. 2 C. P. 615; but not where it had expired by its own limitations; 4 Pick. 425. The doctrine extends to all kinds of employees; 107 Mass. 553; though it has been held to apply, at common law, only to domestic servants and apprentices; 15 S. C. 82.

Where one after notice continues to employ another's servant the latter has a right of action, though at the time he hired him the second master did not know that he was hiring another man's servant; Schoul. Dom. Rel. § 487; but in Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216, which was an action for damages caused by the enticement of Wagner, a celebrated singer, from one theatre to another, the majority of the court thought the action would lie.

Enticement in some states renders one liable to criminal prosecution; 44 Ga. 828; 50 Ala. 160; 69 N. C. 538. See, generally, 26 Fla. 206 and cases cited.

ENTIRE. That which is not divided; that which is whole.

When a contract is entire, it must, in general, be fully performed before the party can claim the compensation which was to have been paid to him: for example, when a man hires to serve another for one year, he will not be entitled to leave him at any time before the end of the year, and claim compensation for the time unless it be done by the consent or default of the party hiring; 6 Vt. 35; 2 Pick. 267; 4 McCord 26, 246; 4 Me. 454; 2 Pa. 454; 15 Johns. 224; 6 H. & J. 38. See 27 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 501. A contract is entire if the consideration be single and entire, notwithstanding the subject of the contract consist of several distinct items; 2 Pars. Cont. 517. See DRIVABLE.

An entire day is an undivided day, from midnight to midnight; 43 Ala. 325; 7 Tex. App. 80, 192. The words "entire use, benefit," etc., in a trust deed for the benefit of a married woman, have been construed as equivalent to "sole and separate use;" 3 Ired. Eq. 414. Entire tenancy "is contrary to several tenancy, signifying a sole possession in one man, whereas the other signifieth joint or common in more." Cowell.

Entire and Absolute Property. "Entire and absolute property" signifies undivided, unmingled, complete in all its parts; free and not controlled by others. 7 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 393.

Property. See "Entire and absolute property." Supra.

ENTIRE AND SEVERAL CONTRACTS. If the part to be performed by one party consists of several and distinct items, and the price to be paid by the other is apportioned to each item to be performed, or is left to be implied by law, such a contract will generally be held to be severable. But if the consideration to be paid is single and entire, the contract must be held to be entire, although the subject of the contract may consist of several distinct and wholly independent items. 115 U. S. 196; 2 Parsons on Contracts, 29-31. See CONTRACT; SEVERAL.

ENTIRETY. This word denotes the whole in contradistinction to moiety, which denotes the half part. A husband and wife, when jointly seized of land, are seized by entireties per tout and not per my et per tout, as joint tenants are. Jacob. Law

Dict.; 2 Kent 182. See 156 Pa. 428; PER TOUT ET NON PER MY.

The same words of conveyance that would make two other persons joint tenants will make the husband and wife tenants of the entirety; 28 S. C. 34; 60 Miss. 795; 23 Or. 4; 22 Tenn. 707. Where a wife pays for land and consents that the title may be taken in the name of herself and husband, they hold as tenants in entirety, and a conveyance by the husband passes the rights to the possession of the land during their joint lives, and to the fee in case the husband survive; 67 Hun 229; 169 Mass. 415. See TENANCY BY ENTIRETIES.

ENTITLED. In its usual sense, to entitle is to give a right; therefore a person is said to be entitled to property when he has a right to it. R. & L. Dict.; L. R. 20 Eq. 534. Also, to bestow a name upon. English.

ENTREGA. In Spanish Law. Delivery.

ENTREPOT. A warehouse. A magazine where goods are deposited which are to be again removed.

ENTRY. In Common Law. The act of setting down the particulars of a sale, or other transaction, in a merchant's or tradesman's account-books: such entries are, in general, prima facie evidence of the sale and delivery, and of work done; but unless the entry be the original one, it is not evidence. See SHORT ENTRY; SINGLE ENTRY.

In Revenue Law. The submitting to the inspection of officers appointed by law, to collect customs, goods imported into the United States, together with a statement or description of such goods, and the original invoices of the same, for the purpose of estimating the duties to be paid thereon.

The act of March 2, 1799, s. 80, 1 Story, U. S. Laws 606, and the act of March 1, 1823, 3 Story, U. S. Laws 1881, and of March 3, 1863, regulate the manner of making entries of goods. Under the last mentioned act, goods entered by means of any false paper, etc., or their value, shall be forfeited, and the word "entry" in that act means the entire transaction by which the goods become a part of the merchandise of the country; 5 Ben. 25.

The term "entry" in the acts of congress is used in two senses. In many of the acts it refers to the bill of entry,—the paper or declaration which the merchant or importer in the first instance hands to the entry clerk. In other statutes it is used to denote, not a document, but a transaction; a series of acts which are necessary to the end to be accomplished, viz. the entering of the goods; 3 Sawy. 46.

In Criminal Law. The act of entering a dwelling-house, or other building, in order to commit a crime.

In cases of burglary, the least entry with the whole or any part of the body, hand, or foot, or with any instrument or weapon, introduced for the purpose of committing a felony, is sufficient to complete the offence; Co. 3d Inst. 64.

It is an entry if a person descend a chimney but is arrested before he can get low enough to enter any room; it is an entry to open a window entirely, but not to push it up or down when partly opened; putting a finger or a pistol over a threshold is an entry, but not a centre-bit or crowbar, these instruments being intended for breaking, and not for committing a felony. Sir M. Hale suggests a "quere," however, with a "seeming" to the contrary, as to an entry by a bullet fired into a house; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 535. It is submitted, says Wilmut (Dig. Law of Burglary 58), that the only possible way in which the discharging a loaded gun or pistol into a dwelling-house from the outside could be held burglary would be by laying the intent to commit felony by killing or wounding, or generally to commit felony; and quere, whether the breaking and entry requisite to complete the burglary would be satisfied by such discharge? It is not necessary in all cases to show an actual entry by all the prisoners; there may be a constructive entry as well as a constructive breaking. A, B, and C come in the night by consent to break and enter the house of D to commit a felony. A only actually breaks and enters the house; B stands near the door, but does not actually enter; C stands at the lane's end, or orchard-gate, or field-gate, or the like, to watch that no help come to aid the owner, or to give notice to the others if help comes; this is burglary in all, and all are principals; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 555. See BURGLARY.

Upon Real Estate. The act of going upon the lands of another, or lands claimed as one's own, with intent to take possession. See 8 Humph. 806.

In general, any person who has a right of possession may assert it by a peaceable entry, without the formality of a legal action, and, being so in possession, may retain it, and plead that it is his soil and freehold; 3 Term 295. A notorious act of ownership of this kind was always equivalent to a feudal investiture by the lord, and is now allowed in all cases where the original entry of a wrong-doer was unlawful. But, in all cases where the first entry was lawful and an apparent right of possession was thereby gained, the owner of the estate cannot thus enter, but is driven to his action at law; 3 Bla. Com. 175. See RE-ENTRY; FORCEFUL ENTRY.

At common law, no person could make a valid sale of land unless he had lawfully entered, and could make livery of seisin,—that is, could make an actual delivery of possession to the purchaser. This provision was early incorporated into the English statutes, to guard against the many evils produced by selling pretended titles to land. A pretended title within the purview of the law is where one person claims land of which another is in possession holding adversely to the claim; 1 Plowd. 88 a; Littleton § 347; 9 Wend. 511. And now in most of the states, every grant of land, except as a release, is void as an act of maintenance, if, at the time it is made, the lands are in the actual possession of another person claiming under a title adverse to that of the grantor; 4 Kent 446; 5 Johns. 489; 6 Mass. 418; 87 Hun 30; 30 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 20; contra, 5 N. H. 181; 6 Binn. 420; 2 App. Cas. D. C. 349. See CHAMPERTY.

In a more limited sense, an entry signifies the simply going upon another person's premises for some particular purpose. The right to land is exclusive, and every unwarranted entry thereon without the owner's leave, whether it be enclosed or not, or unless the person entering have an authority given him by law, is a trespass; 12 Johns. 408; 19 id. 335; 2 Mass. 127. But the owner's license will sometimes be presumed, and then will continue in force until it is actually revoked by the owner; 10 Johns. 246; Willes 195; Tayl. L. & T. 766.

Authority to enter upon lands is given by law in many cases. See ARREST.

The proprietor of chattels may under some circumstances enter the land of another upon which they are placed, and remove them, provided they are there without his default: as, where his tree has blown down into the adjoining close by the wind, or his fruit has fallen from a branch which overhanging it; 20 Vin. Abr. 418; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 627.

A landlord also may enter, to distrain or to demand rent, to see whether waste has been committed, or repairs made, and may go into the house for either purpose, provided the outer door be open; Cro. Eliz. 676; 9 Greenl. Ev. § 627. So, if he is bound to repair, he has a right of entry given him by law for that purpose; Moore 889. Or if trees are excepted out of a demise, the lessee has a right of entering to prune or fell them; 11 Co. 63; Tayl. L. & T. § 767. A tenant becomes a trespasser after the expiration of his term, though his holding is in good faith under color of a reasonable claim of right; and the landlord may forcibly enter thereon and eject him without legal process; 16 R. I. 524; 17 id. 731.

Every traveller also has, by law, the privilege of entering a common inn, at all seasonable times, provided the host has sufficient accommodation, which, if he has not,

it is for him to declare. Wand. Inns 46.

So any man may throw down a public nuisance; and a private one may be thrown down by the party grieved, and this before any prejudice happens, but only from the probability that it may happen; Webb, Pol. Torts 518; 5 Co. 103. And see 1 Brownl. 219; 13 Mod. 510; W. Jones 281; 1 Str. 688; 53 Wis. 404. To this end, the abator has authority to enter the close in which it stands. See NUISANCE.

In Practice. The placing on record the various proceedings in an action, in technical language and order. The extreme strictness of the old practice is somewhat relaxed, but the term entry is still used in this connection. "Books of Entries" were formerly much relied on, containing forms or precedents of the proceedings in various actions as they appear on record.

In the law books the words entry and entered are frequently used as synonymous with recorded; 180 N. Y. 504. See 100 Ill. 484; 54 Cal. 519; 74 Ind. 59.

For entry of public lands, see PRE-EMPTION RIGHT. For the terms entry of judgment, entry of appearance, entry for copyright, see JUDGMENT; APPEARANCE; COPYRIGHT.

ENTRY AD COMMUNE LEGEM. In English Law. A writ which lay in favor of the reversioner, when the tenant for term of life, tenant for term of another's life, tenant by the curtesy, or tenant in dower had aliened and died. Tomlin, Law Dict. Long obsolete, and abolished in 1838.

ENTRY, WRIT OF. In Old Practice. A real action brought to recover the possession of lands from one who wrongfully withholds possession thereof.

Such writs were said to be in the Quibus, where the suit was brought against the party who committed the wrong; in the Per, where the tenant against whom the action was brought was either heir or grantee of the original wrong-doer; in the Per and Cui, where there had been two decedents, two alienations, or decedent and an alienation; in the Post, where the wrong was removed beyond the degrees mentioned.

The above designations are derived from significant Latin words in the respective forms adapted to the cases given. A descent or alienation on the part of the disseisor constituted a degree (see Co. Litt. 229 a); and at common law the writ could be brought only within the degrees (two), the demandant after that being driven to his writ of right. By the statute of Marlbridge (q. v.), 4 Hen. III. c. 30 (A. N. 1267), however, a writ of entry, after (post) those degrees had been passed in the alienation of the estate, was allowed. Where there had been no descent and the demandant himself had been disseised, the writ ran: Propter A quod reddid B ex causa terre, etc. de quibus land A, etc. (command A to restore to B six acres of land, etc., of which the said A, etc.); if there had been a descent after the disseision came, the clause, A quod idem A non habet ingressum nisi per C qui illud ei demisit (into which the said A, the tenant, has no entry but through C, who demised it to him); where there were two decedents, nisi per D cui C illud demisit (but by D, to whom C demised it); where it was beyond the degrees, nisi post disseisiam suam C (but after the disseisin which C, the original disseisor, did, etc.).

The writ was of many varieties, also, according to the character of the title of the claimant and the circumstances of the deprivation of possession. Both enumerates and discusses twelve of these, of which some are per disseisin, per intrusion, ad communem legem, ad terminum qui preterit, cui in vita, cui ante discessum, etc. Etc. These might, of course, be brought in any of the four degrees, as the circumstances of the case required. The use of writs of entry has been long since abolished in England; but they are still in use in a modified form in some of the United States, as the common means of recovering possession of realty against a wrongfully occupant; 3 Pick. 473; 10 Id. 359; 5 N. H. 400; 86 Me. 31, 71; 85 Id. 90; 124 Mass. 307, 486; 189 Id. 244; 157 Id. 34. See Stearns, Real Act.; Booth, B. A.; Co. Litt. 229 b.

To maintain a writ of entry, the demandant who declares on his own seisin, and alleges a disseisin, is required to prove only that he has a right of entry and need not prove an actual wrongful dispossession or an adverse possession by the tenants; 161 Mass. 91.

ENTRYMAN. See ARMOR.

ENURE. To take or have effect. To serve to the use, benefit, or advantage of a person. The word is often written enure.

A release to the tenant for life enures to him in reversion; that is, it has the same effect for him as for the tenant for life. A discharge of the principal enures to the benefit of the surety.

ENVOY. In International Law. A diplomatic agent sent by one state to another. Wharton.

A minister of the second rank, on whom his sovereign or government has conferred a degree of dignity and respectability which, without being on a level with an ambassador, immediately follows, and, among ministers, yields the pre-eminence to him alone.

Envoys are either ordinary or extraordinary; by custom the latter is held in greater consideration. Vatt. liv. 4, c. 6, § 72. See FOREIGN MINISTER.

EO INSTANTI. At that instant; at the very or same instant; immediately. 1 Bla. Com. 196, 249; 1 Co. 138; Black, L. Dict.

EPHORE (Sax.). An earl. Blount; 1 Bla. Com. 396.

EPILEPSY. In Medical Jurisprudence. A disease of the brain, which occurs in paroxysms with uncertain intervals between them.

These paroxysms are characterized by the loss of sensation, and convulsive motions of the muscles. When long continued and violent, this disease is very apt to end in dementia. It gradually destroys the memory and impairs the intellect, and is one of the causes of an unsound mind.

EPIQUEYA. In Spanish Law. The benignant and prudent interpretation of the law according to the circumstances of the time, place, and person. This word is derived from the Greek, and is synonymous with the word equity. See Murillo, nn. 67, 68.

EPISCOPACY. In Ecclesiastical Law. A form of government by diocesan bishops; the office or condition of a bishop.

EPISCOPALIA (L. Lat.). In Ecclesiastical Law. Synods, or payments due the bishop.

EPISCOPUS (L. Lat.). In Civil Law. A superintendent; an inspector. Those in each municipality who had the charge and oversight of the bread and other provisions which served the citizens for their daily food were so called. Vicat; Du Cange.

A bishop. These bishops, or episcopi, were held to be the successors of the apostles, and have various titles at different times in history and according to their different duties. It was applied generally to those who had authority or were of peculiar sanctity. After the fall of the Roman empire they came to have very considerable judicial powers. Du Cange; Vicat; Calvinus, Lex.

EPISTOLÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. Rescripts; opinions given by the emperors in cases submitted to them for decision. Answers of the emperors to petitions.

The answers of counsellors (juris-consults), as Ulpian and others, to questions of law proposed to them, were also called epistolæ.

Opinions written out. The term originally signified the same as litteræ. Vicat.

EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS. The equality clause of the Fourteenth amendment (q. v.) which states that no state shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws," which, according to 169 U. S. 406 protects not only natural persons, but also those artificial persons called corporations. The exact interpretation and application of the clause depends of necessity on the circumstances of each individual case, but in general is taken to mean that "the law shall operate equally and uniformly," not on "persons merely as such, but on persons according to their relations," that is, "upon all persons in similar circumstances." Bramon, XIV Am. 315, 319, 323, 324. See CLASSIFICATION IN STATUTES.

EQUALITY. Likeness in possessing the same rights and being liable to the same duties. See 1 Toullier, nn. 170, 188.

Persons are all equal before the law, whatever adventitious advantages some may possess over others. All persons are protected by the law, and obedience to it is required from all.

Judges in court, while exercising their functions, are all upon an equality, it being a rule that inter pares non est potestas: a judge cannot, therefore, punish another judge of the same court for using any expression in court, although the words used might have been a contempt in any other person. Bacon, Abr., Of the Court of Sessions, Of Justices of the Peace.

In contracts, the law presumes that the parties act upon a perfect equality: when, therefore, one party uses any fraud or deceit to destroy this equality, the party grieved may avoid the contract. In case of a grant to two or more persons jointly, without designating what each takes, they are presumed to take in equal proportions; 4 Day 895; 6 Ired. Eq. 437; 83 Pa. 59.

It is a maxim that when the equity of the parties is equal, the law must prevail; 8 Cal. 259; and that as between different creditors, equality is equity; 2 Bouvier, Inst., 2d ed. n. 8729; 1 Paige, Ch. 181. See Kames, Eq. 75.

EQUALLY DIVIDED. Under a bequest of property to be "equally divided" between the children of B and J, brothers of testators, the nieces and nephews take per capita and not per stirpes. 118 Ky. 751, 82 S. W. 408.

Where the words "equally divided" are used in a will they generally mean a per capita and not a per stirpes division. 12 Bush (Ky.) 389; 150 Ky. 641; 150 S. W. 835.

EQUINOX. The name given to two periods of the year when the days and nights are equal; that is, when the space of time between the rising and setting of the sun is one-half of a natural day. The vernal equinox occurs about March 21, the autumnal about September 23.

EQUIPMENT. The act of equipping or being equipped, as for a voyage or expedition. 11 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 54; 85 Cal. 329. The visible, tangible furniture, fixtures, and apparatus on premises, which are usual and necessary for the operations there conducted. Id.; 50 Md. 346.

Of a railroad, the necessary adjuncts such as cars, locomotives, etc. Id.; 45 N. E. Rep. 828.

EQUITABLE. By operation of equity; cognizable in equity.

EQUITABLE ASSETS. Such assets as are chargeable with the payment of debts or legacies in equity, and which do not fall under the description of legal assets.

Those portions of the property which by the ordinary rules of law are exempt from debts, but which the testator has voluntarily charged as assets, or which, being non-existent at law, have been created in equity. Ad. Eq. 254.

They are so called because they can be reached only by the aid and instrumentality of a court of equity, and because their distribution is governed by a different rule from that which governs the distribution of legal assets. 2 Fonb. Eq. b. 4, pt. 2, c. 2, § 1, and notes; 2 Vern. 768; Willes 528; 3 Woodd. Lect. 466; Story, Eq. Jur. § 562.

The doctrine of equitable assets has been much restricted in the United States generally, and has lost its importance in England since the act of 1870, providing that simple contract and specialty creditors are, in future, payable pari passu out of both legal and equitable assets; Biagh. Eq. § 581; 4 Johns. Ch. 651; 5 Pet. 160; 2 Brock. 885; 8 Dana 18; 9 B. Monr. 499; 3 Ired. Eq. 269.

EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT. An assignment of a chose in action, a thing not in esse, as a mortgage of personal property to be acquired in the future, and a mere contingency which, though not good at law, equity will recognize. Biagh. Eq. § 164; 10 H. L. Cas. 209; 19 Wall. 544; 88 Ill. App.

66; 83 N. J. Eq. 614; 91 Pa. 96. In making such an assignment, no particular form of words is necessary; 35 Me. 41; 56 Barb. 362; 33 Vt. 491; 59 N. H. 888; 80 N. J. Eq. 171; but the property must be specifically pointed out; 56 Me. 465; Benj. Sales 62; and there must be an appropriation or separation, and the mere intent to appropriate is not sufficient; 54 Fed. Rep. 577; 37 N. J. Eq. 128. See 14 Wall. 69. A valid assignment may be made of a portion of the contract price of a building contracted to be erected by the assignor, but not yet erected, and such assignment need not be written nor accompanied by any transfer of the contract itself; 50 N. J. Eq. 201. The assignee of a chose in action takes it subject to existing equities in favor of third persons, as well as to those between the original parties; 50 N. Y. 67; 8 Lead. Cas. Eq. 872, n.; Beach, Eq. Jur. 842. Equity will not recognize the assignment of certain kinds of property as against the policy of the law, such as, mere litigious rights, pensions, salaries of judges, commissions of officers in the army or navy, claims against the United States, and the like; 1 E. L. & Eq. 153; 67 Pa. 369; L. R. 7 Ch. 109; 8 id. 76; 6 Ct. Cl. 123; 4 id. 569; 112 U. S. 733. The assignment of secured notes carries with it an equitable assignment of the security; 44 Ill. App. 516. See ASSIGNMENT; EXPECTANCY.

EQUITABLE CONVERSION. See CONVERSION.

EQUITABLE DEFENCE. A defence to an action on grounds which, prior to the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act (17 and 18 Vict. c. 125), would have been cognizable only in a court of equity. Moz. & W. The codes of procedure and the practice in some of the states likewise permit both a legal and equitable defence to the same action.

EQUITABLE ESTATE. A right or interest in land, which, not having the properties of a legal estate, but being merely a right of which courts of equity will take notice, requires the aid of such court to make it available.

These estates consist of uses, trusts, and powers. They possess in some respects the qualities of legal estates in modern law; 1 Pet. 508; 13 Pick. 154; 5 Watts 113; 82 Pa. 86; 1 Johns. Ch. N. Y. 508; 2 Vern. 536; 1 Bro. Ch. Cas. 499; Wms. R. P. 184-136; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 501; 1 Washb. R. P. 130, 161.

EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL. Estoppel in pais (q. v.). 10 Otto 580.

In order to constitute an "equitable estoppel" there must exist a false representation or concealment of material facts; it must have been made with knowledge, actual or constructive, of the facts; the party to whom it was made must have been without knowledge or the means of knowledge of the real facts; it must have been made with the intention that it should be acted upon; and the party to whom it was made must have relied on or acted upon to his prejudice. 157 Ky. 23, 163 S. W. 504. See ESTOPPEL.

EQUITABLE MORTGAGE. A lien upon real estate of such a character that it is recognized in equity as a security for the payment of money and is treated as a mortgage. A mortgage of a merely equitable estate or interest is also so called.

Such a mortgage may exist by a deposit with the lender of money of the title-deeds to an estate; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1020; Bisph. Eq. 161; 1 Bro. Ch. C. 260, note; 17 Ves. 230; 2 Myl. & K. 417; 5 Wheat. 277; 2 Dick. 759; 2 Drew 41; 20 Beav. 607. They must have been deposited as a present, bona fide security; 1 Washb. R. P. 503; and the mortgagee must show notice to affect a subsequent mortgagee of record; 24 Me. 811; 3 Hare 416; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1020. Such mortgages are recognized in some states; 24 Me. 311; 18 Miss. 418; 16 Ga. 469; 2 Hill, S. C. 166; 2 Sandf. 9; 4 R. I. 512; but under the usual system of the registration of deeds are of infrequent occurrence.

Such a mortgage has been said to exist in favor of the vendor of real estate as security for purchase-money due from the purchaser; in which case a lien is recognized in some jurisdictions; 15 Ves. 339; 1 Bro. Ch. C. 420, 424, n. It is occasionally spoken of as an equitable mortgage; 1 Bland 491; 2 Rob. Va. 447, though it is doubtful if it is to be so considered. It is properly termed vendor's lien, which see. See also LIEN.

EQUITABLE WASTE. See WASTE.

EQUITATURA. In Old English Law. Needful equipments for riding or travelling.

EQUITY. A branch of remedial justice by and through which relief is afforded to suitors in the courts of equity.

In the broad sense in which this term is sometimes used, it signifies natural justice.

In a more limited application, it denotes equal justice between contending parties. This is its moral signification, in reference to the rights of parties having conflicting claims; but applied to courts and their jurisdiction and proceedings, it has a more restricted and legal signification.

One division of courts is into courts of law and courts of equity. And equity, in this relation and application, is a branch of remedial justice by and through which relief is afforded to suitors in the courts of equity.

The difference between the remedial justice of the courts of common law and that of the courts of equity is marked and material. That administered by the courts of law is limited by the principles of the common law (which are to a great extent positive and inflexible), and especially by the nature and character of the issues and pleadings, and of the judgments which those courts can render; because the pleadings cannot fully present all the matters in controversy, nor can the judgments be adapted to the special exigencies which may exist in particular cases. It is not uncommon, also, for cases to fail in the law, from the fact that too few or too many persons have been joined as parties, or because the pleadings have not been framed with sufficient technical precision.

The remedial process of the courts of equity, on the other hand, admits, and generally requires, that all persons having an interest shall be made parties, and makes a large allowance for amendments by summoning and discharging parties after the commencement of the suit. The pleadings are usually framed so as to present to the consideration of the court the whole case, with its possible legal rights, and all its equities,—that is, all the grounds upon which the party is not entitled to relief upon the principles of equity. And its final remedial process may be so varied as to meet the requirements of these equities, in cases where the jurisdiction of the courts of equity exists, by "commanding what is right, and prohibiting what is wrong." In other words, its final process is varied so as to enable the courts of equity to do equitable justice between the parties which the case demands, either by commanding what is to be done, or prohibiting what is threatened to be done.

The principles upon which, and the modes and forms by which, through which, justice is administered in the United States, are derived to a great extent from those which were in existence in England at the time of the settlement of this country; and it is therefore important to a correct understanding of the nature and character of our own jurisprudence, not only to trace it back to its introduction here on the early settlement of the colonies, but also to trace the English jurisprudence from its earliest inception as the administration of law, founded on principles, down to that period. It is in this way that we are enabled to explain many things in our own practice which would otherwise be entirely obscure. This is particularly true of the principles which regulate the jurisdiction and practice of the courts of equity, and of the principles of equity as they are now applied and administered in the courts of law which at the present day have equitable jurisdiction conferred upon them by statutes passed for that purpose. And for the purpose of a competent understanding of the course of decisions in the courts of equity in England, it is necessary to refer to the origin of the equitable jurisdiction there, and to trace its history, inquiring upon what principles it was originally founded, and how it has been modified.

The study of equity jurisprudence, therefore, comprises an inquiry into the origin and history of the courts of equity; the distinctive principles upon which jurisdiction in equity is founded; the nature, character, and extent of the jurisdiction itself; its peculiar remedies; the rules and maxims which regulate its administration; its remedial process and proceedings and modes of defence; and its rules of evidence and practice.

The meaning of the word "equity," as used in its technical sense in English jurisprudence, comes back to this: that it is simply a term descriptive of a certain field of jurisdiction exercised in the English system, by certain courts, and of which the extent and boundaries are not marked by lines founded upon principles so much as the features of the original constitution of the English scheme of remedial law, and the accidents of its development." Bisph. Eq. § 11.

ORIGIN AND HISTORY. The courts of equity may be said to have their origin as far back as the Aula or Curia Regis, the great court in which the king administered justice in person, assisted by his counselors. Of the officers of this court, the chancellor was one of great trust and confidence, next to the king himself; but his duties do not distinctly appear at the present day. On the dissolution of that court, he exercised separate duties.

On the introduction of seals, he had the keeping of the king's seal, which he affixed to charters and deeds; and he had some authority in relation to the king's grants,—perhaps annulling those which were alleged to have been procured by misrepresentation or to have been issued unadvisedly.

As writs came into use, it was made his duty to frame and issue them from his court, which, as early as the reign of Henry II., was known as the chancery. And it is said that he exercised at this period a sort of equitable jurisdiction by which he mitigated the rigor of the common law,—to what extent it is impossible to determine. He is spoken of as one who "annuls unjust laws, and executes the rightful commands of the pious prince, and puts an end to what is injurious to the people or to morals,"—which would form a very ample jurisdiction; but it seems probable that this was according to the authority or direction of the king, given from time to time in relation to particular cases. He was a principal member of the king's council, after the conquest, in which, among other things, all applications for the special exercise of the prerogative in regard to matters of judicial cognizance were discussed and decided upon. In connection with the council, he exercised a separate authority in cases in which the council directed the suitors to proceed in chancery. The court of chancery is said to have sprung from this council. But it may be said that it had its origin in the prerogative of the king, by which he undertook to administer justice, on petitions to himself, without regard to the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts, which he did through orders to his chancellor. The great council, or parliament, also sent matters relating to the king's grants, etc., to the chancery; and it seems that the chancellor, although an ecclesiastic, was the principal actor as regards the judicial business which the select or king's council, as well as the great council, had to advise upon or transact. In the reign of Edward I. the power and authority of the chancellor were extended by the statute of Westminster 2d.

In the time of Edward III. proceedings in chancery were commenced by petition or bill, the adverse party was summoned, the parties were examined, and chancery appears as a distinct court for giving relief in cases which required extraordinary remedies, the king having, "by a writ, referred all such matters as were of grace to be dispatched by the chancellor or by the keeper of the privy seal."

It may be considered to have been fully established as a separate and permanent jurisdiction, from the 17th of Richard II.

In the time of Edward IV. the chancery had come to be regarded as one of the four principal courts of the kingdom. From this time its jurisdiction and the progress of its jurisdiction become of more importance to us.

It is the tendency of any system of legal principles, when reduced to a practical application, to fail of effecting such justice between party and party as the special circumstances of a case may require, by reason of the minuteness and inflexibility of its rules and the inability of the judges to adapt its remedies to the necessities of the controversy under consideration. This was the case with the Roman law; and, to remedy this, edicts were issued from time to time, which enabled the consuls and prætors to correct "the scrupulosity and mischievous subtlety of the law;" and from these edicts a code of equitable jurisprudence was compiled.

So the principles and rules of the common law, as they were reduced to practice, became in their application the means of injustice in cases where special equitable circumstances existed, of which the judge could not take cognizance because of the precise nature of its titles and rights, the inflexible character of its principles, and the technicality of its pleadings and practice. And in a manner somewhat analogous to the Roman mode of modification, in order to remedy such hardships, the prerogative of the king or the authority of the great council was exercised in ancient times to procure a more equitable measure of justice in the particular case, which was accomplished through the court of chancery.

This was followed by the "intention" of the writ of subpoena by means of which the chancery assumed, upon a complaint made directly to that court, to require the attendance of the adverse party, to answer to such matters as should be objected against him. Notwithstanding the complaints of the commons, from time to time, that the course of proceeding in chancery "was not according to the course of the common law, but the practice of the holy church," the king sustained the authority of the chancellor, the right to issue the writ was recognized and regulated by statute, and other statutes were passed conferring jurisdiction where it had not been taken before. In this way, without any compilation of a code, a system of equitable jurisprudence was established in the court of chancery, enlarging from time to time; the decisions of the court furnishing an exposition of its principles and of their application. It is said that the jurisdiction was greatly enlarged under the administration of Cardinal Wolsey, in the time of Henry VIII. The courts of equity also began to act in personam and to enjoin plaintiffs in common-law courts from prosecuting inequitable suits. A controversy took place between Lord Chancellor Ellesmere and Lord Coke, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, in the time of James I., respecting the right of the chancellor to interfere with any of the proceedings and judgments of the courts of law. The king sustained the chancellor; and from that time the jurisdiction then claimed has been maintained. See 1 Ch. Rep. 1; 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 504; Bishop. Eq. § 407; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 172; CANCELLARIUS.

It is from the study of these decisions and the commentaries upon them that we are enabled to determine, with a greater or less degree of certainty, the time when and the grounds upon which jurisdiction was granted or was taken in particular classes of cases, and the principles upon which it was administered. And it is occasionally of importance to attend to this; because we shall see that, chancery having once obtained jurisdiction, that jurisdiction continues until expressly taken away, notwithstanding the intervention of such changes in common-law practice and rules as, if they had been made earlier, would have rendered the exercise of jurisdiction in equity incompatible with the principles upon which it is founded.

A brief sketch of some of the principal points in the origin and history of the court of chancery may serve to show that much of its jurisdiction exists independently of any statute, and is founded upon an assumption of a power to do equity, having its first inception in the prerogative of the king, and his commands to do justice in individual cases, extending itself through the action of the chancellor, to the issue of a writ of summons to appear in his court without any special authority for that purpose, and, upon the return of the subpoena, to the reception of a complaint, to a requirement upon the party summoned to make answer to that complaint, and then to a hearing and decree, or judgment, upon the merits of the matters in controversy, according to the rules of equity and good conscience.

It appears as a noticeable fact that the jurisdiction of the chancery proceeded originally from and was sustained by successive kings of England against the repeated remonstrances of the commons, who were for adhering to the common law; though not, perhaps, approving of all its rigors, as equity had been to some extent acknowledged as a rule of decision in the common-law courts.

This opposition of the commons may have been owing in part to the fact that the chancellor was in those days usually an ecclesiastic, and to the existing antipathy among the masses of the people to almost everything Roman.

The master of the rolls, who for a long period was a judicial officer of the court of chancery, second only to the chancellor, was originally a clerk or keeper of the rolls or records, but seems to have acquired his judicial authority from being at times directed by the king to take cognizance of and determine matters submitted to him.

DISTINCTIVE PRINCIPLES. It is quite apparent that some principles other than those of the common law must regulate the exercise of such a jurisdiction. That law could not mitigate its rigor upon its own principles. And as, down to the time of Edward III., and, with few exceptions, to the 21st of Henry VIII., the chancellors were ecclesiastics, much more familiar with the principles of the Roman law than with those of the common law, it was but a matter of course that there should be a larger adoption of the principles of that law; and the study of it is of some importance in this connection. Still, that law cannot be said to be of authority even in equity proceedings. The commons were jealous of its introduction. "In the reign of Richard II. the barons protested that they would never suffer the kingdom to be governed by the Roman law, and the judges prohibited it from being any longer cited in the common-law tribunals."

This opposition of the barons and of the common-law judges furnished very sufficient reasons why the chancellors should not profess to adopt that law as the rule of decision. In addition to this, it was not fitted, in many respects, to the state of things existing in England; and so the chancellors were of necessity compelled to act upon equitable principles as expounded by themselves. In later times the common-law judges in that country have resorted to the Roman law for principles of decision to a much greater extent than they have given credit to it.

Since the time of Henry VIII. the chancery bench has been occupied by some of the ablest lawyers which England has produced, and they have given to the proceedings and practice in equity definite rules and forms, which leave little to the personal discretion of the chancellor in determining what equity and good conscience require. The discretion of the chancellor is a judicial discretion, to be exercised according to the principles and practice of the court. See DISCRETION.

The avowed principle upon which the jurisdiction was at first exercised was the administration of justice according to honesty, equity, and conscience,—which last, it is said, was unknown to the common law as a principle of decision.

In the 15th of Richard II. two petitions, addressed to the king and the lords of parliament, were sent to the chancery to be heard, with the direction, "Let there be done, by the authority of parliament, that which right and reason and good faith and good conscience demand in the case."

These may be said to be the general principles upon which equity is administered at the present day.

The distinctive principles of the courts of equity are shown, also, by the classes of cases in which they exercise jurisdiction and give relief,—allowing it to be sought and administered through process and proceedings of less formality and technicality than are required in proceedings at law. This, however, has its limitations, some of its rules of pleading in defence being quite technical. And it is another peculiar feature that the relief is administered by a decree or process adapted to the exigencies of the particular case.

JURISDICTION. It is difficult to reduce a jurisdiction so extensive and of such diverse component parts to a rigid and precise classification. But an approach to it may be made. The general nature of the jurisdiction has already been indicated. It exists—discovery from the defendant, respecting the truth of the matters alleged against him, by an appeal to his conscience to speak the truth. The discovery is enforced by requiring an answer to the allegations in the plaintiff's complaint, in order that the plaintiff may use the matters disclosed in the answer, as admissions of the defendant, and, thus, evidence is secured for the plaintiff, either in connection with and in aid of other evidence offered by the plaintiff, or to supply the want of other evidence on his part; or it may be to avoid the expense to which the plaintiff must be put in procuring other evidence to sustain his case.

First, for the purpose of compelling a

When the plaintiff's complaint, otherwise called a bill, prays for relief in the same suit, the statements of the defendant in his answer are considered by the court in forming a judgment upon the whole case.

To a certain extent, the statements of the defendant in answer to the bill are evidence for himself also.

The discovery which may be required is not only of facts within the knowledge of the defendant, but may, also, be of deeds and other writings in his possession.

The right to discovery is not, however, an unlimited one: as, for instance, the defendant is not bound to make a discovery which would subject him to punishment, nor, ordinarily, to discover the title upon which he relies in his defence; nor is the plaintiff entitled to require the production of all papers which he may desire to look into. The limits of the right deserve careful consideration. The discovery, when had, may be the foundation of equitable relief in the same suit, in which case it may be connected with all the classes of cases in which relief is sought; or it may be for the purpose of being used in some other court, in which case the jurisdiction is designated as an assistant jurisdiction. Since the new statutes on the admission of evidence of parties, bills of discovery have practically fallen into disuse. See DISCOVERY.

Second, where the courts of law do not, or did not, recognize any right, and therefore could give no remedy, but where the courts of equity recognize equitable rights and, of course, give equitable relief. This has been denominated the exclusive jurisdiction. In this class are trusts, charities, forfeited and imperfect mortgages, penalties and forfeitures, imperfect consideration.

Uses and trusts have been supposed to have had their origin in the restrictions laid by parliament upon conveyances of mortmain,—that is, to the church for charitable, or rather for ecclesiastical, purposes.

It may well be that the doctrine of equitable titles and estates, unknown to the common law but which could be enforced in chancery, had its origin in conveyances to individuals for the use of the church in order to avoid the operation of these restrictions,—the conscience of the feeoffee being bound to permit the church to have the use according to the design and intent of the feoffment.

But conveyances in trust for the use of the church were not by any means the only cases in which it was desirable to convey the legal title to one for the use of another. In many instances, such a conveyance offered a convenient mode of making provision for those who, from any circumstances, were unable to manage property advantageously for themselves, or to whom it was not desirable to give the control of it; and the propriety in all such cases of some protection to the beneficiary is quite apparent. The court of chancery, by recognizing that he had an interest of an equitable character which could be protected and enforced against the holder of the legal title, exercised a jurisdiction to give relief in cases which the courts of common law could not reach, consistently with their principles and modes of procedure.

Mortgages, which were originally estates conveyed upon condition, redeemable if the condition were performed at the day, but absolute on non-performance, the right to redeem being thereby forfeited, owe their origin, in the modern conception of the term, to the court of chancery; which, acting at first, perhaps, in some cases where the non-performance was by mistake or accident, soon recognized an equitable right of redemption after the day, as a general rule, in order to relieve against the forfeiture. This became known as an equity of redemption,—a designation, in use at the present day, although there has long been a legal right of redemption in such cases.

Relief against penalties and forfeitures also was formerly obtained only through the aid of the court of chancery.

In most of the cases which fall under this head, courts of law now exercise a concurrent jurisdiction.

Third, where the courts of equity administer equitable relief for the infraction of legal rights, in cases in which the courts of law, recognizing the right, give a remedy according to their principles, modes, and forms, but the remedy is deemed by equity inadequate to the requirements of the case. This is sometimes called the concurrent jurisdiction. This class embraces fraud, mistake, accident, administration, legacies, contribution, and cases where justice and conscience require the cancellation, or reformation of instruments, or the rescission, or the specific performance of contracts.

The courts of law relieve against fraud, mistake, and accident where a remedy can be had according to their modes and forms; but there are many cases in which the legal remedy is inadequate for the purposes of justice.

The modes of investigation and the peculiar remedies of the courts of equity are often of the greatest importance in this class of cases.

Transfers to defeat or delay creditors, and purchases with notice of an outstanding title, come under the head of fraud.

It has been said that there is a less amount of evidence required to prove fraud, in equity, than there is at law; but the soundness of that position may well be doubted.

The court does not relieve in all cases of accident and mistake.

In many cases the circumstances are such as to require the cancellation or reformation of written instruments or the specific performance of contracts, instead of damages for the breach of them.

Fourth, where the court of equity administers a remedy because the relations of the parties are such that there are impediments to a legal remedy. Partnership furnishes a marked instance. Joint-tenancy and marshalling of assets may be included.

From the nature of a partnership, there are impediments to suits at law between the several partners and the partnership in relation to matters involved in the partnership; and impediments of a somewhat similar character exist in other cases.

Fifth, where the forms of proceeding in the courts of law are not deemed adequate to the due investigation of the particulars and details of the case. This class includes account, partition, dower, ascertainment of boundaries.

Sixth, where, from a relation of trust and confidence, or from consanguinity, the parties do not stand on equal ground in their dealings with each other: as, the relations of parent and child, guardian and ward, attorney and client, principal and agent, executor or administrator and legatee or distributee, trustee and cestui que trust, etc.

Seventh, where the court grant relief from considerations of public policy, because of the mischief which would result if the court did not interfere. Marriage-brokerage agreements, contracts in restraint of trade, buying and selling public offices, agreements founded on corrupt considerations, usury, gaming, and contracts with expectant heirs, are of this class.

Many cases of this and the preceding class are sometimes considered under the head of constructive fraud.

Eighth, where a party from incapacity to take care of his rights is under the special care of the court of equity, as infants, idiots, and lunatics.

This is a branch of jurisdiction of very ancient date, and of a special character, said to be founded in the prerogative of the king.

In this country the court does not, in general, assume the guardianship, but exercises an extensive jurisdiction over guardians, and may hold a stranger interfering with the property of an infant accountable as if he were guardian.

Ninth, where the court recognizes an obligation on the part of a husband to make provision for the support of his wife, or to make a settlement upon her, out of the property which comes to her by inheritance or otherwise.

This jurisdiction is not founded upon either trust or fraud, but is derived originally from the maxim that he who asks equity should do equity.

Tenth, where the equitable relief appropriate to the case consists in restraining the commission or continuance of some act of the defendant, administered by means of a writ of injunction.

Eleventh, the court aids in the procurement or preservation of evidence of the rights of a party, to be used, if necessary, in some subsequent proceeding, the court administering no final relief.

See a full note as to equity jurisdiction in 19 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 568.

PECULIAR REMEDIES, AND THE MANNER OF ADMINISTERING THEM. Under this head are—specific performance of contracts; re-execution, reformation, rescission, and cancellation of contracts or instruments; restraint by injunction; bills quia timet; bills of peace; protection of a party liable at law, but who has no interest, by bill of interpleader; election between two inconsistent legal rights; conversion; priorities; tacking; marshalling of securities; application of purchase-money.

In recent periods, the principles of the court of chancery have in many instances been acted on and recognized by the courts of law (as, for instance, in relation to mortgages, contribution, etc.) so far as the rules of the courts of law admitted of their introduction.

In some states the entire jurisdiction has, by statute, been conferred upon the courts of law, who exercise it as a separate and distinct branch of their authority, upon the principles and according to the modes and forms previously adopted in chancery.

In a few, the jurisdictions of the courts of law and of equity have been amalgamated, and an entire system has been substituted, administered more according to the principles and modes and forms of equity than the principles and forms of the common law.

RULES AND MAXIMS. In the administration of the jurisdiction, there are certain rules and maxims which are of special significance.

First, Equity having once had jurisdiction of a subject-matter because there is no remedy at law, or because the remedy is inadequate, does not lose the jurisdiction merely because the courts of law afterwards give the same or a similar relief.

Second, Equity follows the law. This is true as a general maxim. Equity follows the law, except in relation to those matters which give a title to equitable relief because the rules of law would operate to sanction fraud or injustice in the particular case.

Third, Between equal equities, the law must prevail. The ground upon which the suitor comes into the court of equity is that he is entitled to relief there. But if his adversary has an equally equitable case, the complainant has no title to relief.

Fourth, Equality is equity: applied to cases of contribution, apportionment of moneys due among those liable or benefited by the payment, abatement of claims on account of deficiency of the means of payment, etc.

Fifth, He who seeks equity must do equity: A party cannot claim the interposition of the court for relief unless he will do what it is equitable should be done by him as a condition precedent to that relief.

Sixth, Equity considers that as done which ought to have been done. A maxim of much more limited application than might at first be supposed from the broad terms in which it is expressed. In favor of parties who would have had a benefit from something contracted to be done, and who have an equitable right to have the case considered as if it had been done, equity applies this maxim. Illustration: when there is an agreement for a sale of land, and the vendor dies, the land may be treated as money, and the proceeds of the sale, when completed, go to the distributees of personal estate, instead of to the heir. If the vendee die before the completion of the purchase, the purchase-money may be treated as land for the benefit of the heir.

REMEDIAL PROCESS, AND DEFENCE. A suit in equity is ordinarily instituted by a complaint, or petition, called a bill; and the defendant is served with a writ of summons, requiring him to appear and answer, called a subpoena.

In Pennsylvania the suit is begun by filing and serving a copy of the bill, the subpoena having been dispensed with by a rule of court.

The forms of proceedings in equity are such as to bring the rights of all persons interested before the court; and, as a general rule, all persons interested should be made parties to the bill, either as plaintiffs or defendants.

There may be amendments of the bill; or a supplemental bill,—which is sometimes necessary when the case is beyond the stage for amendment.

In case the suit fails by the death of the party, there is a bill of revivor, and after the cause is disposed of there may be a bill of review.

The defence is made by demurrer, plea, or answer. If the defendant has no interest, he may disclaim. Discovery may be obtained from the plaintiff, and further matter may be introduced, by means of a cross-bill, brought by the defendant against the plaintiff, in order that it may be considered at the same time. Issue is joined by the plaintiff's filing a replication to the defendant's answer; Sto. Eq. Pl. § 878 n. The U. S. Equity rule 66 requires a replication to be filed on or before the next rule day; failing which the bill may be dismissed. In some states, as Delaware, the replication is entered as of course without filing; and special replications are now as a rule not used.

The final process is directed by the decree, which being a special judgment can provide relief according to the nature of the case. This is sometimes by a perpetual injunction.

There may be a bill to execute, or to impeach, a decree.

EVIDENCE AND PRACTICE. The rules of evidence, except as to the effect of the answer and the taking of the testimony, are, in general, similar to the rules of evidence in cases at law. But to this there are exceptions.

The answer, if made on oath, is evidence for the defendant, so far as it is responsive to the calls of the bill for discovery, and as such it prevails, unless it is overcome by something more than what is equivalent to the testimony of one witness. If without oath, it is a mere pleading, and the allegations stand over for proof.

If the answer is incomplete or improper, the plaintiff may except to it, and it must, if the exceptions are sustained, be so amended as to be made sufficient and proper.

The case may be heard on the bill and answer, if the plaintiff so elects, and sets the case down for a hearing thereon.

If the plaintiff desires to controvert any of the statements in the answer, he files a replication by which he denies the truth of the allegations in the answer, and testimony is taken.

The testimony, according to the former practice in chancery, is taken upon interrogatories filed in the clerk's office, and propounded by the examiner, without the presence of the parties. But this practice has been very extensively modified.

If any of the testimony is improper, there is a motion to suppress it.

The case may be referred to a master to state the accounts between the parties, or to make such other report as the case may require; and there may be an examination of the parties in the master's office. Exceptions may be taken to his report.

The hearing of the case is before the equity judge, who may make interlocutory orders or decrees, and who pronounces the final decree or judgment. There may be a rehearing, if sufficient cause is shown.

At the present day, wherever equity forms are used, the proceedings have become very much simplified.

The system of two distinct sets of tribunals administering different rules for the adjudication of causes has now been changed in England. By the Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1876, the courts of law and equity were consolidated into one Supreme Court of Judicature, in which equitable claims and defences are recognized in all proceedings to the same effect as a court of chancery would have recognized them before the passing of the act. Equitable remedies are substantially applied.

In America, the federal courts have equity powers under the constitution, where an adequate remedy at law does not exist; R. S. § 723; 140 U. S. 105; 141 id. 658; 138 id. 146. The adequate remedy at law, which is the test of the equitable jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, is that which existed when the judiciary act of 1789 was adopted, unless subsequently changed by congress; 131 U. S. 301. The equity jurisdiction conferred on the federal courts is the same that the high court of chancery in England possesses, is subject to neither limitation nor restraint by state legislation, and is uniform throughout the different states of the Union; 150 U. S. 202; 120 id. 130; 2 Sumn. 612.

Courts of chancery were constituted in some of the states after 1776: and in Pennsylvania, for a short time, as early as 1723, a court of chancery existed; see Rawle, Eq. in Penna.; and in most of the colonies before the revolution; Bisph. Eq. § 14, n.

At the present time, distinct courts of chancery exist in very few of the states. In the greater number chancery powers are exercised by judges of common-law courts according to the ordinary practice in chancery. In the remaining states, the distinctions between actions at law and suits in equity have been abolished, but certain equitable remedies are still administered under the statutory form of the civil action. See Bisph. Eq. § 15. It has been claimed that Pennsylvania was the first state to administer equity through common-law forms; but in a recent report to the Texas State Bar Association it is said: "Of one fact there can be no doubt, viz., Texas was the first state in the Union, which was dominated by common-law people and lawyers, to reject the common-law form of pleading and practice when the issue was raised between that system and the civil-law system; and Texas was unquestionably the first state in the American Union controlled by common-law principles to abolish the distinction between law and equity in the enforcement of private rights and redress of private wrongs." Ann. Rep. 1896.

That system of justice which was administered by the High Court of Chancery in England in the exercise of its extraordinary jurisdiction. In its technical and scientific legal sense means neither natural justice nor even all that portion of natural justice which is susceptible of being judicially enforced. It has a precise, definite and limited significance, and is used to denote a system of justice which was administered in a particular court—the nature and extent of which system cannot be defined in a single sentence. Bispham, Prin. of Eq. 10th ed., p. 1.

The term "equity" as descriptive of an important body of English law, has an essentially technical signification, and its precise and definite meaning when so used is clearly distinguishable from that which it bears in its ordinary acceptation. Thus, "equity" may be in one sense synonymous with natural right and justice; but neither Courts of Chancery nor courts of law profess to afford relief in all cases in which redress would be prescribed by rules of charity, generosity or benevolence, or by the dictates of a nice sense of honor, and yet the rules of benevolence and the principles of honor are included within the scope of the terms "right" and "justice," and may therefore fall within one meaning of the term "equity." On the other hand, courts of common law recognize "equity" in a certain sense. Thus, when the "equity" of a statute is spoken of, or a certain case is said to be within that "equity," or the like, the meaning intended to be conveyed is simply that a sound and fair interpretation of the law must be given—an interpretation based not upon its letter alone, but upon its spirit and true sense. The meaning of the word "equity" then, as used in its technical sense in English jurisprudence, is simply a term descriptive of a certain field of jurisdiction exercised, in the English system, by certain courts, and of which the extent and boundaries are not marked by lines founded upon principle so much as by the features of the original constitution of the English scheme of remedial law and the accidents of its development. Id., p. 22, 23.

EQUITY EVIDENCE. See EQUITY; EVIDENCE.

EQUITY JURISPRUDENCE. That system of jurisprudence which comprehends every matter of law for which common law provides no, or inadequate remedy. Stand Dict.

EQUITY PLEADING. See EQUITY; PLEA.

EQUITY OF REDEMPTION. A right which the mortgagor of an estate has of redeeming it, after it has been forfeited at law by the non-payment at the time appointed of the money secured by the mortgage to be paid, by paying the amount of the debt, interest, and costs.

The phrase of equity of redemption is indiscriminately, though often incorrectly, applied to the right of the mortgagor to regain his estate, both before and after breach of condition. In North Carolina, by statute, the former is called a legal right of redemption, and the latter the equity of redemption, thereby keeping a just distinction between these estates; 1 N. C. Rev. Stat. 268; 4 McCord 340. The interest is recognized at law for many purposes: as a subsisting estate, although the mortgagor in order to enforce his right is obliged to resort to an equitable proceeding administered generally in courts of equity, but in some states by courts of law; 11 S. & R. 223; or in some states may pay the debt and have an action at law; 18 Johns. 7, 110; 1 Halst. 466; 2 H. & M'H. 9.

This estate in the mortgagor is one which he may devise or grant; 2 Washb. R. P. 40; and which is governed by the same rules of devolution or descent as any other estate in lands; 10 Conn. 243; 2 S. & S. 323; 2 Hare 35. He may mortgage it; 1 Pick. 485; and it is liable for his debts; 8 Met. 31; 21 Me. 104; 7 Watts 475; 15 Ohio 487; 1 Cal. Cas. 47; 4 B. Mich. 178; 24 Mo. 249; 18 Pet. 294; and in many other cases, if the mortgagor still retains possession, he is held to be the owner; 5 Gray 470, note; 11 N. H. 268; 22 Conn. 587; 18 Ill. 469; 84 Me. 89; 23 Barb. 490.

Any person who is so interested in the mortgaged estate, or any part of it, having a legal estate therein, or a legal or equitable lien thereon, provided he comes in as privy in estate with the mortgagor, may exercise the right; including heirs, devisees, executors, administrators, and assignees of the mortgagor; 3 Root 509; 3 Hayw. 23; 14 Vt. 501; 10 Paige, Ch. 49; 9 Mass. 422; 48 Minn.

A mortgagee for adequate value and in good faith may acquire the equity of redemption; 112 Mo. 815; and a second mortgagee who purchases such equity is entitled to any payments that may have been made on the first mortgage, but which were not credited thereon; 26 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 839.

Where the necessary amount has been tendered within the statutory period for redemption, it can be followed up by suit to redeem at any time before the right to bring suit is barred; 57 Ark. 198. A court of equity has the discretion governed by the equities of each case, to name terms on which it will let in a party to redeem; 112 Mo. 599.

Where a bill to redeem is filed before the debt is due, it must be dismissed, although the hearing is not had until after the debt is due; 100 Mass. 102. See MORTGAGE.

EQUIVALENT. Of the same value. Sometimes a condition must beliterally accomplished in forma specifica; but some may be fulfilled by an equivalent, per equivalentem, when such appears to be the intention of the parties: as, if I promise to pay you one hundred dollars, and then die, my executor may fulfil my engagement; for it is equivalent to you whether the money be paid to you by me or by him. Rolle, Abr. 451. For its meaning in patent law, see 7 Wall. 327; PATENT.

EQUIVOCAL. Having a double sense. In the construction of contracts, it is a general rule that when an expression may be taken in two senses, that shall be preferred which gives it effect. See CONSTRUCTION; INTERPRETATION.

EQUULEUS (Lat.). A kind of rack for extorting confessions. Encyc. Lond.

ERASURE. The obliteration of a writing. The effect of an erasure is not per se to destroy the writing in which it occurs, but is a question for the jury, and will render the writing void or not, under the same circumstances as an interlineation. See 5 Pet. 560; 11 Co. 88; 5 Bingh. 183; 11 Conn. 531; 3 La. 56; 57 Ala. 173; 62 Ind. 401; 39 Mo. 34; 44 N. H. 237; 43 Wis. 221; 69 Me. 429; 119 Mass. 269. See ALTERATION; INTERLINEATION.

ERISCUNDUS (Lat. erciscere). For dividing. Familie eriscunda actio. An action for dividing a way, goods, or any matter of inheritance. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.

ERECTION. This term is generally used of a completed building. 45 N. Y. 153; 119 Mass. 254. The repairing, alteration, and enlarging, or the removal from one spot to another, of a building, is not erection within the meaning of a statute forbidding the erection of wooden buildings; 27 Conn. 332; 2 Rawle 262; 51 Ill. 422. The moving of a building is not an erection of a building; 121 Mass. 229; but the painting of a house has been held to be part of the erection; 51 Ill. 422. See LIEN.

EREGIMUS (Lat. we have erected). A word proper to be used in the creation of a new office by the sovereign. Bac. Abr. Offices, E.

EROSION. This consists of the gradual eating away of the soil by the operation of currents or tides. 100 N. Y. 488.

The proprietorship of lands may be lost by erosion and regained by accretion. 11 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 255; 100 N. Y. 433.

As distinguished from submergence. The one consists of a gradual eating away of the soil by the operation of currents or tides, and the other of its disappearance under the water and the formation of a navigable body over it. Id. Loss of title to land by erosion occurs only when the erosion is accompanied by a transportation of the land beyond the owner's boundary. Id. See RIPARIAN PROPERTIES; ACCRETION.

EROTIC MANIA. In Medical Jurisprudence. A name given to a morbid activity of the sexual propensity. It is a disease or morbid affection of the mind, which fills it with a crowd of voluptuous images, and hurries its victim to acts of the grossest licentiousness, in the absence of any lesion of the intellectual powers. See Krafft-Ebing, Pycopathia Sexualis, Chad-dock's ed.; MANIA.

ERRANT (Lat. errare, to wander). Wandering. Justices in eyre were formerly said to be errant (itinerant.) Cowel.

ERRONEOUS. Deviating from the law. 72 Ind. 338.

The word never designates a corrupt or evil act. It is to be distinguished from "illegal" which means that which lacks authority of or support from law. Anderson; 72 Ind. 338. An erroneous judgment is rendered according to the course and practice of the courts, but contrary to law. An irregular judgment is contrary to the course and practice of the courts. Id.; 74 N. C. 599.

ERROR. A mistake in judgment or deviation from the truth in matters of fact, and from the law in matters of judgment.

Error of fact will excuse the party acting illegally but honestly, in many cases, will avoid a contract in some instances, and when mutual will furnish equity with a ground for interference; 15 Me. 45; 20 Wend. 174; 6 Conn. 71; 12 Mass. 86. See MISTAKE.

Error in law will not, in general, excuse a man for its violation. A contract made under an error in law is, in general, binding; for, were it not so, error would be urged in almost every case; Bishop, Eq. 187. 2 East 469. See 6 Johns. Ch. 166; 8 Cow. 195; 2 J. & W. 249; 1 Y. & C. 232; 6 B. & C. 671. But a foreign law will for this purpose be considered as a fact; 15 Me. 45; 9 Pick. 112; 2 Pothier, Obl. 380, etc.

ERROR, WRIT OF. See WRIT OF ERROR.

ESCAMBIO. In Old English Law. A writ granting power to an English merchant to draw a bill of exchange on another who is in a foreign country. Reg. Orig. 194. Abolished by State. 59 Geo. III. c. 49, and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 125.

ESCAMBIUM. Exchange, which see.

ESCAPE. The deliverance of a person who is lawfully imprisoned, out of prison, before such a person is entitled to such deliverance by law. 5 Mass. 810.

The voluntarily or negligently allowing any person lawfully in confinement to leave the place. 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 917.

Departure of a prisoner from custody before he is discharged by due process of law.

Escape takes place without force; prison-break, with violence; rescue, through the intervention of third parties.

Actual escapes are those which take place when the prisoner in fact gets out of prison and unlawfully regains his liberty.

Constructive escapes take place when the prisoner obtains more liberty than the law allows, although he still remains in confinement. Bac. Abr. Escape (B); Plowd 17; 5 Mass. 810; 2 Mas. 486.

Negligent escape takes place when the prisoner goes at large, unlawfully, either because the building or prison in which he is confined is too weak to hold him, or because the keeper by carelessness lets him go out of prison.

Voluntary escape takes place when the prisoner has given to him voluntarily any liberty not authorized by law. 5 Mass. 820; 2 D. Chip. 11.

When a man is imprisoned in a proper place under the process of a court having jurisdiction in the case, he is lawfully imprisoned, notwithstanding the proceedings may be irregular; 1 Crawf. & D. 208; see 138 Mass. 399; but if the court has not jurisdiction the imprisonment is unlawful, whether the process be regular or otherwise. Bacon, Abr. Escape in Civil Cases (A 1); 13 Johns. 378; 8 Cow. 192; 1 Root 233. See 7 Conn. 452.

Letting a prisoner, confined under final process, out of prison for any, even the shortest time, is an escape, although he afterwards return; 3 W. Bl. 1048; 40 N. J. L. 230; 67 How. Pr. 109; 83 Fed. Rep. 794; 11 Mass. 160; 40 N. J. L. 417; 85 N. Y. 445; and this may be (as in the case of imprisonment under a ca. sa.) although an officer may accompany him; 3 Co. 44 a; Plowd. 37; Hob. 202; 1 B. & P. 24. Where an insolvent debtor whose discharge has been refused by the court, surrenders himself to the keeper of a prison, who will not receive him because he has no writ or record showing that he is an insolvent debtor and is not in charge of an officer, the surrender is not sufficient to make the keeper liable for the debt in case of the debtor's escape; 140 Pa. 102.

In criminal cases, the prisoner is indictable for a misdemeanor, whether the escape be negligent or voluntary; 2 Hawk. Pl. C. 189; Cro. Car. 209; 7 Conn. 884; 82 N. C. 585; and the officer is also indictable; 32 Ark. 124; 80 N. C. 990; 107 id. 857. If the offence of the prisoner was a felony, a voluntary escape is a felony on the part of the officer; 2 Hawk. Pl. C. 19, § 25; if negligent, it is a misdemeanor only in any case; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 925; Cl. Cr. L. 327. See 78 Ind. 166. It is the duty of the officer to rearrest after an escape; 6 Hill 344; 111 Ill. 90; 1 Russ. Cr. 572.

In civil cases, a prisoner may be arrested who escapes from custody on meane process, and the officer will not be liable if he rearrest him; Cro. Jac. 419; but if the escape be voluntary from imprisonment on meane process, and in any case if the escape be from final process, the officer is liable in damages to the plaintiff, and is not excused by retaking the prisoner; 2 B. & A. 56; 88 Mass. 260. Nothing but an act of God or the enemies of the country will excuse an escape; 24 Wend. 381; 2 Murph. 386; 1 Brev. 146; 51 Mass. 575. See 5 Ired. 702; 5 W. & S. 435.

Attempts to escape by one accused of crime are presumptive of guilt, and the conduct of a defendant in arrest, either before or after being accused of the crime, may be competent evidence against him, as indicating a guilty mind; 30 La. Ann. Part II. 1266; 58 Ala. 335; 6 Tex. App. 207, 347; 14 Bush 840; 47 Cal. 118; 83 N. H. 216. Where a prisoner being in the corridor of a jail unlocks a door between the corridor and a cell, and thence escapes, he commits prison breach; 53 N. J. L. 488. An unsuccessful attempt at prison breach is indictable; 12 Johns. 339. See Whart. Cr. L. § 1687; 26 Am. L. Reg. 845; FLIGHT. See AVERT.

ESCAPE WARRANT. A warrant addressed to all sheriffs throughout England, to retake an escaped prisoner for debt, and commit him to gaol till the debt is satisfied.

ESCHEAT (Fr. escheoir, to happen). An accidental reverting of lands to the original lord.

An obstruction of the course of descent, and a consequent determination of the tenure, by some unforeseen contingency, in which case the land naturally results back, by a kind of reversion, to the original grantor or lord of the fee; 2 Bla. Com. 244.

The estate itself which so reverted was called an escheat. Spelman. The term included also other property which fell to the lord; as, trees which fell down, etc. Cowel.

All escheats under the English laws are declared to be strictly feudal and to import the extinction of tenure. Wr. Ten. 115; 1 W. Bl. 123.

That if the ownership of a property becomes vacant, the right must necessarily subside into the whole community in which, when society first assumed the elements of order and subordination, it was originally vested, is a principle which lies at the foundation of property; 4 Kent 438; and this seems to be the universal rule of civilized society. Donat. Droit Pub. lib. 1, t. 6, s. n. 1. See 10 Viner, Abr. 130; 1 Bro. Civ. Law 260; 5 Blanc. 375; 27 Barb. 373; 5 Cal.

373; 47 Id. 105; 86 Pa. 284; Mitch. R. P. 818. It was recognized by Justinian, and by the civil law an officer was appointed, called the escheator, whose duty it was to assert the right of the emperor to the hereditas jacens or caduca when the owner left no heirs or legates to take it. Code 10, 10, 1. By the earlier English usage, the estate of the deceased escheated to his lord when there were no representatives in the seventh degree, and this custom was later extended to include male descendants ad infinitum; Lib. Feud. l. 1, s. 4.

In case of escheat by failure of heirs, by corruption of blood, or by conviction of certain crimes, the feud fell back into the lord's hands by a termination of the tenure. 1 Washb. R. P. 34. At the present day, in England, escheat can only arise from the failure of heirs. By the Felony Act, 33 and 34 Vict. c. 22, no confession, verdict, inquest, conviction, or judgment of or for any treason or felony, or felo de ar., shall cause any forfeiture or escheat; 3 Steph. Com. 660; Mox. & W.; Brown. An action of ejectment, commenced by writ of ejectment, has taken the place of an ancient writ of escheat, against the person in possession on the death of the tenant without heirs.

The early English law is thus well stated: "By the law of England, before the Declaration of Independence, the lands of a man dying intestate and without lawful heirs reverted by escheat to the king as the sovereign lord; but the king's title was not complete without an actual entry upon the land, or judicial proceedings to ascertain the want of heirs and devisees; 3 App. Cas. 757, 772; 2 Bla. Com. 245. The usual form of proceeding for this purpose was by an inquisition or inquest of office before a jury, which was had upon a commission out of the court of chancery, but was really a proceeding at common law, and, if it resulted in favor of the king, then, by virtue of ancient statutes, any one claiming title in the lands might, by leave of that court, file a traverse in the nature of a plea or defense to the king's claim, and not in the nature of an original suit; Lord Somers in 14 How. St. Tr. 1, 83; 6 Ves. 329; 4 Madd. 281; L. R. 2 Eq. 46; 3 Johns. 1; 11 Allen 157, 172. The inquest of office was a proceeding in rem; when there was proper office found for the king, that was notice to all persons who had claims to come in and assert them, and, until so traversed, it was conclusive in the king's favor; Hamilton, in 12 East 96, 103; 10 Vin. Abr. 38, pl. 1; Hamilton, Brown, 161 U. S. 236.

In this country, however, the state steps in, in the place of the feudal lord, by virtue of its sovereignty, as the original and ultimate proprietor of all the lands within its jurisdiction; 4 Kent 424. See 10 Gill & J. 450; 8 Dane, Abr. 140. And it escheats to the state as part of its common ownership, either by mere operation of law, or upon an inquest of office according to the law of the particular state; 181 U. S. 256; 8 Washb. R. P. 4th ed. 47, 48. It is, perhaps, questionable how far this incident exists at common law in the United States generally. In Maryland the lord proprietor was originally the owner of the land, as the crown was in England. In most of the states the right to an escheat is secured by statute; 4 Kent 424; 1 Washb. R. P. 24, 27; 2 id. 443. See DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

In Indiana and Missouri it was held that at common law, if a bastard died intestate, his property escheated; 6 Blackf. 533; 30 Mo. 268; but this is now otherwise by statute in those states and in most of the others. See BASTARD. So at common law there was an escheat if the purchaser or heirs of the decedent were aliens; 7 N. H. 475; Co. Litt. 2 b; but it is usually otherwise by the statutes of the several states. See ALIEN.

In Massachusetts unclaimed moneys or dividends of any insolvent bank or insurance company, after 10 years' custody by the clerk of court, are turned over to the state treasurer, and if not claimed within two years thereafter, escheat to the state; acts of Mass. p. 210; and such a provision is constitutional; 1 Caldw. 202.

Hereditaments which, although they may be held in fee-simple, are not strictly subjects of tenure, such as fairs, markets, commons in gross, rents charge, rents seck, and the like, do not escheat, but become extinct upon a failure of heirs of the tenant; Challis, R. P. 30.

The method of proceeding, and subject-matter. To determine the question of escheat a proceeding must be brought in the nature of an inquest of office or office found; 7 Wend. 387; 5 Cal. 378; 28 Ca. 227; 14 la. 474; and to give the inquisition the effect of a lien the same must be filed, as the record of it is the only competent evidence by which title by escheat can be established; 21 Mich. 24; 3 Johns. 1; and such action must also be taken to recover escheated lands held in adverse possession; after which an entry must be made to give the state a right of possession; 7 Wend. 387; 6 Leigh 588; 74 Ind. 252; and the facts which support the escheat must be stated; 9 Head 553; 2 Watts 288; a bill of information must be filed and a scire facias issued against all alleged to have, hold, claim, or possess such estate; 117 Ill. 128; and the names of all persons in possession of the premises, and all who were known to claim an interest therein, must be set forth and the scire facias served on them personally; to all other persons constructive notice is sufficient; id. In Texas, no proceedings can be had, except under and according to an act of the legislature; 64 Tex. 133; 161 U. S. 336.

In many of the states, however, the doctrine in force is, that land cannot remain without an owner; it must vest somewhere, and on the death of an intestate without heirs it becomes eo instanti the property of the state; 6 Johns. Ch. 360; 2 Har. & J. 112; 5 Neb. 208; 7 N. H. 475; 7 Watts 455; 9 R. L. 26; 24 N. J. L. 566. In the case of Walahan v. Ingersoll, 117 Ill. 128, it was held that on the death of an intestate without heirs, the title to his estate devolves immediately upon the state, but, in order to make that title available, it must be established in the manner prescribed by law by proceedings in the proper court, in the name of the people for the purpose of proving and establishing by judicial determination the title of the state. After a long lapse of time an inquest will be presumed; 27 Va. 391; 26 Ga. 582. A right of action for the recovery of lands is vested in the state at the death of the owner whose property escheats; 107 N. Y. 185. Persons claiming as heirs may come in under the statute and obtain an order for leave to make up an issue at law to have their rights determined; 13 Rich. L. 77. The legislature is under no constitutional obligation to leave the title to such property in abeyance, and a judicial proceeding for ascertaining an escheat on due notice, actual to known and constructive to all possible unknown claimants, is due process of law; and a statute, providing for such proceeding does not impair the obligation of any contract, contained in the grant under which the former owner held whether from the state or a private person; 161 U. S. 256, 276.

Not only do estates in possession escheat, but also those in remainder, if vested; 2 Hill 67; and equitable as well as legal estates; 1 Wall. 5; 5 Ired. Eq. 207; 3 Washb. R. P. 446; 10 Gill & J. 443; 4 Kent 424; (in many states this provision is statutory, out the rule in England is contrary; 1 Eden 177;) also those held in trust, when the trust expires; 88 Pa. 429.

Proceedings to traverse an inquest. An inquisition is traversable, the traverser being considered as a defendant, and being only required to show failure of title in the state and bare possession in himself; 2 Johns. 1; contra, in Pennsylvania, where such traverser is in the position of plaintiff in ejectment and must show a title superior to the commonwealth; proceedings may be brought by any one claiming an interest and including an administratrix in possession; 187 Pa. 138; it is a proceeding at law and not in equity; 19 Ore. 504; and the court of common pleas has jurisdiction over it; 137 Pa. 138; the traverser being allowed to begin and conclude the suit to the jury; 2 Ashm. 183. And if only one of those notified appear, he is entitled to a separate trial of his traverse; 21 S. C. 435; but such traverser has no precedence over others on the dockets of cases; 1 Riley, S. C. 301.

When all the members of a partnership have died intestate and without heirs, the property escheats to the state, but the heirs or kindred of any one of the partners may traverse the inquisition; 57 Pa. 102.

The law favors the presumption of the existence of heirs, and there must be something shown by those claiming by virtue of escheat to rebut that presumption; 2 Watts 228; 41 Tex. 249; but see contra, 86 Tex. 288; 4 Md. 138; 90 N. C. 385, overruling as to this point, 1 Hayw. 673. Proceedings for an escheat for want of heirs or devisees, like ordinary provisions for the administration of his estate, presuppose that he is dead; if he is still alive, the court is without jurisdiction and its proceedings are null and void, even in a collateral proceeding; 161 U. S. 256, 287; citing 8 Cr. 9, 28; 154 U. S. 84; 27 Tex. 217; id. 491, 497; 67 id.

Equity cannot enjoin proceedings to have an escheat declared, where every question presented could be decided on a traverse should such escheat be found; 88 Pa. 284; and an amicus curiae cannot move to quash an inquisition, unless he has an interest himself or represents some one who has; 2 Cal. 284.

Disposition of escheated lands by the state. Where the state takes the title of escheated land, it is entitled to the rights of the last owner; therefore, such lands cannot be taken up by location as vacant land; 11 Tex. 10; or be regarded as ungranted land; but it must be sold pursuant to the statute; 2 Brev. 821; 37 Pa. 36; and a grant of such lands by the state before office found is valid; 7 Watts 458; 24 N. J. L. 560; 27 Barb. 376; as is also a grant of land to escheat in futuro; 9 Rich. Eq. 440; but no authority is vested in officers of the land office to issue warrants for the taking up of escheated lands. After seven years from the inquisition they shall be sold at auction; 27 Pa. 33; and the power to order the sale of the property is vested in the district court; 41 Tex. 10. The disposition of funds secured by the sale of such property must be strictly in conformity with the state statute; and the legislature of a state can pass no act diverting the funds to another purpose; 5 Neb. 203; but where the constitution gives to the legislature the power to provide methods to enforce the forfeiture, there can be no proceedings until the legislature acts; 64 Tex. 133.

In selling escheated lands the grantee named in the statute must be a party to the proceedings, or the sale will be void; 2 Swan 46; 1 Cald. 381.

When land is held by a foreign corporation and a statute has been passed declaring that the land shall be held "indefeasibly as to any right of escheat" in the commonwealth, the penalty of escheat is removed, although the act imposing such penalty is not repealed in terms; 133 Pa. 591; 7 L. R. A. 634.

As to statutory disposition of escheated lands, see the statutes of the several states; DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

See, generally, 12 L. R. A. 529; ALIEN; BASTARD; DISSOLUTION; FOREIGN CORPORATION.

ESCHEATOR. The name of an officer whose duties are generally to ascertain what escheats have taken place, and to prosecute the claim of the sovereign for the purpose of recovering the escheated property. 10 Vin. Abr. 158; Co. Litt. 13 b; Toml. L. D. His office was to be retained but one year; and no one person could hold the office more than once in three years.

This office has fallen into desuetude. There was formerly an escheator-general in Pennsylvania, but his duties have been transferred to the auditor-general, and in most of the states the duties of this office devolve upon the attorney-general.

ESCRIBANO. In Spanish Law. The public officer who is lawfully authorized to reduce to writing and verify by his signature all judicial acts and proceedings as well as all acts and contracts entered into between private individuals.

ESCRIPIT. Writing; a writing; a written instrument.

ESCROW. A deed delivered to a stranger; to be by him delivered to the grantee upon the happening of certain conditions, upon which last delivery the transmission of title is complete.

The delivery must be to a stranger; 8 Mass. 230. See 9 Co. 137 b; T. Moore 642; 5 Blackf. 18; 23 Wend. 43; 2 Dev. & B. L. 530; 4 Watts 180; 22 Me. 569; for when delivered directly to the grantee it cannot be treated as an escrow; 53 Ark. 489; 114 Ill. 19; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 238; 84 Me. 840; nor to the agent or attorney of the grantee; 85 Me. 242; but see 1 S. D. 497; 84 Ala. 827. The second delivery must be conditioned, and not merely postponed; 8 Metc. 486; 2

B. & C. 89; Shepp. Touch. 58. Care should be taken to express the intent of the first delivery clearly; 10 Wend. 810; 8 Mass. 230; 23 Me. 569; 14 Conn. 871; 3 Green, Ch. 155. An escrow has no effect as a deed till the performance of the condition; 31 Wend. 287; 18 Or. 253; 86 Miss. 888; 10 Neb. 1; and takes effect from the second delivery; 1 Barb. 500. See 8 Metc. 412; 6 Wend. 660; 16 Vt. 533; 30 Me. 110; 10 Pa. 285; 91 Ala. 610. But where the parties announce their intention that the escrow shall, after the performance of the condition, take effect from the date of the deed, such intention will control; Devl. Deeds 329; 34 Ill. 13.

A deed delivered in escrow cannot be revoked; 77 Cal. 270.

See, generally, 14 Ohio St. 309; 13 Johns. 285; 5 Mas. 60; 6 Humph. 405; 3 Metc. 412; 8 Ill. App. 30, 498; 57 Ala. 459; 90 id. 294; 33 Ohio St. 203; 26 N. Y. 483; 28 Am. L. Reg. 697, n.; 91 Cal. 282; 47 Fed. Rep. 276; 10 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 469, n.

ESCUAGE. In Old English Law. Service of the shield. Tenants who hold their land by escuage hold by knight's service. 1 Thomas, Co. Litt. 272; Littleton § 95, 86 b. Abolished by Stat. 12 Car. II. c. 24. SCUTAGE.

ESKETORES. Robbers or destroyers of other men's lands and fortunes. Cowel.

ESKIPPAMENTUM. Tackle or furniture; outfit. Certain towns in England were bound to furnish certain ships at their own expense and with double skippage or tackle. The modern word outfit would seem to render the passage quite as satisfactorily; though the conjecture of Cowel has the advantage of antiquity.

ESKIPPER, ESKIPPARE. To ship. Kelh. Norm. L. D.; Rast. 409.

ESKIPESON. Shippage, or passage by sea. Spelled, also, skippeson. Cowel.

ESNECY. Eldership. In the English law, this word signifies the right which the eldest coparcener of lands has to choose first one of the parts of the estate after it has been divided.

ESPERA. The period fixed by a competent judge within which a party is to do certain acts, as, e. g., to effect certain payments, present documents, etc.; and more especially the privilege granted by law to debtors, allowing them certain time for the payment of their indebtedness.

ESPLEES. The products which the land or ground yields; as, the hay of the meadows, the herbage of the pasture, corn or other produce of the arable, rents, and services. See 11 S. & R. 275; Dane, Abr. Index; 9 Barb. 293.

ESPOUSALS. A mutual promise between a man and a woman to marry each other at some other time: it differs from a marriage, because then the contract is completed. Wood, Inst. 57. See BETROTHMENT.

ESQUIRE (Lat. Armiger; Fr. Escuyer). A title applied by courtesy to officers of almost every description, to members of the bar, and others. No one is entitled to it by law; and therefore it confers no distinction in law.

In England, it is a title next above that of a gentleman and below that of a knight. Camden reckons up four kinds of esquires particularly regarded by the heralds: the eldest sons of knights, and their eldest sons in perpetual succession; the eldest sons of the younger sons of peers, and their eldest sons in like perpetual succession; esquires created by the king's letters patent, or other investiture, and their eldest sons; esquires by virtue of their office, as justices of the peace, and others who bear any office of trust under the crown. 2 Steph. Com. 616. A miller or a farmer may be an esquire; 1 R. 2 Eq. 235.

ESSART. See ASSART.

ESSE. See IN ESSE.

ESSENDI QUIETAM DE THEOLONIA (Lat. of being quit of toll). A writ which lay anciently for the citizens or burgesses of a town which was entitled to exemption from toll, in case toll was demanded of them. Fitzh. N. B. 226, L.

ESSOIN, ESSOIGN. In Old English Law. An excuse for not appearing in court at the return of the process. Presentation of such excuse. Spelman, Gloss; 1 Sell. Pr. 4; Comyns, Dig. Essoine, B. 1. Essoin is not now allowed at all in personal actions. 2 Term 16; 16 East 7 (a); 8 Bla. Com. 278, n.

ESSOIN DAY. Formerly, the first day in the term was essoin day; now practically abolished. Dowl. 448; 3 Bla. Com. 278, n.

ESSOIN ROLL. The roll containing the essoins and the day of adjournment. Rosc. R. Act. 182 et seq.

ESTABLISH. This word occurs frequently in the constitution of the United States, and it is there used in different meanings. 1. To settle firmly, to fix unalterably: as, to establish justice, which is the avowed object of the constitution. 2. To make or form: as, to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies,—which evidently does not mean that these laws shall be unalterably established as justice. 3. To found, to create, to regulate: as, Congress shall have power to establish post-roads and post-offices. 4. To found, recognize, confirm, or admit: as, Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion. 5. To create, to ratify, or confirm: as, We, the people, etc., do ordain and establish this constitution. 1 Story, Const. § 454.

For judicial decisions upon the scope and meaning of the word, see 14 N. Y. 262; 23 Barb. 55; 33 Pa. 222; 11 Gray 205; 49 N. H. 220; 18 La. Ann. 49; 10 S. C. 329.

ESTABLISHMENT, ESTABLISSEMENT. An ordinance or statute. Especially used of those ordinances or statutes passed in the reign of Edw. I. Co. 2d Inst. 156; Britt. c. 21. That which is instituted or established for public or private use, as the trading establishments of a government.

Establisement is also used to denote the settlement of dower by the husband upon his wife. Britt. c. 102.

ESTADAL. In Spanish Law. In Spanish America this was a measure of land of sixteen square varas, or yards. 2 White, Rec. 139.

ESTADIA. In Spanish Law. Called, also, Sobrestadia. The time for which the party who has chartered a vessel, or is bound to receive the cargo, has to pay demurrage on account of his delay in the execution of the contract.

ESTATE (Lat. status, the condition or circumstances in which the owner stands with reference to his property). The degree, quantity, nature, and extent of interest which a person has in real property.

It signifies the quantity of interest which a person has, from absolute ownership down to naked possession. 9 Cow. 81.

This word has several meanings. 1. In its most extensive sense, it is applied to signify everything of which riches or fortune may consist, and includes personal and real property: hence we say, personal estate, real estate; 8 Ves. 504; 16 Johns. 587; 4 Mott. 178; 3 Cal. 97; 25 Me. 294; 10 Mass. 233; 1 Pet. 235; 4 Harr. (Del.) 177; 32 Miss. 107; 4 Mead 60; 14 N. J. 53. 2. In its more limited sense, the word estate is applied to lands. It is so applied in two senses. The first describes or points out the land itself, without ascertaining the extent or nature of the interest therein: as, my estate at A. 18 Pick. 337. The second, which is the proper and technical meaning of estate, is the degree, quantity, nature, and extent of interest which one has in real property: as, an estate in fee, whether the same be a fee-simple or fee-tail, or an estate for life or for years, etc. Coke says, Estate signifies such inheritance, freehold, term of years, tenancy by statute merchant, staple, eligit, or the like, as any man hath in lands or tenements, etc. Co. Litt. § 945, 950 a. See Jones, Land Off. Titles in Penna. 105-170. Estate does not include rights in action; 13 Fred. L. 61; 35 Miss. 25; 18 Pa. 369. But as the word is commonly used in the settlement of estates, it does include the debts as well as the assets of a bankrupt or decedent, all his obligations and resources being regarded as one entirety. See 9 La. 126. Also the status or condition in life of a person; 15 Me. 122. See ESTATES OF THE DEAD.

See FREEHOLD ESTATE, PERSONAL ESTATE; REAL ESTATE, VESTED ESTATE.

ESTATE IN COMMON. An estate held in joint possession by two or more persons at the same time by several and distinct titles. 1 Washb. R. P. 415; 2 Bla. Com. 191; 1 Pres. Est. 139. This estate has the single unity of possession, and may be of real or personal property; 76 N. Y. 436; 82 N. C. 75, 83; 93 Ill. 129; 25 Minn. 232; 126 Mass. 480; 30 N. J. Eq. 110; 25 Mich. 53.

Where one dies intestate, the joint ownership of his property by his children is generally that of tenants in common; 94 Mich. 204.

ESTATE UPON CONDITION. See CONDITION.

ESTATE UPON CONDITION IMPLIED (OR CONDITION IN LAW). An estate having a condition annexed to it inseparably from its essence and constitution, although no condition be expressed in words. 2 Bl. Com. 152; 4 Kent's Com. 121.

ESTATE UPON CONDITION EXPRESSED. An estate granted, either in fee simple or otherwise, with an express qualification annexed, whereby the estate granted shall either commence, be enlarged, or be defeated, upon performance or breach of such qualification, or condition. 2 Bl. Com. 154.

ESTATE IN COPARCENARY. An estate which several persons hold as one heir, whether male or female. In the latter case, it arises at common law, when an estate descends to two or more females; in the former, when an estate descends to all the males in equal degree by particular custom. This estate has the three unities of time, title, and possession; but the interests of the coparceners may be unequal. 1 Washb. R. P. 414; 3 Bla. Com. 188; 4 Kent 366; 4 Mo. App. 360. See COPARCENARY, ESTATES IN.

ESTATE BY THE CURTESY. That estate to which a husband is entitled upon the death of his wife in the lands or tenements of which she was seised in possession, in fee-simple, or in fee-tail during their coverture; provided they have had lawful issue born alive and possibly capable of inheriting her estate. 1 Washb. R. P. 123; 2 Crabb, R. P. § 1074; Co. Litt. 30 a; 3 Bla. Com. 126; 1 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 153; 4 Kent 20, note; 21 Hun 381; 8 Baxt. 361; 3 Lea 710; 6 Mo. App. 416, 549; [1892] 3 Ch. 336. See CURTESY.

Curtsey is abolished or modified in many states. In Pennsylvania, birth of issue is no longer necessary, and in some states actual seisin is not required; 152 Pa. 318; 4 Day 206; 2 Ohio 808; 38 Me. 356; 24 Miss. 261.

ESTATE IN DOWER. See DOWER.

ESTATE DUTY. The tax imposed by the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, upon the principal value of all property (except such property as is expressly declared by that Act to be exempt), whether real or personal, settled or not settled which passes on the death of any person dying after 1st August, 1894. The duty applies to the realty and personally abroad of everyone with British domicile; and it applies also to all realty and chattels real within the United Kingdom of everyone, no matter what be his domicile. For the purposes of the duty, property, whether real or personal, is deemed to "pass at death" on the happening of any of the events which made account duty (q. v.) payable. Probate (q. v.) and account duty are not payable on any property upon which estate duty has been paid. Byrne; s. 1, Sch. I. (1). See DEATH DUTIES.

ESTATE BY ELEGIT. See ELEGIT.

ESTATE IN EXPECTANCY. An estate giving a present or vested contingent right of future enjoyment. One in which the right to permanency of the profits is postponed to some future period. Such are estates in remainder and reversion. 7 Paige 70, 76; 20 Barb. 455.

ESTATE IN FEE-SIMPLE. See FREE-SIMPLE.

ESTATE IN FEE-TAIL. See FREE-TAIL.

ESTATE OF FREEHOLD or FRANK-TENEMENT. Any estate of inheritance, or for life, in either a corporeal or incorporeal hereditament, existing in or arising from real property of free tenure. 2 Bla. Com. 104. It thus includes all estates but copyhold and leasehold, the former of which has never been known in this country. Freehold in deed is the real possession of land or tenements in fee, fee-tail, or for life. Freehold in law is the right to such tenements before entry. The term has also been applied to those offices which a man holds in fee or for life. Mozl. & W. Dict.; 1 Washb. R. P. 71, 637. See 100 Ill. 231; 75 N. C. 12; L. R. 11 Eq. 454; LIBRUM TENEMENTUM.

ESTATE OF INHERITANCE. An estate which may descend to heirs. 1 Washb. R. P. 51; 1 Steph. Com. 218.

All freehold estates are estates of inheritance, except estates for life. Crabb, R. P. § 945.

ESTATE OF JOINT TENANCY. The estate which subsists where several persons have any subject of property jointly between them in equal shares by purchase. 1 Washb. R. P. 406; 1 Bla. Com. 180. The right of survivorship is the distinguishing characteristic of this estate. Littleton § 290. In most of the United States the presumption is that all tenants holding jointly hold as tenants in common, unless a clear intention to the contrary be shown; 6 Gray 428; 5 Halst. 42; 20 Ala. N. S. 112; 1 Root 48; 10 Ohio 1; 11 S. & R. 191; 8 Vt. 548; 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 547; 96 Mo. 591; 60 Pa. 511; 35 Ark. 17; 93 N. C. 214. In some states this is by statute.

In some, words that would have created a joint tenancy now create a tenancy in common.

ESTATE FOR LIFE. A freehold estate, not of inheritance, but which is held by the tenant for his own life or the life or lives of one or more other persons, or for an indefinite period, which may endure for the life or lives of persons in being, and not beyond the period of a life. 1 Washb. R. P. 88; Co. Litt. 42 a; Bract. lib. 4, c. 28, § 207; 4 Den. 414; 7 Pick. 100; Chal. R. P. 89. When the measure of duration is the tenant's own life, it is called simply an estate "for life;" when the measure of duration is the life of another person, it is called an estate "per (or pur) autre vie;" 2 Bla. Com. 120; Co. Litt. 41 b; 4 Kent 23, 24.

Estates for life may be created by act of law or by act of the parties: in the former case they are called legal, in the latter conventional. The legal life estates are estates-tail after possibility of issue extinct, estates by dower, estates by curtesy, jointures; Mitch. R. P. 118, 133; 94 Me. 151; 5 Grant. 499; 1 Cush. 95; 24 Pa. 133; 6 Ind. 489; 8 E. L. & Eq. R. 345; 5 Md. 219; 51 Vt. 87; 12 S. C. 423; 50 La. 302; 89 Ill. 248; 31 N. J. Eq. 234. A life estate may be created by implication; 35 S. C. 833.

The chief incidents of life estates are a right to take reasonable estovers, and freedom from injury by a sudden termination or disturbance of the estate; 40 N. H. 532. Under-tenants have the same privileges as the original tenant; and acts of the original tenant which would destroy his own claim to these privileges will not affect them; see 10 Pa. 323.

Their right, however, does not of course, as against the superior lord, extend beyond the life of the original tenant; 2 Bla. Com. 122; 1 Rolle, Abr. 727; Co. Litt. 41 b; 1 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 102.

ESTATE IN POSSESSION. An estate where the tenant is in actual permanency or receipt of the rents and other advantages arising therefrom. 2 Crabb, R. P. § 2329; 2 Bla. Com. 163. See 19 Mach. 116; 18 Mo. 466; EXPECTANCY.

ESTATE PUR AUTRE VIE. An estate for the life of another. It arises most frequently when a tenant for his own life conveys his estate to a third person. He can only convey what he has, and his grantee takes an estate during the life of the grantor. If the tenant died during the life of the grantor (who was called the cestui que vie), at common law the balance of the estate went to the first person who took it, termed a general occupant. If the original gift was to the tenant and his heirs, the heir took it as special occupant. By statute in England, if there is no special occupant, the estate goes to the executors as personally, if not disposed of by will. This rule has been adopted in most of the United States, except a few, where it still descends as personality; 1 Washb. R. P. 88; 2 Bla. Com. 120.

ESTATE IN REMAINDER. See REMAINDER.

ESTATE IN REVERSION. See REVERSION.

ESTATE IN SEVERALTY. See SEVERALTY, ESTATE IN.

ESTATE BY STATUTE MERCHANT. See STATUTE MERCHANT.

ESTATE AT SUFFERANCE. The interest of a tenant who has come rightfully into possession of lands by permission of the owner and continues to occupy the same after the period for which he is entitled to hold by such permission. 1 Washb. R. P. 393; 2 Bla. Com. 130; Co. Litt. 57 b; Sm. L. & T. 217; 25 Cal. 81; 86 Ind. 108; 89 Mo. 177; Mitch. R. P. 174. This estate is of infrequent occurrence, but is recognized as so far an estate that the landlord must enter before he can bring ejectment against the tenant; 3 Term 299; 1 M. & G. 644. If the tenant has personally left the house, the landlord may break in the doors; 1 Bingh. 58; 17 Pick. 268; and the modern rule seems to be that the landlord may use force to regain possession, subject only to indictment if any injury is committed against the public peace; 7 Term 431; 14 M. & W. 497; 1 W. & S. 90; 7 M. & G. 318; 13 Johns. 253; 121 Mass. 809; 59 Me. 508. See 33 Vt. 82; 26 Mo. 116; 68 Ill. 58; L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 174.

ESTATE TAIL. See FEE-TAIL.

ESTATE IN VADIO. Pledge. See MORTGAGE.

ESTATE AT WILL. An estate in lands which the tenant has, by entry made thereon under a demise, to hold during the joint wills of the parties to the same. Co. Litt. 55 a; Tud. L. Cas. R. P. 10; 2 Bla. Com. 145; 4 Kent 110. Estates properly at will are of very infrequent occurrence, being generally turned into estates for years or from year to year by decisions of the courts or by statute; 4 Kent 115; Tud. L. Cas. R. P. 14; 4 Rawle 183; 1 Term 159.

ESTATE FROM YEAR TO YEAR. A lease for a year which unless terminated arises new by implication for another year. English.

ESTATE FOR YEARS. An interest in lands by virtue of a contract for the possession of them for a definite and limited period of time. 2 Bla. Com. 140; 2 Crabb, R. P. § 1267; Bac. Abr. Leases; Wms. R. P. 195. Such estates are frequently called terms. See TERM. The length of time for which the estate is to endure is of no importance in ascertaining its character, unless otherwise declared by statute; 15 Mass. 439; 1 N. H. 350; 13 S. & R. 60; 23 Ind. 122; 4 Kent 93.

ESTATES. Estates may mean as well the interests in the lands, as the lands themselves.

ESTATES OF THE REALM. The lords spiritual, the lords temporal, and the commons of Great Britain. 1 Bla. Com. 133; 3 Hallam, ch. 6, pl. 3. Sometimes called the three estates.

ESTER IN JUDGMENT. To appear before a tribunal either as plaintiff or defendant. Kelh. Norm. L. D.

ESTIMATE. A word used to express the mind or judgment of the speaker or writer on the particular subject under consideration. It implies a computation or calculation. 87 Hun 203.

A rough valuation; an appraisement. English. Equivalent to "asses-a." Both mean "to fix" the amount of the damages or the value of the thing to be ascertained. 11 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed. 383; 49 Ala. 162.

Estimated cost of a building held to mean the reasonable cost of a building erected in accordance with the plans and specifications referred to, and not necessarily the amount of some actual estimate made by a builder, nor an estimate agreed upon by the parties, nor yet an estimate or bid accepted by the defendant. Id.; 55 Conn. 437.

Estimated Capacity. The ordinary meaning of estimate is to calculate roughly, or to form an opinion as to amount from imperfect data. In this sense the expression "estimated capacity" meant substantially the supposed or probable capacity of the car. 72 S. W. 805.

ESTOPPEL. The preclusion of a person from asserting a fact, by previous conduct inconsistent therewith, on his own part or the part of those under whom he claims, or by an adjudication upon his rights which he cannot be allowed to call in question.

A preclusion, in law, which prevents a man from alleging or denying a fact, in consequence of his own previous act, allegation, or denial of a contrary tenor. Steph. Pl. 239.

A plea which neither admits nor denies the facts alleged by the plaintiff, but denies his right to allege them. Gould, Pl. c. 2, § 89.

A special plea in bar, which happens where a man has done some act or executed some deed which precludes him from averring anything to the contrary. 8 Bla. Com. 808.

Where a fact has been admitted or asserted for the purpose of influencing the conduct or deriving a benefit from another so that it cannot be denied without a breach of good faith, the law enforces the rule of good morals as a rule of policy, and precludes the party from repudiating his representations or denying the truth of his admissions; 5 Ohio 100; Rawle, Cor. 467.

This doctrine of law gives rise to a kind of pleading that is neither by way of traverse, nor confession and avoidance, viz.: a pleading that, waiving any question of fact, relies merely on the estoppel, and, after stating the previous act, allegation, or denial of the opposite party, prays judgment if he shall be received or admitted to aver contrary to what he before did or said. This pleading is called a pleading by way of estoppel. Steph. Pl. 240; 120 Mass. 91; 18 Hun 161; 87 Miss. 634; 31 La. Ann. 61, 108; 8 East. 299; 90 Ill. 604; 6 Wash. 244. See 93 Cal. 641.

Formerly the questions of regarding estoppel arose almost entirely in relation to transfers of real property, and the rules in regard to one kind of estoppel were quite fully elaborated. In more modern times the principle has come to be applied to all cases where one by words or conduct wilfully causes another to believe in the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief or to alter his own previous position. 2 Exch. 683; 1 Zab. 408; 28 Me. 621; 9 N. Y. 121; 40 Mo. 348. See, as to the reason and propriety of the doctrine, Co. Litt. 352 a; 11 Wend. 117; 1 Dev. & B. L. 464; 12 Vt. 44.

"The correct view of estoppel is that taken in a recent work (Bigelow, Est.). 'Certain admissions,' it is there said, 'are indisputable, and estoppel is the agency of the law by which evidence to controvert their truth is excluded. In other words, when an act is done, or a statement made by a party the truth or efficacy of which it would be a fraud on his part to controvert or impair, the character of an estoppel will be given to what would otherwise be a mere matter of evidence. The law of estoppel, therefore, is a branch of the law of evidence, it has become a part of the jurisdiction of chancery, simply because in equity alone, or rather by equitable construction alone, has that full effect been given to this species of evidence which is necessary to the due administration of justice.' Bisph. Eq. § 280. See Tiedm. Eq. Jur. 106.

Where there is an attempt to apply the doctrine of estoppel, one essential in such a case is that the party in whose favor it is invoked must himself act in good faith; 50 Kan. 773.

BY DEED. Such as arises from the provisions of a deed. It is a general rule that a party to a deed is estopped to deny any thing stated therein which has operated upon the other party: as, the inducement to accept and act under such deed; 7 Conn. 214; 18 Vt. 158; 3 Mo. 873; 5 Ohio 199; 10 Cuah. 163; 107 Mo. 610; and see 185 N. Y. 926; 52 Minn. 67; 36 S. C. 468; 98 N. C. 203; 3 McCord 411; 6 Ohio 300; including a deed made with covenant of warranty, which estops even as to a subsequently acquired title; 11 Johns. 91; 24 Pick. 824; 20 Me. 200; 8 Ohio 107; 12 Vt. 39; 145 U. S. 546; 180 id. 122; 157 Mass. 57; 89 Tenn. 411. But see 18 Pick. 116; 5 Gray 828; 4 Wend. 300; 11 Ohio 475; 14 Me. 351; 43 id. 432; 20 Fla. 228. See 101 U. S. 240; 21 Hun 145; 45 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 528; 61 Ga. 822; 94 Ill. 191; 83 Ia. 545; 94 Ala. 508; 63 Va. 817; 64 N. H. 500.

A corporation accepting conveyance of a water works plant by deed describing certain mortgages thereon, and expressly declaring that the conveyance was made subject thereto, is thereby estopped from questioning the validity of the mortgages; 73 Fed. Rep. 950.

To create an estoppel, the deed must be good and valid in its form and execution; 2 Washb. R. P. 41; 89 Minn. 511; and must convey no title upon which the warranty can operate in case of a covenant; 3 McLean 56; 9 Cow. 271; 2 Pres. Abs. 216.

Estoppels affect only parties and privies in blood, law, or estate; 6 Bing. N. C. 79; 8 Johns. Ch. 108; 24 Pick. 324; 35 N. H. 90; 5 Ohio 100; 2 Dev. 177; 13 N. H. 350; 44 La. Ann. 584; 33 Fla. 204. See 123 Mass. 25; 47 Fed. Rep. 231. Estoppels, it is said, must be reciprocal; Co. Litt. 352 a; 17 Or. 204. But see 4 Litt. 272; 15 Mass. 400; 11 Ark. 62; 2 Sm. L. C. 664. And see 2 Washb. R. P. 453.

A grantor is not estopped by recitals in his deed of payment of consideration, from suing for the unpaid purchase money; 110 N. C. 400. A grantee cannot enter and hold under a deed and at the same time repudiate the title thereby conveyed; 75 Md. 876. See 150 Mass. 181; 145 Pa. 628; 112 N. C. 688; 94 Mich. 420; 40 Ill. App. 110; 79 Cal. 23.

BY MATTER OF RECORD. Such as arises from the adjudication of a competent court. Judgments of courts of record, and decrees and other final determinations of ecclesiastical, maritime, and military courts, work estoppels; 1 Munf. 466; 2 B. & Ald. 362; 16 Blatchf. 324; 69 Me. 445; 75 N. Y. 417; 25 Minn. 72; 101 U. S. 570; 124 Mass. 109; 847; 87 Ill. 367; 130 id. 274; 98 U. S. 433; 109 N. C. 400; 12 Colo. 434. See 44 La. Ann. 548; 112 N. C. 759. Admissions in pleadings, either express or implied, cannot afterwards be controverted in a suit between the same parties; Cum. Dig. Estoppel A. 1. It is of the essence of estoppel by judgment that it is certain that the precise fact was determined by the former judgment; 158 U. S. 216. Estoppels by deed and by record are common-law doctrines.

BY MATTER IN PARS. Such as arises from the acts and declarations of a person by which he designedly induces another to alter his position injuriously to himself: 17 Conn. 345, 355; 5 Denio 154; 46 Ohio St. 255; 39 Minn. 419. See 97 N. C. 303; 43 Ill. App. 157; 116 Mo. 333; 3 Tex. Civ. App. 406; 66 Hun 628. Equitable estoppel, or estoppel by conduct, is said to have its foundation in fraud, considered in its most general sense; Bisph. Eq. § 282. It is said (Bigelow, Estop. 437) that the following elements must be present in order to constitute an estoppel by conduct: 1. There must have been a representation or concealment of material facts. 2. The representation must have been made with knowledge of the facts. 3. The party to whom it was made must have been ignorant of the truth of the matter. 4. It must have been made with the intention that the other party would act upon it. 5. The other party must have been induced to act upon it. See 69 Tex. 287; Tiedm. Eq. Jur. 107. The rule of equitable estoppel is, that where one by his acts, declarations, or silence, where it is his duty to speak, has induced another person, in reliance on such acts or declarations, to enter into a transaction, he shall not, to the prejudice of the person so misled, impeach the transaction; per Bates, Ch., in 3 Del. Ch. 9.

In the leading case on this subject (Pickard v. Sears, 6 Ad. & El. 469) a mortgagee of personalty was held to be estopped from asserting his title under the mortgage because he had passively acquiesced in a purchase of the same by the defendant under an execution against the mortgagor. Cases of estoppel by silence are numerous; 10 Wall. 289; 81 Pa. 384; 12 Gray 78, 205; 4 Wall. 572; 158 Mass. 97; but silence does not always amount to fraud; 65 Pa. 241; and there is no estoppel by silence where a party has had no opportunity to speak; 63 Pa. 417. See 94 Mich. 84; 2 Miso. Rep. 897.

The estoppel will be limited to the acts which were based upon the representations out of which the estoppel arose; thus, where a sheriff had a writ against A, but took B into custody, upon B's representations that she was A, but detained her after he was informed that she was not A, B was estopped to recover damages for the false arrest but not for the subsequent detention; 2 C. B. n. s. 495. See 50 Ga. 90; 27 Barb. 595; Bishp. Eq. § 292. The acts alleged as an estoppel must be executed and not merely executory; 83 Va. 397; as when a statement is not accepted and acted upon, it does not constitute an estoppel; 73 Ia. 268; 60 Vt. 261. Where an indorser gave notes in compromise of the claims of the indorsee, the acceptance of partial payments by the latter did not estop him from suing on the original notes upon which, under the agreement, the indorser was to be released from liability upon payment of the compromise notes at maturity; 75 Fed. Rep. 852.

It is said that the contract of a person under disability cannot be made good by estoppel; Bishp. Eq. § 293. See 2 Gray 161; 117 Mass. 241; 52 Pa. 400. It makes no difference whether the person, if a married woman, falsely represented herself to be sole; 9 Ex. 422; 97 N. C. 106. But estoppel may operate to prevent such a person from enforcing a right. For instance, if a married woman were to induce A to buy property from B, knowing that the title was not in B, but in herself, she would be estopped from asserting her title against A; 3 Bush 702; 8 C. E. Green 477; 30 Ala. 382. The same principle would extend to similar acts on the part of an infant; 3 Hare 503; 9 Ga. 23; but not unless the conduct was intentional and fraudulent; 38 Fed. Rep. 482. An unexecuted contract void as against public policy cannot be validated by invoking the doctrine of estoppel; 71 Mich. 141.

The doctrine that estoppels bind not only parties, but privies of blood, law, and estate, is said to apply equally to this class of estoppels; Bigelow, Estop. 74, 449; but a ward cannot be estopped by an act of his guardian which the other party to the agreement knew to be unauthorized; 145 Ill. 656.

The maxim vigilantibus non dormientibus leges adjuvant specially applies to a claim of equitable estoppel, since in such cases the interposition of equity is extraordinary and restrictive of what but for the estoppel would be a clear legal right; 3 Del. Ch. 9.

The doctrine of estoppel is said to be the basis of another equitable doctrine, that of election; Bishp. Eq. § 294. See ELECTION.

This principle has been applied to cases of dedication of land to the public use; 6 Pet. 438; 19 Pick. 408; of the owner's standing by and seeing land improved upon; 50 N. Y. 222, 68 Pa. 164; 24 Mich. 134; 24 Neb. 702; 84 Ala. 570; 25 Tenn. 171; 30 W. Va. 687; 31 S. C. 153; or sold; 7 Watts 168; 11 N. H. 201; 2 Dana 13; 13 Cal. 359; 1 Woodb. & M. 218; 40 Me. 348; 115 Mo. 613; without making claim; 44 La. Ann. 917; 115 Mo. 613; 37 Fed. Rep. 508; 76 Cal. 260; 69 Tex. 38, 287; 41 Minn. 198; 85 Ky. 260. See EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL.

In Equity. Where an act is done or a statement made by a party, under such circumstances that to impair its efficacy or controvert its truth, would be contrary to justice and good faith, the result is that the party is debarred from asserting any right or title in opposition to any right which has been acquired in reliance upon such act or statement; this result is called an estoppel. Bispham, Prin. of Eq. 10th ed., p. 478.

ESTOPPEL IN PAIS. An equitable estoppel. The law upon the subject is well settled. The vital principle is that he who by his language or conduct leads another to do what he would not otherwise have done, shall not subject such person to loss or injury by disappointing the expectations upon which he acted. 10 Otto (U. S.) 580.

ESTOVERS (estouviere, necessities; from estoffer, to furnish). The right or privilege which a tenant has to furnish himself with so much wood from the demised premises as may be sufficient or necessary for his fuel, fences, and other agricultural operations. 2 Bla. Com. 85; Woodf. L. & T. 232; 10 Wend. 639.

Any tenant may claim this right, whether he be a tenant for life, for years, or at will; and that without waiting for any special leave or assignment of the lessor, unless he is restrained by some provision contained in his lease; Shepp. Touchst. 8, n. 1; Chal. R. P. 311. Nor does it appear to be necessary that the wood should all be consumed upon the premises, provided it is taken in good faith for the use of the tenant and his servants, and in reasonable quantities, with the further qualification, also, that no substantial injury be done to the inheritance; 1 Paige, Ch. 578.

Where several tenants are granted the right of estovers from the same estate, it becomes a common of estovers; but no one of such tenants can, by underletting his land to two or more persons, apportion this right among them; for in this way he might surcharge the land, and the rights of his cotenants, as well as those of the landlord, would be thereby invaded. In case, therefore, of the division of a farm among several tenants, neither of the under-tenants can have estovers, and the right, consequently, becomes extinguished; 10 Wend. 650; 4 Co. 86; 8 id. 78. There is much learning in the old books relative to the creation, apportionment, suspension, and extinguishment of these rights, very little of which, however, is applicable to the condition of things in this country, except perhaps in the state of New York, where the entanglements produced by grants of the manor-lands have led to some litigation on the subject. Tayl. Landl. & T. § 220. See 4 Wash. R. P. 99; 7 Bing. 640; 7 Pick. 152; 17 id. 248; 14 Me. 221; 2 N. H. 130; 7 id. 341; 7 Ired. Eq. 197; 6 Yerg. 394; 5 Mass. 13.

The alimony allowed to a wife was called at common law, estovers. See DE ESTOVERIUS HABENDIS.

ESTRAY. Cattle whose owner is unknown. Spelman, Gloss.; 29 Ia. 437; 27 Wis. 422; 4 Oreg. 206; 18 Pick. 426; but see 69 Mo. 203; 14 Tex. 431. Any beast, not wild, found within any lordship, and not owned by any man. Cowel; 1 Bla. Com. 297; 2 id. 14. These belonged to the lord of the soil. Britt. c. 17.

Statutes directing unlicensed dogs at large to be killed and animals running at large to be seized and upon notice by a justice, etc., sold at auction, are not unconstitutional; 89 Mich. 461; 82 N. C. 176; 69 Mo. 205; 15 Or. 62.

An animal turned on a range by its owner is not an estray, although its immediate whereabouts are unknown to the owner, unless it wanders from the range and becomes lost; 16 Or. 62.

ESTREAT. A true copy or note of some original writing or record, and especially of fines and amercements imposed by a court, extracted from the record, and certified to a proper officer or officers authorized and required to collect them. Fitzh. N. B. 57, 76. A forfeited recognizance taken out from among the other records for the purpose of being sent up to the exchequer, that the parties might be sued thereon, was said to be estreated. 4 Bla. Com. 253.

ESTREPEMENT. A common-law writ for the prevention of waste.

The same object being attainable by a motion for an injunction in chancery, the writ became obsolete in England, and was explicitly abolished by 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 27.

The writ lay at common law to prevent a party in possession from committing waste on an estate the title to which was disputed, after judgment obtained in any real action and before possession was delivered by the sheriff.

But, as waste might be committed in some cases pending the suit, the statute of Gloucester gave another writ of estrepement pendente placito, commanding the sheriff firmly to inhibit the tenant "ne faciat vastum vel strepementum pendente placito dicto indicibus." By virtue of either of these writs, the sheriff may resist those who commit waste after he has offered to do so; and he might use sufficient force for the purpose; 3 Bla. Com. 235, 236.

The writ is sometimes directed to the sheriff and the party in possession of the lands, in order to make him amenable to the court as for a contempt in case of his disobedience to the injunction of the writ. At common law the process proper to bring the tenant into court is a venire facias, and thereon an attachment. Upon the defendant's coming in, the plaintiff declares against him. The defendant usually pleads "that he has done no waste contrary to the prohibition of the writ." The issue on this plea is tried by a jury, and in case they find against the defendant they assess damages which the plaintiff recovers. But, as this verdict convicts the defendant of a contempt, the court proceed against him for that cause as in other cases; Co. 2d Inst. 829; Rast. 317; 1 B. & P. 121; 2 Lilly, Reg. Estrepement; 5 Co. 119; Reg. Brev. 76.

In Pennsylvania, by legislative enactment, the remedy by estrepement is extended for the benefit of any owner of lands leased for years or at will, at any time during the continuance or after the expiration of such demise, and due notice given to the tenant to leave the same, agreeably to law; or for any purchaser at sheriff or coroner's sale of lands, etc., after he has been declared the highest bidder by the sheriff or coroner; or for any mortgagee or judgment-creditor, after the lands bound by such judgment or mortgage shall have been condemned by auction, or which may be subject to be sold by a writ of venditioni exponas or levari facias. See 10 Vinet, Abr. 497; Woodf. Landl. & T. 447; Arch. Civ. Pl. 17; 7 Com. Dig. 659; 24 Pa. 162; 37 id. 260.

ESTREYTE. See LARGE.

ET ADJOURNATUR. And it is adjourned. A phrase used in the old reports, where the argument of a cause was adjourned to another day, or where a second argument was had. 1 Keb. 692, 764; Black, L. Dict.

ET ALIUS (Lat.). And another. The abbreviation et al., sometimes in the plural written et als., is affixed to the name of the first plaintiff or defendant, in entitling a cause, where there are several joined as plaintiffs or defendants.

On an appeal from a judgment in favor of two or more parties, a bond payable to one of the appellants et al. will be good; 3 La. Ann. 218; 12 id. 324. But where a summons should state the parties to the action, the name of one followed by the words et al. is not sufficient; 44 Cal. 680.

ET CÆTERA (Lat.). And others; and other things. See 39 Hun 576; 4 Daly 62.

The addition of the abbreviation et c. to some minor provisions of an agreement for a lease does not introduce such uncertainty as to prevent a decree for specific performance where the material points are clear; Chelmsford, Ld. Ch., in 2 De G. & J. 559; but such an agreement "for letting and taking coals, etc.," was too indefinite a statement of the subject-matter of the agreement to admit of such a decree; 1 De G. M. & G. 80; but an agreement "to do all the painting, papering, repairing, decorating, etc., during the term of the lease" was not so uncertain as to prevent a specific performance; 21 L. J. Rep. 185.

Under a bequest of "all her household furniture and effects, plate, linen, china, glass, books, wearing apparel, etc.," it was claimed that the testatrix had disposed of the general residue of her estate, but she was held by Romilly, M. R., to be intestate "except as to the articles specified in the will and those which are ejusdem generis;" 26 Beav. 220; and the same judge held the words good-will, etc., in a contract, to include "such other things as are necessarily connected with and belong to the good-will, . . . for instance, the use of trade-marks," and a covenant not to engage in similar business in Great Britain for a reasonable time to be limited in the conveyance having regard to the nature of such undertakings. "All these things would be included in the words et cetera," 28 L. J. Ch. 212; "all my furniture, etc.," passed only property quidem generis and not shares of a water-works company; L. R. 11 Eq. 363; "all my money, cattle, farming implements, etc., the paying" certain sums named to testator's two brothers, was, upon looking at the whole will, sufficient to make the widow universal residuary legatee of real and personal estate, the latter being insufficient to pay debts; Jessel, M. R., L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 800.

The abbreviation etc. was formerly much used in pleading to avoid the inconveniences attendant upon making full and half defence. See DEFENCE. It is not generally to be used in solemn instruments; see 6 S. & R. 437; when used in pleadings to avoid repetition, it usually refers to things unnecessary to be stated; 27 Ark. 564.

Where the sense of the abbreviation may be gathered from the preceding words there is sufficient certainty; but where the abbreviation cannot be understood and affects a vital part of the contract or instrument the uncertainty will be fatal.

ET DE HOC PONIT SE SUPER PATRIAM (Lat.). And of this he puts himself upon the country. The Latin form of concluding a traverse. See 3 Bla. Com. 313.

ET HOC PARATUS EST VERIFICARE (Lat.). And this he is prepared to verify. The Latin form of concluding a plea in confession and avoidance; that is, where the defendant has confessed all that the plaintiff has set forth, and has pleaded new matter in avoidance. 1 Saik. 2.

ET HOC PETIT QUOD INQUIRATUR PER PATRIAM (Lat.). And this he prays may be inquired of by the country. The conclusion of a plea tendering an issue to the country. 1 Saik. 3.

ET INDE PRODUCIT SECTAM (Lat.). And thereupon he brings suit. The Latin conclusion of a declaration, except against attorneys and other officers of the court. 3 Bla. Com. 295.

ET MODO AD HUNC DIEM (Lat.). And now at this day. The Latin form of the commencement of the record on appearance of the parties.

ET NON (Lat.). And not. These words are sometimes employed in pleading to convey a pointed denial. They have the same effect as "without this," absque hoc. 2 Bouvier, Inst., 2d ed. n. 2963, note.

ET SIC AD PATRIAM (Lat.). And so to the country. A phrase used in the year books, to record an issue to the country.

ET UXOR (Lat. and wife). Used to show that the wife of the grantor is a party to the deed. The abbreviation is et ux.

ETHICS, LEGAL. The principles of morally right and wrong conduct and character as expounded by the legal profession.

Following are the Canons of Professional Ethics and the Canons of Judicial Ethics as adopted by the American Bar Association.

Canons of Professional Ethics: (Adopted by the American Bar Association at its thirty-first annual meeting at Seattle, Washington, on August 27, 1905.)

(The committee of the American Bar Association which prepared the Canons was composed of the following: Henry St. George Tucker, Virginia, Chairman; Lucien Hugh Alexander, Pennsylvania, Secretary; David J. Brewer, District of Columbia; Frederick V. Brown, Minnesota; J. M. Dickinson, Illinois; Franklin Ferriss, Missouri; William Wirt Howe, Louisiana; Thomas H. Hubbard, New York; James G. Jenkins, Wisconsin; Thomas Goode Jones, Alabama; Alton R. Parker, New York; George R. Peck, Illinois; Francis Lynde Stetson, New York; Ezra R. Thayer, Massachusetts.)

Preamble.

In America, where the stability of Courts and of all departments of government rests upon the approval of the people, it is peculiarly essential that the system for establishing and dispensing Justice be developed to a high point of efficiency and so maintained that the public shall have absolute confidence in the integrity and impartiality of its administration. The future of the Republic depends upon the maintenance of Justice pure and unadulterated. It cannot be so maintained unless the conduct and the motives of the members of our profession are such as to merit the approval of all just men.

No code or set of rules can be framed, which will particularize all the duties of the lawyer in the varying phases of litigation or in all the relations of professional life. The following canons of ethics are adopted by the American Bar Association as a general guide, yet the enumeration of particular duties should not be construed as a denial of the existence of others equally imperative, though not specifically mentioned.

1. The Duty of the Lawyer to the Courts.

It is the duty of the lawyer to maintain towards the Courts a respectful attitude, not for the sake of the temporary incumbent of the judicial office, but for the maintenance of its supreme importance. Judges, not being wholly free to defend themselves, are peculiarly entitled to receive the support of the Bar against unjust criticism and clamor. Whenever there is proper ground for serious complaint of a judicial officer, it is the right and duty of the lawyer to submit his grievances to the proper authorities. In such cases, but not otherwise, such charges should be encouraged and the person making them should be protected.

2. The Selection of Judges.

It is the duty of the Bar to endeavor to prevent political considerations from entering judicial offices in the selections of Judges. It should protest earnestly and actively against the appointment or election of those who are unsuitable for the Bench; and it should strive to have elevated thereto only those willing to forego other employments, whether of a business, political or other character, which may embarrass their free and fair consideration of questions before them for decision. The aspiration of lawyers for judicial position should be governed by an impartial estimate of their ability to add honor to the office and not by a desire to obtain the distinction the position may bring to themselves.

3. Attempts to Exert Personal Influence on the Court.

Marked attention and unusual hospitality on the part of a lawyer to a Judge, uncalculated by the personal relations of the parties, subject both the Judge and the lawyer to misconstructions of motive and should be avoided. A lawyer should not communicate or argue privately with the Judge as to the merits of a pending cause, and he deserves rebuke and denunciation for any device or attempt to gain from a Judge special personal consideration or favor. A self-respecting independence in the discharge of professional duty, without denial or diminution of courtesy and respect due the Judge's station, is the only proper foundation for cordial personal and official relations between Bench and Bar.

4. When Counsel for an Indigent Prisoner.

A lawyer assigned as counsel for an indigent prisoner ought not to ask to be excused for any trivial reason, and should always exert his best efforts in his behalf.

5. The Defense or Prosecution of Those Accused of Crime.

It is the right of the lawyer to undertake the defense of a person accused of crime, regardless of his personal opinion as to the guilt of the accused; otherwise innocent persons, victims only of suspicious circumstances, might be denied proper defense. Having undertaken such defense, the lawyer is bound by all fair and honorable means, to present every defense that the law of the land permits, to the end that no person may be deprived of life or liberty, but by due process of law.

The primary duty of a lawyer engaged in public prosecution is not to convict, but to see that justice is done. The suppression of facts or the secreting of witnesses capable of establishing the innocence of the accused is highly reprehensible.

6. Adverse Influences and Conflicting Interests.

It is the duty of a lawyer at the time of retainer to disclose to the client all the circumstances of his relations to the parties, and any interest in or connection with the controversy, which might influence the client in the selection of counsel.

It is unprofessional to represent conflicting interests, except by express consent of all concerned given after a full disclosure of the facts. Within the meaning of this canon, a lawyer represents conflicting interests when, in behalf of one client it is his duty to contend for that which duty to another client requires him to oppose.

The obligation to represent the client with undivided fidelity and not to divulge his secrets or confidences forbids also the subsequent acceptance of retainers, or employment from others in matters adversely affecting any interest of the client with respect to which confidence has been reposed.

7. Professional Colleagues and Conflicts of Opinion.

A client's proffer of assistance of additional counsel should not be regarded as evidence of want of confidence, but the matter should be left to the determination of the client. A lawyer should decline association as colleague if it is objectionable to the original counsel, but if the lawyer retained is relieved, another may come into the case.

When lawyers jointly associated in a cause cannot agree as to any matter vital to the interest of the client, the conflict of opinion should be frankly stated to him for his final determination. His decision should be accepted unless the nature of the difference makes it impracticable for the lawyer whose judgment has been overruled to co-operate effectively. In this event it is his duty to ask the client to relieve him.

Efforts, direct or indirect, in any way to encroach upon the business of another lawyer, are unworthy of those who should be brethren at the Bar; but, nevertheless, it is the right of any lawyer, without fear or favor, to give proper advice to those seeking relief against unfaithful or neglectful counsel, generally after communication with the lawyer of whom the complaint is made.

8. Advising Upon the Merits of a Client's Cause.

A lawyer should endeavor to obtain full knowledge of his client's cause before advising thereon, and he is bound to give a candid opinion of the merits and probable result of pending or contemplated litigation. The miscarriages to which justice is subject, by reason of surprises and disappointments in evidence and witnesses, and through mistakes of juries and errors of Courts, even though often avoidable, admonish lawyers to beware of bold and confident assurances to clients, especially where the employment may depend upon such assurance. Whenever the controversy will admit of fair adjustment, the client should be advised to avoid or to end the litigation.

9. Negotiations With Opposite Party.

A lawyer should not in any way communicate upon the subject of controversy with a party represented by counsel; much less should he undertake to negotiate or compromise the matter with him, but should deal only with his counsel. It is incumbent upon the lawyer not particularly to avoid everything which may tend to mislead a party not represented by counsel, and he should not undertake to advise him as to the law.

10. Acquiring Interest in Litigation.

The lawyer should not purchase any interest in the subject matter of the litigation which he is conducting.

11. Dealing With Trust Property.

Money of the client or other trust property coming into the possession of the lawyer should be reported promptly, and except with the client's knowledge and consent should not be commingled with his private property or be used by him.

12. Fixing the Amount of the Fee.

In fixing fees, lawyers should avoid charges which overestimate their advice and services, as well as those which undervalue them. A client's ability to pay cannot justify a charge in excess of the value of the service, though his poverty may require a less charge, or even none at all. The reasonable requests of brother lawyers, and of their widows and orphans without ample means, should receive special and kindly consideration.

In determining the amount of the fee, it is proper to consider: (1) the time and labor required, the novelty and difficulty of the questions involved and the skill requisite properly to conduct the cause; (2) whether the acceptance of employment in the particular case will preclude the lawyer's appearance for others in cases likely to arise out of the transaction, and in which there is a reasonable expectation that otherwise he would be employed, or will involve the loss of other business while employed in the particular case or antagonism with other clients; (3) the customary charges of the Bar for similar services; (4) the amount involved in the controversy and the benefits resulting to the client from the services; (5) the contingency or the certainty of the compensation; and (6) the character of the employment, whether casual or for an established and constant client. No one of these considerations in itself is controlling. They are mere guides in ascertaining the real value of the service.

In fixing fees it should never be forgotten that the profession is a branch of the administration of justice and not a mere money-getting trade.

13. Contingent Fees.

Contingent fees, where sanctioned by law, should be under the supervision of the Court, in order that clients may be protected from unjust charges.

14. Suing a Client for a Fee.

Controversies with clients concerning compensation are to be avoided by the lawyer so far as shall be compatible with his self-respect and with his right to receive reasonable recompense for his services; and lawsuits with clients should be resorted to only to prevent injustice, imposition or fraud.

15. How Far a Lawyer May Go in Supporting a Client's Cause.

Nothing operates more certainly to create or to foster popular prejudice against lawyers as a class, and to deprive the profession of that full measure of public esteem and confidence which belongs to the proper discharge of its duties than does the false claim, often set up by the unscrupulous in defense of questionable transactions, that it is the duty of the lawyer to do whatever may enable him to succeed in winning his client's cause.

It is improper for a lawyer to assert in argument his personal belief in his client's innocence or in the justice of his cause.

The lawyer owes "entire devotion to the interest of the client, warm seal in the maintenance and defense of his rights and the exertion of his utmost learning and ability," to the end that nothing be taken or withheld from him, save by the rules of law, legally applied. No fear of judicial disfavor or public unpopularity should restrain him from the full discharge of his duty. In the judicial forum the client is entitled to the benefit of any and every remedy and defense that is authorized by the law of the land, and he may expect his lawyer to assert every such remedy or defense. But it is steadfastly to be borne in mind that the great trust of the lawyer is to be performed within and not without the bounds of the law. The office of attorney does not permit, much less does it demand of him for any client, violation of law or any manner of fraud or chance. He must obey his own conscience and not that of his client.

16. Restraining Clients from Improperities.

A lawyer should use his best efforts to restrain and to prevent his clients from doing those things which the lawyer himself ought not to do, particularly with reference to their conduct towards Courts, judicial officers, jurors, witnesses and suitors. If a client persists in such wrong-doing the lawyer should terminate their relation.

17. Ill Feeling and Personalities Between Advocates.

Clients, not lawyers, are the litigants. Whatever may be the ill-feeling existing between clients, it should not be allowed to influence counsel in their conduct and demeanor toward each other or toward suitors in the case. All personalities between counsel should be scrupulously avoided. In the trial of a cause it is indecent to allude to the personal history or the personal peculiarities and idiosyncrasies of counsel on the other side. Personal collisions between counsel, which cause delay and promote unseemly wrangling should also be carefully avoided.

18. Treatment of Witnesses and Litigants.

A lawyer should always treat adverse witnesses and suitors with fairness and due consideration, and he should never minister to the malevolence or prejudices of a client in the trial or conduct of a cause. The client cannot be made the keeper of the lawyer's conscience in professional matters. He has no right to demand that his counsel shall abuse the opposite party or indulge in offensive personalities. Improper speech is not excusable on the ground that it is what the client would say if speaking in his own behalf.

19. Appearance of Lawyer as Witness for His Client.

When a lawyer is a witness for his client, except as to merely formal matters, such as the attestation or custody of an instrument and the like, he should leave the trial of the case to other counsel. Except when essential to the ends of justice, a lawyer should avoid testifying in court in behalf of his client.

20. Newspaper Discussion of Pending Litigation.

Newspaper publications by a lawyer as to pending or anticipated litigation may interfere with a fair trial in the Courts and thereby prejudice the due administration of justice. Generally they are to be condemned. If the extreme circumstances of a particular case justify a statement to the public, it is unprofessional to make it anonymously. An ex parte reference to the facts should not go beyond quotation from the records and papers on file in the court; but even in extreme cases it is better to avoid any ex parte statement.

21. Punctuality and Expedition.

It is the duty of the lawyer not only to his client, but also to the Courts and to the public to be punctual in attendance, and to be concise and direct in the trial and disposition of causes.

22. Candor and Fairness.

The conduct of the lawyer before the Court and with other lawyers should be characterized by candor and fairness.

It is not candid or fair for the lawyer knowingly to misquote the contents of a paper, the testimony of a witness, the language or the argument of opposing counsel, or the language of a decision or a text-book; or with knowledge of its invalidity, to cite as authority a decision that has been overruled, or a statute that has been repealed; or in argument to assert as a fact that which has not been proved, or in those jurisdictions where a side has the opening and closing arguments to mislead his opponent by concealing or withholding positions in his opening argument upon which his side then intends to rely.

It is unprofessional and dishonorable to deal other than candidly with the facts in taking the statements of witnesses, in drawing affidavits and other documents, and in the presentation of causes.

A lawyer should not offer evidence, which he knows the Court should reject, in order to get the same before the jury by argument for its admissibility, nor should he address to the Judge arguments upon any point not properly calling for determination by him. Neither should he introduce into an argument addressed to the court, remarks or statements intended to influence the jury or bystanders.

These and all kindred practices are unprofessional and unworthy of an officer of the law charged, as is the lawyer, with the duty of aiding in the administration of justice.

23. Attitude Toward Jury.

All attempts to curry favor with juries by fawning, flattery or pretended solicitude for their personal comfort are unprofessional. Suggestions of counsel, looking to the comfort or convenience of jurors, and propositions to dispense with argument, should be made to the Court out of the jury's hearing. A lawyer must never converse privately with jurors about the case; and both before and during the trial he should avoid communicating with them, even as to matters foreign to the cause.

24. Right of Lawyer to Control the Incidents of the Trial.

As to incidental matters pending the trial, not affecting the merits of the cause, or working substantial prejudice to the rights of the client, such as forcing the opposite lawyer to trial when he is under affliction or bereavement; forcing the trial on a particular day to the injury of the opposite lawyer when no harm will result from a trial at a different time; agreeing to an extension of time for signing a bill of exceptions, cross interrogatories and the like, the lawyer must be allowed to judge. In such matters no client has a right to demand that his counsel shall be illiberal, or that he do anything therein repugnant to his own sense of honor and propriety.

25. Taking Technical Advantage of Opposite Counsel; Agreements With Him.

A lawyer should not ignore known customs or practice of the Bar or of a particular Court, even when the law permits, without giving timely notice to the opposing counsel. As far as possible, important agreements, affecting the rights of clients, should be reduced to writing; but it is dishonorable to avoid performance of an agreement fairly made because it is not reduced to writing, as required by rules of Court.

26. Professional Advocacy Other Than Before Courts.

A lawyer openly, and in his true character may render professional services before legislative or other bodies, regarding proposed legislation and in advocacy of claims before departments or government, upon the same principles of ethics which justify his appearance before the Courts; but it is unprofessional for a lawyer so engaged to conceal his attorneyship, or to employ secret personal solicitations, or to use means other than those addressed to the reason and understanding, to influence action.

27. Advertising, Direct or Indirect.

The most worthy and effective advertisement possible, even for a young lawyer, and especially with his brother lawyers, is the establishment of a well-merited reputation for professional capacity and fidelity to trust. This cannot be forced, but must be the outcome of character and conduct. The publication or circulation of ordinary simple business cards, being a matter of personal taste or local custom, and sometimes of convenience, is not per se improper. But solicitation of business by circulars or advertisements, or by personal communications or interviews, not warranted by personal relations, is unprofessional. It is equally unprofessional to procure business by indirection through letters of any kind, or through allied estate firms or trust companies, advertising to secure the drawing of deeds or wills or offering retainers in exchange for executorships or trusteeships to be influenced by the lawyer. Indirect advertisement by business by furnishing or inspiring newspaper comments concerning causes in which the lawyer has been or is engaged, or by inducing the manner of their conduct, the magnitude of the interests involved, the importance of the lawyer's positions, and all other like self-laudation, defy the traditions and lower the tone of our high calling, and are intolerable.

28. Stirring Up Litigation, Directly or Through Agents.

It is unprofessional for a lawyer to volunteer advice to bring a lawsuit, except in rare cases where ties of blood, relationship or trust make it his duty to do so. Stirring up strife and litigation is not only unprofessional, but it is indictable at common law. It is disreputable to hunt up defects in titles or other causes of action and inform thereof in order to be employed to bring suit, or to breed litigation by seeking out those with claims for personal injuries or those having any other grounds of action in order to secure them as clients, or to employ agents or runners for like purposes, or to pay or reward, directly or indirectly, those who bring or influence the bringing of such cases to his office, or to remunerate policemen, court or prison officials, physicians, hospital attendants or others who may succeed, under the guise of giving disinterested friendly advice, in inducing the criminal, the sick and the injured, the ignorant or others, to seek his professional services. A duty to the public and to the profession devolves upon every member of the Bar, having knowledge of such practices upon the part of any practitioner, immediately to inform thereof to the end that the offender may be disbarred.

29. Upholding the Honor of the Profession.

Lawyers should expose without fear or favor before the proper tribunals corrupt or dishonest conduct in the profession, and should accept without hesitation employment against a member of the Bar who has wronged his client. The counsel upon the trial of a cause in which perjury has been committed owe it to the profession and to the public to bring the matter to the knowledge of the prosecuting authorities. The lawyer should aid in guarding the Bar against the admission to the profession of candidates unfit or unqualified because of their immoral character or education. He should strive at all times to uphold the honor and to maintain the dignity of the profession and to improve not only the law but the administration of justice.

30. Justifiable and Unjustifiable Litigations.

The lawyer must decline to conduct a civil cause or to make a defense when convinced that it is intended merely to harass or to injure the opposite party or to work oppression or wrong. But otherwise it is his right, and, having accepted retainer, it becomes his duty to insist upon the judgment of the Court as to the legal merits of his client's claim. His appearance in Court should be deemed equivalent to an assertion on his honor that in his opinion his client's case is one proper for judicial determination.

31. Responsibility for Litigation.

No lawyer is obliged to act either as adviser or advocate for every person who may wish to employ him. He has the right to decline employment. Every lawyer upon his own responsibility must decide what business he will accept as counsel, what cases he will bring into Court for plaintiffs, what cases he will contest in Court for defendants. The responsibility for advising as to questionable transactions, for bringing questionable suits or urging questionable defenses, is the lawyer's responsibility. He cannot escape it by urging as an excuse that he is only following his client's instructions.

32. The Lawyer's Duty in Its Last Analysis.

No client, corporate or individual, however powerful, nor any cause, civil or political, however important, is entitled to receive nor should any lawyer render any service or advice involving disloyalty to the law whose ministers we are, or disrespect of the judicial office, which we are bound to uphold, or corruption of any person or persons exercising a public office or private trust, or deception or betrayal of the public. When rendering any such improper service or advice, the lawyer invites and merits stern and just condemnation. Correspondingly he advances the honor of his profession, the best interest of his client, when he renders service or gives advice tending to improve upon the client and his undertaking exact compliance with the strictest principles of moral law. He must also observe and advise his client to observe the statute law, though until a statute shall have been construed and interpreted by competent adjudication, he is free and is entitled to advise as to its validity and as to what he conscientiously believes to be its true meaning and extent. But above all a lawyer will find his highest honor in a deserved reputation for fidelity to private trust and to public duty, as an honest man and as a patriotic and loyal citizen.

Oath of Admission.

The general principles which should ever control the lawyer in the practice of his profession are clearly set forth in the following Oath of Admission to the Bar, formulated upon that in use in the State of Washington, and which conforms in its main outlines to the "duties" of lawyers as defined by statutory enactments in that and many other States of the Union—the duties which they are sworn on admission to obey and for the wilful violation of which disbarment is provided:

I DO SOLEMNLY SWEAR:

I will support the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the State of . . . . .

I will maintain the respect due to Courts of Justice and judicial officers:

I will not counsel or maintain any suit or proceeding which shall appear to me to be unjust, nor any defense except such as I believe to be honestly debatable under the law of the land.

I will not employ for the purpose of maintaining the cause confided to me such means only as are consistent with truth and honor, and will never seek to mislead the Judge or jury by any artifice or false statement of fact or law.

I will maintain the confidence and preserve inviolate the secrets of my client, and will accept no compensation in connection with his business except from him or with his knowledge and approval.

I will abstain from all offensive personality, and advance no fact prejudicial to the honor or reputation of a party or witness, unless required by the justice of the cause with which I am charged;

I will never reject, for any consideration personal to myself, the cause of the defenseless or oppressed, or delay any man's cause for lucre or malice. SO HELP ME GOD.

We commend this form of oath for adoption by the proper authorities in all the States and Territories.

*Alabama, California, Georgia, Idaho, Indiana, Iowa, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Washington and Wisconsin. The oaths administered on admission to the Bar in all the other States require the observance of the highest moral principle in the practice of the profession, but the duties of the lawyer are not as specifically defined by law in the States named.

[The foregoing foot-note was appended to the above form of Oath as published at the time of the adoption of the Canons of Professional Ethics in 1908. It does not indicate any subsequent changes of form or requirement of Oath by later State legislation.]

Canons of Judicial Ethics: (Adopted by the American Bar Association at its Forty-Seventh Annual Meeting at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on July 9, 1924.)

[The committee of the American Bar Association, which prepared the Canons, was appointed in 1922 and composed of the following: William E. Taft, District of Columbia, Chairman; Leslie C. Cornish, Maine; Robert von Moeckliaker, Pennsylvania; Charles A. Boston, New York, and Garret W. McEnery, California. George Sutherland, of Utah, originally a member of the Committee, retired and was succeeded by Mr. McEnery. In 1923, Frank M. Angellotti, of California, took the place of Mr. McEnery.]

Ancient Precedents.

"And I charged your Judges at that time, saying: Hear the causes between your brethren, and judge righteously between every man and his brother, and the stranger that is with him.

"Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; but ye shall hear the small as well as the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man; for the judgment is God's; and the cause that is too hard for you, ye shall unto me. I will hear it."—Deuteronomy, I, 16-17.

"Thou shalt not wrest judgment; thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift; for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous."—Deuteronomy, XVI, 19.

"Ye shall not make any partiality, justices, sheriffs or bailiffs, but from those who understand the law of the realm and are well disposed to observe it."—Magna Charta, XLV.

"Judges ought to remember that their office is ius dicere not ius dare; to interpret law, and not to make law, or give law."

"Judges ought to be more learned than witty; more reverend than plausible; and more advised than confident. Above all things, integrity is their portion and proper virtue."

"Patience and gravity of hearing is an essential part of justice, and an over speaking judge is no well-tuned cymbal. It is no grace to a judge first to find that which he might have heard in due time from the Bar, or to show quickness of conceit in cutting off evidence or counsel too short; or to prevent information by questions though pertinent."

"The place of justice is a hallowed place; and therefore not only the Bench, but the foot pace and precincts and purview thereof ought to be preserved without scandal and corruption." . . . Bacon's Essays on Judicature.

Preamble.

In addition to the Canons for Professional Conduct of Lawyers which it has formulated and adopted, the American Bar Association, mindful that the character and conduct of a judge should never be objects of indifference, and that declared ethical standards tend to become habits of life, deems it desirable to set forth its views respecting those principles which should govern the personal practice of members of the judiciary in the administration of their office. The Association accordingly adopts the following Canons, the spirit of which it suggests as a proper guide and reminder for judges, and as indicating what the people have a right to expect from them.

1. Relations of the Judiciary.

The assumption of the office of judge casts upon the incumbent duties in respect to his personal conduct which concern his relation to the state and its inhabitants, the litigants before him, the principles of law, the practitioners of law in his court, and the witnesses, jurors and attendants who aid him in the administration of its functions.

2. The Public Interest.

Courts exist to promote justice, and thus to serve the public interest. Their administration should be speedy and careful. Every judge should at all times be alert in his rulings and in the conduct of the business of the court, so far as he can, to make it useful to litigants and to the community. He should avoid unconsciously falling into the attitude of mind that the litigants are made for the courts instead of the courts for the litigants.

3. Constitutional Obligations.

It is the duty of all judges in the United States to support the federal Constitution and that of the state whose laws they administer; in so doing, they should fearlessly observe and apply fundamental limitations and guarantees.

4. Avoidance of Impropriety.

A judge's official conduct should be free from impropriety and the appearance of impropriety; he should avoid infractions of law; and his personal behavior, not only upon the Bench and in the performance of judicial duties, but also in his every day life, should be beyond reproach.

5. Essential Conduct.

He should be temperate, attentive, patient, impartial, and, since he is to administer the law and apply it to the facts, he should be studious of the principles of the law and diligent in endeavoring to ascertain the facts.

6. Industry.

He should exhibit an industry and application commensurate with the duties imposed upon him.

7. Promptness.

He should be prompt in the performance of his judicial duties, recognizing that the time of litigants, jurors and attorneys is of value and that habitual lack of punctuality on his part justifies dissatisfaction with the administration of the business of the court.

8. Court Organization.

He should organize the court with a view to the prompt and convenient dispatch of its business and he should not tolerate abuses and neglect by clerks, and other assistants who are sometimes prone to presume too much upon his good natured acquiescence by reason of friendly association with him.

It is desirable too, where the judicial system permits, that he should cooperate with other judges of the same court, and in other courts, as members of a single judicial system, to promote the more satisfactory administration of justice.

9. Consideration for Jurors and Others.

He should be considerate of jurors, witnesses and others in attendance upon the court.

10. Courtesy and Civility.

He should be courteous to counsel, especially to those who are young and inexperienced, and also to all others appearing or concerned in the administration of justice in the court.

He should also require, and, so far as his power extends, enforce on the part of the clerks, court officers and counsel civility and courtesy to the court and to jurors, witnesses, litigants and others having business in the court.

11. Unprofessional Conduct of Attorneys and Counsel.

He should utilize his opportunities to criticize and correct unprofessional conduct of attorneys and counselors, brought to his attention; and, if adverse comment is not a sufficient corrective, should send the matter at once to the proper investigating and disciplinary authorities.

12. Appointees of the Judiciary and Their Compensation.

Trustees, receivers, masters, referees, guardians and other persons appointed by a judge to aid in the administration of justice should have the strictest probity and impartiality and should be selected with a view solely to their character and fitness. The power of making such appointments should not be exercised by him for personal or partisan advantage. He should not permit his appointments to be controlled by others than himself. He should also avoid nepotism and undue favoritism in his appointments.

While not hesitating to fix or approve just amounts, he should be most scrupulous in granting or approving compensation for the services or charges of such appointees to avoid excessive allowances, whether or not excepted to or complained of. He cannot rid himself of this responsibility by the consent of counsel.

13. Kinship or Influence.

He should not act in a controversy where a near relative is a party; he should not suffer his conduct to justify the impression that any person can improperly influence him or unduly enjoy his favor, or that he is affected by the kinship, rank, position or influence of any party or other person.

14. Independence.

He should not be swayed by partisan demands, public clamor or considerations of personal popularity or notoriety, nor be apprehensive of unjust criticism.

15. Interference in Conduct of Trial.

He may properly intervene in a trial of a case to promote expedition and prevent unnecessary waste of time, or to clear up some obscurity, but he should bear in mind that his undue interference, impatience, or participation in the examination of witnesses, or a severe attitude on his part toward witnesses, especially those who are excited or terrified by the unusual circumstances of a trial, may tend to prevent the proper presentation of the case, or the ascertainment of the truth in respect thereto.

Conversation between the judge and counsel in court is often necessary, but the judge should be studious to avoid controversies which are apt to obscure the merits of the dispute between litigants and lead to his unjust disposition. In addressing counsel, litigants, or witnesses, he should avoid a controversial manner or tone.

He should avoid objections of counsel in their arguments except to clarify his mind as to their positions, and he should not be tempted to the unnecessary display of learning or a premature judgment.

16. Ex parte Applications.

He should discourage ex parte hearings of applications for injunctions and receiverships where the order may work detriment to absent parties; he should act upon such ex parte applications only where the necessity for quick action is clearly shown; if this be demonstrated, then he should endeavor to counteract the effect of the absence of opposing counsel by a scrupulous cross-examination and investigation as to the facts and the principles of law on which the application is based, granting relief only when fully satisfied that the law permits it and the emergency demands it. He should remember that an injunction is a limitation on the freedom of action of defendants and should not be granted lightly or inadvisedly. One applying for such relief must sustain the burden of showing clearly its necessity and this burden is increased in the absence of the party whose freedom of action is sought to be restrained even though only temporarily.

17. Ex parte Communications.

He should not permit private interviews, arguments or communications designed to influence his judicial action, where interests to be affected thereby are not represented before him, except in cases where provision is made by law for ex parte application.

While the conditions under which briefs of argument are to be received are largely matters of local rule or practice, he should not permit the contents of such briefs presented to him to be concealed from opposing counsel. Ordinarily all communications of counsel to the judge intended or calculated to influence action should be made known to opposing counsel.

18. Continuances.

Delay in the administration of justice is a common cause of complaint; counsel are frequently responsible for this delay. A judge, without being arbitrary or forcing cases unreasonably or unjustly to trial when unprepared, to the detriment of parties, may well endeavor to hold counsel to a proper appreciation of their duties to the public interest, to their own clients, and to the adverse party and his counsel, so as to enforce due diligence in the dispatch of business before the court.

19. Judicial Opinions.

In disposing of controverted cases, a judge should indicate the reasons for his action in an opinion showing that he has not disregarded or overlooked serious arguments of counsel. He should show his full understanding of the case, avoid the suspicion of arbitrary conclusion, promote confidence in his intellectual integrity and may contribute useful precedent to the growth of the law.

It is desirable that Courts of Appeal in reversing cases and granting new trials should so indicate their views on questions of law argued before them and necessarily arising in the controversy that upon the new trial counsel may be aided to avoid the repetition of erroneous positions or errors and shall not be left in doubt by the failure of the court to decide such questions.

But the volume of reported decisions is such and is so rapidly increasing that in writing opinions which are to be published the judge must take this fact into consideration, and curtail them accordingly, without substantially departing from the principles stated above.

It is of high importance that judges constituting a court of last resort should use prompt and self-restraint to promote solidarity of conclusion and the consequent influence of judicial decision. A judge should not yield to pride of opinion or value more highly his individual reputation than that of the court to which he should be loyal. Except in case of conscientious difference of opinion on fundamental principle, dissenting opinions should be discouraged in courts of last resort.

20. Influence of Decisions Upon the Development of the Law.

A judge should be mindful that his duty is the application of general law to particular instances, that ours is a government of law and not of men, and that he violates his duty as a minister of justice under such a system if he seeks to do what he may personally consider substantial justice in a particular case and disregards the general law as he knows it to be binding on him. Such action may become a precedent unsettling accepted principles and may have detrimental consequences beyond the immediate controversy. He should administer his office with a due regard to the integrity of the system of the law itself, remembering that he is not a depository of arbitrary power, but a judge under the sanction of law.

21. Idiosyncrasies and Inconsistencies.

Justice should not be moulded by the individual idiosyncrasies of those who administer it. A judge should adopt the usual and expected method of doing justice, and not seek to be extreme or peculiar in his judgments, or spectacular or sensational in the conduct of the court. Though vested with discretion in the imposition of mild or severe sentences he should not compel persons brought before him to submit to some humiliating act or discipline of his own devising without authority of law, because he thinks it will have a beneficial corrective influence.

In imposing sentence he should endeavor to conform to a reasonable standard of punishment and should not seek popularity or publicity either by exceptional severity or undue leniency.

22. Review.

In order that a litigant may secure the full benefit of the right of review accorded to him by law, a trial judge should scrupulously grant to the defeated party opportunity to present the questions arising upon the trial exactly as they arose, not pre-empted, and decided, by full and fair bill of exceptions or otherwise; any failure in this regard on the part of the judge is peculiarly worthy of condemnation because the wrong done may be irremediable.

23. Legislation.

A judge has exceptional opportunity to observe the operation of statutes, especially those relating to practice, and to ascertain whether they tend to impede the just disposition of controversies; and he may well contribute to the public interest by advising those having authority to remedy defects in the procedure, of the result of his observation and experience.

24. Inconsistent Obligations.

He should not accept inconsistent duties; nor incur obligations, pecuniary or otherwise, which will in any way interfere or appear to interfere with his devotion to the expeditious and proper administration of his official functions.

25. Business Promotions and Solicitations for Charity.

He should avoid giving ground for any reasonable suspicion that he is utilizing the power or prestige of his office to persuade or coerce others to patronize or contribute, either to the success of private business ventures, or to charitable enterprises. He should, therefore, not enter into such private business, or pursue such a course of conduct, as would justify such suspicion, nor use the power of his office or the influence of his name to promote the business interests of others; he should not solicit for charities, nor should he enter into any business relation which, in the normal course of events reasonably to be expected, might bring his personal interest into conflict with the impartial performance of his official duties.

26. Personal Investments and Relations.

He should abstain from making personal investments in enterprises which are apt to be involved in litigation in the court; and, after his accession to the Bench, he should not retain such investments previously made, longer than a period sufficient to enable him to dispose of them without serious loss. It is desirable that he should, so far as reasonably possible, refrain from all relations which would normally tend to arouse the suspicion that such relations warp or bias his judgment, or prevent his impartial attitude of mind in the administration of his judicial duties. He should not utilize information coming to him in a judicial capacity, for purposes of speculation; and it detracts from the public confidence in his integrity and the soundness of his judgment if he is known at any time to become a speculative investor upon the hazard of a margin.

27. Executorships and Trusteeships.

While a judge is not disqualified from holding executorships or trusteeships, he should not accept or continue to hold any fiduciary or other position if the holding of it would interfere or seem to interfere with the proper performance of his judicial duties, or if the business interests of those represented require investments in enterprises that are apt to come before him judicially, or to be involved in questions of law to be determined by him.

28. Partisan Politics.

While entitled to entertain his personal views of political questions, and while not required to surrender his rights or opinions as a citizen, it is inevitable that suspicion of being warped by political bias will attach to a judge who becomes the active promoter of the interests of one political party as against another. He should avoid making political speeches, making or soliciting payment of assessments or contributions to party funds, the public endorsement of candidates for political office and participation in party conventions.

29. Self-Interest.

He should abstain from performing or taking part in any judicial act in which his personal interests are involved. If he has personal litigation in the court of which he is judge, he need not resign his judgeship on that account, but he should, of course, refrain from any judicial act in such a controversy.

30. Candidacy for Office.

A candidate for judicial position should not make or suffer others to make for him, promises of conduct in office which appeal to the cupidity or prejudices of the appointing or electing power; he should not announce in advance his conclusions of law on disputed issues to secure class support, and he should do nothing while a candidate to create the impression that if chosen, he will administer his office with bias, partiality or improper discrimination.

While holding judicial office he should decline nomination to any other place which might reasonably tend to create a suspicion or criticism that the proper performance of his judicial duties is prejudiced or prevented thereby.

If a judge becomes a candidate for any office, he should refrain from all conduct which might tend to arouse reasonable suspicion that he is using the power or prestige of his judicial position to promote his candidacy or the success of his party.

He should not permit others to do anything in behalf of his candidacy which would reasonably lead to such suspicion.

31. Private Law Practice.

In many states the practice of law by one holding judicial position is forbidden. In superior courts of general jurisdiction, it should never be permitted. In inferior courts it is sometimes permitted because the county or municipality is not able to pay adequate living compensation for a competent judge. In such cases one who practices law is in a position of great delicacy and must be scrupulously careful to avoid conduct in his practice whereby he utilizes or seems to utilize his judicial position to further his professional success.

He should not practice in the court in which he is a judge, even when presided over by another judge, or appear therein for himself in any controversy.

If forbidden to practise law, he should refrain from accepting any professional employment while in office.

He may properly act as arbitrator or lecture upon or instruct in law, or write upon the subject, and accept compensation therefor, if such course does not interfere with the due performance of his judicial duties, and is not forbidden by some positive provision of law.

32. Gifts and Favors.

He should not accept any presents or favors from litigants, or from witnesses, before him or from others whose interests are likely to be submitted to him for judgment.

33. Social Relations.

It is not necessary to the proper performance of judicial duty that a judge should live in retirement or seclusion; it is desirable that, so far as reasonable attention to the completion of his work will permit, he continue to mingle in social intercourse, and that he should not discontinue his interest in or appearance at meetings of members of the Bar. He should, however, in pending or prospective litigation before him be particularly careful to avoid such action as may reasonably tend to awaken the suspicion that his social or business relationships constitute an element in influencing his judicial conduct.

34. A Summary of Judicial Obligation.

In every particular his conduct should be above reproach. He should be conscientious, studious, thorough, courteous, patient, punctual, just, impartial, fearless of public clamor, regardless of public praise, and indifferent to private political or partisan influences; he should administer justice according to law, and deal with his appointments as a public trust; he should not allow other affairs or his private interests to interfere with the prompt and proper performance of his judicial duties, nor should he administer the office for the purpose of increasing his personal ambitions or increasing his popularity.

EUGENICS. The science and art of improving the human race by applying the ascertained laws of inheritance of characteristics to the selection of marriage mates, with the aim of securing to the offspring a desirable combination of traits, including resistance to untoward conditions; term first used by Sir Francis Galton in 1883. Stand. Dict. Negative eugenics is the science and art of preventing the procreation of weak and defective persons. Id.

EUGENICS LAWS. Laws, the purpose of which is to restrict marriage only to those physically and morally fit to enter into the relation and beget offspring free from physical and moral taint. Keezer, Mar. & Div. 2nd ed., p. 99. An example of a eugenic law is that of Wisconsin which requires all male applicants for marriage licenses to submit to a medical examination to determine whether such persons are free from acquired venereal diseases and making it a condition to the issuance of a license that the applicant present to the licensing officer a certificate showing such freedom from such venereal disease. The law was upheld as within the police power of the state and as not infringing any constitutional right of persons desiring to enter into the matrimonial relation. Id.; 157 Wis. 641.

EUNDO MORANDO ET RED-UNDO (Lat.). This Latin phrase signifies going, remaining, and returning. It is employed in cases where a person is privileged from arrest, in order to give him the freedom necessary to the performance of his respective obligations, to signify that he is protected from arrest eundo, morando et redeundo.

EUNOMY. Equal laws and a well-adjusted constitution of government.

EUNUCH (Lat. eunuchus from the Gr. eunoyos, one who had charge of the sleeping apartments). A man whose organs of generation have been so far removed or disorganized that he is rendered incapable of reproducing his species. Domat, liv. prel. tit. 2, s. 1, n. 10.

EVASION (Lat. evadere, to avoid). A subtle device to set aside the truth or escape the punishment of the law: as, if a man should tempt another to strike him first, in order that he might have an opportunity of returning the blow with impunity. He is, nevertheless, punishable, because he becomes himself the aggressor in such a case. Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 81, §§ 24, 25; Bac. Abr. Fraud, A.

EVENT. The consequences of anything, the issue, conclusion, end; that in which an action, operation, or series of operations, terminates. 11 Barb. 473.

EVERY. Originally, "everich"—ever each; each one of all. Anderson.

Includes all the separate individuals which constitute the whole, regarded one by one; as, in the expression, "every person not having a license shall be liable to a fine." Id.; 19 S. C. 221.

In a statute "every railroad" may mean all railroads. Id.; 81 Va. 367. See ALL.

EVICTIION. Deprivation of the possession of lands or tenements.

Originally and technically, the dispossession must be by judgment of law; if otherwise, it was an ouster; 2 Wend. 568, note; 7 id. 285; but the necessity of legal process was long ago abandoned in England; 4 Term 617; and in this country also it is settled that there need not be legal process; 4 Hill 645; 8 Dev. 200; 54 Miss. 450. The word is difficult to define with technical accuracy; 17 C. B. 30; but it may be fairly stated that any actual entry and dispossession, adversely and lawfully made under paramount title, will be an eviction; Rawle, Cov. § 133.

Total eviction takes place when the possessor is wholly deprived of his rights in the premises. Partial eviction takes place when the possessor is deprived of only a portion of them; as, if a third person comes in and ejects him from the possession of half his land, or establishes a right to some easement over it, by a title which is prior to that under which he holds.

With respect to the demised premises, an eviction consists in taking from a tenant some part of the premises of which he was in possession, not in refusing to put him in possession of something which by the agreement with his landlord he should have enjoyed; 12 Wend. 529. And in order to effect a suspension of rent there must be something equivalent to an expulsion from the premises, and not a mere trespass, or disturbance in the enjoyment of them; 4 Wend. 503; 5 Sandf. 542; T. Jones 148; 1 Yerg. 379; 120 Mass. 284. The entry of a landlord upon demised premises for the purpose of rebuilding does not operate as an eviction, where it was with the tenant's assent and not to his entire seclusion; 151 Pa. 101.

It is not necessary, however, in order to produce the eviction of a tenant, that there should be an actual physical expulsion; for a landlord may do many acts tending to diminish the enjoyment of the premises, short of an expulsion, which will amount to an eviction in law: as, if he erect a nuisance so near the demised premises as to deprive the tenant of the use of them, or if he otherwise intentionally disturb the tenant's enjoyment to such an extent as to injure his business or destroy the comfort of himself and family, it will amount to an eviction; 8 Cow. 727; 2 Fred. 350; Woodf. Landl. & T. 1096; 53 N. W. Rep. (S. Dak.) 583; 16 N. Y. Sup. 163; 44 Mo. App. 279; 91 Pa. 333; 106 Mass. 201; 49 Vt. 109.

In New York it is said that eviction from the whole premises leased relieves the tenant from the payment of rent; but when the eviction is from a part only, the rent will be apportioned; 46 N. Y. 370. When the landlord's wrongful act interferes more or less with the beneficial enjoyment of the premises, but leaves them intact, the act is merely a trespass, though the tenant suffer injury by it; ibid.

Where the landlord, instead of resorting to the means provided by law, takes upon himself without authority to remove the property of his tenant and turn him out, he will be liable in damages, though it were effected without personal violence in the tenant's absence; 44 La. Ann. 514.

Constructive eviction may arise from any wrongful act of the lessor which deprives the tenant of the full enjoyment of the leased premises: as, by forbidding an under-tenant to pay rent to the tenant; 25 Ill. 587; building a fence in front of the premises to cut off the tenant's access thereto; 9 Allen 421; erecting a permanent structure which renders unfit for use two rooms; 106 Mass. 201; refusal to do an act indispensably necessary to enable the tenant to carry on the business for which the premises were leased: as, when premises were let for a grog-shop, the landlord refused to sign the necessary documents required by statute to enable the tenant to obtain a license; 42 Md. 236; also where lessor tears down an adjoining building, making it evident that lessee's building would fall; 142 N. Y. 263. And when a landlord, who owned another building adjoining that occupied by a tenant, the two being constructed together, tore the former down, rendering the latter unsafe for occupancy, and then procured its condemnation and destruction by the city authorities, these acts constituted an eviction, for which the tenant might recover damages; and the landlord could not avail himself of the action of the city authorities as a defence; 68 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 406.

But a mere failure of the landlord to make repairs, although such act may cause the place to be untenable, will not amount to an eviction; 23 La. Ann. 59; 35 N. Y. Super. Ct. 412; 72 Pa. 285. See 49 Vt. 109. But the doctrine of constructive eviction amounts only to a right to abandon the premises; it is not a defence against an action for rent when the tenant waives the eviction and remains in possession; 20 N. Y. 281.

The remedy for an eviction depends chiefly upon the covenants in the deed under which the party held. When the grantee suffers a total eviction, if he has a covenant of seisin or for quiet enjoyment, he recovers from the grantor the consideration-money which he paid for the land, with interest, and not the enhanced value of the premises, whether such value has been created by the expenditure of money in improvements thereon, or by any other more general cause; 14 Wend. 38; 2 Mass. 432. And this seems to be the general rule in the United States; 13 Johns. 50; 4 Dall. 441; Cooke 447; 1 Hen. & M. 202; 4 Halst. 139; 2 Bibb 272.

With respect to a lessee, however, who pays no purchase-money, the rule of damages upon an eviction is different; for he recovers nothing, except such expenses as he has been put to in defending his possession; and as to any improvements he may have made upon the premises, he stands upon the same general footing with a purchaser. The rents reserved in a lease, where no other consideration is paid, are regarded as a just equivalent for the use of the demised premises. Upon an eviction the rent ceases, and the lessee is thereby relieved from a burden which must be deemed equal to the benefit he would have derived from the continued enjoyment of the property; 2 Hill 103; 1 App. D. C. 447; 44 Mo. 164; 49 Vt. 109; 69 Pa. 420; 25 Ill. 587. And see 1 Duer, N. Y. 343; Tayl. Landl. & T. § 817; 147 Ill. 634; 3 Ind. App. 64. It is no defence, however, to an action for rent which was due at the time of the eviction; 8 Misc. Rep. 307.

When the eviction is only partial, the damages to be recovered under the covenant of seisin are a ratable part of the original price, and they are to bear the same ratio to the whole consideration that the value of the land to which the title has failed bears to the value of the whole tract. The contract is not rescinded, so as to entitle the vendee to the whole consideration-money, but only to the amount of the relative value of the part lost; 5 Johns. 19; 12 id. 126; 4 Kent 462. See 6 Bac. Abr. 44; 1 Saund. 204, 323 a; 117 Mass. 262; 22 Gratt. 109; 43 N. J. L. 430. 71 Fed. Rep. 226. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Eviction by Paramount Title. "Eviction by paramount title" is not constituted by the entry of one claiming under a title which is conceived by the vendee to be paramount. 163 Ky. 618, 174 S. W. 505.

EVIDENCE. That which tends to prove or disprove any matter in question, or to influence the belief respecting it. Belief is produced by the consideration of something presented to the mind. The matter thus presented, in whatever shape it may come, and through whatever material organ it is derived, is evidence. Prof. Parker, Lectures on Medical Jurisprudence, in Dartmouth College.

The word evidence, in legal acceptance, includes all the means by which any alleged matter of fact, the truth of which is submitted to investigation, is established or disproved. 1 Greenl. Ev. c. I. § 1; Will, Cir. Ev. 1. Testimony is not synonymous with evidence; 17 Ind. 272; the latter is the more comprehensive term; Whart. Cr. L. § 733; and includes all that may be submitted to the jury whether it be the statement of witnesses, or the contents of papers, documents, or records, or the inspection of whatever the jury may be permitted to examine and consider during the trial; Will, Cir. Ev. 2; 48 Ill. App. 230.

The means sanctioned by law of ascertaining in a judicial proceeding the truth respecting a question of fact. Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1823. And the law of evidence is declared to be a collection of general rules established by law:

1. For declaring what is to be taken as true without proof.
2. For declaring the presumptions of law, both disputable and conclusive.
3. For the production of legal evidence.
4. For the exclusion of what is not legal.
5. For determining in certain cases the value and effect of evidence. Id. § 1825.

"The rules of evidence," says a late discriminating writer, "are the maxims which the sagacity and experience of ages have established, as the best means of discriminating truth from error, and of contracting as far as possible the dangerous power of judicial discretion." Will, Cir. Ev. 2.

That which is legally submitted to a jury, to enable them to decide upon the questions in dispute, or issue, as pointed out by the pleadings, and distinguished from all comment and argument, is termed evidence. 1 Stark. Ev. pt. 1, § 3.

Evidence may be considered with reference to its instruments, its nature, its legal character, its effect, its object, and the modes of its introduction.

The instruments of evidence, in the legal acceptance of the term, are:—

1. Judicial notice or recognition. There are divers things of which courts take judicial notice, without the introduction of proof by the parties: such as the territorial extent of their jurisdiction, local divisions of their own countries, seats of courts, all public matters directly concerning the general government, the ordinary course of nature, divisions of time, the meanings of words, and, generally, of whatever ought to be generally known in the jurisdiction. If the judge needs information on subjects, he will seek it from such sources as he deems authentic. See 1 Greenl. Ev. c. 2; Steph. Ev. art. 58; Tayl. Ev. 3; JUDICIAL NOTICE.

2. Public records; the registers of official transactions made by officers appointed for the purpose; as, the public statutes, the judgments and proceedings of courts, etc.

3. Judicial writings; such as inquiries, depositions, etc.

4. Public documents having a semi-official character: as, the statute-books published under the authority of the government, documents printed by the authority of congress, etc.

5. Private writings; as, deeds, contracts, wills.

6. Testimony of witnesses.

7. Personal inspection, by the jury or tribunal whose duty it is to determine the matter in controversy: as, a view of the locality by the jury, to enable them to determine the disputed fact, or the better to understand the testimony, or inspection of any machine or weapon which is produced in the cause.

Real evidence is evidence of the thing or object which is produced in court. When, for instance, the condition or appearance of any thing or object is material to the issue, and the thing or object itself is produced in court for the inspection of the tribunal, with proper testimony as to its identity, and, if necessary, to show that it has existed since the time at which the issue in question arose, this object or thing becomes itself "real evidence" of its condition or appearance at the time in question. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 18 a, note. For a full discussion of this species of evidence, see 50 N. J. L. 491. There are rules prescribing the limits and regulating the use of these different instruments of evidence, appropriate to each class.

In its nature, evidence is direct, or presumptive, or circumstantial.

Direct evidence is that means of proof which tends to show the existence of a fact in question, without the intervention of the proof of any other fact.

It is that evidence which, if believed, establishes the truth of a fact in issue, and does not arise from any presumption. Evidence is direct and positive when the very facts in dispute are sworn to by those who have the actual knowledge of them by means of their senses. 1 Phill. Ev. 116; 1 Stark. Ev. 19; Tayl. Ev. 84. In one sense, there is but little direct or positive proof, or such proof as is acquired by means of one's own sense; all other evidence is presumptive; but, in common acceptance, direct and positive evidence is that which is communicated by one who has actual knowledge of the fact.

Presumptive evidence is that which shows the existence of one fact, by proof of the existence of another or others, from which the first may be inferred; because the fact or facts shown have a legitimate tendency to lead the mind to the conclusion that the fact exists which is sought to be proved.

Presumptive evidence has been divided into presumptions of law and presumptions of fact.

Presumptions of law, adopted from motives of public policy, are those which arise in certain cases by force of the rules of law, directing an inference to be drawn from proof of the existence of a particular fact or facts. They may be conclusive or inconclusive.

Conclusive presumptions are those which admit of no averment or proof to the contrary. Thus, the records of a court, except in some proceeding to amend them, are conclusive evidence of the matter there recorded, being presumed to be rightly made up.

Inconclusive or disputable presumptions of law are those where a fact is presumed to exist, either from the general experience of mankind, or from policy, or from proof of the existence of certain other facts, until something is offered to show the contrary. Thus, the law presumes a man to be sane until the contrary appears, and to be innocent of the commission of a crime until he is proved to be guilty. So, the existence of a person, or of a particular state of things, being shown, the law presumes the person or state of things to continue until something is offered to conflict with the presumption. See Best, Presumption, ch. ii.

But the presumption of life may be rebutted by another presumption. Where a party has been absent from his place of residence for the term of seven years, without having been heard of, this raises a presumption of his death, until it is encountered by some evidence showing that he is actually alive, or was so within that period.

Presumptions of fact are not the subject of fixed rules, but are merely natural presumptions, such as appear, from common experience, to arise from the particular circumstances of any case. Some of these are "founded upon a knowledge of the human character, and of the motives, passions, and feelings by which the mind is usually influenced." 1 Stark. Ev. 27.

They may be said to be the conclusions drawn by the mind from the natural connection of the circumstances disclosed in each case, or, in other words, from circumstantial evidence.

Circumstantial evidence is sometimes used as synonymous with presumptive evidence, but not with strict accuracy; for presumptive evidence is not necessarily and in all cases what is usually understood by circumstantial evidence. The latter is that evidence which tends to prove a disputed fact by proof of other facts which have a legitimate tendency, from the laws of nature, the usual connection of things, and the ordinary transactions of business, etc., to lead the mind to a conclusion that the fact exists which is sought to be established. See 1 Stark. Ev. 478; Whart. Ev. 1, 2, 15.

The latest writer on this subject thus states the distinction: the word presumption, ex vi termini, imports an inference from facts known, based upon previous experience of the ordinary connection between the two, and, the word itself implies a certain relation between fact and inference. Circumstances, however, generally but not necessarily lead to particular inferences; for the facts may be indisputable, and yet their relation to the principal fact may be only apparent, not real; and even where the connection is real, the deduction may be erroneous. Circumstantial and presumptive evidence differ therefore as genus and species. Will, Cir. Ev. 17.

Presumptive evidence may sometimes be the result, to some extent, of any arbitrary rule—as in the case of the presumption of death after an absence of seven years without being heard of—derived by analogy from certain statutes.

The judge and the jury draw conclusions from circumstantial evidence, and find one fact from the existence of other facts shown to them,—some of the presumptions being so clear and certain that they have become fixed as rules of law, and others having greater or less weight according to the circumstances of the case, leaving the matter of fact inquired about in doubt until the proper tribunal to determine the question draws the conclusion.

In its legal character, evidence is primary or secondary, and prima facie or conclusive.

Primary evidence is the best evidence, or that proof which most certainly exhibits the true state of facts to which it relates. The law requires this, and rejects secondary or inferior evidence when it is attempted to be substituted for evidence of a higher or superior nature. For example, when a written contract has been entered into, and the object is to prove what it was, it is requisite to produce the original writing, if it is to be attained; and in that case no copy or other inferior evidence will be received.

This is a rule of policy, grounded upon a reasonable suspicion that the substitution of inferior for better evidence arises from sinister motives, and an apprehension that the best evidence, if produced, would alter the case to the prejudice of the party. This rule, relates not to the measure and quantity of evidence, but to its quality when compared with some other evidence of superior degree.

To this general rule there are several exceptions. 1. As it refers to the quality rather than to the quantity of evidence, it is evident that the fullest proof that every case admits of is not requisite: if, therefore, there are several eye-witnesses to a fact, it may be sufficiently proved by one only. 2. It is not always requisite, when the matter to be proved has been reduced to writing, that the writing should be produced: as, if the narrative of a fact to be proved has been committed to writing, it may yet be proved by parol evidence. A receipt for the payment of money, for example, will not exclude parol evidence of payment; 4 Esp. 213. And see 8 B. & Ald. 666; 3 Cra. 51. 1 Dak. 873; 78 N. Y. 82; 41 Minn. 169. The evidence of a father and mother, cognizant of their child's birth, is primary evidence of its date or the age of the child, although there is a written record thereof in the family Bible; 49 Kan. 237; 34 S. C. 118. 1 McCord 164; 73 Wis. 248. A stenographer's notes of the testimony of a witness are not the best evidence of such testimony, so as to prevent any other person who was present from testifying in relation thereto; 35 S. C. 537; 17 Misc. Rep. 157. Documentary evidence is not the best evidence of marriage; 72 Mich. 184. Oral admissions of a party against himself as to the contents of a writing are primary evidence; 62 Conn. 542.

Secondary evidence is that species of proof which is admissible when the primary evidence cannot be produced, and which becomes by that event the best evidence that can be adduced. 8 Yeates 530.

But before such evidence can be allowed it must be clearly made to appear that the superior evidence is not to be had; 87 Ga. 727; 91 Mich. 229. The person who possesses it must be applied to, whether he be a stranger or the opposite party: in the case of a stranger, a subpoena and attachment, when proper, must be taken out and served; and in the case of a party, notice to produce such primary evidence must be proved before the secondary evidence will be admitted; 7 S. & R. 116; 3 B. & Ald. 296; 61 Pa. 328; 149 id. 25; 72 Mich. 599; 7 Exch. 639; 94 Ala. 602. See 45 Mo. App. 497; 83 Ala. 401; 25 Neb. 57. Secondary evidence of the contents of a written contract is inadmissible in the absence of proper diligence to secure the original; 70 Tex. 745; 84 Ala. 592. After proof of the due execution of the original, the contents should be proved by a counterpart, if there be one, for this is the next best evidence; and it seems that no evidence of a copy is admissible until proof has been given that the counterpart cannot be produced; 6 Term 226. If there be no counterpart, a copy may be proved in evidence by any witness who knows that it is a copy, from having compared it with the original; Bull. N. P. 254; 6 Binn. 234; 8 Mass. 278. If regularly recorded, an office copy may be given in evidence. If there be no copy, the party may produce an abstract, or even give parol evidence of the contents of a deed; 10 Mod. 8; 6 Term 536. A transcribed telegraphic message which is actually delivered is primary evidence, and if lost or destroyed its contents may be proved by parol; 50 Minn. 424. See 118 Ind. 98; 127 Ill. 632. Letter-press copies of writings are secondary evidence; 30 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 454.

If books or papers necessary as evidence in the courts of one state be in the possession of a person living in another state, secondary evidence without further showing may be given to prove the contents of such papers, and notice to produce them is unnecessary; 20 Wall. 125. See 62 Minn. 174. Where the attesting witness to a deed lives out of the state, secondary evidence of its execution is admissible; 157 Mass. 272.

It has been decided in England that there are no degrees in secondary evidence; and when a party has laid the foundation for such evidence, he may prove the contents of a deed by parol, although it appear that an attested copy is in existence; 6 C. & P. 208; 8 id. 389; 7 M. & W. 102. It is urged on the one hand that the rule requiring the best evidence has reference to its nature, not to its strength, and the argument ab inconvenienti is invoked against the extension of the rule recognizing degrees. On the other hand it is contended that such an extension is an equitable one and rests on the same principle which forbids the introduction of any secondary evidence while the primary is available. English cases cited in favor of the recognition of degrees are said to be not so much decisions of the point as dicta, as they refer to it as a rule existing but not involved in the case; 10 Mod. 8; 2 Atk. 71; 1 Nev. & Per. 8. But in the latter case the rule is doubted, and in 6 C. & P. 359 impliedly denied by Patteson, J., as it is also by Parke, J.; 6 C. & P. 81; id. 206. See 8 Dowl. 889; 3 Scott, N. R. 577. The question is not settled in the United States; Greenl. Ev. § 84, note; and the United States Supreme Court, after saying they do not adopt the English rule, observe that the rule of exclusion or admission must be so applied as to promote the ends of justice, and guard against fraud, surprise, and imposition; 20 Wall. 226. See 3 Wash. St. 166; 68 Fed. Rep. 884. The American doctrine seems to be "that if from the nature of the case itself it is manifest that a more satisfactory kind of secondary evidence exists, the party will be required to produce it; but that when the nature of the case does not of itself disclose the existence of such better evidence, the objector must not only prove its existence, but also must prove that it was known to the other party in time to have been produced at the trial;" 1 Gr. Ev. § 84, note; 7 Tex. 315; 2 Cold. 831; 28 Ala. 250; 56 Ga. 258; 75 Ill. 815; 62 Me. 480; 20 Wall. 226; 9 Pet. 668. In an action against a stockholder for an assessment, without deciding whether the law recognizes degrees of secondary evidence, oral testimony of the contents of the notice of the call was admitted, when the existence of a copy did not appear; 63 Minn. 381. In an action for work and labor where the time-book had been burned but there was proof that plaintiff had made a copy of the entries against the defendant, the copy was held best evidence and parol proof was excluded in the absence of proof of the loss of the copy; 98 Mich. 168.

Prima facie evidence is that which appears to be sufficient proof respecting the matter in question, until something appears to controvert it, but which may be contradicted or controlled.

Conclusive evidence is that which establishes the fact: as in the instance of conclusive presumptions.

Evidence may be conclusive for some purposes but not for others.

Admissibility of evidence. In considering the legal character of evidence, we are naturally led to the rules which regulate its competency and admissibility, although it is not precisely accurate to say that evidence is in its legal character competent or incompetent; because what is incompetent for the consideration of the tribunal which is to pronounce the decision is not, strictly speaking, evidence.

But the terms incompetent evidence and inadmissible evidence are often used to designate what is not to be heard as evidence: as, witnesses are spoken of as competent or incompetent.

As the common law excludes certain classes of persons from giving testimony in particular cases, because it deems their exclusion conducive, in general, to the discovery of the truth, so it excludes certain materials and statements from being introduced as testimony in a cause, for a similar reason. Thus, as a general rule, it requires witnesses to speak to facts within their own knowledge, and excludes hearsay evidence.

Hearsay is the evidence, not of what the witness knows himself, but of what he has heard from others.

Such mere recitals or assertions cannot be received in evidence for many reasons, but principally for the following:—first, that the party making such declarations is not on oath; and, secondly, because the party against whom it operates has no opportunity of cross-examination; 1 Phil. Ev. 185. See, for other reasons, 1 Stark. Ev. pt. 1, p. 44; Tayl. Ev. 508. The general rule excluding hearsay evidence does not apply to those declarations to which the party is privy, or to admissions which he himself has made.

Many facts, from their very nature, either absolutely or usually exclude direct evidence to prove them, being such as are either necessarily or usually imperceptible by the senses, and therefore incapable of the ordinary means of proof. These are questions of pedigree or relationship, character, prescription, custom, boundary, and the like; as also questions which depend upon the exercise of particular skill and judgment. Such facts, some from their nature, and others from their antiquity, do not admit of the ordinary and direct means of proof by living witnesses: and, consequently, resort must be had to the best means of proof which the nature of the case affords. The rule permitting a resort to hearsay evidence, however, in cases of pedigree extends only to the admission of declarations by deceased persons who were related by blood or marriage to the person in question, and not to declarations by servants, friends, or neighbors; 75 Fed. Rep. 217. And "general reputation in the family," which is admissible in matters of pedigree, or to establish the facts of birth, marriage, or death, is confined to declarations of deceased members of the family, and family history and traditions handed down by declarations of deceased members, in either case made ante litem motam, and originating with persons presumed to have competent knowledge of the facts stated; and evidence of the opinion or belief of living members of a family as to the death of another member, or of general reputation among a person's living friends and acquaintances as to his death, is not within the rule, and is inadmissible; 35 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 77. See BOUNDARY; CUSTOM; PEDIGREE; PRESCRIPTION.

Admissions are the declarations which a party by himself, or those who act under his authority, make of the existence of certain facts. But where an admission is made the foundation of a claim, the whole statement must be taken together; 82 Va. 50. See 62 Conn. 542; 85 Ala. 589; ADMISSIONS.

A statement of all the distinctions between what is to be regarded as hearsay and what is to be deemed original evidence would extend this article too far. The general principle is that the mere declaration, oral or written, of a third person, as to a fact, standing alone, is inadmissible.

Res gestæ. But where evidence of an act done by a party is admissible, his declarations made at the time, having a tendency to elucidate or give a character to the act, and which may derive a degree of credit from the act itself, are also admissible, as part of the res gestæ; 9 N. H. 271; 93 U. S. 435; 118 Ind. 278; 79 Ca. 681; 112 Mo. 874; 128 Ill. 545; 95 Mich. 412; 82 Tex. 516; 18 Fed. Rep. 156; 148 Pa. 566; 21 How. St. Tr. 514; Steph. Dig. Ev. § 2, 7.

So, declarations of third persons, in the presence and hearing of a person, which tend to affect his interest, may be shown in order to introduce his answer or to show an admission by his silence, but this species of evidence must be received with great caution; 1 Greenl. Ev. 236.

Confessions of guilt in criminal cases come within the class of admissions, provided they have been voluntarily made and have not been obtained by the hope of favor or by the fear of punishment. And if made under such inducements as to exclude them, a subsequent declaration to the same effect, made after the inducement has ceased to operate, and having no connection with the hopes or fears which have existed, is admissible as evidence; 17 N. H. 171. Actions as well as verbal declarations may constitute a confession, and the same rule as to admissibility applies to both: 98 N. C. 590. There is, however, a growing unwillingness to rest convictions on confessions unless supported by corroborating circumstances, and in all cases there must be at least proof of the corpus delicti, independently of the confession; 1 Whart. Cr. Law, § 683; Cooley, Const. Lim. 385; Tayl. Ev. 744. See ADMISSIONS; CONFESSION; RES GESTÆ.

Dying declarations are an exception to the rule excluding hearsay evidence, and are admitted, under certain limitations in cases of homicide, so far as the circumstances attending the death and its cause are the subject of them. See DECLARATION; DYING DECLARATIONS.

Opinions of persons of skill and experience, called experts, are also admissible in certain cases, when, in order to the better understanding of the evidence or to the solution of the question, a certain skill and experience are required which are not ordinarily possessed by jurors. See EXPERT; OPINION.

In several instances proof of facts is excluded from public policy; as professional communications between lawyer and client, and physician and patient; secrets of state, proceedings of grand juror, and communications between husband and wife. See CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS; PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

The effect of evidence. As a general rule, a judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction directly upon a point in issue is a bar between the same parties; 1 Phill. Ev. 242; and privies in blood, as an heir; 3 Mod. 141; or privies in estate; 1 Ld. Raym. 780; Bull. N. P. 232, stand in the same situation as those they represent: the verdict and judgment may be used for or against them, and is conclusive. See RES JUDICATA; JUDGMENT.

The constitution of the United States, art. 4, s. 1, declares that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state. And congress may, by general laws, prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof." See 3 Wheat. 234; 17 Mass. 548; 8 Bibb 369; 2 Marsh. 293; 5 Day 563; 159 U. S. 113, 235; 2 Black, Judg. § 857; FOREIGN JUDGMENT.

Foreign laws must be proved as facts in the courts of this country, and mere citations to English statutes and authorities cannot be accepted as showing the English law; 50 Fed. Rep. 73. See FOREIGN LAW. For the force and effect of foreign judgments, see FOREIGN JUDGMENT.

The object of evidence is next to be considered. It is to ascertain the truth between the parties. It has been discovered by experience that this is done most certainly by the adoption of the following rules, which are now binding as law:—1. The evidence must be confined to the point in issue. 2. The substance of the issue must be proved; but only the substance is required to be proved. 3. The affirmative of the issue must be proved.

It is a general rule, both in civil and criminal cases, that the evidence shall be confined to the point in issue. Justice and convenience require the observance of this rule, particularly in criminal cases; for when a prisoner is charged with an offence it is of the utmost importance to him that the facts laid before the jury should consist exclusively of the transaction which forms the subject of the indictment, and which alone he has come prepared to answer; 2 Russ. Cr. 894; 1 Phill. Ev. 160.

To this general rule there are several exceptions, and a variety of cases which do not fall within the rule. In general, evidence of collateral facts is not admissible; but when such a fact is material to the issue joined between the parties, it may be given in evidence: as, for example, in order to prove that the acceptor of a bill knew the payee to be a fictitious person, or that the drawer had general authority from him to fill up bills with the name of a fictitious payee, evidence may be given to show that he had accepted similar bills before they could, from their date, have arrived from the place of date; 2 H. Bla. 288.

When special damage sustained by the plaintiff is not stated in the declaration, it is not one of the points in issue, and, therefore, evidence of it cannot be received; yet a damage which is a necessary result of the defendant's breach of contract may be proved notwithstanding it is not in the declaration; 11 Price 19.

In general, evidence of the character of either party to a suit is inadmissible; yet in some cases such evidence may be given. See CHARACTER.

When evidence incidentally applies to another person or thing not included in the transaction in question, and with regard to whom or to which it is inadmissible, yet if it bear upon the point in issue it will be received; 8 Bing. 370. And see 4 B. & P. 93; 9 Conn. 47; 1 Whart. Cr. Law § 649.

The acts of others, as in the case of conspirators, may be given in evidence against the prisoner, when referable to the issue; but confessions made by one of several conspirators after the offence has been completed, and when the conspirators no longer act in concert, cannot be received. See 3 Pick. 33; 2 Pet. 364; 2 Va. Cas. 269; 1 Rawle 362, 458; 2 Leigh 745; 3 Day 205; 2 B. & Ald. 573, 574; 25 Tex. App. 588; CONFESSION.

In criminal cases, when the offence is a cumulative one, consisting itself in the commission of a number of acts, evidence of those acts is not only admissible, but essential to support the charge. On an indictment against a defendant for a conspiracy to cause himself to be believed a man of large property, for the purpose of defrauding tradesmen after proof of a representation to one tradesman, evidence may thereupon be given of a representation to another tradesman at a different time; 1 Campb. 309; 2 Day 205; 1 Johns. 99.

To prove the guilty knowledge of a prisoner with regard to the transaction in question, evidence of other offences of the same kind committed by the prisoner, though not charged in the indictment, is admissible against him; as, in the case where a prisoner had passed a counterfeit dollar, evidence that he had other counterfeit dollars in his possession is evidence to prove the guilty knowledge; 2 Const. 758, 776; 1 Bail. 300; 2 Leigh 745; 1 Wheel. Cr. Cas. 415; Russ. & R. 132; 5 Rand. 701.

The substance of the issue joined between the parties must be proved; 1 Phill. Ev. 190; Tayl. Ev. 238. Under this rule will be considered the quantity of evidence required to support particular averments in the declaration or indictment.

And, first, of civil cases. 1. It is a fatal variance in a contract if it appear that a party who ought to have been joined as plaintiff has been omitted; 1 Saund. 291 A, n.; 2 Term 282; and so where a bill for specific performance alleges the execution of a contract in a certain year, and the proof shows that it was made in another; 85 Ala. 286. But it is no variance to omit a person who might have been joined as defendant; because the non-joinder ought to have been pleaded in abatement; 1 Saund. 291 d, n. 2. The consideration of the contract must be proved; but it is not necessary for the plaintiff to set out in his declaration, or prove on the trial, the several parts of a contract consisting of distinct and collateral provisions: it is sufficient to state so much of the contract as contains the entire consideration of the act, and the entire act to be done in virtue of such consideration, including the time, manner, and other circumstances of its performance; 6 East 588; 4 B. & Ald. 387.

Second. In criminal cases, it may be laid down that it is, in general, sufficient to prove what constitutes the offence. 1. It is enough to prove so much of the indictment as shows that the defendant has committed a substantive crime therein specified; 3 Campb. 585; 1 H. & J. 427. See 78 Ga. 98; 62 Mich. 297. If a man be indicted for robbery, he may be found guilty of larceny and not guilty of the robbery; 2 Hale, Pl.

Cr. 309. The offence of which the party is convicted must, however, be of the same class with that of which he is charged; 1 Leach 14; 3 Stra. 1183.

2. When the intent of the prisoner furnishes one of the ingredients in the offence, and several intents are laid in the indictment, each of which, together with the act done, constitutes an offence, it is sufficient to prove one intent only; 3 Stark. 85.

3. When a person or thing necessary to be mentioned in an indictment is described by circumstances of greater particularity than is requisite, yet those circumstances must be proved; 8 Rog. 77; 3 Day 283; 28 Tex. App. 486. For example, if a party be charged with stealing a black horse, the evidence must correspond with the averment, although it was unnecessary to make it; Rosco. Cr. Ev. 77; 4 Ohio 350; 83 Ga. 881; but see 78 Cal. 7, where an indictment charging a murder with a "bludgeon" is supported by proof that death was produced by a blow with a bolt or club; 28 Neb. 33. See 103 N. C. 384; 28 Tex. App. 109.

4. The name of the prosecutor or party injured must be proved as laid; and the rule is the same with reference to the name of a third person introduced into the indictment, as descriptive of some person or thing. See 85 Fed. Rep. 407; 10 Ky. L. Rep. 973; 40 Minn. 55.

The affirmative of the issue must be proved. The general rule with regard to the burden of proving the issue requires that the party who asserts the affirmative should prove it. But this rule ceases to operate the moment the presumption of law is thrown into the other scale. When the issue is on the legitimacy of a child, therefore, it is incumbent on the party asserting the illegitimacy to prove it; 2 Selw. N. P. 709. Or where an answer admits all the averments of the complaint, and sets up a counter-claim as a defence, the affirmative of all the issues raised by the pleadings is on the defendant; 61 Hun 624. See ONUS PROBANDI; PRESUMPTION; 2 Gall. 485; 1 McCord 573; 2 So. L. Rev. (N. S.) 126; 44 La. Ann. 1043.

Modes of proof. Records are to be proved by an exemplification, duly authenticated according to law, in all cases where the issue is not trial record. In other cases, an examined copy, duly proved, will, in general, be evidence; 2 Woods 890. Foreign laws are proved in the mode pointed out under the article FOREIGN LAW. See supra.

Private writings are proved by producing the attesting witness; or in case of his death, absence, or other legal inability to testify, as if after attesting the paper he becomes infamous, his handwriting may be proved. When there is no witness to the instrument, it may be proved by the evidence of the handwriting of the party, by a person who has seen him write, or who in a course of correspondence or business relations has become acquainted with his hand. See 3 Wash. C. C. 31; 1 Rawle 223; 4 Am. L. Rev. 625; 49 Minn. 420. As to the question whether the genuineness of a signature may be proved or disproved by comparison, or the signature to documents not a part of the case be proven for the purpose of using them as standards of comparison with the signature to the instrument sued on, see HANDWRITING.

Books of original entry, when duly proved, are prima facie evidence of goods sold and delivered, and of work and labor done. See ORIGINAL ENTRY.

A recent decision laid down some general rules in relation to the use of the ballots as evidence in an election contest, which present the law in that regard in a very terse and lucid form. It holds (1) that one who has received a certificate of election to office is not estopped in case of contest from going behind the returns from ballot boxes which were counted without objection by either party, and which formed the basis of the certificate; (2) that in an election contest, the ballots of a certain box, which had been opened before a legislative committee after the election, are admissible when it appears that the opportunity for the ballots to have been tampered with was a mere possibility; and (3) that the fact that a discrepancy exists between the returns of the votes counted from that ballot box and a recount made by the court in an election contest does not indicate that there was any alteration in the ballots after being voted, nor tend to cast suspicion thereon, when the evidence shows that, when the count was concluded by the election officers, there were discrepancies between the tally sheets of the different clerks of the election, which it was attempted to reconcile by guessing at the result, and making changes accordingly; 84 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 992. See ELECTION.

Proof by witnesses. The testimony of witnesses is called oral evidence, or that which is given in voce, as contradistinguished from that which is written or documentary. It is a general rule that oral evidence shall in no case be received as equivalent to, or as a substitute for, a written instrument, where the latter is required by law; or to give effect to a written instrument which is defective in any particular which by law is essential to its validity; or to contradict, alter, or vary a written instrument, either appointed by law, or by the contract of the parties, to be the appropriate and authentic memorial of the particular facts it recites; for by doing so, oral testimony would be admitted to usurp the place of evidence decidedly superior in degree; 1 S. & R. 27, 464; 3 Marsh. 383; 1 Bibb 271; 11 Mas 30; 3 Conn. 9; 12 Johns. 77; 1 Maule & S. 21; 45 La. Ann. 580; 67 Hun 815; 142 N. Y. 207; 150 Mass. 496; but this rule does not apply in suits between persons not parties to the writing; 8 Misc. Rep. 814; 50 Ohio St. 528; 77 N. Y. 613; 142 Mass. 76; 80 Me. 465; 1 Gr. Ev. § 279.

But parol evidence is admissible to defeat a written instrument, on the ground of fraud, mistake, etc., or to apply it to its proper subject-matter, or, in some instances, as ancillary to such application, to explain the meaning of doubtful terms, or to rebut presumptions arising extrinsically. In these cases, the parol evidence does not usurp the place, or arrogate the authority of written evidence, but either shows that the instrument ought not to be allowed to operate at all, or is essential in order to give to the instrument its legal effect; 1 Murph. 423; 1 Des. 465; 1 Bay 247; 1 Bibb 271; 11 Mass. 30. See 1 Pct. C. C. 85; 3 S. & R. 340; Pothier, Obl. pl. 4, c. 2; 15 R. I. 41; 1 Okl. 232; 65 Vt. 231; 62 Conn. 459; 6 Harv. L. Rev. 325, 417; 2 Misc. Rep. 219; 148 U. S. 581; 154 Pa. 149. Where the facts do not appear on the face of the judgment, oral evidence is admissible to show how credits thereon come to be allowed, and what they were allowed for; 75 Fed. Rep. 832. And parol evidence has been admitted to establish a contemporaneous oral agreement which induced the execution of the written contract though the effect be to alter or reform the latter; 114 Pa. 170; 116 id. 270; so when the contract was a letter "confirming our verbal contract," proof of the latter was permitted although inconsistent with the letter; 120 id. 439.

See, generally, the treatises on Evidence, of Gilbert, Philipps, Starkie, Roscoe, Swift, Bentham, Macnally, Peake, Greenleaf, Wharton, Stephen, Rice; Best on Presumption; Browne, Parol Ev.; Will, Circ. Ev. See ADMINICLE: CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE, CORROBORATING EVIDENCE, FAILURE OF FORMER TRIAL, INDICATIVE EVIDENCE, IRRELEVANT EVIDENCE, PRIMA FACIE EVIDENCE.

EVIDENCE, CIRCUMSTANTIAL. The proof of facts which usually attend other facts sought to be proved; that which is not direct evidence. For example, when a witness testifies that a man was stabbed with a knife, and that a piece of the blade was found in the wound, and it is found to fit exactly with another part of the blade found in the possession of the prisoner, the facts are directly attested, but they only prove circumstances; and hence this is called circumstantial evidence.

Circumstantial evidence is of two kinds, namely, certain and uncertain. It is certain when the conclusion in question necessarily follows: as, where a man had received a mortal wound, and it was found that the impression of a bloody left hand had been made on the left arm of the deceased, it was certain some other person than the deceased must have made such mark; 14 How. St. Tr. 1834. But it is uncertain whether the death was caused by suicide or by murder, and whether the mark of the bloody hand was made by the assassin, or by a friendly hand that came too late to the relief of the deceased. It has been contended that, in order to justify the inference of legal guilt from circumstantial evidence, the existence of the inculpatory facts must be absolutely incompatible with the innocence of the accused; Will, Cir. Ev. 800; Stark. Ev. 160; 1 Crim. L. Mag. 284; 9 Houst. 564; 85 Pa. 127; 19 Ia. 280; 58 Ind. 530; but other writers have held that the distinction between this species of evidence and that which is direct is merely one of logic, and of no practical significance; that all evidence is more or less circumstantial; all statements of witnesses, all conclusions of juries, are the results of inference; or as it was expressed by Gibson, C. J., "the difference being only in degree;" 4 Pa. 269. See 2 Sumn. 27; 4 Pa. 269; Whart. Cr. Ev. § 10; Tayl. Ev. 86. Even in its strictest sense, circumstantial evidence is legal evidence, and when it is satisfactory beyond reasonable doubt, a jury is bound to act upon it as if it were the most direct; 1 Cent. L. J. 219; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 13; 3 Rice, Ev. 544. See CIRCUMSTANCES; EVIDENCE.

EVIDENCE, CONCLUSIVE. That which, while uncontradicted, satisfies the judge and jury; it is also that which cannot be contradicted.

The record of a court of common-law jurisdiction is conclusive as to the facts therein stated; 2 Wash. Va. 64; 2 Hen. & M. 55; 6 Conn. 508. But the judgment and record of a prize-court is not conclusive evidence in the state courts, unless it had jurisdiction of the subject-matter; and whether it had or not, the state courts may decide; 1 Conn. 429. See, as to the conclusiveness of the judgments of foreign courts of admiralty, 3 Cra. 458; 4 id. 421, 484; Gilman, 16; 1 Const. 381; 1 Nott & M'C. 537. See EVIDENCE.

EVIDENCE, DIRECT. That which applies immediately to the factum probandum, without any intervening process: as, if A testifies he saw B inflict a mortal wound on C, of which he instantly died. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 18. See EVIDENCE.

EVIDENCE, EXTRINSIC. External evidence, or that which is not contained in the body of an agreement, contract, and the like.

It is a general rule that extrinsic evidence cannot be admitted to contradict, explain, vary, or change the terms of a contract or of a will, except in a latent ambiguity, or to rebut a resulting trust; 14 Johns. 1; 1 Day 8. Excepting where evidence is admissible to vary a written contract on the ground that it does not represent the actual contract between the parties. See WIGRAM, EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE; 14 L. R. A. 450; EVIDENCE.

EVIDENTIARY. Having the quality of evidence; constituting evidence; evidencing.

EVOCATION. In French Law. The act by which a judge is deprived of the cognizance of a suit over which he had jurisdiction, for the purpose of conferring on other judges the power of deciding it. It is like the process by writ of certiorari.

EWAGE. A toll paid for water-passage. Cowel. The same as aquagium.

EWBRICE. Adultery; spouse-breach; marriage-breach. Cowel; Tomlin, Law Dict.

EX AQUO ET BONO (Lat.). In justice and good dealing. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 965.

EX CONTRACTU (Lat.). From contract. A division of actions is made in the common and civil law into those arising ex contractu (from contract) and ex delicto (from wrong or tort). 3 Bla. Com. 117; 1 Chit. Pl. 2; 1 Mackelday, Civ. Law § 195.

EX DEBITO JUSTITIE (Lat.). As a debt of justice. As a matter of legal right. 8 Bla. Com. 48.

EX DELICTO (Lat.). Actions which arise in consequence of a crime, misdemeanor, or tort are said to arise ex delicto: such are actions of case, replevin, trespass, trover. 1 Chit. Pl. 2; See EX CONTRACTU; ACTIONS.

EX DOLO MALO (Lat.). Out of fraud or deceit. When a cause of action arises from fraud or deceit, it cannot be supported; ex dolo malo non oritur actio. See MAXIMS.

EX EMPTO. Out of purchase; founded on purchase. A term of the civil law, adopted by Bracton. Inst. 4, 6, 28; Bract. fol. 102; Black, L. Dict.

EX FACTO (Lat.). From, by or in consequence of an act, or thing done. Applied generally to an act done in violation of law or right. A title is said to originate ex facto, when it commences in an unlawful act.

EX GRATIA (Lat.). Of favor. Of grace. Words used formerly at the beginning of royal grants, to indicate that they were not made in consequence of any claim of legal right.

EX INDUSTRIA (Lat.). Intentionally. From fixed purpose.

EX MALEFICIO (Lat.). On account of misconduct. By virtue of or out of an illegal act. Used in the civil law generally, and sometimes in the common law. Browne, Stat. Frauds 110, n.; Broom, Leg. Max. 351.

EX MERO MOTU (Lat.). Of mere motion. The term is derived from the king's letters patent and charters, where it signifies that he grants them of his own mere motion, without petition. To prevent injustice, the courts will, ex mero motu, make rules and orders which the parties would not strictly be entitled to ask for. See EX GRATIA; EX PROPRIO MOTU.

EX MORA (Lat.). From the delay; from the default. All persons are bound to make amends for damages which arise from their own default.

EX MORE (Lat.). According to custom.

EX NECESSITATE LEGIS (Lat.). From the necessity of law.

EX NECESSITATE REI (Lat.). From the necessity of the thing. Many acts may be done ex necessitate rei which would not be justifiable without it; and sometimes property is protected ex necessitate rei which under other circumstances would not be so, or a way of necessity will be allowed; 126 Mass. 445. Property put upon the land of another from necessity cannot be distrained for rent. See DISTRESS.

EX OFFICIO (Lat.). By virtue of his office.

Many powers are granted and exercised by public officers which are not expressly delegated. A judge, for example, may be ex officio a conservator of the peace and a justice of the peace. See OFFICIO, EX, OATH OF.

EX OFFICIO OATH. See OATH, EX OFFICIO.

EX OFFICIO INFORMATION. In English Law. A criminal information filed by the attorney-general ex officio on behalf of the crown, in the court of queen's bench, for offences more immediately affecting the government, and to be distinguished from informations in which the crown is the nominal prosecutor. Moz. & W. L. Dict.; 4 Steph. Com. 372.

EX PARTE (Lat.). Of the one part. Many things may be done ex parte, when the opposite party has had notice. An affidavit or deposition is said to be taken ex parte when only one of the parties attends to taking the same. An injunction is granted ex parte when but one side has had a hearing. "Ex parte," in the heading of a reported case, signifies that the name following is that of the party upon whose application the case is heard. The term ex parte implies an examination in the presence of one of the parties and the absence of the other. 3 Scam. 63.

EX PARTE MATERNA (Lat.). On the mother's side. The words ex parte materna and ex parte paterna have a well-known signification in the law. They are found constantly used in the books to denote the line, or blood of the mother or father, and have no such restricted or limited sense, as from the mother or father, exclusively; 24 N. J. L. 433; 2 Bla. Com. 224, and notes.

EX PARTE PATERNA (Lat.). On the father's side. See EX PARTE MATERNA; DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

EX POST FACTO (Lat.). From or by an after act; by subsequent matter. The correlative term is ab initio. An estate granted may be made good or avoided by matter ex post facto, when an election is given to the party to accept or not to accept; 1 Coke 146. A remainderman or reversioner may confirm ex post facto a lease granted by a life-tenant to last beyond his own life.

Within the meaning of the Constitution, any law is ex post facto which is enacted after the offence was committed, and which, in relation to it or its consequences, alters the situation of the accused to his disadvantage. 107 U. S. 221. See IMPOSSIBILITY.

EX POST FACTO LAW. A statute which would render an act punishable in a manner in which it was not punishable when it was committed. 6 Cra. 138; 1 Kent 406.

A law made to punish acts committed before the existence of such law, which had not been declared crimes by preceding laws. Mass. Declar. of Rights, pt. 1, s. 24; Md. Decl. of Rights, art. 15.

A law passed after the commission of the offence charged, which inflicts a greater punishment than was annexed to the crime at the time of commission, or which alters the situation of the accused to his disadvantage. 3 Wyo. 478.

A law which, in its operation, makes that criminal which was not so at the time the action was performed; or which increases the punishment, or, in short, which, in relation to the offence or its consequences, alters the situation of a party to his disadvantage. 2 Wash. 866; 107 U. S. 228; see 65 Miss. 542; 6 Cra. 87; 43 N. J. L. 203; 29 N. Y. 124; 4 Wall. 325.

Parliament, in virtue of its supreme power, may pass such laws, being sustained by discretion alone; 1 Bla. Com. 46, 160.

By the constitution of the United States, congress is forbidden to pass ex post facto laws. U. S. Const. art. 1, § 9. And by § 10 of the same instrument, as well as by the constitutions of most, if not all, of the states, a similar restriction is imposed upon the state legislatures. Such an act is void as to those cases in which, if given effect, it would be ex post facto; but so far only. In cases arising after it, it may have effect; for as a rule for the future, it is not ex post facto.

There is a distinction between ex post facto laws and retrospective or retroactive laws: every ex post facto law must necessarily be retrospective, but not every retrospective law is an ex post facto law; in general, ex post facto laws only are prohibited. Retrospective laws are prohibited by the constitutions of the states of New Hampshire and Ohio. See 15 Ohio 207; 27 id. 22; 50 id. 428; 107 U. S. 221; T. U. P. Charlt. 94.

It is fully settled that the term ex post facto, as used in the constitution, is to be taken in a limited sense as referring to criminal or penal statutes alone, and that the policy, the reason, and the humanity of the prohibition against passing ex post facto laws do not extend to civil cases, to cases that merely affect the private property of citizens. But the prohibition cannot be evaded by giving a civil form to what is, in substance, criminal; 4 Wall. 277; id. 313; 97 U. S. 383; 39 N. Y. 418; 43 Ga. 490; Hare, Am. Const. L. 547. Divorce not being a punishment may be authorized for causes happening previous to the passage of the divorce act; 40 Miss. 549.

The constitution does not prohibit the states from passing retrospective laws generally. Some of the most necessary acts of legislation are, on the contrary, founded upon the principles that private rights must yield to public exigencies; 8 Wheat. 69; 17 How. 403; 8 Pet. 88; 11 id. 421; 9 Cra. 374; 1 Gall. 103; 2 Pet. 880, 523, 637; 7 Johns. 488; 6 Binn. 271; 69 Mo. 843; 69 How. Pr. 21; 93 Ill. 483; Cooley, Const. Lim. 283; 36 S. C. 454. See 73 In. 707; 74 id. 708.

Test oaths of past loyalty to the government have been held void as ex post facto; 4 Wall. 333; except as pre-requisites to the exercise of the elective franchise; 47 Mo. 119; 39 N. Y. 418. A law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors is not ex post facto, 5 R. I. 185; or a law imposing a retrospective tax; 81 N. J. L. 133; 20 Wall. 323; see 16 Pa. 63; S. C. 17 How. 856; 66 N. C. 361; or a law authorizing a divorce for past offences; 40 Miss. 849; 10 N. H. 880; compare 3 Murph. (N. C.) 327; or a law providing that the punishment of future crimes shall be increased by reason of past offences; 63 Me. 409. Corporations cannot pass ex post facto by-laws; 31 Mich. 458.

Laws under the following circumstances are to be considered ex post facto laws within the words and intent of the prohibition: 1. Every law that makes an act done before the passing of the law, which was innocent when done, criminal and punishes such action. 2. Every law that aggravates a crime, or makes it greater than it was when committed. 3. Every law that changes the punishment, and inflicts a greater punishment than the law annexed to the crime when committed; though it would be otherwise of a law mitigating the punishment; 3 Story, Const. 212. 4. Every law that alters the legal rules of evidence, and receives less or different testimony than the law required at the time of the commission of the offence, in order to convict the offender; 3 Dall. 300. This construction, it is said, "has been accepted and followed as correct by the courts ever since;" Cooley, Const. Lim. 325. See 98 Cal. 427; 155 Mass. 163.

This classification has been generally adopted as accurate and complete, but is not entirely so. Thus a law has been decided to be ex post facto which was intended to punish a criminal act, prosecution as to which was already barred by a statute of limitations; Moore v. State of N. J., 43 N. J. L. 203; s. c. 24 Alb. J. 308; but an act which reduces a punishment is not ex post facto as to crimes committed prior to its enactment; 140 N. Y. 484; 65 N. C. 311; 12 Allen 421; 20 Tex. App. 395. The statement under the fourth head also requires modification. Convictions under changes in the rules of evidence have been held not unconstitutional; 53 N. Y. 164; 9 Cush. 279; 14 Rich. L. 281; 31 Tex. Cr. R. 597; 84 Ky. 1; 84 Ind. 432; though it seems to be settled that a law requiring a less degree of evidence cannot be applied to a previous offence. But changes in the forms, in the manner of passing sentence, or the qualifications of jurors, do not fall within the prohibition; 11 Pick. 28; 2 Wash. St. 552; 8 Wyo. 478; 29 S. C. 335; nor will a provision reducing the number of peremptory challenges on a prosecution for a capital offence, though applied to cases where the offence was committed before the change was made; 31 Fla. 291; 86 Ala. 617; nor an amendment which confers jurisdiction in a criminal cause upon a division of the supreme court less in numbers and different in personnel from the court as organized when the crime was committed; 152 U. S. 377. A change of criminal procedure applied to the trial of crimes committed before it took effect is not ex post facto, unless it affects some substantial right to which the accused was entitled when the alleged offence was committed; 88 La. Ann. 1214; 107 U. S. 221. The supreme court of the United States has recently decided that a constitutional provision, requiring all grand and petit jurors to be qualified electors, able to read and write, and enjoining on the legislature to provide by law for listing and drawing persons so qualified, but declaring that, until otherwise provided by law, all crimes should be tried as though no change had been made (Const. Miss. 1890, §§ 264, 283), went into effect immediately on its adoption, so far as the qualifications of jurors were concerned; that one who committed a crime after the adoption of the constitution, but before the legislature passed a new jury law, could be tried, after the passage of such a law, by a jury selected under its provisions; and that, as the new law did not aggravate the crime previously committed, or inflict a greater punishment, or alter the rules of evidence, its application to the trial of the accused did not make it an ex post facto law; 162 U. S. 585.

For a review of the history of the ex post facto clause of the constitution in connection with its adoption, and with its subsequent construction by the federal and state courts, see 107 U. S. 221.

EX PROPRIO VIGORE (Lat.). By its own force. 2 Kent 457.

EX REL. See EX RELATIONE.

EX RELATIONE (Lat.). At the information of; by the relation. A bill in equity, for example, may in many cases be brought for an injunction to restrain a public nuisance ex relatione (by information of) the parties immediately interested in or affected by the nuisance; 18 Ves. 217; 2 Johns. Ch. 382; 6 id. 439; 13 How. 518; 12 Pet. 91.

It is frequently abbreviated ex rel. See RELATOR.

EX TEMPORE (Lat.). From the time; without premeditation.

EX VI TERMINI (Lat.). By force of the term.

EX VISCERIBUS (Lat. from the bowels). From the vital part, the very essence of the thing. 10 Co. 24 b; 2 Metc. Mass. 213. Ex visceribus verborum (from the mere words and nothing else); 10 Johns. 494; 1 Story, Eq. § 980.

EX VISITATIONE DEI (Lat.). By or from the visitation of God. In the ancient law, upon a prisoner arraigned for treason or felony standing mute, a jury was impelled to inquire whether he stood obstinately mute, or was dumb ex visitatione Dei; 4 Steph. Com. 391. This phrase is frequently employed in inquisitions by the coroner, where it signifies that the death of the deceased is a natural one.

EXACTION. A wilful wrong done by an officer, or by one who, under color of his office, takes more fee or pay for his services than the law allows.

Between extortion and exaction there is this difference: that in the former case the officer extorts more than his due, when something is due to him; in the latter, he exacts what is not his due, when there is nothing due to him. Co. Litt. 86.

EXACTOR. In Old English and Civil Law. A collector. Exactor regis (collector for the king). A collector of taxes or revenue. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Spelman, Gloss. The term exaction early came to mean the wrong done by an officer, or one pretending to have authority, in demanding or taking any reward or fee for that matter, cause, or thing which the law allows not. Termes de la Ley.

EXAMINATION. In Criminal Law. The investigation by an authorized magistrate of the circumstances which constitute the grounds for an accusation against a person arrested on a criminal charge, with a view to discharging the person so arrested, or to securing his appearance for trial by the proper court, and to preserving the evidence relating to the matter.

Practically, it is accomplished by bringing the person accused, together with witnesses, before a magistrate (generally a justice of the peace), who thereupon takes down in writing the evidence of the witnesses, and any statements which the prisoner may see fit to make. If no cause for detention appears, the party is discharged from arrest. If sufficient cause of suspicion appears to warrant putting him on trial, he is committed, or required to give bail or enter into a recognizance to appear at the proper time for trial. The witnesses are also frequently required to recognize for their appearance; though in ordinary cases only their own recognizance is required. The magistrate signs or certifies the minutes of the evidence which he has taken, and it is delivered to the court before whom the trial is to be had. The object of an examination is to enable the judge and jury to see whether the witnesses are consistent, and to ascertain whether the offence is bailable. 2 Leach 552. And see 4 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 296.

At common law, the prisoner could not be interrogated by the magistrate; but under the statutes 1 & 2 Phil. & M. c. 13, 2 & 3 Phil. & M. c. 10, the provisions of which have been substantially adopted in most of the United States, the magistrate is to examine the prisoner as well as the witnesses. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 224; 4 Bla. Com. 296; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 44; Ry. & M. 432.

The examination should be taken and completed as soon as the nature of the case will admit; Cro. Eliz. 820; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 585; 2 id. 120. The prisoner must not be put upon oath, but the witnesses must; 1 Phil. Ev. 106; Archb. Cr. Fr. & Pl. 368. The prisoner formerly had no right to the assistance of an attorney; but the privilege was granted at the discretion of the magistrate; 2 Dowl. & R. 86; 1 B. & C. 37. Now, however, a prisoner is permitted to have counsel as a matter of course. The magistrate's return and certificate are conclusive evidence, and exclude parol evidence, of what the prisoner said on that occasion with reference to the charge; 2 C. & K. 223; 5 C. & P. 102; 1 Mood. & M. 403. See CONFESSION; RECOGNIZANCE.

In Practice. The interrogation of a witness, in order to ascertain his knowledge as to the facts in dispute between parties.

The examination in chief is that made by the party calling the witness; the cross-examination is that made by the other party. In the examination in chief the counsel cannot ask leading questions, except in particular cases. See CROSS-EXAMINATION; LEADING QUESTIONS.

The examination is to be made in open court, when practicable; but when, on account of age, sickness, absence from the jurisdiction, or other cause, the witness cannot be present, then in civil causes it may be made before authorized commissioners.

The interrogation of a person who is desirous of performing some act, or availing himself of some privilege of the law, in order to ascertain if all the requirements of the law have been complied with, conducted by and before an officer having authority for the purpose.

There are many acts which can be of validity and binding force only upon an examination. Thus, in many states, a married woman must be privately examined as to whether she has given her consent freely and without restraint to a deed which she appears to have executed; see ACKNOWLEDGMENT; an insolvent who wishes to take the benefit of the insolvent laws, one who is about to become bound for another in legal proceedings, a bankrupt, etc., must submit to an examination.

EXAMINATION DE BENE ESSE. A conditional examination. The examination of a witness out of court before a trial, with the view of using his deposition in case his personal attendance cannot be procured at the trial.

EXAMINED COPY. A phrase applied to designate a paper which is a copy of a record, public book, or register, and which has been compared with the original. 1 Campb. 469.

Such examined copy is admitted in evidence, because of the public inconvenience which would arise if such record, public book, or register were removed from place to place, and because any fraud or mistake made in the examined copy would be so easily detected; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 91; 1 Stark. Ev. 189. But in an answer in chancery on which the defendant was indicted for perjury, or where the original must be produced in order to identify the party by proof of handwriting, an examined copy would not be evidence; 1 Mood. & R. 189. See COPY.

EXAMINERS. Persons appointed to question students of law in order to ascertain their qualifications before they are admitted to practice.

The word "examiner" embraces any person authorized to take a deposition. Section 732, subsection 38, Civil Code of Kentucky.

Persons employed by the government of the United States in the Patent Office for the purpose of passing upon applications for letters patent. See SPECIAL EXAMINER. MEDICAL EXAMINER.

EXAMINERS IN CHANCERY. Officers who examine, upon oath, witnesses produced on either side upon such interrogatories as the parties to any suit exhibit for that purpose. Cowel.

The examiner is to administer an oath to the party, and then repeat the interrogatories one at a time, writing down the answer himself; 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 1002. Anciently, the examiner was one of the judges of the court; hence an examination before the examiner is said to be an examination in court; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 1033.

EXANNUAL ROLL. A roll containing the illeivable fines and desperate debts, which was read yearly to the sheriff (in the ancient way of delivering the sheriff's accounts), to see what might be gotten. Hale, Sheriffs 67; Cowel.

EXCAMB. In Scotch Law. To exchange. Excambion, exchange. The words are evidently derived from the Latin excambium. Bell, Dict. See EXCHANGE.

EXCAMBIATOR. An exchanger of lands; a broker. Obsolete.

EXCAMBIUM (Lat.). In English Law. Exchange; a recompense. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 442.

EXCELLENCY, HIS. A title given by the constitution of Massachusetts to the governor of that State; also, by custom, to the governors of the other States, and to the President of the United States. Anderson. The title of a viceroy, governor, ambassador or commander-in-chief. R. & L. Dict.

EXCEPTING. The words "excepting" and "reserving," although strictly distinguishable, are often used interchangeably or indiscriminately, and the use of either term is not conclusive as to the nature of the provision. 146 Ky. 307, 142 S. W. 394.

EXCEPTIO REI JUDICATAE. A defence in the Scotch law that the matter has been adjudged in another court or country, and the judgment carried into effect. Wharton. A term constantly used in modern law, to denote a defence founded upon a previous adjudication of the same matter. Burrill; Fract. fol. 100 b, 177. See RES JUDICATA.

EXCEPTION (Lat. excipere: ex, out of, capere, to take).

In Contracts. A clause in a deed by which the lessor excepts something out of that which he before granted by the deed. The exclusion of something from the effect or operation of the deed or contract which would otherwise be included.

An exception differs from a reservation (q. v.),—the former being always of part of the thing granted, the latter of a thing not in esse, but merely created or reserved; the exception is of the whole of the part excepted; the reservation may be of a right or interest in the particular part affected by the reservation. See 5 R. I. 410; 41 Me. 177; 48 id. 9; 81 id. 43; 19 Barb. 192; 2 B. & C. 197. The two words, however, are often used indiscriminately; 18 Mass. 231; 28 Conn. 541. An exception differs, also, from an explanation, which, by the use of a videlicet, proviso, etc., is allowed only to explain doubtful clauses precedent, or to separate and distribute generals into particulars; 8 Pick. 272.

To make a valid exception, these things must concur: first, the exception must be by apt words, as, "saving and excepting," etc.; see 30 Vt. 242; 5 R. I. 419; 41 Me. 177; 102 N. C. 14; second, it must be of part of the thing previously described, and not of some other thing; third, it must be of part of the thing only, and not of all, the greater part, or the effect of the thing granted; 11 Md. 339; 23 Vt. 395; 10 Mo. 428; see 140 Pa. 451; an exception, therefore, in a lease which extends to the whole thing demised is void; fourth, it must be of such thing as is severable from the demised premises, and not of an inseparable incident; 33 Pa. 251; 37 N. H. 167; fifth, it must be of such a thing as he that excepts may have, and which properly belongs to him; sixth, it must be of a particular thing out of a general, and not of a particular thing out of a particular thing; seventh, it must be particularly described and set forth; a lease of a tract of land except one acre would be void, because that acre was not particularly described; Co. Litt. 47 a; 12 Me. 337; Wright, Ohio 711; 3 Johns. 875; 8 Conn. 369; 6 Pick. 499; 6 N. H. 421; 4 Strobb. 208; 2 Tayl. 178; see 91 Cal. 74; 112 N. C. 58. Exceptions against common right and general rules are construed as strictly as possible; 1 Bart. Conv. 68; 5 Jones, N. C. 63. When a grantor makes a valid exception, the thing excepted remains the property of himself or his heirs; but if he has no valid title to it, neither he nor his heirs can recover; 97 N. C. 95.

In Equity Practice. The allegation of a party, in writing, that some pleading or proceeding in a cause is insufficient.

In Civil Law. A plea. Merlin, Répert. Dilatory exceptions are such dilatory exceptions as merely decline the jurisdiction of the judge before whom the action is brought. La. Code Proc.

Dilatory exceptions are such as do not tend to defeat the action, but only to retard its progress.

Declinatory exceptions have this effect, as well as the exception of discussion offered by a third possessor or by a surety in an hypothecary action, or the exception taken in order to call in the warrant. 7 Mart. La. n. a. 222; 1 La. 38, 400.

Peremptory exceptions are those which tend to the dismissal of the action.

Some relate to forms, others arise from the law. Those which relate to forms tend to have the cause dismissed, owing to some nullities in the proceedings. These must be pleaded in limine litis. Peremptory exceptions founded on law are those which, without going into the merits of the cause, show that the plaintiff cannot maintain his action, either because it is prescribed, or because the cause of action has been destroyed or extinguished. These may be pleaded at any time previous to definitive judgment; Fother. Proc. Civ. pt. 1, c. 2, ss. 1, 2, & 3. These, in the French law, are called fin de non recevoir.

In Practice. Objections made to the decisions of the court in the course of a trial. See BILL OF EXCEPTION.

EXCEPTION TO BAIL. An objection to the special bail put in by the defendant to an action at law made by the plaintiff on grounds of the insufficiency of the bail. 1 Tidd, Pr. 255.

EXCEPTION ON TRIAL. An exception taken by the counsel of a party, on the trial of a cause, to a decision made by the judge in the course of the trial, or to an opinion expressed or direction given in his charge to the jury; and usually for the purpose either of moving for a new trial, or of bringing a writ of error.

EXCESS. When a defendant pleaded to an action of assault that the plaintiff trespassed on his land, and he would not depart when ordered, whereupon he mollior manus imposuit, gently laid hands on him, the replication of excess was to the effect that the defendant used more force than necessary. Wharton.

EXCESSIVE BAIL. Bail which is per se unreasonably great and clearly disproportionate to the offence involved, or which under the peculiar circumstances appearing is shown to be so in the particular case. 44 Cal. 558; 83 id. 410.

EXCESSIVE DAMAGES. Damages, given by the verdict of a jury, which are unreasonably great in amount, and not warranted by law; outrageous damages. One of the grounds for granting new trials.

EXCHANGE. In Commercial Law. A negotiation by which one person transfers to another funds which he has in a certain place, either at a price agreed upon or which is fixed by commercial usage.

This transfer is made by means of an instrument which represents such funds and is well known by the name of a bill of exchange. The price above the par value of the funds so transferred is called the premium of exchange, and if under that value the difference is called the discount,—either being called the rate of exchange.

The par of exchange is the value of the money of one country in that of another, and is either real or nominal. The nominal par is that which has been fixed by law or usage, and, for the sake of uniformity, is not altered, the rate of exchange alone fluctuating. The real par is that based on the weight and fineness of the coins of the two countries, and fluctuates with changes in the coinage. The nominal par of exchange in this country on England, settled in 1799 by act of congress, was four dollars and forty-four cents for the pound sterling; but by successive changes in the coinage this value has been increased, the real mint par at present being a little over four dollars and eighty-seven cents. The course of exchange means the quotations for any given time.

The transfer of goods and chattels for other goods and chattels of equal value. This is more commonly called barter. Where a party deposits wheat with a mill company, expecting to receive a proportionate amount of flour, it constitutes an exchange and not a sale; 49 Mo. App. 23. One cannot, as having been defrauded thereby, rescind an exchange of property, without tendering a return of his property to the other, unless it is absolutely worthless; 97 Mich. 581.

The distinction between a sale and exchange of property is rather one of shadow than of substance. In both cases the title to property is absolutely transferred, and the same rules of law are applicable to the transaction, whether the consideration of the contract is money or by way of barter. It can make no essential difference in the rights and obligations of parties that goods and merchandise are transferred and paid for by other goods and merchandise instead of by money, which is but the representative of value or property; 14 Gray 872.

The profit which arises from a maritime loan, when such profit is a percentage on the money lent, considering it in the light of money lent in one place to be returned in another, with a difference in amount in the sum borrowed and that paid, arising from the difference of time and place. The term is commonly used in this sense by French writers. Hall, Mar. Loans 56, n.

The place where merchants, captains of vessels, exchange-agents, and brokers assemble to transact their business. Code de Comm. art. 71.

In Conveyancing. A mutual grant of equal interests in land, the one in consideration of the other. 3 Bla. Com. 823; Littleton 62; Shep. Touchst. 289; Watk. Conv; Digby, R. P. 888. It is said that exchange in the United States does not differ from bargain and sale. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2059.

There are five circumstances necessary to an exchange. That the estates given be equal. That the word excommutio, or exchange, be used,—which cannot be supplied by any other word, or described by circumlocution. That there be an execution by entry or claim in the life of the parties. That if it be of things which lie in grant, it be by deed. That if the lands lie in several counties, or if the thing lie in grant, though they be in one county, it be by deed indented. In practice this mode of conveying is nearly obsolete.

185; 47 Minn. 500; 133 Ind. 203; 80 Ala. 591.

Of Services. Barter. Carries with it no implication of reduction to money as a common denominator. It contemplates simply an estimate, determined by self interest, of the relative value and importance of the services rendered and those received. 248 U. S. 474. See FOREIGN EXCHANGE. QUOTATIONS OF PRICES ON AN EXCHANGE.

EXCHEQUER (L. Lat. scaccarium, Nor. Fr. ecchequier). In English Law. A department of the government which has the management of the collection of the king's revenue.

The name is said to be derived from the chequered cloth which covered the table on which some of the king's accounts were made up and the amounts indicated by counters.

It consisted of two divisions, one for the receipt of revenue, the other for administering justice. Co. 4th Inst. 103; 3 Bla. Com. 44, 45. See COURT OF EXCHEQUER; COURT OF EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

EXCHEQUER BILLS Bills of credit issued by authority of parliament.

They constitute the medium of transaction of business between the bank of England and the government. The exchequer bills contain a guarantee from government which secures the holders against loss by fluctuation. Wharton; McCulloch, Comm. Dict.

EXCISE. An inland imposition, paid sometimes upon the consumption of the commodity, and frequently upon the retail sale. 1 Bla. Com. 318; Story, Const. § 930; Cooley, Tax. 4. See 11 Allen 203; INTERNAL REVENUE.

A tax laid upon the manufacture, sale or consumption of commodities within the country, upon licenses to pursue certain occupations, and upon corporate privileges. 220 U. S. 151 quoting Cooley, Const. Lim., 7th ed., 680.

EXCLUSIVE (Lat. ex, out, claudere, to shut). Not including; debarring from participation. Shut out; not included.

An exclusive right or privilege, as a copyright or patent, is one which may be exercised and enjoyed only by the person authorized, while all others are forbidden to interfere.

Exclusive Jurisdiction. The words "exclusive jurisdiction" mean not only exclusive, but full and final jurisdiction, and that no appeal lies from the judgment of the county court, although it may have imposed a fine and imprisonment. 159 Ky. 87, 166 S. W. 808.

Exclusive of Interest and Cost. The term "exclusive of interest and cost" as used in the statute, means the cost incurred in the suit and embraced in the judgment from which the appeal is taken. 101 Ky. 219, S. W. 673.

EXCOMMUNICATION. In Ecclesiastical Law. An ecclesiastical sentence pronounced by a spiritual judge against a Christian man, by which he is excluded from the body of the church, and disabled to bring any action or sue any person in the common-law courts. Bao. Abr.; Co. Litt. 138, 144; 91 Tenn. 808.

In early times it was the most frequent and the most severe method of executing ecclesiastical censure, although proper to be used, said Justinian (Nov. 128), only upon grave occasions. The effect of it was to remove the excommunicated person not only from the sacred rites, but from the society of men. In a certain sense it interdicted the use of fire and water, like the punishment spoken of by Caesar (lib. 6 & 2 Bell. Gall.) as inflicted by the Druids. Innocent IV. called it the nerve of ecclesiastical discipline. On repentance, the excommunicated person was absolved and received again to communion. These are said to be the powers of binding and loosing,—the keys of the kingdom of heaven. This kind of punishment seems to have been adopted from the Roman usage of interdicting the use of fire and water. Fr. Duaren. De Sacris Eccles. Ministeriis, lib. 1, cap. 8. See Ridley, View of the Civil and Ecclesiastical Law 245.

EXCOMMUNICATO CAPIENDO (Lat. for taking an excommunicated person).

In Ecclesiastical Law. A writ issuing out of chancery, founded on a bishop's certificate that the defendant had been excommunicated, returnable to the king's bench. 4 Bla. Com. 415; Bao. Abr. Excommunication, E. See Cro. Eliz. 224, 480; Cro. Car. 421; Cro. Jac. 507; 1 Balk. 288.

EXCUSABLE HOMICIDE. In Criminal Law. The killing of a human being, when the party killing is not altogether free from blame, but the necessity which renders it excusable may be said to have been partly induced by his own act. 1 East, Pl. Cr. 220. See HOMICIDE.

EXCUSATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. Excuse. A cause from exemption from a duty, such as absence, insufficient age, etc. Vicat. Voc. Jur., and reference there given.

EXCUSATOR (Lat.). In English Law. An excuser.

In Old German Law. A defendant; he who utterly denies the plaintiff's claim. Du Cange.

EXCUSE. A reason alleged for the doing or not doing a thing.

This word presents two ideas, differing essentially from each other. In one case an excuse may be made in order to show that the party acted is not guilty; in another, by showing that though guilty he is less so than he appears to be. Take, for example, the case of a sheriff who has an execution against an individual, and who, in performance of his duty, arrests him: in an action by the defendant against the sheriff, the latter may prove the facts, and this shall be a sufficient excuse for him; this is an excuse of the first kind, or a complete justification; the sheriff was guilty of no offence. But suppose, secondly, that the sheriff has an execution against Paul, and by mistake, and without any malicious design, he arrests Peter instead of Paul: the fact of his having the execution against Paul and the mistake being made will not justify the sheriff, but it will extenuate and excuse his conduct, and this will be an excuse of the second kind.

Persons are sometimes excused for the commission of acts which ordinarily are crimes, either because they had no intention of doing wrong, or because they had no power of judging, and therefore had no criminal will, or, having power of judging, they had no choice, and were compelled by necessity. Among the first class may be placed infants under the age of discretion, lunatics, and married women committing certain offences in the presence of their husbands. Among acts of the second kind may be classed the beating or killing another in self-defence, the destruction of property in order to prevent a more serious calamity, as the tearing down of a house on fire to prevent its spreading to the neighboring property, and the like. See Dallas, Dict.

EXCURSIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. Exhausting the principal debtor before proceeding against the surety. Discussion is used in the same sense in Scotch law. Vicat, Excursionis Beneficium.

EXECUTE. To complete; to make; to perform; to do; to follow out.

The term is frequently used in law; as, to execute a deed, which means to make a deed, including especially signing, sealing, and delivery. To execute a contract is to perform the contract. To execute a use is to merge or unite the equitable estate of the certain que use in the legal estate, under the statute of uses. To execute a writ is to do the act commanded in the writ. To execute a criminal is to put him to death according to law, in pursuance of his sentence. See EXECUTED DEED.

EXECUTED. Done; completed; effectuated; performed; fully disclosed; vested; giving present right of employment. The term is used of a variety of subjects.

EXECUTED CONSIDERATION. See CONSIDERATION.

EXECUTED CONTRACT. One which has been fully performed. The statute of frauds does not apply to such contracts; 180 Ind. 108; 48 Kan. 418; 9 U. S. App. 537; 159 Pa. 121; 100 Ala. 480; 18 Colo. 450; 83 Tex. 158. See CONTRACTS.

EXECUTED DEED. In Real Estate Law. A deed signed, sealed if necessary, acknowledged if necessary, and delivered. 214 Mo. 473, cited by 2 Elliot, Contr. 1169. The word "to execute" as applied to deeds, notes or written contracts, includes, signing and delivery, but in popular speech it is often used to express merely the act of signing the instrument. Id.; 122 S. W. 377. See EXECUTE.

EXECUTED ESTATE. An estate whereby a present interest passes to and resides in the tenant, not dependent upon any subsequent circumstance or contingency. They are more commonly called estates in possession. 2 Bla. Com. 162.

An estate where there is vested in the grantee a present and immediate right of present or future enjoyment. An estate which confers a present right of present enjoyment.

When the right of enjoyment in possession is to arise at a future period, only the estate is executed; that is, it is merely vested in point of interest; where the right of immediate enjoyment is annexed to the estate, then only is the estate vested in possession. 1 Prest. Est. 62; Fearn, Cont. Rem. 362.

Executed is synonymous with vested. 1 Washb. R. P. 11.

EXECUTED REMAINDER. One giving a present interest, though the enjoyment may be future. Fearn, Cont. Rem. 31; 2 Bla. Com. 168. See REMAINDER.

EXECUTED TRUST. A trust of which the scheme has in the outset been completely devised. Ad. Eq. 151. One in which the devise or trust is directly and wholly declared by the testator or settlor, so as to attach on the lands immediately under the deed or will itself. 1 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 385; 1 Jac. & W. 570. "A trust in which the estates and interest in the subject-matter of the trust are completely limited and defined by the instrument creating the trust, and require no further instruments to complete them." Bisph. Eq. 31. The instrument creating such a trust must be construed according to the rules of law, although the intention may be defeated; id. 86. See 1 Hayes, Conv. 85; TRUST; EXECUTORY TRUST.

EXECUTED USE. A use with which the possession and legal title have been united by statute. 1 Steph. Com. 339; 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 335, note; 7 Term 342; 12 Ves. Ch. 89; 4 Mod. 380; Comb. 312.

EXECUTED WRIT. A writ the command in which has been obeyed by the person to whom it was directed.

EXECUTION. The accomplishment of a thing; the completion of an act or instrument; the fulfilment of an undertaking. Thus, a contract is executed when the act to be done is performed; a deed is executed when it is signed, sealed, and delivered. See 12 Ired. 221. Where the party is present and directs another to sign for him, no written authority is necessary; 30 N. J. Eq. 193; 6 Neb. 368; 22 Cal. 563; 175 Pa. 393; Reed, St. of Fr. § 1063.

In Criminal Law. Putting a convict to death, agreeably to law, in pursuance of his sentence. This is to be performed by the sheriff or his deputy; (see 4 Bla. Com. 403;) or under the laws of the United States, by the marshal. See CRIMES; ELECTROCUTION; GARROTE; GUILLOTINE; HANGING.

In Practice. Putting the sentence of the law in force. 3 Bla. Com. 412. The act of carrying into effect the final judgment or decree of a court.

The writ which directs and authorizes the officer to carry into effect such judgment.

Final execution is one which authorizes the money due on a judgment to be made out of the property of the defendant.

Execution quousque is such as tends to an end, but is not absolutely final: as, for example, a capias ad satisfaciendum, by virtue of which the body of the defendant is taken, to the intent that the plaintiff shall be satisfied of his debt, etc., the imprisonment not being absolute, but until he shall satisfy the same. 6 Co. 87.

Execution, in civil actions, is the mode of obtaining the debt or damages or other thing recovered by the judgment; and it is either for the plaintiff or defendant. For the plaintiff upon a judgment in debt, the execution is for the debt and damages; or in assumpsit, covenant, case, replevin, or trespass, for the damages and costs; or in detinue, for the goods, or their value, with damages and costs. For the defendant upon a judgment in replevin, the execution at common law is for a return of the goods, to which damages are superadded by the statutes 7 Hen. VIII. c. 4, § 3, and 21 Hen. VIII. c. 19, § 3; and in other actions upon a judgment of non pros., non suit, or verdict, the execution is for the costs only; Tidd, Pr. 903.

After final judgment signed and even before it is entered of record, the plaintiff may, in general, at any time within a year and a day, and whilst the parties to the judgment continue the same, take out execution; provided there be no writ of error depending or agreement to the contrary, or, where this is allowed, security entered for stay of execution. But after a year and a day from the time of signing judgment the plaintiff cannot regularly take out execution without reviving the judgment by scire facias, unless a fi. facias, or capias ad satisfaciendum, etc., was previously sued out, returned, and filed, or he was hindered from suing it out by a writ of error; and if a writ of error be brought, it is, generally speaking, a superseas of execution from the time of its allowance; provided bail, when necessary, be put in and perfected, in due time. See Tidd, Pr. 994; 3 Ala. 223.

Writs of execution are judicial writs issuing out of the court where the record is upon which they are grounded. Hence, when the record has been removed to a higher court by writ of error or certiorari, or on appeal, either the execution must issue out of that court, or else the record must be returned to the inferior court by a remittitur (q. v.) for the purpose of taking out execution in the court below. The former is the practice in England; the latter, in some of the United States.

The object of execution in personal actions is effected in one or more of the three following ways. 1. By the seizure and sale of personal property of the defendant. 2. By the seizure of his real property, and either selling it or detaining it until the issues and profits are sufficient to satisfy the judgment. 3. By seizing his person and holding him in custody until he pays the judgment or is judicially declared insolvent.

These proceedings, though taken at the instance and under the direction of the party for whom judgment is given, are considered the act of the law itself, and are in all cases performed by the authorized minister of the law. The party or his attorney obtains, from the office of the court where the record is, a writ, based upon and reciting the judgment, and directed to the sheriff (or, where he is interested or otherwise disqualified, to the coroner) of the county, commanding him, in the name of the sovereign or of the state, that of the goods and chattels or of the lands and tenements of the defendant in his bailiwick he cause to be made or levied the sum recovered, or that he seize the person of the defendant, as the case may be, and have the same before the court at the return day of the writ. This writ is delivered by the party to the officer to whom it is directed, who thenceforth becomes responsible for his performance of its mandate, and in case of omission, mistake, or misconduct is liable in damages to the person injured, whether he be the plaintiff, the defendant, or a stranger to the writ.

When property is sold under execution, the proceeds are applied to the satisfaction of the judgment and the costs and charges of the proceedings; and the surplus, if there be any, is paid to the defendant in execution.

Execution against personal property. When the property consists of goods and chattels, in which are included terms for years, the writ used is the fi. facias (q. v.). If, after levying on the goods, etc., under a fi. facias, they remain unsold for want of buyers, etc., a supplemental writ may issue, which is called the venditioni exponas. At common law, goods and chattels might also be taken in execution under a levari facias; though now perhaps the most frequent use of this writ is in executions against real property.

Where it is sought to reach an equitable interest a bill in equity is sometimes filed in aid of an execution; 78 Fed. Rep. 627.

When the property consisted of choses in action, whether debts due the defendant or any other sort of credit or interest belonging to him, it could not be taken in execution at common law; but now, under statutory provisions in many of the states, such property may be reached by a process in the nature of an attachment, called an attachment execution or execution attachment. See ATTACHMENT; CREDITORS' BILL.

Execution against real estate. Where lands are absolutely liable for the payment of debts, and can be sold in execution, the process is by fi. facias and venditioni exponas. In Pennsylvania the land cannot be sold in execution unless the sheriff's jury, under the fi. facias, find that the profits will not pay the debt in seven years. But, practically, lands are almost never extended. And, in general, under common-law practice, lands are not subject to sale under execution, until after a levy has been made under the fi. facias, and they are appraised under an inquisition. They are then liable to be sold under a venditioni exponas.

There are in England writs of execution against land which are not in general use here. The extent (q. v.), or extendi facias, is the usual process for the king's debt. The levari facias (q. v.) is also used for the king's debt, and for the subject on a recognizance or statute staple or merchant (q. v.), and on a judgment in scire facias, in which latter case it is also generally employed in this country.

Execution against the person. This is effected by the writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, under which the sheriff arrests the defendant and imprisons him till he satisfies the judgment or is discharged by process of law; Freem. Ex. 451. See INSOLVENCY. This execution is not final, the imprisonment not being absolute; whence it has been called an execution quousque; 6 Co. 87.

Besides the ordinary judgment for the payment of a sum certain, there are specific judgments, to do some particular thing. To this the execution must correspond: on a judgment for plaintiff in a real action, the writ is a habere facias seisinam; in ejectment it is a habere facias possessionem; for the defendant in replevin, as has already been mentioned, the writ is de retorno habendo.

Still another sort of judgment is that in rem, confined to a particular thing: such are judgments upon mechanics' liens and municipal claims, and, in the peculiar practice of Pennsylvania, on scire facias upon a mortgage. In such cases the execution is a writ of levari facias. A confession of judgment upon warrant of attorney, with a restriction of the lien to a particular tract, is an analogous instance; but in such case there is no peculiar form of execution; though if the plaintiff should, in violation of his agreement, attempt to levy on other land than that to which his judgment is confined, the court on motion would set aside the execution.

An execution issued in direct violation of an express agreement not to do so, except in a certain contingency which has not happened, will be set aside; 127 Pa. 288.

The lien of an execution from the judgment or decree of a court of record relates to its teste, and attaches to all personality owned by the debtor between the teste and the levy so as to defeat the title of all intermediate purchasers; 85 Tenn. 720; not only in the county in which judgment was rendered, but everywhere in the state; 88 Tenn. 139. A sale under execution transmits only the debtor's estate, in the same plight and subject to all the equities under which he held it; 97 N. C. 241.

In Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Maine by common law and immemorial usage, under a judgment against a town, the property of any inhabitant may be taken in execution; 121 U. S. 121.

See, generally, Bingham; Freeman; Herman, and a long list of leading cases and annotations on special branches of the title in St. Louis Law Library catalogue, tit. Executions; EXEMPTION; FIERI FACIAS; HOMESTEAD. See SPECIAL EXECUTION.

EXECUTION PAREE. In French Law. A right founded on an act passed before a notary, by which the creditor may immediately, without citation or summons, seize and cause to be sold the property of his debtor, out of the proceeds of which to receive his payment. It imports a confession of judgment, and is not unlike a warrant of attorney. La. Code of Proc. art. 733; 6 Toullier, n. 208; 7 id. 99.

EXECUTIONER. The name given to him who puts criminals to death, according to their sentence; a hangman.

In the United States there are no executioners by profession. It is the duty of the sheriff or marshal to perform this office, or to procure a deputy to do it for him.

EXECUTIVE. That power in the government which causes the laws to be executed and obeyed.

It is usually conferred to the hands of the chief magistrate: the president of the United States is invested with this authority under the national government; and the governor of each state has the executive power of the state in his hands.

The officer in whom the executive power is vested.

The constitution of the United States directs that "the executive power shall be vested in a president of the United States of America." Art. 2, s. 1. See Story, Const. b. 3, c. 36.

EXECUTIVE DUTY. See MINISTERIAL DUTY.

EXECUTIVE POWER. Authority exercised by that department of government which is charged with the administration or execution of the laws as distinguished from the legislative and judicial functions.

"Executive power," which the constitution declares shall be 'vested' in the president, includes power to carry into execution the national laws—and including such other powers, not legislative or judicial in their nature, as might from time to time be delegated to the president by congress—as the prosecution of war when declared—and to take care that the law be faithfully executed." 1 Curtis, Const. Hist. 578.

The separation of the three primary governmental powers as found in the constitution of the United States and of the separate states is the culmination of a revolution which had long been in progress in Europe. As is pointed out by a recent writer all governmental power was formerly united in the monarch of the middle ages. As the result of experience there was a separation of the state from the government, the former being termed the constitution-making power and the latter the instrumentalities by which the function of power in time to set in motion and carried on. Further advances in experience indicated the necessity of the distribution of powers by which there should be a deliberative body for the formulation of the rules and regulations under which the state should exist and its affairs be administered; another which should be the medium by which these rules and regulations forming the body of municipal law should be carried into effect; and a third to which should be conferred the function of power in the science of government as judicial. The latter, under the government of the United States, has reached its highest development and exercises an authority in some instances over the other two departments of the government elsewhere unknown, even going so far as to define the limits of their authority and to declare void legislative acts. See CONSTITUTIONAL. This theory of the distribution of the powers of government among three distinct authorities, independent of each other, was first formulated by Montesquieu, Esprit des Lois, b. xi, c. vi. The absolute independence of the three branches of government which was advocated by Montesquieu has not been found entirely practicable in practice, and, although the threefold division of powers is the basis of the American constitution, there are many cases in which the duties of one department are to a certain extent devolved upon and shared by another. This is illustrated in the United States and in many of the states by the veto power which vests in the executive a part of the legislative authority, and on the other hand by the requirement of the confirmation by one branch of the legislature of executive appointments. The practical difficulty expressed in the way of an exact division of powers is expressed: "Although the executive, legislative, and supreme judicial powers of the government ought to be forever separate and distinct, it is also true that the states by the veto power have in one; therefore, while each should firmly maintain the essential powers belonging to it, it cannot be forgotten that the three co-ordinate parts constitute one brotherhood, whose common trust requires a mutual toleration of the delicate 'bordering' domains of each;" 70 N. C. 98, 102. In England, there is in parliament a practical union of all the governmental powers, that body having absolute power of selecting the agents through whom, in fact, is exercised the executive power theoretically vested in the crown, and the final judicial authority on appeal remaining in the House of Lords. There is, notwithstanding, a complete recognition of the threefold division of government powers which is not lost nor destroyed by the unity of the final depository of it all.

While the science of government in modern times may be said to accept the general theory of the separation of powers, subject to limitations and exceptions suggested, the application of the theory has not been uniform. Great difficulty has been found in practice in determining the depository of executive power and whether it should be vested in one man or a body of control, the latter being supposed to insure freedom and possibly to prevent tyranny, and the other being more conducive to efficient administration. See 8 St. Const. §§ 1410-22; Montesquieu, Esprit des Lois, b. xi, c. vi; De Lolme, Const. Eng. b. 2, ch. 2; Federalist No. 70; 1 Kent 271. The necessity for the latter view is the almost universal adoption of the plan of having a single executive head, and the principal remaining difficulty has been the extent and character of the power to be entrusted to it. This is in part the result of the effort to apply to the executive the absolute separation of powers already shown to be impracticable. Another difficulty has been said to arise from the failure to recognize that executive power really comprises two functions, the political or governmental and the administrative. The former concerns the relations of the chief executive authority with the great powers of government, the latter relates to the practical management of the public service. It has been said that the executive authority, as understood in the American states, is mainly a political chief, that in France and in less democratic England its position as an administrator is more important, while in the federal government in this country it is both, as it is also in Germany; 1 Goodnow, Comp. Adm. L. 61.

The proper scope of this subject involves the consideration of the systems of executive administration developed in the principal countries of the world which have adopted the principle of the distribution of powers. Only the briefest summary, however, is here practicable.

The general theory of the distribution of powers in Great Britain is like that in the princely governments of Germany. The residuum of governmental powers is in the crown, and the crown may exercise all authority not expressly otherwise delegated, but it rests with parliament to decide ultimately what powers shall be exercised by the crown and how it shall exercise them; herein it differs from the German system. From the comprehensive Norman idea of royalty which combined all the sovereign powers of the Saxon and Dane with those of the feudal lords, the crown has been stripped at the time in France, there developed at first hereditary and despotic power which was gradually limited by the necessity of the concurrent action of parliament for the imposition of taxes and the enactment of laws affecting the ordinary relations of civil rights. Later on, when a law or ordinance enacted could not be changed without the consent of parliament, and finally the latter body assumed the right to initiate as well as approve laws, and the crown lost its original power of veto which was certainly become obsolete though it has been said to be merely dormant and susceptible of being revived; 2 Todd, Parl. Govt. in Eng. 390. See 1 Stubbs, Const. Hist. of Eng. 388. The result of this development is that parliament has assumed most of the legislative power, though many matters not regulated by it are controlled by the crown which exercises a large ordinance power both independent and supplementary. The crown has lost both the taxing power and the judicial power, but retains in large part its executive power, and its authority is controlled very largely by a body whose power has gradually developed, viz., the privy council. The crown may do anything which it is not forbidden to do and possesses the administrative as well as the political power. It may create offices as well as fill them, and both remove and direct the incumbents. The crown is, therefore, the chief both of the administrative and political departments of the executive power, its position being modified by the principle that its advisers must consent to what it cannot do, must possess the confidence of the majority in the house of commons. The principle of parliamentary responsibility puts the crown in the position of resigning but not governing; but so long as it possesses the confidence of the house of commons it has very extensive executive powers, and in council may declare war and make treaties, which in other countries can be done only with the consent of the legislature. The crown is in theory irresponsible, but when its ministers are in a minority in the house of commons it chooses new ministers who will have the confidence of parliament, or dissolves parliament in the hope that the new body will have confidence in the existing ministers, but the theory is that in all cases a vote of censure and parliament administrators. See Pom. Const. Law § 176; 1 Goodnow, Comp. Adm. L. ch. vi.

In France the executive power is vested in a president elected by the legislature. His position is said by a recent writer, probably on account of the monarchical tradition, to be more important from the administrative point of view than that of the President of the United States, he having no veto power. He has quite an unlimited power of appointment and removal, and the power of removal, not only of officers appointed by himself, but of local administrative officers; as mayors of communes; Law, Art. 3, 1864; and he may dissolve local and municipal legislative bodies in the departments and communes; Law, Art. 10, 1864 and Art. 1, 1894. In addition to his power of executing laws, he has in many cases authority to supplement the law without any delegation of legislative power by what are known as decrees. This supplemental power is accorded to him, and the constitutional provision that he shall watch over and secure the execution of the laws, and the difference between the interpretation put upon this and the similar provision in the United States constitution is accredited to the monarchical traditions of the country, and the resulting idea that the residuary governmental power is vested in the executive and not, as in this country, in congress. The president is also held to a greater responsibility for his action than in the American system. 1 Goodnow, Comp. Adm. L. ch. iv.

In Germany the conception of executive power is much broader than in the United States, and it is more important from the administrative point of view. There are important constitutional limitations on the action of the Prince, or executive head of the subdivisions of the empire; but in the absence of such limitations he is recognized as having the governmental power, being as in France the possessor of the residuum of the governmental power. The limitations upon his action by the constitution are found in the requirement of legislative consent for the validity of legislative acts affecting freedom of person and property and the financial affairs of the government, judicial power administered by courts independent of the control of the executive, and the necessity that each of his official acts must be countersigned by a minister who is responsible for it either to the legislature or to the criminal courts. The administrative powers are very extensive, including that of appointment and removal, and a very wide power of direction, together with the authority to make decrees or ordinances as to all matters not regulated in detail by legislation.

In imperial government, the Emperor occupies from the administrative point of view about the same position as the President of the United States. He has a general power of appointment and of administrative direction, which latter is, however, exercised under the responsibility of the chancellor, who must countersign all acts by which it is exercised; but just what the responsibility of the latter officer seems to be undefined other than that he may be called upon to defend his policy before the federal council. The Emperor does not have any ordinance power, as has been expressly mentioned in the constitution or delegated by the legislature, and in the exercise of it often requires the consent of the federal council. He is entirely irresponsible, id. ch. v. A leading German commentator regards the government as a form of the empire as a republic; 1 Zorn, Das Reichsstaatsrecht, 102.

In the United States, the federal executive power is vested in the president. In all the states the chief executive is the governor. With respect to the power of the latter the differences in the state constitutions make it necessary, for brief statements of the executive officers and their duties, to refer to the titles under the names of the several states, and for more detailed information to the constitutions of the states, while comparative views of the provisions on particular points may be found in Stimson, Am. Stat. Law. Many features are common to most of the states and, making due allowance for differences of detail, the character of the officer is substantially the same. In general, it may be noted that he is commander of the state militia, subject to the paramount federal constitutional control when it is in the actual service of the United States; he has in most cases a pardoning power (except in some states for treason), as to which, however, there is a growing tendency to limit it by requiring the recommendation of a board of pardons, either such in name or effect, usually composed of several executive officers, virtute officii; he has usually a veto power which compels the reconsideration of legislation by a two-thirds vote in most cases, but in some, three-fifths, and in others a mere majority; in most of the states he has power to summon the legislature in extra session, and to adjourn its sessions when the two houses disagree as to the time. As a rule, the governor's power of appointment is confined to minor state officials, and he has no power of removal except for cause and after a hearing. He is usually charged with the duty of sending messages to the legislature containing his views and recommendations upon public questions. The constitutional powers vested in the governor alone are addressed to and regulated by his own uncontrolled discretion; for example, where an officer assuming to act as governor, in his absence, had issued a proclamation convening the legislature in extraordinary session, the governor having returned previous to the time named for the meeting, and issued a second proclamation, revoking the first, it was held that, the power of convening the legislature being discretionary, the call might be recalled before the meeting took place; 3 Neb. 409; s. c. 19 Am. Rep. 694.

Under the United States constitution the governor of a state may call upon the president, when necessary, for aid in the enforcement of the laws.

His limited power of removal makes his power of direction and administration very slight. He is in effect a political rather than an administrative officer, his powers of the former class having increased while those of the latter class have been gradually curtailed. In this respect his relative position is quite the reverse of that of the president. For a discriminating review of this subject, see 1 Goodnow, Comp. Adm. L. ch. iii.; and see titles on the several states.

The executive power possessed by the president must be considered historically in order to reach an adequate view, both of its present scope and limitations and its growth since the adoption of the constitution. It is to be observed primarily that in the United States there is the fundamental condition that the executive power, whether of president or governor, is expressly granted, and the residuum of sovereignty is in the legislature, either federal or state as the case may be, and not, as in France and Germany, actually so, or, as in England, theoretically so. This remark is equally true as to its general results, notwithstanding decisions, that the express grant of executive power carries with it certain implied powers. These were still powers of executing the laws, and not, as in the countries named, of supplementing or adding to them.

Though it is often said that the framers of the United States constitution, in creating the office of president, had in view, as a model, the English king; Pom. Const. Law § 176, a more recent and probably correct view is that the office was rather modelled upon the colonial governor; 1 Goodnow, Comp. Adm. L. 62, and 1 Bryce, Am. Const. 86. An examination of the powers of the executive in each of the three colonies of New York, Massachusetts, and Virginia leads Professor Goodnow to the conclusion that the American constitutional executive power was that which has been called the political or governmental power, and which had usually been exercised by the colonial governors, to which was added the carrying on of foreign relations, which, in the colonial period, were under the control of the mother country, and afterwards of the continental congress. The fact that the constitution, in vesting in the president the executive power, used the term as one whose meaning would be readily understood, undoubtedly leads to the conclusion that the general powers so characterized were such as people of the states were accustomed to have exercised by the governors, first of the colonies and then of the states. But see Stevens, Sources Const. 17, 8, ch. vi.

The specific powers conferred by the constitution in addition to the general provision vesting the executive power in him, are that he shall be commander-in-chief of the army and navy and the militia of the states when in service; that he may require the opinions of the officers of the executive departments; grant reprieves and pardons, except in cases of impeachment; make treaties with the advice and consent of the senate, two-thirds thereof concurring; and, the senate consenting, appoint ambassadors, judges, and other officers whose appointment is not otherwise provided for by law; give information to congress; convene both houses, or either, and adjourn them, when they disagree with respect to the time of adjournment, to such time as he shall think proper; receive ambassadors and other public ministers; take care that the laws be faithfully executed; and commission all officers; Const. art. ii. § 1, 2, 3.

This grant is said to have conferred upon the president the political power of an executive and one administrative power, viz., the power of appointment, beyond which he had no control over the administration; 1 Goodnow, Comp. Adm. L. 63; Pom. Const. L. § 633.

These original powers of the president have been increased by acts of congress conferring specific powers upon him and by decisions that his power is not limited by the express terms of legislative acts but includes certain "rights, duties, and obligations growing out of the constitution itself, our international relations, and all the protection implied by the nature of the government under the constitution"; 185 U. S. 1, 64. Under this implied power it was held that the president could take measures to protect a United States judge or a mail-carrier in the discharge of his duty without an act of congress authorizing him to do so; id. 67; or, in the same manner, to place guards upon the public lands to protect the property of the government. As an illustration of the exercise of this power the supreme court cites the executive action which resulted in the release of Koszta from a foreign prison where he was confined in derogation of his rights as a person who had declared his intention to become an American citizen; id. 64. He may remove obstructions to interstate commerce and the transportation of the mails; and enforce the full and free exercise of all national powers and the security of all rights under the constitution; in re Debs, 158 U. S. 568.

Another increase of the administrative power of the president was due to his power of removal, which was not expressed in the constitution, but it was held by a majority vote in the first congress to be a part of the executive power; 1 Lloyd's Debates 351, 386, 450, 490-600; 2 id. 1-12; 5 Marsh. Life of Washington, ch. 8, 106; and this construction of the constitution was judicially approved; Deady 204; and was undoubtedly the recognized practice of the government until the passage of the Tenure of Office Act of 1867-9; U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 1767 to 1769; which were repealed in 1887. See 2 St. Const. §§ 1537-43; Paper of W. A. Dunning on the Impeachment and Trial of President Johnson; 4 Papers Am. Hist. Assoc. 491; 1 Kent 810; Pom. Const. L. §§ 647-657. To the power of removal thus recognized has been attributed the evolution of "the president's power of direction and supervision over the entire national administration" and "the recognition of the possession by the president of the administrative power"; 1 Goodnow, Comp. Adm. L. 68. Whatever theories may be formed of the conception of the office in the minds of the framers of the constitution, and however the result may have been brought about, it cannot be doubted that the executive head of the federal government is now in fact the depository of the complete executive power, as it is understood to comprehend both political and administrative power. He is authorized to appoint certain officers in the executive departments, the discharge of whose duties is under his direction; 1 Cra. 165; 12 Pet. 524; 5 Cra. C. C. 103. This is considered by the writer last cited to be a great enlargement of the American conception; and this view seems to be well supported by the considerations already suggested. It is true that at the time of the adoption of the constitution the powers conferred upon the president were considered by many to be so great as to endanger the stability of the Union, and it is considered by one of the ablest authorities on constitutional law that no one of the three great departments "has been more shorn of its just powers, or crippled in the exercise of them, than the presidency"; Miller, Const. U. S. 20, 95. But the context shows that this has reference solely to the encroachments on the appointing power by the extra-legal participation of members of congress therein—an evil much mitigated by the extension of the civil service system to the greater number of offices which were formerly not subject to its operation.

The administrative power of the president includes not only the control of the personnel of the public service but also the vast number of powers brought into action in the course of the administration of the government growing out of powers vested in the president by his duty under the constitution to see that the laws are faithfully executed. These duties, aside from this specific enumeration in the constitution as already stated, are those imposed upon the president by act of congress, and may be either of a special or general character, as the promulgation of regulations for the control of particular branches of the public service, such as consular regulations and the civil service rules; but in most cases such executive regulations proceed from the heads of departments and not from the president directly, although they are in law presumed to proceed from him; 18 Peters 498, 513; 10 id. 291; 20 Wall. 92, 109; 99 U. S. 10, 19; 101 id. 755. Executive acts, as to the manner of doing which there is no provision of law, may be done through the head of the proper department whose acts are the acts of the president in contemplation of law; 137 U. S. 202, 217. The president may act in special cases by directions to his subordinate officers, either directly or through the head of a department, or by his decision on appeal from either of them, though, as a rule, he is not considered to be authorized to entertain such appeals except as to the jurisdiction of the officer appealed from; 15 Op. Att. Gen. 94, 100, reviewing opinions on this question. In other cases the appeal does not go beyond the head of the department; 4 id. 515; 9 id. 462; 10 id. 526.

Congress may impose on any executive officer any duty which is not repugnant to any right which is secured and protected by the constitution; 1 Cra. 137; 12 Pet. 524. With respect to certain executive functions which spring from the legislation of congress, after the occasion is created by the passage of a law, the authority of the legislature is ended, and the uncontrolled discretion of the executive attaches and is exercised independently of the other departments of the government. In the exercise of such powers the discretion of the subordinate officer, within his sphere, is the discretion of the president. Of this character are the control of the military resources of the government; the pardoning power and the power of appointment, all of which are dormant until legislation has been enacted for creating an army and navy, or defining crimes and punishments and the creation of offices. As to another class of executive powers which depend entirely upon the legislation of congress both for their existence and their scope, the president merely executes the law. Within this class necessarily fall the greater number of executive functions, and they differ from the other classes in that, with respect to them, the president may be deprived of all discretion.

The executive powers which are derived directly from the constitution would still remain if all the legislative acts of congress were repealed. As to these the president is clothed with unrestrained discretion, and his acts in pursuance of them are purely political. He cannot be controlled nor can his powers be enlarged or diminished by legislation, though through the medium of proper laws he may be aided in the performance of the duties thus imposed upon him. For example, an attempt to limit the pardoning power or control its effect has been held unconstitutional, where the supreme court having declared that the power of the president dispensed with the necessity of proof of loyalty in cases authorizing claims for the value of property seized as captured or abandoned during the war; congress subsequently enacted that such proof should be required irrespective of any executive pardon or amnesty. This the court held unconstitutional, saying:—"Now it is clear that the legislature cannot change the effect of such a pardon any more than the executive can change a law. Yet this is attempted by the provision under consideration. The court is required to receive special pardons as evidence of guilt and to treat them as null and void. It is required to disregard pardons granted by proclamation on condition, though the condition has been fulfilled, and to deny them their legal effect. This certainly impairs the executive authority and directs the court to be instrumental to that end." 13 Wall. 123, 148. But when a claim was made against the government for payment for supplies furnished before the war, it was held that the prohibitory legislation of congress prevented a recovery, because the disability of the claimant to receive a debt from the United States did not arise as a consequence of any offence but out of a state of war, and ended with the close of the war, and not by reason of the pardon, which operated only to relieve him from punishment for his acts and gave him no new rights; 118 U. S. 62.

As to his express powers the president is equally independent of the courts and can be held for maladministration of them only by impeachment; 1 Cra. 165; 13 Pet. 534;

5 Cra. C. C. 163; Hempst. 306.

The command of the army and navy is essentially an executive power; 2 St. Const. § 149; 2 Kent 389; though it did not pass without criticism; 2 Elliot, Deb. 365; 3 id. 103, 108; the power to call out the militia is discretionary and his judgment of the necessity is final; 13 Wheat. 29; and he may delegate the command of it; Rawle, Const. 193; 2 St. Const., 5th ed. § 1492, n. 3. See 5 Mass. 343.

The power to require opinions from the heads of departments has been termed a mere redundancy; Federalist, No. 74; but it is said to be not without its use and frequently acted upon; 3 St. Const. § 1493; especially in two notable instances, by President Washington, 1793, relative to the condition of affairs between France and Great Britain, and by President Grant in 1873 in reference to the subject of expatriation; Miller, Const. U. S. 185.

The pardoning power of the president extends to any case in which it might have been exercised under the English law; 7 Pet. 150; 18 How. 307; and includes the power to grant a conditional pardon; id.; 4 Wall. 333; to relieve against forfeiture of property under a confiscation act; 6 Wall. 766; or release from fines, penalties, and forfeitures which accrue from the offence; 91 U. S. 474; or contempt of court; 24 La. Ann. 119; s. c. 13 Am. Rep. 115; it includes amnesty; 13 Wall. 128; and a general amnesty proclamation includes domiciled aliens; 16 Wall. 14, 148. The power of the president to issue a proclamation of general amnesty has been much drawn into question, and it was denied in a report of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate made Feb. 17, 1869, that he could do it without the authority or assent of congress. It was the subject of legislation, an express power being granted to the president by sec. 13 of the act of June 17, 1862, which was repealed by act of Jan. 19, 1867. It was, however, generally considered that the subject was within the power of the executive, and it was exercised by Presidents Washington, Adams, Madison, Lincoln, and Johnson, and independently of congressional action. See an extended discussion of the subject in 8 Am. Law Reg. n. s. 513, 577. The president may act on pardons immediately, or first refer them to the executive departments; 14 Op. Att. Gen. 20.

The power to make treaties "embraces all sorts of treaties, for peace or war; for commerce or territory; for alliances or succors; for indemnity for injuries or payment of debt; for the recognition and enforcement of principles of public law; and for any other purposes which the policy or interests of independent sovereigns may dictate in their intercourse with each other." 2 St. Const. sec. 1508. This power is plenary; 14 Pet. 540; 93 U. S. 188; it includes removing the disabilities of aliens to inherit; 5 Cal. 381; or enabling them to purchase and hold lands in the United States; 2 Wheat. 259.

An important question has frequently arisen as to the effect of this power where legislation was required to give effect to a treaty. "In regard to this, any serious difficulty has been averted by the wisdom and forbearance of the house of representatives;" Miller, Const. U. S. 168. See also id. 181, and authorities cited; Pom. Const. L. §§ 676-681; 1 Kent 298; TREATIES.

The power of appointment includes nomination and appointment, and the power to commission is distinct, but when the commission is signed and sealed, the legal right of the officer is vested and delivery of the commission is not essential; 1 Cra. 137; 19 How. 74. The nomination is a recommendation in writing; 1 Cra. 137; 7 Op. Att. Gen. 196; and the senate can only affirm or reject; 3 Op. Att. Gen. 188; congress cannot by law designate the person to fill an office; 13 How. 40. The president cannot make a temporary appointment in a recess, if the senate was in session when or since the vacancy occurred; 16 Am. L. Reg. 746.

Whether a newly created office, not before filled, is a vacancy, within the constitutional power of the president to make temporary appointments, is a question upon which courts and attorneys-general have differed. The most reasonable conclusion and that best supported by authority seems to be that it is not; Cooley, Const. Law 104, n. 5; Ordonaux, Const. Leg. 107; and it is said that if the senate is in session when offices are created by law and no appointment is made, no vacancy exists in such sense that the president can appoint during the recess; id.; 2 St. Const. § 1559; 7 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 786; 8 Fed. Rep. 112.

Strictly speaking, an appointment to office is an executive act; 3 J. J. Marsh. 404; 2 Goodn. Comp. Adm. L. 22; but in many cases it has been held that it may be exercised by the legislative power, and this in the absence of negative constitutional limitation is held valid; id.; Cooley, Const. Lim. 115, n.; 15 Md. 876; 18 Mich. 481; 24 id. 44; 6 W. Va. 583; infra, 118 Ind. 449; id. 426; 7 Ohio St. 546; 29 id. 102.

See, generally, as to the president's power of appointment and removal, 2 St. Const. §§ 1545-1558; Rawle, Const. 100; Sergeant, Const. ch. 29; Miller, Const. U. S. 156; Pom. Const. L. §§ 642-651.

Among the executive powers of first importance vested in the president is the management of foreign affairs, including the treaty power, to be exercised with the consent of the senate, and the power to appoint and receive foreign ministers, both of which are expressed in the constitution.

A question recently much discussed, is whether the recognition of a foreign revolutionary government is a matter entrusted, under the constitution, to the discretion of the president acting alone, or whether it is vested in congress, or requires the joint action of both of the political departments of the government. It has been contended on the one hand that this power

"rests exclusively with the executive," and that "a resolution on the subject by the senate or by the house, by both bodies or by one, whether concurrent or joint, is inoperative legislation, and is important only as advice of great weight voluntarily tendered to the executive regarding the manner in which he shall exercise his constitutional functions."

Such is the view said to have been expressed by Secretary Olney in a public statement, which, although not an official document, was generally accepted as a fit expression of the opinion of those who take the extreme view of the prerogative of the executive on this subject. The occasion of this utterance was a unanimous report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the Senate, recommending the passage of a joint resolution, "That the independence of the Republic of Cuba be, and the same is, hereby acknowledged by the United States of America."

The opposite opinion is based upon the idea that, because the constitution vests in congress the power to declare war (which is liable to be a consequence of the recognition of a new government) not only is the action of that body necessary, but it is the proper department of the government to act in such case. At least it is contended that congress has the power to act even if its power is not exclusive.

The argument in favor of the absolute and exclusive control of the subject by congress is substantially this:—The recognition of the independence of a people is from its very nature the creation of obligations arising from international law, and therefore must belong to the law-making power; it is also a supreme act of sovereignty and must be done by that department of the government in which the national sovereignty resides. Under the constitution, congress is invested with almost all the prerogatives of sovereignty, the only one granted to the president being the pardoning power, and even that is denied in cases of impeachment. The power in question is not directly granted to the president; therefore, is not one of his functions unless necessary to the full and proper exercise of some power directly granted to him or inherent in the office. His general inherent function is to execute the laws, to which this power of recognition has no relation, unless it be exercised in pursuance of law.

The only expressed power from which it is sought to imply this far-reaching authority is that of receiving ambassadors and ministers; and that, it is urged, is simply a ceremonial duty, imposed upon him as the medium through which the government communicates with foreign governments. As the power of receiving ambassadors and ministers can be exercised pursuant to the direction of congress in doubtful cases, the power to determine the existence or independence of a nation is not necessarily involved in the constitutional grant of power to receive ambassadors, etc. If this power is vested in the executive, it is unlimited and involves the authority, so far as this government is concerned, to alter the map of the world, change the relation of this government to other governments, and involve the country in war. That such uncontrolled executive power over foreign relations was intended, cannot be reconciled with the fact that the president cannot declare war, or make a treaty, or appoint an ambassador or consul without the consent of the senate.

The argument from this point of view is very forcibly stated in a speech by Senator Bacon, Jan. 18, 1897, in the United States senate, made expressly to take issue with the position taken by Secretary Olney, supra.

A third view is that, under the constitution and according to precedent,

"the recognition of the independence of a new foreign power is an act of the executive (president alone, or president and senate), and not of the legislative branch of the government. Although the executive branch may properly first consult the legislature. While the legislative branch of the government cannot directly exercise the power of recognizing a foreign government, because that is a power executive or judicial in nature (and one which the judiciary, by refusing independently to examine the question, cast entirely upon the executive), nevertheless, if a recognition of such independence is liable to become a casus belli with some other foreign power, it is most advisable as well as proper for the executive first to consult the legislative branch as to its wishes and postpone its own action if not assured of legislative approval."

The basis of the argument in favor of legislative participation in such action is mainly the power to declare war and, as particularly urged by Mr. Clay, the power to regulate commerce. The argument in favor of exclusive executive power is found in the general control of foreign relations, as to which the only expressed powers are to "make treaties" and to "receive ambassadors and other ministers." The argument of greater force in favor of executive control is, however, not that the power in question is included in the specific powers named but that it is a part of the general grant of executive power; that all duties in connection with foreign relations, not otherwise specified, are placed upon the executive, and that the two powers enumerated are merely illustrative and not exclusive. This third view is thus stated in a memorandum submitted to the United States senate by Senator Hale in connection with resolutions pending for the recognition of Cuba, and printed as Ex. Doc. No. 56, 2d Sess. 54th Cong.

"It is in the light of this conception of the executive character of foreign negotiations and acts concerning foreign relations that our constitution gave the president power to send and receive ministers and agents to or from any country he sees fit, and when he sees fit, and not to send or receive any, as he may think best. Also, the power to make treaties; that is, to negotiate with or without agents, as he may prefer, when he may prefer, or not at all, if he prefer; to draw up such articles as may suit him; and to ratify the acts of his plenipotentiaries, instructed by him, the only qualification of his power being the advice and consent of the senate to the treaty he makes. These grants confirm the executive character of the proceedings, and indicate an intent to give all the power to the president, which the federal government itself was to possess—the general control of foreign relations."

The extent of executive control of foreign relations was the subject of an extended debate in congress in 1796, upon a resolution calling upon the president for details of the negotiations leading up to the Jay treaty with England, the exact question, however, being the effect of a treaty when negotiated. See TREATY.

With respect to the express power of the executive to make treaties, that is relations," and it was held that the court could not inquire whether it had not in fact become an independent sovereign state before its recognition as such by the treaty-making power; 14 How. 38, 51.

In the Prize Cases, much later than any of those above cited (relating not to foreign but to domestic relations, and therefore not strictly applicable), this language is used:

"As in the case of an insurrection, the President must, in the absence of congressional action, determine what degree of force the crisis demands, and as in political matters the courts must be governed by the decisions and acts of the political department to which this power is entrusted, the proclamation of blockade by the president is of itself conclusive evidence that a state of war existed which demanded and authorized recourse to such a measure." 2 Black 635.

In this case, the court terms the executive the political department of the government, and in a later case it so designates congress; 1 Wall. 412. More recently in a case in which the president was authorized, by act of congress, to declare that a guano island belonged to the United States, the court said:

"Who is the sovereign, de jure or de facto, of a territory is not a judicial, but a political, question, the determination of which by the legislative and executive departments of any government conclusively binds the judges as well as all other officers, citizens, and subjects of that government;" 137 U. S. 232.

With reference to the status of the revolutionary party of Chile, the circuit court of appeals said that it was to be regarded by the courts as determined by the executive department of the United States; 56 Fed. Rep. 505; aff'd 48 id. 99.

The earliest reference to this subject by a text-writer is by Rawle, who says:

"The power of receiving foreign ambassadors carries with it, among other things, the right of judging in the case of a revolution in a foreign country, whether the new ruler ought to be recognized. The legislature, indeed, possesses a superior power, and may declare its dissent from the executive recognition or refusal, but until their sense is declared, the act of the executive is binding. The judicial power can take no notice of a new government, until one of the other of those two departments has acted on it. Circumstances may render the decision of great importance to the interests and peace of the country. A precipitate acknowledgment of the independence of part of a foreign nation, separating itself from its former head, may provoke the resentment of the latter; a refusal to do so may disgust the former, and prevent the attainment of amity and commerce with them if they succeed. The principle on which the separation takes place must also be taken into consideration, and if they are conformable to those which led to our own independence, and appear likely to be preserved, a strong impulse will arise in favor of recognition. The power of congress on this subject cannot be controlled; they may, if they think proper, acknowledge a small and helpless community, though with a certainty of drawing war upon our country; but greater circumspection is required from the president, who, not having the constitutional power to declare war, ought ever to abstain from a measure likely to produce it." Rawle, Const. 136.

A little later Story wrote:

"The exercise of this prerogative of acknowledging new nations or ministers is, therefore, under such circumstances, an executive function of great delicacy, which requires the utmost caution and deliberation. . . . If such recognition is made, it is conclusive upon the nation, unless indeed, it can be reversed by an act of congress repudiating it. If, on the other hand, such recognition has been refused by the executive, it is said that congress may, notwithstanding, solemnly acknowledge the sovereignty of the nation or party (citing Rawle). These, however, are propositions which have hitherto remained as abstract statements under the constitution, and therefore can be propounded, not as absolutely true, but as still open to discussion if they should ever arise in the course of our foreign diplomacy. The constitution has expressly invested the executive with power to receive ambassadors and other ministers. It has not expressly invested congress with the power either to repudiate or acknowledge them." 2 Sto. Const. § 1669.

In connection with this treatment of the subject is to be considered the judicial utterance of Judge Story, before cited from 8 Sumn. 270. Pomeroy is also cited in Senator Hale's memorandum as an authority in favor of the exclusive executive control, which he does assert strongly with reference to foreign relations, and the treaty-making power in general, but he does not discuss the particular question under consideration; while he enforces with great earnestness the necessity of harmonious action of congress and the executive, and of their co-operation in giving due effect to the powers confided to each; Pom. Const. Law § 676.

tional Law, in discussing the subject of the recognition of various revolutionary governments, entitles section vii. of chap. iii., vol. 1, thus: "Such recognition determinable by executive," thus implying the opinion that the right rests with the executive alone. The author states the proposition embodied in his caption more fully thus:

"In political matters the courts follow the department of the government to which those matters may be committed, and will not recognize the existence of a new government until it has been recognized by the executive." Most of the cases, however, which are cited by him under this caption are among the authorities upon the proposition already noted, that it is not a matter for the judicial department of the government, but that the courts will not take cognizance of the existence of a new government until it has been recognized by the political department of the government, without discriminating between the executive and legislative branches of the government.

From an examination of all the decisions touching this question by the judicial department, no precise principle can be deduced unless it be that the references to it rest upon an assumption of entire harmony of action between the executive and legislative departments. And the fact that the direct issue arising from the claim of exclusive control by one of those two departments has not heretofore been made, will readily account for the absence of direct judicial authority or authoritative expression of opinion by text-writers. The duties and powers of what the supreme court frequently terms the political departments are so closely interwoven that it is unlikely that such an issue will be sharply drawn. Every approach to it hitherto has resulted, after discussion, in the recognition by congress of the right of the executive to full control of foreign relations and to the initiative in the practical recognition of a new foreign power, and, on the other hand, by a prudent disposition on the part of the executive not to act in a doubtful case or one likely to create a casus belli without ascertaining the disposition of congress. This has been simply the application to this particular subject of the principle of mutual recognition of the distribution of powers and interdependence of the executive and congress which, with the prudent reserve of the judiciary in keeping closely within the limits of its own sphere, has enabled the government to avoid the dangers of mere theoretical construction alluded to by Mr. Otis in the quotation made from his remarks upon the subject. The undoubted constitutional powers of both departments bearing upon the question make harmony of action as necessary in dealing with this subject as with most; if not all, of the ordinary details of the government. While the president may undoubtedly recognize a foreign government, as has frequently been done, such action, if it involved war, would still require the action of congress to make it effective, and doubtless the precedents established by Presidents Jackson and Monroe, neither of whom was indifferent to the respect due to his office, will always have very great, if not controlling, weight. Again, the question recently raised of the right of congress by independent action and against the views of this president, to recognize the independence of a new nation, is more likely to be met hereafter, as heretofore, in the spirit of co-operation and full recognition of the executive control of foreign relations than to be asserted, to the extent of making a direct issue, as it would need to be by a majority of two-thirds of each house.

Executive officers, including the president, are required to execute the laws as enacted by the legislature or congress, and can in no case nullify them by refusing to execute them so long as their unconstitutionality or invalidity has not been judicially established, for, until this is done, the constitutionality is presumed, and in the judicial power alone resides the power to decide as to the validity of a statute; Pom. Const. L. secs. 148, 662-663; 2 Dall. 304; 1 Wheat. 304; 6 id. 264; 21 How. 506.

The question whether an executive officer has, under any circumstances, the right to question the constitutionality of an act of congress, and to make this decision the basis of acting upon claims to be passed upon by him, was the subject of consideration and extended discussion in the sugar bounty case lately pending before the comptroller of the treasury. It was contended on the one hand that every law must be considered valid until declared otherwise by the supreme court, and that although the comptroller is an independent officer, and not a mere subordinate of the secretary of the treasury or the president, such an exercise of jurisdiction would be a dangerous usurpation by an executive officer of judicial authority, which is confided by the constitution exclusively to the courts. On the other hand, it was urged that the constitution is the supreme law, and that an executive officer is responsible for a wrongful act under an unconstitutional statute. It was replied that his responsibility is political. The claim was disallowed by the comptroller upon the ground that the act was unconstitutional and the case sent to the court of claims under the authority of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1065. The act in question had been held unconstitutional, but not by the court of last resort; 23 Wash. Law Rep. 83. Subsequently the act was held to be constitutional by the supreme court, but the question of the power of the comptroller was not determined; 163 U. S. 427. This decision of the comptroller and the questions involved have been elaborately discussed by Mr. Black, the writer on constitutional law, who, after an examination of the authorities, reaches the conclusion that the power of an executive officer to judge of the constitutionality of a statute (in advance of a determination by the courts) is confined to cases in which it is necessary for the regulation of his own conduct, and that where the rights of others are involved he must enforce the law; 29 Am. L. Rev. 801. See also 11 Op. Atty. Gen. 214; 114 U. S. 270; 96 id. 567; 104 id. 728; 135 id. 100; 120 id. 102.

The same principle is applied in the state governments. In a recent case in Louisiana it was held that the executive officers of the state government have no authority to decline the performance of purely ministerial duties imposed upon them by a statute, on the ground that it is unconstitutional. An executive officer cannot nullify a law by neglecting or refusing to act under it; 18 So. Rep. (La.) 746.

The so-called war powers of the executive, so much discussed during the late war, do not now present a practical subject for discussion, and may be passed, with this quotation from a judicious writer on the subject:

"During our Civil War, many powers were claimed and exercised by the president under a stringency of circumstances for which no provision had been made in the constitution. Secession being the outgrowth of the doctrine of states governed by compact and not by law, it became necessary, in the complication growing out of the war, whether in the form of military occupancy and blockade, legislative reconstruction, or judicial protection of persons and property in the seceded states, to find by implication, in the executive department, certain war powers not hitherto contemplated and never before invoked. While the general results of their exercise doubtless contributed to the restoration of the Union, and the re-establishment of the government of the United States over all its territory, these powers were so far anomalous in their assumption as to afford no justifiable precedents for the government of the executive, in the ordinary circumstances of our federal administration. A formal discussion of their scope and application has accordingly been omitted, because they present exceptions in the body of our constitutional legislation that are never again likely to be repeated." Ordronaux, Const. Leg. 109. See Whiting, War Powers under the Constitution; Campbell, Collection of Pamphlets on Habeas Corpus, Martial Law, etc.

The president is not responsible to the courts, civil or criminal; 4 Blatchf. 451; nor are his acts reviewable by them to the extent of bringing them into conflict with him; 4 Wall. 475; except that they may declare void an order or regulation in excess of his powers; 1 Gall. 137; 9 Am. Law Reg. 524; but with respect to all of his political functions growing out of the foreign relations, the control of military officers, and his relations with congress, it is settled that the courts have no control whatever; 5 Peters 1, 20; 7 How. 1; 4 Wall. 475; 1 Goodn. Comp. Adm. L. 84, 73; Pom. Const. L. § 638. See also 1 Ves. 467;

1 Ves. Jr. 875; 2 id. 56.

All the acts of the president by which his political powers are exercised are considered equally political, and are only brought within the scope of judicial examination where the act of some inferior ministerial officer, who is the direct instrument for exercising the executive function, is submitted to the scrutiny of the courts. This usually occurs where the constitutionality of a law is questioned by the judicial examination of the act of some officer who has attempted to carry the law into execution. In such a case there is not a direct judicial examination of the president's acts, or those of his subordinates, but merely the determination of the question whether there is a valid law; id. 419; 1 Cranch 187; 4 Wall. 475; Pom. Const. Law § 683.

So, as a necessary incident of the power to perform his executive duties, must be included freedom from any obstruction or impediments; accordingly, the president cannot be liable to arrest, imprisonment, or detention, while he is in the discharge of the duties of his office; and for this purpose his person must be deemed, in civil cases at least, to possess an official inviolability; 2 St. Const. § 1569.

Whether in any case a court may issue a mandamus to the governor of a state is a question on which the decisions are not uniform. In some states it is held that, although conceding the independence of the executive from the control of the judiciary with respect to political duties and powers, as to ministerial duties imposed upon the executive, which might have been committed to another officer, the writ may be resorted to; 7 Jones, L. 545; 5 Ohio St. 528; 39 Cal. 189; 25 Md. 173; 42 id. 572; 17 Colo. 156; 36 Ala. 371; 31 Neb. 82; 2 Mont. 242; 38 Kan. 641. But the weight of authority would seem to be in favor of the contrary opinion; 32 Me. 508; 8 R. I. 192; 19 Ill. 229; 100 id. 472; 120 Mo. 428; 127 Ind. 588; 25 N. J. L. 331; 8 Ga. 360; 39 Mo. 398; 120 id. 428; 1 Ark. 571; 29 Mich. 320; 17 Fla. 67; 22 La. Ann. 1; 19 Minn. 103; 61 Miss. 102.

As to other executive officers, such as secretary of state, treasurer, auditor, and the like, though some conflict exists, the better-considered doctrine, and that supported by the great weight of authority, is properly said to be that courts will apply the general principle of law and issue the writ in the case of purely ministerial acts; High, Ext. Leg. Rem. § 124a-126, where the cases are collected.

The same principle is applied to determine how far the courts will interfere in like manner with the heads of executive departments, or bureaus thereof, of the federal government. If the act is purely ministerial the writ will issue; 12 Pet. 524; 16 D. C. 428; but it must be an act not growing out of the inherent powers of the officer; 6 How. 92; 17 id. 284; and in no case where the act involves the exercise of discretion will the court interfere; 4 Wall. 522; 9 id. 298; 116 U. S. 423; 128 id. 40; 137 id. 637; 139 id. 306; 155 id. 803.

EXECUTOR. One to whom another man commits by his last will the execution of that will and testament. 2 Bla. Com. 503.

A person to whom a testator by his will commits the execution, or putting in force, of that instrument and its codicils. Fonbl.

Rights and Wrongs 307. See LETTERS TESTAMENTARY; HERES.

Lord Hardwicke, in 3 Atk. 801, says, "The proper term in the civil law, as to goods, is heres testamentarius; and executor is a barbarous term, unknown to that law." And again, "What we call executor and residuary legatee is, in the civil law, universal heir." Id. 801.

The word executor, taken in its broadest sense, has three acceptations. 1. Executor a lege constitutus. He is the ordinary of the diocese. 2. Executor ab episcopo constitutus or executor datus; and that is he who is called an administrator to an intestate. 3. Executor a testator constitutus, or executor testamentarius; and that is he who is usually meant when the term executor is used. 1 Wms. Ex. 185.

A general executor is one who is appointed to administer the whole estate, without any limit of time or place, or of the subject-matter.

A rightful executor is one lawfully appointed by the testator, by his will. Deriving his authority from the will, he may do most acts before he obtains letters testamentary; but he must be possessed of them before he can declare in an action brought by him as such; 1 P. Wms. 763; Wms. Ex. 173.

An instituted executor is one who is appointed by the testator without any condition, and who has the first right of acting when there are substituted executors.

A substituted executor is a person appointed executor if another person who has been appointed refuses to act.

An example will show the difference between an instituted and a substituted executor. Suppose a man makes his son his executor, but if he will not act he appoints his brother, and if neither will act, his cousin; here the son is the instituted executor in the first degree, the brother is said to be substituted in the second degree, the cousin in the third degree, and so on. See Swinb. Wills, pt. 4, s. 19, pl. 1.

An executor de son tort is one who, without lawful authority, undertakes to act as executor of a person deceased. See EXECUTOR DE SON TORT.

A special executor is one who is appointed or constituted to administer either a part of the estate, or the whole for a limited time, or only in a particular place.

An executor to the tenor is a person who is not directly appointed by the will an executor, but who is charged with the duties which appertain to one; as, "I appoint A B to discharge all lawful demands against my will;" 3 Phill. Eccl. 116; 1 Eccl. 374; Swinb. Wills 247; Wentw. Ex. pt. 4, s. 4, p. 230; [1892] Prob. 227, 380; 66 Law T. N. s. 332.

Qualification. Generally speaking, all persons who are capable of making wills, and many others besides, may be executors; 2 Bla. Com. 503. The king may be an executor. So may a corporation sole. So may a corporation aggregate; Toller, Exec. 30; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. 32. So may an alien, if he be not an alien enemy residing abroad or unlawfully continuing in the country. See 3 Abb. App. Dec. 86. So may married women and infants; and even infants unborn, or en ventre sa mère, may be executors; 1 Dane, Abr. c. 29 a 2, § 3; 5 S. & R. 40. But in England an infant cannot act solely as executor until his full age of twenty-one years. Meanwhile, his guardian or some other person acts for him as administrator cum test. ann. See 25 Miss. 162; Schoul. Dom. Rel. § 416; ADMINISTRATION. A married woman cannot be executrix without her husband's consent; 56 Me. 300; 84 Ala. 40; 2 Ark. 212. But a man by marrying an executrix becomes executor in her right, and is liable to account as such; 2 Atk. 212; 1 Des. 150.

Persons attainted, outlaws, insolvents, and persons of bad moral character may be qualified as executors, because they act en autre droit and it was the choice of the testator to appoint them; 6 Q. B. 57; 12 B. Monr. 191; 7 W. & S. 244; 3 Salk. 162. It is the duty of the court, when a will has been proven, to grant letters testamentary to the person named in it upon application, if he is not disqualified by statute; 16 Or. 147. Poverty or insolvency is no ground for refusing to qualify an executor; but an insolvent executor may be compelled to give security; 2 Halst. Ch. 9; 2 Barb. Ch. 351; 148 Pa. 564. In some states a bond is required from executors, similar to or identical with that required from administrators.

The testator may, by express direction, exempt from the obligation of giving a bond with sureties any trustees whom he appoints or directs to be appointed, but not his executor, unless permitted to do so by state statute; because the creditors of the estate must look to the funds in the executor's hands.

Idiots and lunatics cannot be executors; and an executor who becomes non compos may be removed; 1 Salk. 86; 2 Robertson 128. In Massachusetts, when an executor shall become insane, or otherwise incapable of discharging his trust, or evidently unsuitable therefor, the judge of probate may remove him; 11 Metc. 104. A drunkard may perform the office of executor; 12 B. Monr. 191; 7 W. & S. 244; but in some states, as Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, there are statutes providing for his removal. A court will not reject an executor on the ground that he is lacking in honesty, integrity, and business experience; 61 Conn. 420. As to who may be, see 80 Cent. L. J. 222.

Appointment. Executors can be appointed only by will or codicil; but the word "executor" need not be used. He may be appointed and designated, by committing to his charge those duties which it is the province of an executor to perform; 3 Phill. Eccl. 118; 10 B. Monr. 394; 3 Bradf. Surr. 32; 2 Spears 97; 7 Watts 51; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. 88. Even a direction to keep accounts will, in the absence of any thing to the contrary, constitute the person addressed an executor. A testator may project his power of appointment into the future and exercise it after death through an agent pointed out by name or by his office; 56 Conn. 208.

The appointment of an executor may be absolute, qualified, or conditional. It is absolute when he is constituted certainly, immediately, and without any restriction in regard to the testator's effects or limitation in point of time; Toller, Ex. 36. It may be qualified as to the time or place wherein, or the subject-matters whereon, the office is to be exercised; 1 Will. Ex. 204. Thus, a man may be appointed executor, and his term made to begin or end with the marriage of testator's daughter; or his authority may be limited to the state; or to one class of property, as if A be made executor of goods and chattels in possession, and B of choses in action; Swinb. Wills, pt. 4, s. 17, pl. 4; Off. Exeo. 29; 3 Phill. Eccl. 424. Still, as to creditors, three limited executors all act as one executor, and may be sued as one; Cro. Car. 293. Finally, an executor may be appointed conditionally, and the condition may be precedent or subsequent. Such is the case when A is appointed in case B shall resign. Godolphin, Orph. Leg. pt. 2, c. 2, § 1. As to appointment, see 24 L. R. A. 684; 39 Sol. J. 228, 244.

Removal. An executor who fails to keep proper accounts or to render any account for a long period, who retains the trust funds mixed with his own and who makes improper investments, should be dismissed; 157 Pa. 215; but the mere delay of an executor to convert real estate into personality when the same has increased in value, is not such misconduct as to warrant his removal; 65 Hun 621. He may be removed, however, where he has any conflicting personal interest; 148 Mass. 247.

Assignment. An executor cannot assign his office. In England, if he dies having proved the will, his own executor becomes also the original testator's executor. But if he dies intestate, an administrator de bonis non of the first testator succeeds to the executorship. And an administrator de bonis non succeeds to the executorship in both these events, in the United States generally, wherever a trust is annexed to the office of executor; 4 Munf. 231; 7 Gill 81; 8 Ired. Eq. 52; 17 Me. 204; 1 Barb. Ch. 563; 4 Fla. 144.

Acceptance. The appointee may accept or refuse the office of executor; 3 Phill. Eccl. 577; 4 Pick. 33; 34 Me. 37; 65 N. H. 102. But his acceptance may be implied by acts of authority over the property which evince a purpose of accepting, and by any acts which would make him an executor de son tort, which see. So his refusal may be inferred from his keeping aloof from all management of the estate; 5 Johns. Ch. 388; 16 Conn. 391; 9 Murph. Eq. 85; 9 Ala. 181; 63 Pa. 166; 158 id. 645. But he cannot be compelled to accept and qualify or renounce in some formal manner; 76 Ia. 163. See Wms. Exrs. 74. If one of two or more appointees accepts, and the other declines or dies, or becomes insane, he becomes sole executor; 6 Watts 373. An administrator de bonis non cannot be joined with an executor.

Acts before probate. The will itself is the sole source of an executor's title. Probate is the evidence of that title. See 97 Ala. 375; 10 Pick. 463; 34 N. H. 407. Before probate, an executor may do nearly all the acts which he can do after. He can receive payments, discharge debts, collect and recover assets, sell bank-stock, give or receive notice of dishonor, initiate or maintain proceedings in bankruptcy, sell or give away goods and chattels, and pay legacies. And when he has acted before probate he may be sued before probate; 6 Term 296; 4 Metc. 431. He may commence, but he cannot maintain, suits before probate, except such suits as are founded on his actual possession; 8 C. & P. 128; 7 Ark. 404; 3 Me. 174; 3 N. H. 517; 2 Atk. 285; 5 Exch. Cas. 14. So in some states he cannot sell land without letters testamentary; 7 Cra. 115; 9 Wheat. 565; or transfer a mortgage; 1 Pick. 81; or remain in his own state and sue by attorney elsewhere; 12 Metc. 423; or indorse a note so as to be sued, in some states; 5 Me. 261; 2 N. H. 291. And see 2 Pet. 239; 7 Johns. 45; Byles. Bills 40; Story, Fr. Notes 394; Story, Bills 250; 67 Ga. 448.

Powers of executors. An executor may do, in general, whatever an administrator can. See ADMINISTRATOR. His authority dates from the moment of his testator's death; Com. Dig. Administration (B 10); 5 B. & Ald. 745; 2 W. Bla. 692; 10 Ad. & El. 212. When once probate is granted, his acts are good until formally reversed by the court; 3 Term 125; 15 S. & R. 39. In some states he has power over both real and personal estate; 3 Mass. 514; 1 Pick. 157. In the majority, he has power over the real estate only when expressly empowered by the will, or when the personal estate is insufficient; 9 S. & R. 431; 2 Root 438; 25 Wend. 224; 3 McCord 371; 9 Ga. 55; 27 N. J. Eq. 445; 57 Ind. 42. The will may direct him to sell lands to pay debts, but the money resulting is usually held to be equitable assets only; 9 B. & C. 499; 3 Brev. 242; 8 B. Monr. 499; 82 Ill. 392; 50 N. J. L. 686; but the title and right of possession to the land remain in the heirs until the sale, and they are the proper parties to maintain ejectment; 68 Miss. 510; but see 112 N. C. 791; and to collect the rents; 168 Pa. 431. In equity, the testator's intention will be regarded as to whether the surplus fund, after a sale of the real estate and payment of debts, shall go to the heir; 1 Wms. Ex. 555. Am. note. An executor's power is that of a mere trustee, who must apply the goods for such purposes as are sanctioned by law; 4 Term 645; 9 Co. 88; Co. 2d Inst. 286; 13 Bush 77; 16 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 12. The personal representative has the legal title to the chooses in action of the deceased, and may transfer, discharge, or compound them as if he were the absolute owner; 83 Ala. 225; 35 N. J. Eq. 461.

Chattels real go to the executor; but he has no interest in freehold terms or leases, unless by local statute, as in South Carolina. But the wife's chattels real, unless taken into possession by her husband during his lifetime, do not pass to his executors; 1 Wms. Ex. 579, n. 5 Whart. 138; 4 Ala. n. s. 350; 7 How. Miss. 425. The husband's act of possession must effect a complete alteration in the nature of the joint interest of husband and wife in her chattels real, or they will survive to her.

Chattels personal go to the executor; 8 Redf. 450; 35 N. J. Eq. 461; 67 Ind. 506; 18 Conn. 610. Such are emblements; Brooke, Abr. Emblements; 4 H. & J. 139; 98 N. C. 393; but see 96 Ala. 536. Heirlooms and fixtures go to the heir; and as to what are fixtures, see FIXTURES, and 1 Wms. Ex. 615; 2 Sm. L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 1450; Crow. Ex. & Ad. 362. The widow's separate property and paraphernalia go to her. For elaborate collections of cases on the effect of nuptial contracts about property upon the executor's right, see 1 Wms. Ex. *660, Am. note 2; 3 id. 686, note 1; 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. 65. Donations mortis causa go to the donee at once, and not to the executor; 1 Nott & M'C. 287; 23 Pa. 59; 16 Gray 408; 56 Me. 237.

Suits. 1. By. In general, a right of action founded on a tort or malfeasance dies with the person. But personal actions founded upon any obligation, contract, debt, covenant, or other duty to be performed, survive, and the executor may maintain them; Cowp. 873; 1 Wms. Saund. 216, n. See 76 Ind. 573; 5 B. & Ad. 78. By statutes in England and the United States this common-law right is much extended. An executor may now have trespass, trover, etc., for injuries done to the intestate during his lifetime. Except for slander, for libels, and for injuries inflicted on the person, executors may bring personal actions, and are liable in the same manner as the deceased would have been; 2 Brod. & B. 102; 2 Johns. Cas. 17; 1 Md. 103; 15 Ala. n. s. 233; 5 Blackf. 232; 6 T. B. Monr. 40; 8 Ohio 211; 9 W. N. C. Pa. 154. See 28 Cal. 607; 17 Vt. 176; 98 Mass. 83. Should his death have been caused by the negligence of any one, they may bring an action for the benefit of the family. Executors may also sue for stocks and annuities, as being personal property. A right of action for the breach of a parol contract for the sale of land survives to the executors; 6 S. & R. 208. So they may sue for an insurance policy. And for all these purposes they may take legal proceedings by action, suit, or summons.

The supreme court of New Jersey has lately held that the courts of New Jersey will enforce the Pennsylvania statute giving a right of action to the widow of one who dies of injuries inflicted by the wrongful act of another, that statute not being repugnant to the policy of the former state; but such an action cannot be brought in New Jersey by the personal representative of the deceased, as required by the laws of that state in similar cases; 84 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 945.

2. Against. An action of trespass quare clausum fregit survives against the executor; 9 Phila. 240. So also in causes of action wholly occurring after the testator's death, the executor is liable individually; 80 N. C. 219. The actions of trespass and trover do not survive against the executors of deceased defendants. But the action of replevin does. The general rule is that causes of action ex contractu survive, while those ex delicto do not. "Executors and administrators are the representatives of the personal property of the deceased and not of his wrongs except so far as the tortious act complained of was beneficial to his estate;" 2 Kent 416.

Wife's choses. In general, choses in action given to the wife either before or after marriage survive to her, provided her husband have not reduced them to possession before his death. A promissory note given to the wife during coverture comes under this rule in England; 12 M. & W. 355; 7 Q. B. 864; but not so in this country generally; 4 Dana 323; 15 Conn. 537; 17 Me. 301; 17 Pick. 391. Mere intention to reduce choses into possession is not a reduction, nor is a mere appropriation of the fund; 5 Ves. 515; 11 S. & R. 377; 3 Whart. 138; 2 Ill. Ch. 644; 4 Ala. n. s. 350; 14 Ohio 100.

Other suits. For actions accruing after the testator's death, the executor may sue either in his own name or as executor. This is true of actions for tort, as trespass or trover, actions on contract and on negotiable paper; 3 Nev. & M. 391; 4 Hill 57; 19 Pick. 432; 4 Jones, N. C. 159. So he may bring replevin in his own name; 6 Fla. 314; and so, in short, wherever the money, when recovered, will be assets, the executor may sue as executor; 20 Wend. 668;

6 Blackf. 120; 1 Pet. 666. See 23 Ark. 585; 56 Pa. 166. An executor cannot recover in ejectment without producing the will; 53 Ga. 637; 87 id. 448.

As to federal jurisdiction over the administration of estates, it is held that by virtue of their chancery powers these courts have jurisdiction over such cases when the requisite citizenship and other conditions exist. The jurisdiction does not extend to the appointment of administrators, confirmation of executors, or the probate of wills; nor will it be exercised when the state courts of concurrent jurisdiction have taken possession of the subject-matter of the controversy. The possession of the state court which will exclude the exercise of power by the federal court, and vice versa, must be the possession of some thing, corporeal or incorporeal, which has been taken under the dominion of the court. A controversy or inquiry is not such a thing, and the pendency of a suit or proceeding in one court, involving a question, controversy, or inquiry, is no bar to the exercise of jurisdiction in the determination of the same question, etc., in the other; 41 Fed. Rep. 468.

Other powers. An executor may sell terms for years, and may even make a good title against a specific legatee, unless the sale be fraudulent. So he may underlet a term. He may indorse a promissory note or a bill payable to the testator or his order; 10 Miss. 687. The rule that executors have no power to confess judgment is not applicable to offers of judgments to firm creditors, by a firm composed of a surviving member and the executor of a deceased member, conducting the interests of the deceased therein; 61 Hun 557; but they may compromise claims; 15 Pick. 79; 26 Me. 531; 50 Tenn. 311; or submit matters in dispute to arbitration; 70 Vt. 340; 41 Ala. 193; 74 N. Y. 38. Without the sanction of the probate court, he has no power to bind the estate by contract, even for the necessities of infant devisees; 91 Mich. 270.

Co-executors. Co-executors are regarded in law as one individual; and hence, in general, the acts of one are the acts of all; Com. Dig. Administration (B 12); 9 Cow. 84; 8 S. C. 244; 83 Tex. 635; 129 N. Y. 190. Hence the assent of one executor to a legacy is sufficient, and the sale or gift of one is the sale or gift of all. So a payment by or to one is a payment by or to all; 8 Blackf. 170; 10 Ired. 263; 74 N. Y. 539; a release by one binds all; 26 Pa. 502. But each is liable only for the assets which have come into his own hands; 11 Johns. 21. So he alone who is guilty of tort or negligence is answerable for it, unless his co-executor has connived at the act or helped him commit it; 74 Cal. 189. An executor is not liable for a derelictus of his co-executor; 9 S. C. 460; 74 N. Y. 539. A power to sell land, conferred by will upon several executors, must be executed by all who proved the will; 2 Dev. & B. 262. But if only one executor consents to act, his sale under a power in the will would be good, and such refusal of the others may be in pais; Cro. Eliz. 80; 3 Dana 195; 92 Mich. 440. If the will gives no direction to the executors to sell, but leaves the sale to the discretion of the executors, all must join. But see less strict rules in 8 Pa. 417; 2 Sandf. 512; 1 N. Y. 341. Where all the executors must unite to make a valid conveyance, no valid contract to convey can be made by a part of them; 72 Wis. 539. One executor cannot bind his co-executors by a confession of judgment without their consent; 2 Pittsb. Pa. 54. On the death of one or more of several joint executors, their rights and powers survive to the survivor; Bac. Abr. Executor (D); Shepp. Touchst. 494. As to acts of co-executor, see 8 Cent. L. J. 63, 82; and as to liability of joint-executors, see 24 id. 147.

Duties. The following is a brief summary of an executor's duties:—

First. He must bury the deceased in a manner suitable to the estate; 2 Bla. Com. 503. But no unreasonable expenses will be allowed, nor any unnecessary expenses if there is any danger of the estate proving insolvent; 2 C. & P. 207; 2 W. N. C. Pa. 447; 24 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 296; 28 La. Ann. 149; 59 N. Y. 582.

Second. Within a convenient time after the testator's death, he should collect the goods of the deceased, if he can do so, peaceably; if resisted, he must apply to the law for redress.

Third. He must prove the will, and take out administration. In England, there are two ways of proving a will,—in common form, and in form of law, or solemn form. In the former, the executor propounds the will,—i. e. presents it to the registrar, in the absence of all other interested parties. In the latter, all parties interested are summoned to show cause why probate should not be granted.

Fourth. Ordinarily, he must make an inventory of personal property at least, and in some states, of real estate also; 5 N. H. 492; 11 Mass. 190; 58 Me. 499; 14 N. J. Eq. 514; 71 Pa. 75. This duty rests on the executors and not on the adult legatees; 65 Hun 619.

Fifth. He must next collect the goods and chattels, and the claims inventoried, with reasonable diligence. And he is liable for a loss by the insolvency of a debtor, if it results from his gross delay; 6 Watts 46; 15 Ala. N. S. 328.

Sixth. He must give notice of his appointment in the statute form, and should advertise for debts and credits; 2 Ohio St. 156; but the giving or not giving it does not affect the statute of limitations, nor does the failure to publish, affect a creditor who did not present his claim; 94 Cal. 357.

Seventh. The personal effects he must deal with as the will directs, and the surplus must be turned into money and divided as if there were no will. The safest method of sale is a public auction.

Eighth. He must keep the money of the estate safely, but not mixed with his own, or he may be charged interest on it. He is also charged when he has misemployed funds or let them lie idle, provided a want of ordinary prudence is proved against him; 4 Mass. 205; 2 Bland, Ch. 306; 1 Sumn. 14; 2 Rand. 409; 4 Harr. N. J. 109; 3 Des. 241; 33 Pa. 258; 131 N. Y. 409. When a debtor is appointed executor of the creditor's will, equity will presume that the debt has been paid, and will treat it as an asset in the executor's hands; 90 Mich. 247. And generally, interest is to be charged on all money received by an executor and not applied to the use of the estate; 1 Bailey, Eq. 98; 1 Dev. Eq. 369; 6 J. J. Marsh. 94; 82 La. 143. See 150 id. 901. But an executor cannot be charged with interest on money allowed him for commission; 10 Pa. 408; 2 Jones, N. C. 347; he is not chargeable with compound interest; 24 Pa. 180. Where investments have been made contrary to the requirements of the will, on personal security, they are at the executor's risk, and he must answer personally for any loss; 48 N. J. Eq. 539. See INTEREST; INVESTMENTS.

Ninth. He must be at all times ready to account to the proper authorities, and must actually file an account at the end of the year generally prescribed by statute. The burden of proving items of a discharge in an accounting is upon the accountant; 48 N. J. Eq. 539.

Tenth. He must pay the debts and legacies in the order required by law. Funeral expenses are preferred debts, and so are debts to the United States, under certain limitations respecting insolvency, by act of congress; 2 Kent 418. Otherwise there is no one order of payment universal in the United States. A valid claim against an estate cannot be defeated on the ground that the estate had been settled before the claim was filed; 85 La. 698. See ADMINISTRATION.

Compensation. Commissions are not allowed on a legacy given in trust to an executor; 1 Bradf. Surr. 198, 321. Reasonable expenses are always allowed an executor; 5 Gray 26; 26 Vt. 763; 3 Cal. 287; 4 Abb. N. Cas. 817; 29 Miss. 72. When one of two co-executors has done nothing, he should get no commission; 20 Barb. 91. In England, executors cannot charge for personal trouble or loss of time, and can only be paid for reasonable expenses. An executor cannot pay himself. His compensation must be ordered by the court; 58 Ind. 374. Faithful service by an executor is a condition to the right of commissions. Misappropriation of funds may forfeit the right; 84 Pa. 51.

In England the jurisdiction of probate formerly belonged to the ecclesiastical courts. It was then exercised in the Court of Probate, which held its sittings in Westminster Hall. There was a principal registry of wills, situated in Doctors Commons, and forty district registries, scattered throughout England and Wales, each presided over by a district registrar, by whom probate was granted where the application was unopposed. This Court of Probate is now consolidated into the Supreme Court of Judicature, and its jurisdiction is exercised by the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of that court. Mozl. & W. Dict. In the United States the jurisdiction is vested in surrogate judges of probate, registers of wills, county courts, etc.

See Schouler; Williams; Crosswell, Exrs. and Adms.; Woerner, Law of Adm.; 3 Field, Lawy. Br. 387-416; 9 Harv. L. Rev. 42; 2 Lawson, Rights & Rem. 889-1008; ADMINISTRATION; ADMINISTRATOR.

EXECUTOR DE SON TORT. One who attempts to act as executor without lawful authority.

If a stranger takes upon him to act as executor without any just authority (as, by intermeddling with the goods of the deceased, and many other transactions), he is called in law an executor of his own wrong, de son tort; 2 Bla. Com. 507; 4 M'Cord 238; 12 Conn. 213; 48 Miss. 38; 14 E. L. & Eq. 510; 3 Litt. 163; 3 Pa. 129; 58 Ala. 810; 38 Ga. 264. If a man kill the cattle of the testator, or take his goods to satisfy a debt, or collect money due him, or pay out such money, or carry on his business, or take possession of his house, etc., he becomes an executor de son tort. Where a person with whom a will had been left filed it, but took out no letters with the will annexed, or any other legal authority to administer on the estate, he became an executor de son tort; 77 Ga. 114.

But a stranger may perform many acts in relation to a testator's estate without becoming liable as executor de son tort. Such are locking up his goods for preservation, burying the deceased in a manner suitable to his fortune, paying for the funeral expenses and those of the last sickness, making an inventory of his property to prevent loss or fraud solely, feeding his cattle, milking his cows, repairing his houses, etc. Such acts are held to be offices of kindness and charity; 19 Mo. 196; 28 N. H. 473. Nor does paying the debts of the deceased with one's own money make one an executor de son tort; 8 Rich. 29; 59 Conn. 247. Nor does one become executor de son tort by obtaining payment of a debt from an executor de son tort; 65 L. T. N. S. 709. The fact that a widow has taken possession of community property is not sufficient to authorize suit against her on a note of her deceased husband; 75 Tex. 595. As to what acts will render a person so liable, see Godolphin, Orph. Leg. 91; 1 Wms. Exec. 299; 1 Dane, Abbr. 581; Bull. N. P. 48; Com. Dig. Administration (C 3); 8 Johns. 426; 15 S. & R. 39; 26 Me. 361; 6 Blackf. 367.

An executor de son tort is liable only for such assets as come into his hands, and is not liable for not reducing assets to possession; 2 Rich. Eq. 247; 82 Pa. 193. And it has been held that he is only liable to the rightful administrator; 3 Barb. Ch. 477; 58 Ala. 319. But see 9 Leigh 79; 2 M'Cord 423; 10 Mo. App. 488; which imply that he is also liable to the heir at law. He cannot be sued except for fraud, and he must be sued as executor; 1 Brayt. 116; 11 Ired. 215; 10 S. & R. 144; 5 J. J. Marsh. 170. But in general he is liable to all the trouble of an executorship, with none of its profits. And the law on this head seems to have been borrowed from the civil-law doctrine of pro hærede gestio. See Heineccius, Antiq. Syntagma, lib. 2, tit. 17, § 16, p. 468.

An executor de son tort is an executor only for the purpose of being sued, and not for the purpose of suing; 11 Ired. 215. He is sued as if rightful executor. But if he defends as such he becomes thereby also an executor de son tort; Lawes, Pl. 190, note; 4 B. Monr. 186; 1 M'Cord, Ch. 318; 21 Miss. 688; 2 H. & J. 435. When an executor de son tort takes out letters of administration, his acts are legalized, and are to be viewed in the same light as if he had been rightful administrator when the goods came into his hands; 19 Mo. 196; 15 Mass. 825; 4 Harr. Del. 108; 8 Johns. 128. But see, contra, 2 N. H. 475. A voluntary sale by an executor de son tort confers only the same title on the purchaser that he himself had; 6 Exch. 164; 20 E. L. & Eq. 145; 20 Ala. N. S. 587; 10 Watts 287.

It is held that in regard to land no man can be an executor de son tort; 1 Root 183; 7 S. & R. 192; 10 id. 144. In Arkansas it is said that there is no such thing as a technical executor de son tort; 17 Ark. 122, 129; and so in Missouri; 103 Mo. 339. See, on this subject, 35 Me. 287; 15 N. H. 137; 17 Mo. 91; 23 Miss. 544; 13 Ga. 478; 23 Ala. N. S. 548; 25 id. 358; Busb. 399; 12 La. Ann. 245, 344; 1 Rawle 149; Schoul. Exrs. & Adms. § 184.

EXECUTORY. Performing official duties; contingent; also, personal estate of a deceased; whatever may be executed,—as, an executory sentence or judgment.

EXECUTORY CONSIDERATION. Something which is to be done after the promise is made, for which it is the legal equivalent. See CONSIDERATION.

EXECUTORY CONTRACT. One in which some future act is to be done: as, where an agreement is made to build a house in six months, or to do any act at a future day. See CONTRACT.

An agreement to sell and convey land, which is not a conveyance, operating as a present transfer of legal estate and seisin, is wholly executory, though it contains the words "grant, bargain and sell;" and produces no effect upon the estates and titles of the parties; and creates no lien or charge on the land itself; 32 Pa. 287; 37 id. 201; 35 W. Va. 463.

EXECUTORY DEVISE. Such a limitation of a future estate in lands or chattels as the law admits in case of a will, though contrary to the rules of limitation in conveyances at common law.

It is a limitation by will of a future estate or interest in lands or chattels. 38 Pa. 294.

By the executory devise no estate vests at the death of the deviser or testator, but only on the future contingency. It is only an indulgence to the last will and testament which is supposed to be made by one in opoe consilii. When the limitation by devise is such that the future interest falls within the rules of contingent remainders, it is a contingent remainder, and not an executory devise. 4 Kent 257; 3 Term 703.

If a particular estate of freehold be first devised, capable in its own nature of supporting a remainder, followed by a limitation which is not immediately connected with, or does not immediately commence from, the expiration of the particular estate of freehold, the latter limitation cannot take effect as a remainder, but may operate as an executory devise: e. g., if land be devised to A for life, and after his decease to B in fee, B takes a (vested) remainder, because his estate is immediately connected with, and commences on, the limitation of A's estate. If land be limited to A for life, and one year after his decease to B in fee, the limitation to B is not such a one as will be a remainder, but may operate as an executory devise. Fearn, Cont. Rem. 396. If land be limited to A for life, and after his decease to E and his heirs, with a proviso that if B survive A and die, without issue of his body living at his decease, then to C and his heirs, the limitation to B, etc., prevents an immediate connection of the estate limited to C with the life estate of A, and prevents its commencement on the death of A. It must operate, if at all, as an executory devise; Butler's note (c) to Fearn, Cont. Rem. 397. If a chattel interest be bequeathed for life, with remainder over, this latter disposition cannot take effect as a remainder, but may as an executory devise, or more properly bequest; id. 407.

An executory devise differs from a remainder in three very material respects:—

First. It needs no particular estate to support it. Second. By it a fee-simple or other less estate may be limited on a fee-simple. Third. By it a remainder may be limited of a chattel interest after a particular estate for life created in the same.

The first is a case of freehold commencing in futuro. A makes a devise of a future estate on a certain contingency, and till the contingency happens does not dispose of the fee-simple, but leaves it to descend to his heirs at law. 1 T. Raym. 59; 1 Salk. 286; 1 Lutw. 708.

The second case is a fee upon a fee. A devise to A and his heirs forever, which is a fee-simple, and then, in case A dies, before he is twenty-one years of age, to B and his heirs. Cro. Jac. 580; 10 Mod. 430.

The third case: a limitation in a term of years to B for life, remainder to C. The common law regards the term for years as swallowed up in the grant for life, which, being a freehold, is a greater estate, and the grantee of such a term for life could alien the whole. A similar limitation in a will may take effect, however, as an executory bequest. 3 S. & R. 59; 1 Desaus. 271; 4 id. 330.

It is not a mere possibility, but a substantial interest, and in respect to its transmissibility stands on the same footing with a contingent remainder. 81 Va. 268.

In order to prevent perpetuities, the rule has been adopted that executory interests must be so limited that from the time of their limitation they will necessarily vest in right (not necessarily in possession) at a period not exceeding that occupied by the life or lives of a person or persons then living, or in rente matris, and the minority of any person or persons born or in rente matris prior to the decease of such first named person or persons, or at a period not exceeding that occupied by the life or lives of such first named person or persons, and an absolute term of twenty-one years afterwards, or within, or at the expiration of an absolute term of twenty-one years without reference to any life. For example, lands are devised to such unborn son of a feme covert as shall first reach the age of twenty-one years. The utmost length of time that can happen before the estate can vest is the life of the mother and the subsequent infancy of her son. Such an executory devise is therefore good. If, however, such limitation had been to the first unborn son who shall attain the age of twenty-five years, the rule against perpetuities would be infringed and the limitations bad; Smith, Ex. Int. 391; 2 Bla. Com. 174.

An executory devise limited after an indefinite failure of issue is bad as leading to a perpetuity; 4 Kent 273; and so of an executory bequest, but the courts are in the latter case much less apt to construe limitations as contemplating a definite failure of issue; 4 Kent 281; 1 P. Wms. 663; Gray, Perpet. 212.

An executory devise is generally inextinguishable by any alteration in the estate out of or after which it is limited. But if it is limited on an estate tail the tenant in tail can bar it, as well as the entail, by common recovery or by deed enrolled, etc., where such deed is by statute given the force and effect of a common recovery; Butler's note to Fearn, Cont. Rem. 562; Wms. R. P. 319.

EXECUTORY ESTATES. Interests which depend for their enjoyment upon some subsequent event or contingency. Such estate may be an executory devise, or an executory remainder, which is the same as a contingent remainder, because no present interest passes.

EXECUTORY PROCESS (Via Executoria). In Louisiana. A process which can be resorted to in two cases, namely: 1. When the right of the creditor arises from an act importing confession of judgment, and which contains a privilege or mortgage in his favor. 2. When the creditor demands the execution of a judgment which has been rendered by a tribunal different from that within whose jurisdiction the execution is sought. Code of Practice, art. 732.

EXECUTORY REMAINDER. The same as a contingent remainder. See CONTINGENT REMAINDER.

EXECUTORY TRUSTS. A trust is called executory when some further act is requisite to be done by the author of the trust to give it its full effect. See Bisph. Eq. 31; Lewin, Tr. 144.

The distinction between executed and executory trusts is well settled; 7 Pa. 177; 1 Desaus. 444; though once doubted in England; 1 Ves. 142; but see 2 Ves. 323. The test is said to be: Has the testator been what is called, and very properly called, his own conveyancer? Has he left it to the court to make out from general expressions what his intention is? or has he so defined that intention that you have nothing to do but to take the limitations he has given to you, and to convert them into legal estates? per Lord St. Leonards, Ld. Ch., in 4 H. L. Cas. 210; see 7 R. I. 383; Bisph. Eq. 86.

In the case of articles made in contemplation of marriage, and which are, therefore, preparatory to a settlement, so in the case of a will directory of a future conveyance to be made or executed by the trustees named therein, it is evident that something remains to be done. The trusts are said to be executory, because they require an ulterior act to raise and perfect them: i. e. the actual settlement is to be made or the conveyance to be executed. They are instructions, rather than complete instruments, in themselves.

The court of chancery will, in promotion of the supposed views of the parties or the testator and to support their manifest intention, give to the words a more enlarged and liberal construction than in the case of legal limitations or trusts executed; 1 Fonbl. Eq. b. 1; 1 Sanders, Uses and T. 237; White, Lead. Cas. 18. Where a voluntary trust is executory and not executed, if it could not be enforced at law because it is a defective conveyance, it is not helped in favor of a volunteer in a court of equity; 4 Johns. Ch. 493, 500; 4 Paige, Ch. 305; 1 Dev. Eq. 93. But where the trust, though voluntary, has been executed in part, it will be sustained or enforced in equity; 1 Johns. Ch. 329; 7 Pa. 173, 178; White, Lead. Cas. 176; 6 Ves. 356; 18 id. 140; 1 Keen 551; 3 Beav. 288.

EXECUTORY USES. Springing uses which confer a legal title corresponding to an executory devise.

Thus, when a limitation to the use of A in fee is defeasible by a limitation to the use of B to arise at a future period, contingency, or event, these contingent or springing uses differ herein from an executory devise: there must be a person seized to such uses at the time the contingency happens, else they can never be executed by the statute. Therefore, if the estate of the feeoffee to such use be destroyed by alienation or otherwise, before the contingency arises, the use is destroyed forever; 1 Co. 134, 135; Cro. Elis. 439; whereas by an executory devise the freehold itself is transferred to the future devisee. In both cases, a fee may be limited after a fee; 10 Mod. 423.

EXECUTRIX. A woman who has been appointed by will to execute such will or testament. See EXECUTOR.

EXECUTRY. In Scotch Law. The movable estate of a person dying, which goes to his nearest of kin. So called as falling under the distribution of an executor. Bell, Dict.

EXEMPLARY. See PUNITIVE.

EXEMPLARY DAMAGES. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

EXEMPLIFICATION. A perfect copy of a record or office-book lawfully kept, so far as relates to the matter in question. See, generally, 1 Stark. Ev. 151; 1 Phill. Ev. 307; 7 Cra. 481; 9 id. 122; 3 Wheat. 234; 10 id. 469; 2 Yeates 532; 1 Hayw. 359; 1 Johns. Cns. 238; 6 Ct. Cls. 230; 92 Ind. 246; 56 Me. 107; 52 Ga. 438. As to the mode of authenticating records of other states, see FOREIGN JUDGMENTS.

EXEMPLUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A copy. A written authorized copy. Used also in the modern sense of example; ad exemplum constituti singulares non trahi (exceptional things must not be taken for examples). Calv. Lex. Exempli gratia, for the sake of example. Abb. e. g.

EXEMPTION. The right given by law to a debtor to retain a portion of his property without its being liable to execution at the suit of a creditor, or to a distress for rent.

In general, the sheriff may seize and sell all the property of a defendant which he can find, except such as is exempted by the common law or by statute. The common law was very niggardly of these exceptions:

it allowed only the necessary wearing apparel; and it was once held that if a defendant had two gowns the sheriff might sell one of them; Comb. 366. But in modern times, with perhaps a prodigal liberality, a considerable amount of property, both real and personal, is exempted from execution by the statutes of the several states; 19 Am. L. Reg. 1; 4 So. L. Rev. N. s. 1; 3 Hughes 600; 82 N. C. 212, 241; 62 Ga. 569; 31 La. Ann. 374; 8 Bax. 38; 69 Mo. 41; 38 Mich. 660; 77 Cal. 194; 99 id. 202; 6 Wash. 327; 54 Minn. 366; 157 Pa. 133; and there is now hardly a state or nation which has not by statute made certain exemptions designed as a protection for the family; 18 John. 403; and such statutes are to be liberally construed; 104 Ind. 269; 83 Wis. 510; 61 Ill. 449; 46 Vt. 346; 39 Tex. 109; 40 Conn. 106. Some of the exemptions are the following: household furniture; 93 N. H. 345; 18 Wis. 103; 30 Vt. 224; 15 Cal. 266; 56 Tex. 308; tools of trade; 19 Conn. 513; 44 id. 98; 28 La. Ann. 695; 52 Wis. 315; the interest of a legatee in lands, until the court has held it to be a charge on such, although the legacy is given with a view that it shall be such a charge; 68 Hun 624; curtesy initiate; 109 N. C. 202; property held in trust; 83 Neb. 770; the bridge of a public corporation; 39 Neb. 357; blackberries while growing; 49 Minn. 412; trademark, apart from the articles it has served to identify; 20 N. Y. S. 462; a vendor's lien reserved for the purchase price of lands conveyed; 3 Tex. Civ. App. 509; the interest of a cestui que trust under a trust for maintenance and support; 8 C. C. App. 370; the interest of the grantor in property transferred in fraud of creditors; 141 N. Y. 1. State exemption laws are inapplicable to debts due from a citizen to the United States; 9 Fed. Rep. 674. See 106 U. S. 280.

See, generally, DISTRESS; EXECUTION; HOMESTEAD; FAMILY; TOOLS.

From Taxation. "Exemption from taxation" means free from liability, from duty, from service. It is a grace, a favor, an immunity; taken out from under the general rule, not to be like others who are not exempt; to receive and not to make a return. 149 Ky. 183, 148 S. W. 1.

EXEMPTS. Persons who are not bound by law, but excused from the performance of duties imposed upon others.

By act of congress Feb. 24, 1864, it was enacted that such persons as were rejected as physically or mentally unfit for the service, all persons actually in the military or naval service of the United States at the time of the draft, and all persons who had served in the military or naval service two years during the then war and been honorably discharged therefrom, and no others, were exempt from enrolment and draft under said act, and act of congress, March 3, 1863.

EXEQUATUR (Lat.). In French Law. A Latin word which was, in the ancient practice, placed at the bottom of a judgment emanating from another tribunal, and was a permission and authority to the officer to execute it within the jurisdiction of the judge who put it below the judgment.

We have something of the same kind in our practice. When a warrant for the arrest of a criminal is issued by a justice of the peace of one county, and he flies into another, a justice of the latter county may indorse the warrant, and then the ministerial officer may execute it in such county. This is called backing a warrant.

In International Law. An official recognition of a consul or commercial agent, made by the foreign department of the state to which he is accredited, authorizing him to exercise his power. He cannot act without it, and it may be refused or revoked at the pleasure of the same government. 3 Chit. Com. Law 56; 3 M. & S. 290; 5 Fardessus, n. 1445; Twiss, Law of Nations; 1 Halleck, Int. Law 851.

EXERCITOR MARIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. One who fits out and equips a vessel, whether he be the absolute or qualified owner, or even a mere agent. Emerigon, Mar. Loans, c. 1, s. 1. We call him exercitor to whom all the returns come. Dig. 14. 1. 15; 14. 1. 7; 3 Kent 161; Molloy, de Jur. Mar. 245.

The managing owner, or ship's husband.

These are the terms in use in English and American laws, to denote the same as exercitor maris. See SHIP'S HUSBAND.

EXERCITORIA ACTIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. An action against a managing owner (exercitor maris), founded on acts of the master. 3 Kent 161; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

EXFESTUCARE (Lat.). To abdicate; to resign by passing over a staff. Du Cange. To deprive one's self of the possession of lands, honors, or dignities, which was formerly accomplished by the delivery of a staff or rod. Said to be the origin of the custom of surrender as practised in England formerly in courts baron. Spelman, Gloss. See also, Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.

EXHÆREDATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. A disinheriting. The act by which a forced heir is deprived of his legitimate or legal portion. In common law, a disinheritance. Occurring in the phrase, in Latin pleadings, ad exhæredationem (to the disinheriting), in case of abatement.

EXHÆRES (Lat.). In Civil Law. One disinherited. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Du Cange.

EXHIBERE (Lat.). To present a thing corporeally, so that it may be handled. Vicat, Voc. Jur. To appear personally to conduct the defence of an action at law.

EXHIBIT. To produce a thing publicly, so that it may be taken possession of and seized. Dig. 10. 4. 2.

To file of record. Thus, it is the practice in England in personal actions, when an officer or prisoner of the king's bench is defendant, to proceed against such defendant in the court in which he is an officer, by exhibiting, that is, filing, a bill against him. Steph. Pl. 52, n. (l); 2 Sellon, Pr. 74; 2 Conn. 38.

A paper or writing proved on motion or other occasion.

A supplemental paper referred to in the principal instrument, identified in some particular manner, as by capital letter, and generally attached to the principal instrument. 1 Stra. 674; 2 P. Wms. 410; Gresh. Eq. Ev. 98.

A paper referred to in, and filed with the bill, answer, or petition in a suit in equity, or with a deposition. 18 Ga. 68.

In the absence of a positive statutory provision, exhibits properly identified need not be attached to the deposition in connection with which they are offered in evidence; 98 Cal. 490. It has been held that the exhibits filed with a petition form no part thereof, and cannot be considered in determining its sufficiency on demurrer; 113 Mo. 440; and if the exhibit is not the foundation for the cause of action or of the defence, it will not be considered; 129 Ind. 568.

EXHIBITANT. A complainant in articles of the peace. 12 Ad. & E. 599.

EXHIBITION. In Scotch Law. An action for compelling the production of writings. See DISCOVERY.

EXHUMATION. The taking or digging up of that which has been buried; disintering; especially, the disintering of a human body. Stand. Dict.

EXIGENDARY. In English Law. An officer who makes out exigents.

EXIGENT, EXIGI FACIAS. In Practice. A writ issued in the course of proceedings to outlawry, deriving its name and application from the mandatory words found therein, signifying, "that you cause to be exacted or required;" and it is that proceeding in an outlawry which, with the writ of proclamation, issued at the same time, immediately precedes the writ of capias utlagatum. 2 Va. Cas. 244.

EXIGENT LIST. A phrase used to indicate a list of cases set down for hearing upon various incidental and ancillary motions and rules.

EXIGENTER. An officer who made out exigents and proclamations. Cowel. The office is now abolished. Holthouse.

EXIGIBLE. Demandable; that which may be exacted.

EXILE. Banishment. A person banished.

EXILIUM (Lat.). In Old English Law. Exile. Settling free or wrongly ejecting bond-tenants. Waste is called exilium when bondmen (servi) are set free or driven wrongfully from their tenements. Co. Litt. 536. Destruction; waste. Du Cange. Any species of waste which drove away the inhabitants, into exile, or had a tendency to do so. Bac. Abr. Waste (a); 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 886.

EXISTIMATIO (Lat.). The reputation of a Roman citizen. The decision of arbiters. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; 1 Mackelley, Civ. Law § 123.

EXISTING. The force of this word is not necessarily confined to the present. Thus a law for regulating "all existing railroad corporations" extends to such as are incorporated after as well as before its passage, unless exception is provided in their charters; 63 Ill. 117; 5 Ind. 525; 38 Ia. 215.

EXIT WOUND. The wound made in coming out by a weapon which has passed through the body or any part of it. 2 Beck. Med. Jur. 119.

EXITUS (Lat.). An export duty. Issue, child, or offspring. Rent or profits of land.

In Pleading. The issue or the end, termination or conclusion, of the pleadings; so called because an issue brings the pleadings to a close. 3 Bla. Com. 814.

EXLEX (Lat.). An outlaw. Spelman, Gloss.

EXOINE. In French Law. An act or instrument in writing which contains the reasons why a party in a civil suit, or a person accused, who has been summoned, agreeably to the requisitions of a decree, does not appear. Pothier, Procéd. Crim., s. 3, art. 3. See ESSEIGN.

EXONERATION. The taking off a burden or duty. The main use of the word is in the rule in the distribution of an intestate's estate that the debts which he himself contracted and for which he mortgaged his land as security, shall be paid out of the personal estate in exoneration of the real.

But when the real estate is charged with the payment of a mortgage at the time the intestate buys it, and the purchase is made subject to it, the personal is not in that case to be applied in exoneration of the real estate; 3 Pow. Mortg. 780; 5 Hayw. 57; 3 Johns. Ch. 229; 1 Lead. Cas. in Eq. n. *846; 92 Pa. 491.

But the rule for exoneration the real estate out of the personal does not apply against specific or pecuniary legacies, nor the widow's right to paraphernalia, and, with reason, not against the interest of creditors; 2 Ves. 64; 1 P. Wms. 693; 3 id. 367. See 26 Beav. 522; 35 Pa. 54; 21 Conn. 550.

Like the right of contribution between those equally liable for the same debt, the right of exoneration exists between debtors successively liable. A surety who discharges an obligation is entitled to look to the principal for reimbursement, and to invoke the aid of a court of equity for this purpose, and a subsequent surety, who, by the terms of the contract, is responsible only in the case of the default of the principal and a prior surety, may claim exoneration at the hands of either; Disph. Eq. § 331; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1416.

As to exoneration of simple contract debts, see 1 Sm. L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 614.

EXONERATUR (Lat.). In Practice. A short note entered on a bail-piece, that the bail is exonerated or discharged in consequence of having fulfilled the condition of his obligation, made by order of the court or of a judge upon a proper cause being shown. See RECOGNIZANCE.

EXPATRIATION. The voluntary act of abandoning one's country and becoming the citizen or subject of another.

The right of a citizen to do this has been much discussed. The question has been settled in the United States by the act of July 27, 1868, which declares the right of expatriation to be the inherent right of all people, disavows the claim made by foreign states that naturalized American citizens are still the subjects of such states, and extends to such naturalized citizens, while in foreign countries, the same protection accorded to native-born citizens. Rev. Stat. § 1999, 2000. This declaration comprehends our own citizens as well as those of other countries; 14 Op. Atty. Gen. 295. Since the passage of this act, the United States has entered into treaties with nearly all the nations of Europe by which the contracting powers mutually concede to subjects and citizens the right of expatriation on conditions and under qualification. And in case of conflict between the above act of congress and any treaty, it would seem the treaty must be held paramount; Morse, Citizenship § 179. To be legal, the expatriation must be for a purpose which is not unlawful nor in fraud of the duties of the emigrant at home. But a woman who is a citizen of the United States does not expatriate herself merely by marriage with an alien, and in any event actual removal from the country and the acquisition of a domicile elsewhere are conditions precedent to such expatriation; 56 Fed. Rep. 556. There is no implied expatriation, and it will not occur unless in some manner assented to by congress, and the purpose to effect it must be manifested by some unequivocal act on the part of the citizen as to whom the question is raised; id.

A citizen may acquire in a foreign country commercial privileges attached to his domicile, and be exempted from the operation of commercial acts embracing only persons resident in the United States or under its protection. See DOMICILE, NATURALIZATION. See also Miller, Const. U. S. 285, 297; 2 Cra. 120; 2 Kent 36; Grotius, b. 2, c. 5, s. 24; Puffendorff, b. 8, c. 11, ss. 2, 3; Vattel, b. 1, c. 19, ss. 218, 223, 224, 233; Wyckford, tom. i. 117, 119; 3 Dall. 133; 7 Wheat. 342; 1 Pet. EXPECTANCY. Contingency as to possession. That which is expected or hoped for. Frequently used to imply an estate in expectancy.

Estates are said to be in possession when the person having the estate is in actual enjoyment of that in which his estate subsists, or in expectancy, when the enjoyment is postponed, although the estate or interest has a present legal existence.

A bargain in relation to an expectancy is, in general, considered invalid, unless the proof of good faith is strong; 2 Ves. 137; 1 Bro. Ch. 10; Jeremy, Eq. Jur. 397; 32 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 408.

But it is well settled in equity that a deed which purports to convey property, which is in expectancy or to be subsequently acquired, or which is not the subject of grant at law, though inoperative as a grant or conveyance, will be upheld as an executory agreement, and enforced according to its intent, if supported by a valid consideration, whenever the grantor is in a condition to give it effect; per Strong, J., in 40 Pa. 37, 43; 11 Paige 290; 2 S. & R. 507; 12 R. I. 560, 563; 10 Ill. L. Cas. 180, 211; 91 Pa. 96; id. 296. So it is said that an estate in expectancy, though contingent, is a fair subject of contract, and an agreement by an expectant heir in respect thereto, fairly made upon valuable considerations, will be enforced in equity; 45 Ill. 232; 1 Hoffm. Ch. 882; 5 Jones, Eq. 211; so also the interest which a person may take under the will of another living person; 2 Pa. 325; 9 Beav. 252; but a mere agreement to appropriate the money when received from a legacy will not operate as an assignment of it; 93 Pa. 196. An executory agreement between the husbands of two expectant legatees to divide equally what should be left to either of them has been enforced; 2 P. Wms. 183; 2 Sim. 183. In a few instances the contrary is held; 7 Ohio St. 432; 125 Ind. 139; Cal. Civ. Code 700, 1045; and a conveyance to a wife upon consideration only of natural love and affection was held invalid, in equity, as against creditors at the time of the deed or the death of the ancestor; 87 Tenn. 759; so an agreement by a wife, as a collateral security for an old debt of the husband, will not be enforced; 40 Pa. 87.

The general doctrine is undoubtedly to treat such an assignment as a contract enforceable in equity, but Pomerooy considers it inadequate; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1287, n. 2; and prefers the theory that it is an actual transfer of the ownership of an equitable property right which ripens into an absolute title; id. § 1271.

Such an agreement or assignment will be enforced against creditors of the grantor and attaches to the estate, in equity, at the death of the ancestor; 46 Barb. 84.

Equity will, in general, relieve a party from unequal contracts for the sale or pledge of expectancies, as they are in fraud of the ancestor. See 2 P. Wms. 182; 2 Sim. 183, 192; 5 id. 524; 1 Sto. Eq. Jur. § 342. But relief will be granted only on equitable terms; for he who seeks equity must do equity; id.; 1 Fonb. Eq. b. 1, c. 2, § 13, note p.

In dealing with such cases, the rule applied by courts of equity is, as laid down in Chesterfield v. Janssen, to scrutinize them carefully according to the circumstances of each; 2 Ves. Sr. 125; and, if upon inadequate consideration, or otherwise fraudulent, they will be relieved against and wholly or partially set aside; id.; 1 L. Cas. in Eq. 773; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 958, and note, where the cases are collected.

In a leading modern English case the principle is thus stated: "The court will relieve 'expectant heirs' against bargains relating to their reversionary or expectant interest in cases of undervalue, of weakness due to age or poverty, and of the absence of independent advice. But all these circumstances must co-exist in order to entitle them to relief." L. R. 8 Ch. 484. In that case it was held that the repeal of the usury laws in England has not altered the doctrine by which the court of chancery affords relief against improvident and extravagant bargains. In the opinion Lord Selborne directed attention to the fact that concealment was usually a feature of these cases, but agreed with Lord St. Leonards that it was not an indispensable condition of equitable relief; Sugd. Vend. & Pur. 11th ed. 318; differing, as to this point, with Lord Brougham; 2 Myl. & K. 456. The independent advice of a father seems to rebut the presumption of fraud; 2 App. Cas. 814; but old age or youth increases it; 2 Giff. 157; 4 D. J. & S. 888; or poverty and ignorance; L. R. 10 Ch. 389; 40 Ch. D. 312. In the first of these two cases, Jessel, M. R., thus defined the term "expectant heir": "The phrase is used not in its literal meaning, but as including every one who has either a vested remainder, or a contingent remainder in a family property, including a remainder in a portion, as well as a remainder in an estate, and every one who has the hope of succession to the property of an ancestor, either by reason of his being the heir-apparent or presumptive, or by reason merely of the expectation of a devise or bequest on account of the supposed or presumed affection of his ancestor or relation. More than this, the doctrine as to expectant heirs has been extended to all reversioners and remaindermen. So that the doctrine not only included the class mentioned, who in some popular sense might be called 'expectant heirs,' but also all remaindermen and reversioners."

The principle has been held to include younger sons of peers; 13 Ch. D. 679. As to what is a reversionary interest for this purpose, see 11 Eq. 265, 276; L. R. 2 Ch. 542; and as to what is independent advice, see 10 Eq. 641, in which the borrower, though accompanied by a friend who was a solicitor but did not act as such, or know the terms of the contract, was held not to have independent advice.

Undervaluation is not alone a sufficient ground for setting aside a contract, conveyance, or mortgage of a reversion, otherwise fair; stat. 81 Vict. c. 4; 2 Ch. Cas. 136; 35 Beav. 570; 82 L. J. Ch. 201.

By the civil law, such contracts are held contra bonos mores, and they are forbidden in general terms; Code 2, 6, de pactis 30; and in the French code it is forbidden to sell the succession of a living person, even with his consent; art. 1600; the same is the rule of the Italian code; art. 1460; and of that of Austria; § 879.

EXPECTANT. Contingent as to enjoyment.

EXPEDIENTE. A complete statement of every step taken in the proceedings of a Mexican land grant, and a testimonio is the first copy of the expediente. A grant of final title papers is attached to the testimonio and delivered to the grantee as evidence of title, and entry is made at the time in a book called the TOMA DE RAZON (memorandum book), which identifies the grantee, date of the grant and property granted. 161 U. S. 219. See TOMAR RAZON.

EXPEDITATION. A cutting off the claws or ball of the fore-feet of mastiffs, to prevent their running after deer; a practice for the preservation of the royal forests. Cart. de For. c. 17; Spelman, Gloss.; Cowel. See COURT OF RECORD.

EXPEND. The word "expend" means, to dispose of. 92 Ky. 16, 17 S. W. 150.

EXPENDITORS. Paymasters. Those who expend or disburse certain taxes. Especially the sworn officer who supervised the repairs of the banks of the canals in Romney Marsh. Cowel.

EXPENSE LITIS (Lat.). Expenses of the suit; the costs, which are generally allowed to the successful party.

EXPENSE OF LITIGATION. The words "expense of litigation" used in an indemnity policy providing that the insurer will pay the "expense of litigation," in addition to a fixed amount, include the costs of the suit incurred by the assured, the damages awarded the claimant on an appeal by the assured, and the interest that accrued on the judgment against the assured. 150 Ky. 732, 150 S. W. 994.

EXPENSES. See FAMILY EXPENSES. NECESSARY EXPENSE.

EXPENSIVE. In its popular sense, that which would involve or require expense. 31 Conn. 499.

EXPERIENCE. The term "experience" used in a credit insurance policy, meant a business transaction which was closed. 133 Ky. 745, 118 S. W. 1004.

The execution of a note in payment for goods sold on credit did not, until payment of the note close the transaction, so as to render it an "experience" which would justify the creditor in again extending credit to an old customer. 133 Ky. 745, 118 S. W. 1004.

EXPERIENCED MULE. A mule that has been working in a mine nine or ten years, and is pretty well up to all the tricks, knowing enough to see that a collision is inevitable, and jumping out of the way to avoid it, is an "experienced mule." 156 Ky. 715, 161 S. W. 1112.

EXPERTS (Lat. experti, instructed, proved by experience). Persons selected by the court or parties in a cause, on account of their knowledge or skill, to examine, estimate, and ascertain things and make a report of their opinions. Merlin, Rept. Witnesses who are admitted to testify from a peculiar knowledge of some art or science, a knowledge of which is requisite or of value in settling the point at issue.

Persons professionally acquainted with the science or practice in question. Strickl. Ev. 406. Persons conversant with the subject-matter on questions of science, skill, trade, and others of like kind. Best, Ev. § 346. The qualification of a witness as an expert is largely within the discretion of the trial judge; 61 Fed. Rep. 752; 132 Mass. 218; 68 Pa. 150; 126 id. 141; 108 N. Y. 61; 107 Ind. 84. Such a witness may be asked whether the examination made by him was superficial or otherwise; 153 U. S. 271; he need not be engaged in his profession, it is sufficient that he has studied it; 12 Ala. N. S. 648. Experts alone can give an opinion based on facts shown by others, assuming them to be true; 100 N. C. 457.

"It is not sufficient to warrant the introduction of expert testimony that the witness may know more of the subject of inquiry and may better understand and appreciate it than the jury; but to warrant its introduction, the subject of the inquiry must be one relating to some trade, profession, science, or art in which persons instructed therein by study and experience may be supposed to have more skill and knowledge than jurors of average intelligence may generally be presumed to have." 97 N. Y. 511; and not only may they testify to facts but they may give their opinions on them as experts; 118 N. Y. 420. The practical result of the rule admitting such testimony is far from satisfactory; its principal defect being that such witnesses are usually called because their known theories are understood to support the fact which the party calling them wishes to prove; 40 Cal. 405. "They come," says Lord Campbell, speaking of scientific witnesses, "with a bias on their minds to support the cause in which they are embarked, and hardly any weight should be given to their evidence;" 10 Cl. & F. 154. In another case it was said that it was generally safer to take the judgments of unskilled jurors than the hired and biased opinions of experts; 97 N. Y. 511; and such testimony is frequently characterized by the courts as of little value; 4 Dill. 488; 8 Bann. & A. 42; 6 Fish. 330; L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 415, n. See 32 Am. L. Reg. 529.

On the other hand, the necessity of such testimony in certain classes of cases, particularly those involving patent law, is thus set forth in 3 Rob. Pat. § 1012:—

"Notwithstanding the strictures passed upon expert testimony by many jurists on each side of the Atlantic, and the truth of the assertions by which these censures have been justified, it is still certain that in most patent cases expert evidence is, and must always be, indispensable. That the expert is consulted before he is summoned as a witness, that when his opinion is unfavorable to the party who consults him he is not produced in court, at least on that side of the case; that when called as a witness his testimony is expected to support, and generally does support, the claimant or the opponent on whose behalf he is presented,—are no doubt true; but this is only what occurs in every other trial where counsel have properly prepared their case. The error lies with those who ascribe judicial functions to the patent expert, and demand of him such freedom from partisanship as the exercise of judicial powers requires. That there are experts in other departments of affairs upon whose opinion the court is forced to rely as the foundation of its own judgments, because incapable of forming an opinion for itself, and that such experts consequently fill the places of judges and should be beyond the influence and control of parties, must be conceded. But such is not the case with patent experts, whose opinion is received in evidence only in connection with the reasons on which it is based, and is to be accepted or rejected by the jury according to their own view of its fallacy or truth. The patent expert, considered in his real character, is an explorer, gifted with unusual powers of discernment and apprehension; a chronicler, trained to preserve the recollection of the essential attributes of things; an expositor, fitted to embody those essential attributes in accurate and intelligible language; a monitor, able to suggest the conclusions which follow from the premises he has described. His relation to the jury is not unlike that which counsel sustain to the court, as guides to a correct decision of the issues severally confided to their judgments,—the one pointing out facts and applying them in support of the claims advanced by his employer, as the other produces his authorities and applies them to the maintenance of his claims of law."

Such assistance, it is properly suggested, it would not be wise in any tribunal to undervalue or reject; 3 Rob. Pat. § 1012.

The fact that the opinions of experts in patent cases are often diametrically opposite does not necessarily discredit their testimony but merely emphasizes the fact that their opinions are to be regarded as opinions, merely, and a decision rendered between them; Hall, J., in 4 Fish. 12. A patent expert is in effect an "auxiliary counsel" who argues upon the law and the facts; 28 Fed. Rep. 618. While expert evidence is not conclusive on the jury; 1 Fish. 17; and is to be judged by the same standards as ordinary evidence; 27 Fed. Rep. 691; 4 Fish. 404; 1 Sawyer 512; 1 Fish. 298; and to be accorded by the jury such weight as they see fit; 1 Fish. 351; 6 McLean 303; 3 id. 432; it is nevertheless of great value in patent cases, 2 Fish. 465; 1 id. 133, 198, 461; 1 Bond 254; 6 McLean 44; 3 Story 742; 2 Robb 288; 3 McLean 432.

The value of such testimony depends on the skill, not the number; 4 McLean 70; and is to be measured by their reasons; 3 Blatchf. 184; 4 Fish. 29, 232, 468.

There are two classes of patent experts, as is clearly shown by an able writer, scientific and mechanical, each having a distinct sphere. The scientific expert is one familiarized by his studies and experiments with the principles of a science and qualified to understand, distinguish, and explain the subject-matter and application thereto of such science. His services are invoked to determine the character and scope of an invention with reference to the condition of the art at the date of its production. His testimony is directed to the question whether the alleged invention is the result of an inventive act; whether it embraces or excludes a different invention or is substantially the same in principle, function, or effect with any other. The mechanical expert represents the skilled workman in his art, who by practical training in it could comprehend and apply to it various instruments and methods. His evidence will bear upon the defence of want of novelty, prior patent, invalidity of the invention, or ambiguity of the description in the specification of the patent. One person may appear in both capacities. 3 Rob. Pat. § 1013. See Curt. Pat. § 479.

Expert testimony is admissible upon questions for the court as well as upon those for the jury, where it can be properly applied to the subject-matter of the question as the construction of the patent and whether a prior patent covers the same invention; 3 Rob. Pat. § 1014. In dealing with such questions the court is at liberty to admit expert evidence, but cannot be compelled to do so, and it is not error to refuse it; id.; 1 Fish. 487; 21 How. 88.

It has been a matter of grave discussion whether an expert is bound to testify on matters of opinion without extra compensation, the weight of decisions being that he is not bound to do so; 1 C. & K. 25; Sprague 276; 5 So. L. Rev. 799; 59 Ind. 15; 60 Ark. 508; contra, 6 Cent. L. J. 11; 21 D. C. 491; 59 Ind. 1, 15; 6 So. L. Rev. 706. It was recently held that, in the absence of statutory authority, one who testifies for the state in a criminal case as an expert cannot demand extra compensation as such, at least when not compelled to make any preliminary examination or preparation, or to attend and listen to the testimony; 60 Ark. 204. When no demand is made in advance for special compensation, an expert witness can recover only the statutory witness fees; 3 Colo. App. 177.

See, generally, as to who are experts, and the admissibility of their evidence, 1 Greenl. Ev. 440; Tayl. Ev. 1209; 3 Doug. 157; 2 Mood. & M. 75; 9 Conn. 55; 17 Pick. 497; 12 La. Ann. 183; 28 Am. L. EXPIRATION. In Civil Law. The crime of abstracting the goods of a succession.

This is said not to be a theft, because the property no longer belongs to the deceased, nor to the heir before he has taken possession. In the common law, the grant of letters testamentary, or letters of administration, relates back to the time of the death of the testator or intestate; so that the property of the estate is vested in the executor or administrator from that period.

EXPIRATION. Cessation; end; as, the expiration of a lease, of a contract or statute.

In general, the expiration of a contract puts an end to all the engagements of the parties, except to those which arise from the non-fulfilment of obligations created during its existence. See PARTNERSHIP; CONTRACT.

The term is specially used to denote the day upon which the risk of an insurance policy terminates. When before the expiration of policies the companies agreed to "hold" the policies for renewal, and after the expiration the agent of the insured told them to continue to hold them until the form could be arranged, the policies were held to be in force; 163 Mass. 358. Temporary insurance from one day "until" a certain other date, includes all of the day of expiration; 4 Dist. Rep. Pa. 382. See INSURANCE.

When a statute is limited as to time, it expires by mere lapse of time, and then it has no force whatever; and, if such a statute repealed or supplied a former statute, the first statute is, ipso facto, revived by the expiration of the repealing statute; 6 Whart. 294; 1 Bland, Ch. 664; unless it appear that such was not the intention of the legislature; 8 East 212; Bacon, Abr. Statute (D).

EXPIRY OF THE LEGAL. In Scotch Law. The expiration of the term within which the subject of an adjudication may be redeemed on payment of the debt adjudged for. Bell, Dict.; 3 Jurid. Styles, 3d ed. 1107.

EXPLICATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The fourth pleading: equivalent to the sur-rejoinder of the common law. Calvinus, Lex.

EXPLOSION. A sudden and rapid combustion, causing violent expansion of the air, and accompanied by a report. 22 Ohio St. 348.

There is no difference in ordinary use between "explode" and "burst." The ordinary idea is that the explosion is the cause, while the rupture is the effect; 44 N. Y. 151. See SMOKE.

EXPLOSIVES. A fire insurance company includes the following as explosives: benzene, benzole, dynamite, ether, fireworks, gasoline, Greek fire, gunpowder, naphtha, nitro-glycerine. Blasting powder included in the phrase, "other explosives." 216 U. S. 315.

Powder is an explosive, dangerous to handle, the degree of danger corresponding to its quantity. 222 U. S. 424.

EXPORT (v.). Technically includes the sending of merchandise from one country to a foreign country, and its landing in such a country. It is often used, however, to mean only the shipment from a country. 228 U. S. 530. The word "export" will be given the latter meaning when used in a statute the manifest purpose of which would be defeated by limiting the word to its strict technical meaning. Id.

While the word export technically includes the landing in, as well as the shipment to a foreign country, it is often used as meaning only the shipment from this country and it will be so construed when used in a statute the manifest purpose of which would be defeated by limiting the word to its strict technical meaning. 228 U. S. 525.

EXPORTS. Merchandise sent from one country to another. Anderson; As used in the Consti., Art. 1, does not include articles transported from one State into another. Id.; 7 Nev. 142. Cf. IMPORTS.

EXPORTATION. In Common Law. The act of sending goods and merchandise from one country to another. 3 M. & G. 155; 8 id. 959.

In order to preserve equality among the states in their commercial relations, the constitution provides that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any state." Art. 1, s. 9. And, to prevent a pernicious interference with the commerce of the nation, the tenth section of the first article of the constitution contains the following prohibition: "No state shall, without the consent of congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; and the net produce of all duties and imposts laid by any state on imports or exports shall be for the use of the treasury of the United States; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the congress." See 12 Wheat. 419; IMPORTATION.

EXPOSE. A French word, sometimes applied to a written document containing the reasons or motives for doing a thing. The word occurs in diplomacy.

To cast out to chance, to place abroad, or in a situation unprotected; 5 Mich. 90.

To set out, bring into view; display, exhibit; show; as, to expose property to sale (75 Pa. 256), to expose the person (2 Bishop, Cr. L. § 318). Anderson. See INDECENCY.

EXPOSITION DE PART. In French Law. The abandonment of a child, unable to take care of itself, either in a public or private place.

If the child thus exposed should be killed in consequence of such exposure, as, if it should be devoured by animals, the person so exposing it would be guilty of murder. Roco. Cr. Ev. 591.

EXPOSITORY STATUTES. See STATUTE.

EXPOSURE. See INDECENT EXPOSURE.

EXPOSURE OF PERSON. In Criminal Law. Such an intentional exposure, in a public place, of the naked body, as is calculated to shock the feelings of chastity or to corrupt the morals.

This offence is indictable on the ground that every public show and exhibition which outrages decency, shocks humanity, or is contrary to good morals, is punishable at common law. 1 Bish. Cr. Law § 1125; 32 Mo. 560. An indecent exposure, though in a place of public resort, if visible by only one person, is not indictable. An omnibus is a public place; 2 Cox, Cr. Cas. 378; 3 id. 183; Dears. 207. But see 1 Dev. & B. 208; 68 N. C. 259. An ordinance making it an offence to expose the person indecently without reference to the intent which accompanies the act, is a valid exercise of police power; 93 Mich. 135.

See, generally, 1 Benn. & H. Lead. Cr. Cas. 442; 3 Day 103; 5 id. 81; 18 Vt. 574; 1 Mass. 8; 2 S. & R. 91; 5 Barb. 203.

EXPRESS. Stated or declared, as opposed to implied. That which is made known and not left to implication. It is a rule that when a matter or thing is expressed it ceases to be implied by law; expressum facit cessare tacitum. Co. Litt. 183.

EXPRESS ABROGATION. A direct repeal in terms by a subsequent law referring to that which is abrogated.

EXPRESS ASSUMPSIT. A direct undertaking. See ASSUMPSIT; ACTION.

EXPRESS COMPANIES. Companies organized to carry small and valuable packages expeditiously in such manner as not to subject them to the danger of loss and damage which to a greater or less degree attends the transportation of heavy or bulky articles of commerce. 10 Fed. Rep. 218.

An express company may be defined to be a common carrier that carries at regular and stated times, over fixed and regular routes, money and other valuable packages, which cannot be conveniently or safely carried as common freight; and also other articles and packages of any description which the shipper desires or the nature of the article requires should have safe and rapid transit and quick delivery, transporting the same in the immediate charge of its own messenger on passenger steamers and express and passenger railway trains, which it does not own or operate, but with the owners of which it contracts for the carriage of its messengers and freights; and within cities and towns or other defined limits, it collects from the consignors and delivers to the consignee at other places of business the goods which it carries. 44 Fed. Rep. 310. Their right to use the facilities afforded by a railroad depends entirely on contract; 117 U. S. 3.

They are common carriers; 44 Ala. 488; 38 Ohio St. 144; 36 Ga. 689; notwithstanding a declaration in their bill of lading that they are not to be so considered; 93 U. S. 174; 15 Minn. 270. See COMMON CARRIERS.

Like all other common carriers they must receive all goods offered for transportation, on being paid or tendered the proper charge; 6 Hun 344; 5 Cush. 69; and if they cannot transport them within a reasonable time, must refuse them or be responsible for loss caused by the delay; 54 N. Y. 500; 76 Id. 305; 64 Ill. 128. They may also refuse to receive dangerous articles for transportation; 15 Wall. 524; 107 Mass. 568.

An express company insures the safe delivery of the goods received at the destination if on its own route; if not, safe delivery at the end of its own route to the next carrier; and will be relieved only by the act of God or of the public enemy; 33 N. J. L. 543; 58 Ill. 44; 49 Miss. 480; 49 N. Y. 491; 69 Pa. 394; 101 Mass. 420; 52 Vt. 335.

An express company may by special contract limit its liability for the value of goods lost; 69 Ill. 62; 63 N. Y. 35; 74 Id. 125; 28 Ohio St. 144; 89 Ind. 475; except for losses due to its own negligence or misconduct; 93 U. S. 174; 93 Ill. 523; 74 Mo. 538; 87 N. Y. 413. A contract between an express company and its messenger exempting it from liability for injury to him by the negligence of the carrier, is valid and may extend so far as to authorize the express company to contract with the carrier against liability to the messenger; but such contract will not enure to the benefit of the carrier having no knowledge of it or not having availed itself of it by contracting with the express company; 44 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 796.

The express business is an "industrial pursuit" within the meaning of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1898, and may therefore be carried on in Washington territory by a corporation formed there under a general law, or by a corporation otherwise duly formed or incorporated elsewhere; id.; 10 Sawy. 441; 43 Fed. Rep. 467.

By various statutes of New York, an express company organized as a joint-stock company has all the powers of a corporation, except that it has no right to adopt and use a common seal; 3 Abb. N. S. 163.

A statement filed by an express company showing that the business was managed, and its property and effects owned, by five trustees, the names of four of whom, and their respective places of residence, were given; that there was one vacancy, and that "the persons interested as cestui que trust are the stockholders of said company, who change from day to day, and of whom it is impossible to make an accurate statement, owing to the frequency of such changes," was a substantial compliance with the requirement of an act requiring that the statement so filed shall show the full name of every member of such company and his proper place of residence; 32 Ind. 19.

See an epitome of the law on this subject at that date by Judge Bedford in 5 Am. Law Reg. n. s. 1; and three articles on express companies as common carriers; id. 449, 513, 648. See also as to limiting liability 27 id. 570; discrimination; 1 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 390; and as to carriers by express generally; 20 Am. L. Reg. 602; 5 Myers, Fed. Dec. 847; 3 Am. & Eng. R. E. Cas. 601; 13 id. 425; 16 id. 93; 23 id. 572.

EXPRESS CONSIDERATION. A consideration expressed or stated by the terms of the contract.

EXPRESS CONTRACT. One in which the terms are openly uttered and avowed at the time of making. 2 Bla. Com. 443; 1 Pars. Contr. 4. One made in express words. 2 Kent 450. See CONTRACTS.

EXPRESS COVENANTS. Those stated in words more or less distinctly expressing the intent to covenant; 68 Ga. 675. See COVENANT.

EXPRESS TRUST. One declared in express terms. See TRUSTS.

EXPRESS WARRANTY. One expressed by particular words. 3 Bla. Com. 300. The statements in an application for insurance are usually construed to constitute an express warranty. 1 Phil. Ins. 846. See WARRANTY.

EXPROMISSIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The species of novation by which a creditor accepts a new debtor, who becomes bound instead of the old, the latter being released. See NOVATION.

EXPROMISSOR. In Civil Law. The person who alone becomes bound for the debt of another, whether the latter were obligated or not. He differs from a surety, who is bound together with his principal. Dig. 12. 4. 4; 16. 1. 13; 24. 3. 64. 4; 38. 1. 37. 8.

EXPROPRIATION. The surrender of a claim to exclusive property. Wharton. Compulsorily depriving a person of a right of property belonging to him in return for a compensation. R. & L. Dict.; St. Bonnet; Holtz. Encyc. The term has been introduced from its use in foreign countries to denote a compulsory purchase of land, etc., for the purpose of a railway, canal, or the like. ("expropriation pour cause d'utilité publique.") Id.; 1 App. Cas. 384. See EMINENT DOMAIN.

The exclusion of the small owner or wage earner from the ownership of land and other property through their centralization in the hands of monopolists. English.

EXPULSION (Lat. expellere, to drive out). The act of depriving a member of a body politic or corporate, or of a society, of his right of membership therein, by the vote of such body or society, for some violation of his duties as such, or for some offence which renders him unworthy of longer remaining a member of the same.

By the constitution of the United States, art. 1, s. 5, § 2, each house may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member. In the case of John Smith, a senator from Ohio, who was expelled from the senate in 1807, the committee made a report which embraces the following points:

First. That the senate may expel a member for a high misdemeanor, such as a conspiracy to commit treason. Its authority is not confined to an act done in its presence.

Second. That a previous conviction is not requisite in order to authorize the senate to expel a member from their body for a high offence against the United States.

Third. That although a bill of indictment against a party for treason and misdemeanor has been abandoned, because a previous indictment against the principal party had terminated in an acquittal, owing to the inadmissibility of the evidence upon that indictment, yet the senate may examine the evidence for themselves, and if it be sufficient to satisfy their minds that the party is guilty of a high misdemeanor it is sufficient ground of expulsion.

Fourth. That the fifth and sixth articles of the amendments of the constitution of the United States, containing the general rights and privileges of the citizens as to criminal prosecutions, refer only to prosecutions at law, and do not affect the jurisdiction of the senate as to expulsion.

Fifth. That before a committee of the senate, appointed to report an opinion relative to the honor and privileges of the senate, and the facts respecting the conduct of the member implicated, such member is not entitled to be heard in his defence by counsel, to have compulsory process for witnesses, or to be confronted with his accusers. It is before the senate that the member charged is entitled to be heard.

Sixth. In determining on expulsion, the senate is not bound by the forms of judicial proceedings or the rules of judicial evidence; nor, it seems, is the same degree of proof essential which is required to convict of a crime. The power of expulsion must, in its nature, be discretionary, and its exercise of a more summary character. 1 Hall, Law Journ. 460, 465; 6 Wheat. 304; Cooley, Const. Lim. 162.

Corporations have the right of expulsion in certain cases, as such power is necessary to the good order and government of corporate bodies; and the cases in which the inherent power may be exercised are classified by Lord Mansfield as follows: 1. When an offence is committed which has no immediate relation to a member's corporate duty, but is of so infamous a nature as to render him unfit for the society of honest men; such as the offences of perjury, forgery, and the like. But before an expulsion is made for a cause of this kind it is necessary that there should be a previous conviction by a jury according to the law of the land. 2. When the offence is against his duty as a corporator, in which case he may be expelled on trial and conviction before the corporation. 3. The third is of a mixed nature, against the member's duty as a corporator, and also indictable by the law of the land; 1 Burr. 517; 75 Pa. 291; 50 id. 107; 15 Am. Rep. 27; Field, Corp. 78; 47 Wis. 670; 1 Spelling, Priv. Corp. § 523. See 1 Thomp. Corp. 800-930, where the subject is fully treated; AMOTION; DISFRANCHISEMENT.

Distinguished from Banishment, Extradition. Expulsion constitutes neither banishment nor extradition. Those who have been banished are, like those who are expelled, forced to leave the country; but whereas those who are subjected to banishment are compelled to depart only when lawfully convicted of a crime which entails banishment as its penalty, those who are expelled are subject to deportation on being served with an official order to that effect.

The Government, on the one hand, issues the order of expulsion (deportation) in due course and at its discretion without any preliminary understanding with the state of which the party expelled is a national; and on the other hand, the grounds of expulsion need not be set out in the order, for, on principle, the Government is the sole judge as to the necessity to deport. This absence of prior entente with the state to which the deportee belongs results in expulsion being a unilateral act, differing essentially thereby from extradition, with which expulsion is at times confused. Extradition presupposes a prior understanding between states as a matter of course: it constitutes a bilateral act in the form of a convention agreed upon between two states. When a state extradites a person, or in other words delivers up an individual accused of crime, or who has actually been found guilty of an offense committed outside of its jurisdiction and against the laws of the state which is seeking to have him extradited and which has the right to determine and to punish his guilt, this is done by force of prior treaties or by virtue of a special agreement between states. When, on the other hand, a state expels, it is not because it is under any obligation to do so based on a contract with another state. (Alexis Martiné, l'Expulsion des Etrangers, pp. 5, 6.) Bouvé, Exclusion and Expulsion of Aliens in the United States, p. 6. See DEPORTATION; EXTRADITION; RENVOI.

EXTENSION. In Common Law. This term is applied among merchants to signify an agreement made between a debtor and his creditors, by which the latter, in order to enable the former, embarrassed in his circumstances, to retrieve his standing, agree to wait for a definite length of time after their several claims become due and payable, before they will demand payment. It is often done by the issue of notes of various maturities.

Among the French, a similar agreement is known by the name of attermoiement. Merlin, Répert. mot Attermoiement.

EXTENSION OF PATENT (sometimes termed Renewal of Patent). In Patent Law. An ordinary patent was formerly granted for the term of fourteen years. But the law made provision that when any patentee, without neglect or fault on his part, had failed to obtain a reasonable remuneration for the time, ingenuity, and expense bestowed upon the same and the introduction thereof into use, he might obtain an extension of such patent for the term of seven years longer. A fee of forty dollars was required from the applicant, and a public notice of sixty days was to be given of the application. No extension could be granted after the patent had once expired.

The extension of a patent was intended for the sole benefit of the inventor; and where it was made to appear that he would receive no benefit therefrom, it would not be granted. The assignee, grantee, or licensee of an interest in the original patent retained no right in the extension, unless by reason of some stipulation to that effect. But where any person had a right to use a specific machine under the original patent he still retained that right after the extension. See act of 1833, § 18, and act of 1848, § 1; PATENTS. By act of congress of March 2, 1861, c. 85, § 16, 13 Stat. L. 249, it was provided that patents should be granted for the term of seventeen years, and further extension was forbidden. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4924, provided for the granting of extensions only on patents issued prior to March 2, 1861.

EXTENT. A writ, issuing from the exchequer, by which the body, goods, and lands of the debtor may all be taken at once to satisfy the judgment.

It is so called because the sheriff is to cause the lands to be appraised at their full extended value before he delivers them to the plaintiff. Fitch, N. B. 181. The writ originally lay to enforce judgments in case of recognizances or debts acknowledged on statutes merchant or staple; see stat. 13 Edw. I. de Mercatoribus; 37 Edw. III. c. 9; and by 8 Hen. VIII. c. 80, was extended to debts due the crown. The term is sometimes used in the various states of the United States to denote writs which give the creditor possession of the debtor's lands for a limited time till the debt be paid. 10 Mass. 186.

Extent in aid is an extent issued at the suit or instance of a crown-debtor against a person indebted to himself. This writ was much abused, owing to some peculiar privileges possessed by crown-debtors, and its use was regulated by stat. 57 Geo. III. c. 117. See 8 Bla. Com. 419.

Extent in chief is an extent issued to take a debtor's lands into the possession of the crown. See 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 80, § 8.

Manorial extent. A survey of a manor made by a jury of tenants, often of unfree men sworn to sit for the particulars of each tenancy, and containing the smallest details as to the nature of the service due.

These manorial extents "were made in the interest of the lords, who were anxious that all due services should be done; but they imply that other and greater services are not due, that the customary tenants, even though they be unfree men, owe these services for their tenements, no less and no more. Statements that the tenants are not bound to do services of a particular kind are not very uncommon;" 1 Pol. & Maitl. 848. Many admissions against their own interests, the extent of their manors may contain; they suffer it to be recorded that a 'day's work' ends at noon, that in return for some works they must provide food, even that the work is not worth the food that has to be provided; but they do not admit that for certain causes, and for certain causes only, may they take their tenement into their own hands. The matter of fact is seldom of an actual ejectment that the peasant has to complain;" id. 850. Many examples of the manorial extents have been preserved in the monastic cartularies and elsewhere. "Among the most accessible are the Golden Book (printed at the end of the Domesday); the Black Book of Peterborough, the Domesday of St. Paul's, the Worcester Register, the Battle Cartulary, all published by the Camden Society; the Ramsey, Gloucester, and Malmesbury Cartularies or registers published in the Rolls series; the Burton Cartulary of the Salt Society and the Yorkshire Institutions of the Yorkshire Record Society;" id. 180.

EXTENUATION. That which renders a crime or tort less heinous than it would be without it. It is opposed to aggravation.

In general, extenuating circumstances go in mitigation of punishment in criminal cases, or of damages in those of a civil nature.

EXTRATERRITORIALITY (Fr.). This term (extraterritorialité) is used by French jurists to signify the immunity of certain persons, who, although in the state, are not amenable to its laws: foreign sovereigns, ambassadors, ministers plenipotentiary, and ministers from a foreign power, are of this class. Foelix, Droit Intern. Privé, liv. 2, tit. 2, c. 2, s. 4; Westl. Priv. Int. L. 211. See Davis, Int. L. 59, 150; AMBASSADOR; CONFLICT OF LAWS; PRIVILEGE FROM ARREST.

EXTINGUISHMENT. The destruction of a right or contract. The act by which a contract is made void. The annihilation of a collateral thing or subject in the subject itself out of which it is derived. Prest. Merg. 9. For the distinction between an extinguishment and passing a right, see 2 Sharw. Bla. Com. 825.

An extinguishment may be by matter of fact and by matter of law. It is by matter of fact either express, as when one receives satisfaction and full payment of a debt and the creditor releases the debtor; 11 Johns. 518; or implied, as when a person hath a yearly rent out of lands and becomes owner, either by descent or purchase, of the estate subject to the payment of the rent, and the latter is extinguished; 8 Stew. 60; but the person must have as high an estate in the land as in the rent, or the rent will not be extinct; Co. Litt. 147 b.

There are numerous cases where the claim is extinguished by operation of law: for example where two persons are jointly but not severally liable for a simple contract-debt, a judgment obtained against one is at common law an extinguishment of the claim on the other debtor; 1 Pet. C. C. 301; 2 Johns. 213.

A conveyance of mortgaged land by the mortgagor to the mortgagee extinguishes the mortgage; 114 Ill. 888. Taking a note for the amount due does not deprive a claimant of his right to a lien, but merely suspends its enforcement until the note is payable; 7 Misc. Rep. 79.

See, generally, Co. Litt. 147 b; 5 Whart. 541; 8 Conn. 62; 1 Ohio 187; 11 Johns. 518; 1 Halst. 190; 4 N. H. 251; 31 Pa. 475; 154 Mass. 314; 84 Me. 83; 54 Fed. Rep. 568; 87 Neb. 677; 2 Crabb, R. P. § 1487.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF COMMON. Loss of the right to have common. This may happen from various causes; by the owner of the common right becoming owner of the fee; by severance from the land; by release; by appurement; 2 Hill, R. P. 75; 2 Steph. Com. 41; 1 Crabb, R. P. § 841; Co. Litt. 280; 1 Bacon, Abr. 628; Cro. Eliz. 684.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF COPYHOLD. This takes place by a union of the copyhold and freehold estates in the same person; also by an act of the tenant showing an intention not to hold any longer of his lord; Hutt. 81; Cro. Eliz. 21; Wms. R. P. 287; Watk. Copyh.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF A DEBT. Destruction of a debt. This may be by the creditor's accepting a higher security; 1 Salk. 304; 1 Md. 492; 24 Ala. n. s. 439. A judgment recovered extinguishes the original debt; 1 Pick. 118; Hill & D. 392. A trust deed given to secure the payment of a bond is not affected by the rendition of a judgment on the bond, since the original debt is not thereby merged, but only the form of the evidence of the debt changed; 89 Va. 524. A debt evidenced by a note may be extinguished by a surrender of the note; 10 Cush. 169; 29 Pa. 50; 3 Ind. 337. As to the effect of payment in extinguishing a debt, see PAYMENT.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF RENT. A destruction of the rent by a union of the title to the lands and the rent in the same person. Termes de la Ley; Cowel; 8 Sharw. Bla. Com. 325, note.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF WAYS. Destruction of a right of way, effected usually by a purchase of the close over which it lies by the owner of the right of way. 2 Washb. R. P.

EXTORSIVELY. A technical word used in indictments for extortion.

When a person is charged with extorsively taking, the very import of the word shows that he is not acquiring possession of his own; 4 Cox, Cr. Cas. 387. In North Carolina the crime may be charged without using this word; 1 Hayw. 406.

EXTORTION. The unlawful taking by any officer, by color of his office, of any money or thing of value that is not due to him, or more than is due, or before it is due. 4 Bla. Com. 141; 152 Pa. 554; 1 Haw. Pl. Cr. c. 68, s. 1; 1 Russ. Cr. § 144; 2 Bish. Cr. L. 390; 14 Fed. Rep. 595.

At common law, any oppression by color of right; but technically the taking of money by an officer, by reason of his office, where none at all was due, or when it was not yet due. The obtaining of money by force or fear is not extortion; 61 Hun 571; Whart. Cr. L. 838.

In a large sense the term includes any oppression under color of right; but it is generally and constantly used in the more limited technical sense above given.

The incumbent of an office, which it was attempted to create by an unconstitutional statute, cannot be guilty of extortion, as he is neither a de jure nor a de facto officer; 81 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 218.

To constitute extortion, there must be the receipt of money or something of value; the taking a promissory note which is void is not sufficient to make an extortion; 2 Mass. 528; 16 id. 93. See Bacon, Abr.; Co. Litt. 168. It is extortion and oppression for an officer to take money for the performance of his duty, even though it be in the exercise of a discretionary power; 2 Burr. 927. See 6 Cow. 661; 1 Cai. 180; 8 Pa. 183; 152 id. 554; 1 South. 824; 7 Pick. 279; 4 Cox, Cr. Cas. 387. See 27 Tex. App. 513; 133 N. Y. 648.

EXTRA BRAKEMAN. "Extra brakeman" is described to mean one who has no regular employment, but takes the place of a regular employe when off duty. 80 S. W. 499.

EXTRA-DOTAL PROPERTY. In Louisiana this term is used to designate that property which forms no part of the dowry of a woman, and which is also called paraphernal property. La. Civ. Code, art. 2315.

EXTRA-JUDICIAL. That which does not belong to the judge or his jurisdiction, notwithstanding which he takes cognizance of it. Extra-judicial judgments and acts are absolutely void. See CORAM NON JUDICE; Merlin, Répert. Errores de Pouv.

EXTRA-JUDICIUM. Extra-judicial; out of the proper cause. Judgments rendered or acts done by a court which has no jurisdiction of the subject, or where it has no jurisdiction, are said to be extra-judicial.

EXTRA QUATUOR MARIA (Lat. beyond four seas). Out of the realm. 1 Bla. Com. 157. See BEYOND SEA.

EXTRA SERVICES. When used with reference to officers it should be construed to embrace all services rendered by such for which no compensation is given by law. 21 Ind. 33.

Also, extraordinary services; beyond what is common, additional to what is due or expected. Anderson.

EXTRA-TERRITORIALITY. That quality of laws which makes them operate beyond the territory of the power enacting them, upon certain persons or certain rights. See Wheat. Int. Law 121; 19 Law M. & R., 4th series 147.

A fiction by which a public minister, though actually in a foreign country, is supposed still to remain within the territory of his own sovereign.

EXTRA-TERRITORIUM. Beyond or outside of the territorial limits of a state. 6 Binn. 358.

EXTRA VIAM. Out of the way. When, in an action of trespass, the defendant pleads a right of way, the defendant may reply extra viam, that the trespass was committed beyond the way, or make a new assignment. 16 East 343, 349.

EXTRACT. A part of a writing. In general, an extract is not evidence, because the whole of the writing may explain the part extracted, so as to give it a different sense; but sometimes extracts from public books are evidence, as extracts from the registers of births, marriages, and burials, kept according to law, when the whole of the matter has been extracted which relates to the cause or matter in issue.

EXTRACTOR OF THE COURT OF SESSION. In Scotland. A salaried officer of the High Court of Justice.

EXTRADITION (Lat. ex, from, traditio, handing over). The surrender by one sovereign state to another, on its demand, of persons charged with the commission of crime within its jurisdiction, that they may be dealt with according to its laws.

The surrender of persons by one sovereign state or political community to another, on its demand, pursuant to treaty stipulations between them.

The surrender of persons by one federal state to another, on its demand, pursuant to their federal constitution and laws.

Without treaty stipulations. Public jurists are not agreed as to whether extradition, independent of treaty stipulations, is a matter of imperative duty or of discretion merely. Some have maintained the doctrine that the obligation to surrender fugitive criminals was perfect, and the duty of fulfilling it, therefore, imperative, especially where the crimes of which they were accused affected the peace and safety of the state; but others regard the obligation as imperfect in its nature, and a refusal to surrender such fugitives as affording no ground of offence. Of the former opinion are Grotius, Heineccius, Burlamaqui, Vattel, Rutherford, Schmelzing, and Kent; the latter is maintained by Puffendorf, Voet, Martens, Klüber, Leyer, Kluit, Sealfeld, Schmaltz, Mittermeyer, Heffter, and Wheaton.

Except under the provisions of treaties, the delivery by one country to another of fugitives from justice is a matter of comity, not of obligation; 119 U. S. 407.

Foreign extradition belongs solely to the national government; 14 How. 103; 10 S. & R. 125; 119 U. S. 407. A state cannot regulate the surrender of fugitives from justice to foreign countries; 50 N. Y. 321.

Many nations have practised extradition without treaty engagements to that effect, as the result of mutual comity and convenience; others have refused. The United States has always declined to surrender criminals unless bound by treaty to do so; 1 Kent 39, n.; 1 Opin. Attys. Gen. 511; 6 id. 85, 431; 50 N. Y. 321; 14 Pet. 540; 12 Vt. 631; 1 Dall. 120. The existence of an extradition treaty does not prohibit the surrender by either country of a person charged with a crime not enumerated in the treaty; 86 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 669. No state has an absolute right to demand of another the delivery of a fugitive criminal, though it has what is called an imperfect right, but a refusal to deliver the criminal is no just cause of war. Per Tilghman, C. J., in 10 S. & R. 125.

Under treaty stipulations. The sovereignty of the United States, as it respects foreign states, being vested by the constitution in the federal government, it appertains to it exclusively to perform the duties of extradition which, by treaties, it may assume; 14 Pet. 540; 119 U. S. 407; and, to enable the executive to discharge such duties, congress passed the act of Aug. 12, 1848, 11 Stat. L. 302. The general government alone has the power to enact laws for the extradition of foreign criminals. It possesses that power under the treaty power in the constitution; 14 Pet. 540; 50 N. Y. 321; 12 Blatch. 391. See 14 How. 103.

Treaties have been made between the United States and many foreign powers for the mutual surrender of persons charged with certain crimes. These treaties may be found in full in the United States Statutes at Large, in 2 Moore on Extradition 1072; Haswell, Treaties & Conventions, U. S. See also 17 Am. L. J. 44.

Austria-Hungary. Murder, assault with intent to commit murder, piracy, arson, robbery, forgery, counterfeiting, and embezzlement of public moneys.

Baden. Same as Austria-Hungary.

Bavaria. Same as Austria-Hungary.

Belgium. Murder, attempt to commit murder, rape, abortion, arson, bigamy, piracy, mutiny, burglary, forgery, counterfeiting, embezzlement of public moneys and also of private moneys, wilful destruction or obstruction of railroads which endangers human life, reception of articles obtained by means of any one of the above crimes.

Bremen. Same as Prussia. See post.

Dominican Republic. Murder, attempt to commit murder, rape, forgery, counterfeiting, arson, robbery, intimidation, forcible entry of an inhabited house, piracy, embezzlement by public officers or by private persons.

Ecuador. Murder, arson, rape, piracy, mutiny, burglary, forgery, counterfeiting, embezzlement of public property.

France. Murder, rape, forgery, arson, embezzlement by public officers or private persons and counterfeiting.

Great Britain. Murder, manslaughter, assault with intent to commit murder, piracy, arson, robbery, forgery, counterfeiting, embezzlement, larceny, receiving money or valuables known to have been embezzled stolen, or fraudulently obtained, fraud by a bailee, banker, agent, factor, trustee, or director of board of officers of any company made criminal by the laws of both countries, perjury, rape, abduction, child-stealing, kidnapping, house-breaking, shop-breaking, piracy, mutiny, crimes against the laws of both countries for the suppression of slavery, and slave-trading. See 14 Am. L. J. 85; 15 id. 324.

Hanover. Murder, assault with intent to commit murder, piracy, arson, robbery, forgery, or utterance of forged papers, counterfeiting and embezzling of public moneys.

Hawaiian Islands. Murder, piracy, arson, robbery, forgery or the utterance of forged papers.

Hayti. Murder, attempt to commit murder, piracy, rape, forgery, counterfeiting, utterance of forged papers, arson, robbery, and embezzlement by public officers or private persons.

Italy. Murder, attempt to commit murder, rape, arson, piracy, mutiny, burglary, the utterance of forged papers and counterfeiting of public, sovereign, or government acts, counterfeiting, embezzlement of public moneys, and embezzlement by private persons. See 11 Law Mag. & Rev., 4th ed. 62.

Japan. Murder, assault with intent to commit murder, counterfeiting, forgery, embezzlement of public funds, robbery, burglary, entering or breaking into offices of government or of banks, trust companies, insurance, or other companies with the intent to commit a felony, perjury, rape, arson, piracy, assault with intent to kill, and manslaughter on the high seas on board a ship bearing the flag of the demanding country, malicious destruction of or attempt to destroy railways, trams, vessels, bridges, dwellings, public edifices, or other buildings when the act endangers human life.

Luxemburg. Murder, attempt to commit murder, rape, attempt to commit rape, abortion, bigamy, arson, piracy, mutiny, burglary, forgery, counterfeiting, embezzling of public moneys, embezzling by private persons, wilful obstruction, or destruction of railroads which endangers human life, reception of articles obtained by means of any of the above crimes. An attempt against the life of the head of a foreign government or against that of any member of his family when such an attempt comprises the act either of murder, assassination, or poisoning shall not be considered a political offence or an act connected with such an offence.

Mecklenburg-Schwerin. Same as Prussia. See post.

Mecklenburg-Strelitz. Same as Prussia. See post.

Mexico. Murder, assault with intent to commit murder, mutilation, piracy, arson, rape, kidnapping, forgery, counterfeiting, embezzling of public moneys, robbery, burglary, larceny of goods of the value of $25, or more when the same is committed within the frontier states or territories of the contracting parties.

Netherlands. Murder, manslaughter, attempt to commit murder, rape, bigamy, abortion, arson, burglary, mutiny, breaking and entering public offices or the offices of banks, trust companies, insurance companies, and attempt to commit theft therein, robbery, forgery, counterfeiting, embezzling by public officers, embezzling by private persons, intentional destruction of a vessel on the high seas, kidnapping of minors, obtaining money or valuables by false devices, larceny, wilful destruction or obstruction of railroads which endangers human life.

Nicaragua. Murder, piracy, arson, rape, mutiny, burglary, robbery, forgery, counterfeiting, embezzling of public money, embezzling by private persons.

North German Confederation. Same as Prussia. See post.

Oldenburg. Same as Prussia. See post.

Orange Free State. Murder, attempt to commit murder, rape, forgery, arson, robbery, forcible entry of an inhabited house, piracy, embezzling by public officers, or by private persons.

Ottoman Porte. Murder, attempt to commit murder, rape, arson, piracy, mutiny, burglary, forgery, counterfeiting, embezzling of public moneys by private persons.

Peru. Murder, abduction, rape, bigamy, arson, kidnapping, robbery, larceny, burglary, counterfeiting, embezzling of public moneys, or by private persons, fraud, bankruptcy, fraudulent barratry, mutiny, severe injuries intentionally inflicted on railroads, or to telegraph lines, or to persons by means of explosions of mines or steam boilers, piracy.

Prussia. Murder, assault with intent to commit murder, piracy, arson, robbery, forgery, utterance of forged papers, counterfeiting, embezzling of public moneys.

Salvador. Murder, attempt to commit murder, rape, arson, piracy, mutiny, burglary, robbery, forgery, counterfeiting, embezzling of public moneys and by private persons.

Schaumburg-Lippe. Same as Prussia. See ante.

Spain. Murder, attempt to commit murder, rape, arson, piracy, mutiny, burglary, breaking and entering offices of government or banks, trust companies or insurance companies with intent to commit felony therein, robbery, forgery or the utterance of forged papers, counterfeiting, embezzling of public funds and by private persons, kidnapping, destruction or loss to a vessel caused intentionally on the high seas by persons on board the said vessel, obtaining by threats or false devices money or valuables, larceny, slave-trading. See 16 Am. L. J. 444.

Sweden and Norway. Murder, attempt to commit murder, rape, piracy, mutiny, arson, robbery, burglary, forgery, counterfeiting, embezzling by public officers.

Switzerland. Murder, attempt to commit murder, rape, forgery, or the emission of forged papers, arson, robbery, piracy, embezzling by public officers or by private persons.

Sicily. Same as Italy. See ante.

Venezuela. Murder, attempt to commit murder, rape, forgery, counterfeiting, arson, robbery, intimidation, forcible entry of an inhabited house, piracy, embezzling by public officers or by private persons.

Württemberg. Same as Prussia. See ante.

Most of the foregoing treaties contain provisions relating to the evidence required to authorize an order of extradition; but as to this, see FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE.

The United States has made treaties for the mutual surrender of deserting seamen with the following foreign states: Austria-Hungary, Belgium, Bolivia, Colombia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, German Empire, Greece, Hawaiian Islands, Hayti, Italy, Madagascar, Netherlands, Peru, Portugal, Roumania, Russia, Salvador, Spain, Sweden and Norway, Tonga.

It has also made treaties with numerous Indian tribes as nations or distinct political communities, in many of which the Indians have stipulated to surrender to the federal authorities persons accused of crime against the laws of the United States; and in some tripartite treaties they have stipulated for mutual extradition of criminals to one another. 11 Stat. L. 612, 708.

Between the several states, by art. iv. sec. ii. of the constitution of the United States, it is provided that "a person charged in any state with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another state, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the state from which he fled, be delivered up to be removed to the state having the jurisdiction of the crime."

The act of congress of Feb. 12, 1793, U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5278-9 prescribed the mode of procedure in such cases, and imposed a like duty upon the territories northwest or south of the river Ohio. See FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE.

As to trial for a different offence. If surrendered by a foreign government, an extradited criminal can be tried only for the offence for which he was extradited; 14 Fed. Rep. 130; 26 id. 421; 32 id. 911; 13 Bush 697; 39 Ohio St. 273; 10 Tex. App. 627; 119 U. S. 407; contra, 8 Blatchf. 181; 18 id. 295; 6 Crim. L. Mag. 511; 9 Misc. Rep. 600; 81 Hun 336. Extradition treaties of the United States do not guarantee a fugitive an asylum in any foreign country. So far as they regulate the right of asylum at all, they limit it; 119 U. S. 436; and the laws of the United States do not recognize any right of asylum, on the part of a fugitive from justice, in any state to which he has fled; 137 U. S. 900.

Under the extradition treaty with England and Rev. Stat. §§ 5272, 5275, a person brought to this country by extradition proceedings can only be tried for the offence with which he is charged in such proceedings; if not tried, or if acquitted after trial, he shall have reasonable time to leave the country before he is arrested for any other crime previously committed; 119 U. S. 407.

As between the states of the Union, fugitives from justice have no right of asylum, in the international sense; and a fugitive who has been returned by interstate rendition may be tried for other offences than that for which his return was demanded, without violating any rights secured by the constitution or laws of the United States; 127 U. S. 700; 148 id. 537, aff. 90 Ga. 347; 112 N. C. 896; 135 N. Y. 536; 158 Mass. 149; 116 Mo. 505; 119 id. 467; 116 Ind. 51; 89 Ia. 94; 158 Mass. 149; 104 Ala. 4; 60 Wis. 587; 4 Tex. A prisoner, regularly committed for trial on criminal process of the state which is in itself regular and valid, cannot be discharged because he was brought back from another state on extradition warrants procured by false affidavits; and on that ground alone the federal courts will not release him.

on habeas corpus; 75 Fed. Rep. 821; nor is a fugitive, who has been kidnapped and brought back into the state where his offence was committed, entitled to release on habeas corpus; 9 B. & C. 446; 119 U. S. 436; 18 Fed. Rep. 167, aff. 110 Ill. 627; 127 U. S. 700, aff. 84 Fed. Rep. 525; 21 Iowa 467; 18 Pa. 87; 1 Bailey 283; 7 Vt. 118; contra, State v. Simmons, 89 Kan. 262. A prisoner cannot set up as a ground for discharge that he has been enticed into the state by fraudulent representations; 4 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 576; nor that the extradition proceedings in the other state were irregular; 45 Fed. Rep. 352; 52 Vt. 609.

The constitutional provision for interstate rendition warrants a surrender after conviction; 7 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 406; but after serving his sentence the convict cannot be surrendered under a requisition from another state until he has had reasonable time to return to the state from which he was extradited; id.

Extradition proceedings may be made the basis of a suit for malicious prosecution; 16 Fed. Rep. 93.

The word "person" etymologically considered includes citizens as well as those who are not; and while it is the practice of a preponderant number of nations to refuse to deliver its own citizens under a treaty of extradition silent on the point specifically, held, in view of the diplomatic history of the United States, there is no principle of international law by which citizens are excepted from the operation of a treaty to surrender persons where no such exception is made in the treaty itself. The United States has always so construed its treaties. 229 U. S. 448.

A person extradited under the treaty of 1899 with Great Britain cannot be punished for an offense other than that for which his extradition has been demanded even though prior to his extradition he had been convicted and sentenced therefor.

While the escape of criminals is to be deprecated, treaties of extradition should be construed in accordance with the highest good faith, and a treaty should not be so construed as to obtain the extradition of a person for one offense and punish him for another, especially when the latter offense is one for which the surrendering government has refused to surrender him on the ground that it was not covered by the treaty. 205 U. S. 310. See EXPULSION.

EXTRANEUS. In Old English Law. One foreign born; a foreigner. 7

Rep. 16.

In Roman Law. An heir not born in the family of the testator. Those of a foreign state. The same as alienus. Vicat, Vocat. Jur.; Du Cange.

EXTRAORDINARY. Beyond or out of the common order or rule; not usual, regular, or of a customary kind; not ordinary; remarkable; uncommon; rare. 29 Abb. N. C. 154. 19 Fed. Rep. 103.

Extraordinary Care. Synonymous with greatest care, utmost care, highest degree of care. Abbott; 54 Ill. 19.

Extraordinary Peril. What is beyond the ordinary, usual, or common, not what has never been previously heard of, or is within former experience. Anderson; 1 Duer, 170.

EXTRAVAGANTES. In Canon Law. The name given to the constitutions of the popes posterior to the Clementines.

They are thus called, quasi vagantes extra corpus juris, to express that they were out of the canonical law, which at first contained only the decrees of Gratian; afterwards the Decretals of Gregory IX., the Sixte of Boniface VIII., the Clementines, and at last the Extravagantes, were added to it. There are the Extravagantes of John XXII., and the common Extravagantes. The first contain twenty epistles, decretals, or constitutions of that pope, divided under fifteen titles, without any subdivision into books. The others are epistles, decretals, or constitutions of the popes who occupied the holy see either before or after John XXII. They are divided into books, like the decretals.

EXTREMIS (Lat.). When a person is sick beyond the hope of recovery, and near death, he is said to be in extremis.

A will made in this condition, if made without undue influence, by a person of sound mind, is valid. As to the effect of declarations of persons in extremis, see DYING DECLARATIONS; DECLARATIONS.

EXTUNC (Lat.). From then; from that time; from thence; thereafter.

EY. A watery place; water. Co. Litt. 6.

EYE-WITNESS. One who saw the act or fact to which he testifies. When an eye-witness testifies, and is a man of intelligence and integrity, much reliance must be placed on his testimony; for he has the means of making known the truth.

EYOTT. A small island arising in a river. Fleta, l. 3, c. 2, s. b; Bracton, l. 2, c. 2. See ISLAND.

EYRE. A journey; a court of itinerant justices. In old English law applied to the judges who travelled in circuit to hold courts in the different counties. See JUSTICES IN EYRE.

EYRE, CHIEF JUSTICE IN. See CHIEF JUSTICE IN EYRE.

EYREER. To go about. See EYRE.

F.

F. The sixth letter of the alphabet. A fighter or maker of frays, if he had no ears, and a felon on being admitted to clergy, was to be branded in the cheek with this letter. Cowel; Jacob. Those who had been guilty of falsity were to be so marked. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. L. 392.

F. O. B. Free on board. A term frequently inserted, in England, in contracts for the sale of goods to be conveyed by ship, signifying that the buyer will be responsible for the cost of shipment. In London, when goods are so sold, the buyer is considered as the shipper and the goods are shipped at his risk; 5 Moo. P. C. 165; 3 Hurlst. & N. 484; 4 id. 822; 29 L. J. C. P. 218; 43 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 147.

FABRIC LANDS. In English Law. Lands given for the repair, rebuilding, or maintenance of cathedrals or other churches.

It was the custom, says Cowel, for almost every one to give by will more or less to the fabric of the cathedral or parish church where he lived. These lands so given were called fabric lands, because given ad fabricam ecclesie reparandam (for repairing the fabric of the church). Called by the Saxons timber-lands. Cowel; Spelman, Glos.

FABRICARE (Lat.). To make. Used of an unlawful making, as counterfeiting coin; 1 Salk. 842, and also lawful coining.

FABRICATE. To invent; to devise falsely. Invent is sometimes used in a bad sense, but fabricate never in any other. To fabricate a story implies that it is so contrary to probability as to require the skill of a workman to induce belief in it. Crabbe, Syn.

The word implies fraud or falsehood; a false or fraudulent concoction, knowing it to be wrong. L. R. 10 Q. B. 162.

In the Law of Evidence. To forge; to create by artifice, with a view to deceive; as to fabricate evidence, or facts, the materials of evidence. To produce or exhibit false and deceptive appearances, in order to have them observed and testified to, as genuine facts. To present false statements of transactions or occurrences, through the medium of evidence. Burrill.

FABRICATED FACT. In the law of evidence. A fact existing only in statement, without any foundation in truth.

FABULA. In old European law, a contract or covenant. Also in the laws of the Lombards and Visigoths, a nuptial contract; a will. Burrill.

FACE. The outward appearance or aspect of a thing.

The words of a written paper in their apparent or obvious meaning, as, the face of a note, bill, bond, check, draft, judgment, record, or contract, which titles see. The face of a judgment is the sum for which it was rendered, exclusive of interest. 82 La. 285.

FACIAS (Lat. facere, to make, to do). That you cause. Occurring in the phrases scire facias (that you cause to know), fiat facias (that you cause to be made), etc. Used also in the phrases Do ut facias (I give that you may do), Facio ut facias (I do that you may do), two of the four divisions of considerations made by Blackstone, 3 Com. 444.

FACIES? FACIAM (Lat.). Will you do? I will do.

FACILITIES. A name formerly given to certain notes of some of the banks in the state of Connecticut, which were made payable in two years after the close of the war of 1812. 14 Mass. 322.

This word has been the subject of much discussion in connection with the English Traffic Act and the act of congress creating the interstate commerce commission. It has been held to include all works necessary for the accommodation of traffic and safety of passengers; 3 Nev. & Mac. 48; designation of the hour and speed of connecting trains; 2 El. & Bl. 530; accommodation for receiving and delivering freight where there was no station before, if within the power of the company, and if demanded by the public convenience; id. 800; or even to provide a new station; id. 831.

The statutory obligation to afford due and reasonable facilities is not limited by the convenience of the company; 3 Nev. & Mac. 37; or the question of remuneration to the company; 7 id. 72, 88; nor is it to be interfered with by disputes between different companies; 3 id. 540. It cannot be avoided because the company, by its own act, has rendered the performance of such obligation more difficult; [1891] 1 Q. B. 440. Facilities must be of a more or less public character, and not designed to remedy a mere private grievance; 1 Nev. & Mac. 38, 58, 59, 61.

In a very leading case the word was held to include structural alterations; per Lord Selborne, L. C. (with whom concurred Coleridge, C. J., Brett, L. J., dissenting) in 6 Q. B. D. 506 (reversing 5 Q. B. D. 220, in which the decision was by Cockburn, C. J., and Manisty, L. J., dissenting).

Land owned by a railroad company may be rented for storage of coal without liability for undue preference, storage not being included in the facilities required by the English act; L. R. 5 C. P. 622; s. c. 1 Nev. & Mac. 166.

By the second clause of the third section of the act of congress creating the Interstate Commerce Commission all railroad companies are required "to afford all reasonable, proper, and equal facilities for the interchange of traffic between their respective lines.—This (it was held by the Circuit Court for Kentucky, per Mr. Justice Jackson) leaves the carriers where it finds them and imposes no duty upon the railroad companies, either to the public or to other lines, to make new stations, yards or depots, even though such would be convenient for the public or other carriers; 87 Fed. Rep. 567; and when a new railroad makes a physical connection with an old one, at a point other than the regular yard or depot, the old company is not compelled to provide the same or equal facilities at the point of contact which it had originally provided at its regular yards and depots; id.; the provision was not enacted for the benefit of carriers but of the commerce transported; id. In this case the Interstate Commerce Commission made an order requiring the connection; 3 Int. Com. Rep.—; but on application to the circuit court to enforce the order the court considered it was not warranted by the act and refused to enforce it.

Under this clause, railroad companies are not required to furnish competing connecting carriers with equal facilities, for the interchange of traffic, when this involves the use of its tracks by such carriers; it may permit such use by one carrier to the exclusion of others; 69 Fed. Rep. 400; nor is the clause violated by receiving and forwarding without prepayment of freight or car mileage, cars of other companies, containing goods coming from one locality and under like circumstances, refusing goods from a different locality; 61 Fed. Rep. 158, affg. 51 id. 465.

A state constitution prohibiting discrimination in charges and facilities does not require a company to make provision for joint business with a new line crossing it, similar to those already made with a rival line at another near point; 110 U. S. 667; but railroad companies may be required to furnish facilities at, and prevented from abandoning stations already established; 37 Conn. 153; 42 id. 56; 104 U. S. 1; 63 Me. 269; 103 Mass. 254; 19 Neb. 476. The mere failure of a common carrier to provide facilities for the shipment of freight does not constitute a legal ground for the recovery of damages; 61 Ark. 560; 85 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 626; 3 Mo. App. Rep. 941. See COMMON CARRIER.

The power of the commission to regulate the accessory facilities is held by the circuit court of appeals to be confined to mere regulation, and cannot be used to invade rights of property by entering the domain of deprivation, construction, and reconstruction of properties to carry out the proposed regulation; 74 Fed. Rep. 803.

See, generally, as to the construction of the word in the English Traffic Act, Darling-ton, Ry. Rates, Ch. III. See INTERSTATE COMMERCE; RATES. A term applied to certain notes made payable two years after the war of 1812, which were issued by some of the Connecticut banks. Applied to railroads, means everything necessary for the convenience of passengers and the safety and prompt transportation of freight. English.

FACILITY. In Scotch Law. A degree of mental weakness short of idiocy but justifying legal intervention.

In order to support the reduction of the deed of a facile person, there must be evidence of circumvention and of imposition in the transaction, as well as facility in the party and lesion. But where lesion in the deed and facility in the grantor concur, the most slender circumstances of fraud or circumvention are sufficient to set it aside; Bell, Dict.

FACIO UT DES (Lat. I do that you may give). An expression applied in the civil law to the consideration of that species of contract by which a person agrees to perform anything for a price either specifically mentioned or left to the determination of the law to set a value on it; as, when a servant hires himself to his master for certain wages or an agreed sum of money; 2 Bla. Com. 445. See CONSIDERATION.

FACIO UT FACIAS (Lat. I do that you may do). An expression used in the civil law to denote the consideration of that species of contract by which I agree with a man to do his work for him if he will do mine for me; or if two persons agree to marry together, or to do any other positive acts on both sides; or it may be to forbear on one side in consideration of something done on the other. 2 Bla. Com. 444. See CONSIDERATION.

FACSIMILE. An exact copy or accurate imitation of an original instrument.

In England, where the construction of a will may be affected by the appearance of the original paper, the court will order the probate to pass in facsimile as it may possibly help to show the meaning of the testator; 1 Wms. Ex., 7th ed. 331, 386, 566, See PROBATE.

Made like in appearance. Said of counterfeits, designs, signatures, trade-marks, etc. Anderson.

FACT (Lat. factum). An action; a thing done. A circumstance.

Fact is much used in modern times in distinction from law. Thus, in every case to be tried there are facts to be shown to exist to which the law is to be applied. If law is, as it is said to be, a rule of action, the fact is the action shown to have been done, and which should have been done in accordance with the rule. Fact, in this sense, means a thing done or existing. It has been a frequent subject of debate whether certain words and phrases imply questions of fact, or of law, or both, or are conclusions of law. A useful collection of decisions will be found in Ram on Facts, 3d Am. ed. 21.

Material facts are those which are essential to the right of action or defence. See 30 Mo. 68; 40 N. H. 338.

Immaterial facts are those which are not essential to the right of action or defence. Material facts must be shown to exist; immaterial facts need not. As to what are questions of law for the court and of fact for the jury, see QUESTIONS OF LAW AND FACT; IGNORANCE; WELLS. LAW AND FACT. As to pleading material facts, see Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 28.

Facts constituting a cause of action are those facts which the evidence upon the trial will prove, and not the evidence which will be required to prove the existence of such facts. 1 Dak. 403 See INVESTIGATIVE FACT

FACTA ARMORUM. Feats of arms; jousts; tournaments, etc. Cowell.

FACTIO TESTAMENTI (Lat.). In Civil Law. The power of making a will, including right and capacity. Also, the power of receiving under a will. Vicat, Voc. Jur.

FACTOR. An agent employed to sell goods or merchandise consigned or delivered to him, by or for his principal, for a compensation, commonly called factorage or commission. Pal. Ag. 13; Sto. Ag. § 38; Com. Dig. Merch. B; Malynes, Lex Merc. 81; Beawes, Lex Merc. 44; 3 Chit. Com. L. 193; 2 Kent 622; 1 Bell, Comm. 385, § 408; 2 B. & Ald. 143.

An agent for the sale of goods in his possession or consigned to him. Lawson, R. & Rem. § 227.

When the agent accompanies the ship, taking a cargo aboard, and it is consigned to him for sale, and he is to purchase a return cargo out of the proceeds, such agent is properly called a factor; he is, however, usually known by the name of a super-cargo (q. v.). Beawes, Lex Merc. 44; Livermore, Ag. 69; 1 Dond. 18, § 3, art. 18, § 3. A factor differs from a broker in some important particulars: namely, he may buy and sell for his principal in his own name, as well as in the name of his principal; on the contrary, a broker acting as such should buy and sell in the name of his principal; 3 Chit. Com. Law 193, 210, 241; 2 B. & Ald. 143; 3 Kent 622; 25 Wall. 321; 11 Mart. La. 261. Again, a factor is intrusted with possession, management, disposal, and control of the goods to be bought and sold, and has a special property and a lien on them; the broker, on the contrary, has usually no such possession, management, control, or disposal of the goods, nor any such special property or lien; Paley, Ag. 13; 1 Bell, Com. 385. The business of factors in the United States is usually done by commission merchants, who are known by that name, and the term factor is but little used; 1 Pars. Contr. 78. The term factor, however, is largely used in the Southern States in the cotton business, and in a different sense from commission merchant; 16 Fed. Rep. 516. He not only sells cotton, but makes advances to the merchant or planter, in cash or goods, to be repaid when the crop comes in. He thus has a lien upon the crop before it is shipped to him. In Alabama the term "commission merchant" as used in the revenue laws is synonymous with "factor"; 50 Ala. 154.

A domestic factor is one who resides in the same country with his principal.

By the usages of trade, or intention of law, when domestic factors are employed in the ordinary business of buying and selling goods, it is presumed that a reciprocal credit among the principal and the agent and third persons has been given. When a purchase has been made by such a factor, he, as well as his principal, is deemed liable for the debt; and in case of a sale the buyer is responsible both to the factor and the principal for the purchase-money; but this presumption may be rebutted by proof of exclusive credit; Story, Ag. § 297, 301, 328; Paley, Ag. 94, 97; 9 B. & C. 78; 15 East 28.

A foreign factor is one who resides in a different country from his principal. 1

Term 112; 4 Maule & S. 576.

Foreign factors are held personally liable upon all contracts made by them for their employers, whether they describe themselves in the contract as agents or not. In such cases the presumption is that the credit is given exclusively to the factor. But this presumption may be rebutted by proof of a contrary agreement; Story, Ag. § 298; Mech. Ag. 1031; Bull. N. P. 130; 1 B. & P. 308; 9 B. & C. 78.

His duties. He is required to use reasonable skill and ordinary diligence in his vocation; 1 Ventr. 121; 66 Hun 633; 104 Ala. 602. If for any reason not tortious, he delays selling the goods consigned to him, he is not liable for a subsequent loss occurring through an act of God; 44 Ill. App. 527. He is bound to obey his instructions; 3 N. Y. 93; 77 Ga. 64; 5 C. B. 895; but when he has none he may and ought to act according to the general usages of trade; 14 Pet. 479; 7 Taunt. 164; 5 Day 536; 8 Caines 226; 1 Story. 43; to sell for cash when that is usual, or to give credit on sales when that is customary; 61 N. H. 56. He is bound to render a just account to his principal, and to pay him the moneys he may receive for him. The mere fact that one sells products as a factor, does not impose upon him the burden of proving due diligence in the sale; 111 N. C. 458.

His rights. He has the right to sell the goods in his own name; and, when untrammelled by instructions, he may sell them at such times and for such prices as, in the exercise of a just discretion, he may think best for his employer; 3 C. B. 380; 63 N. C. 542; but he must obey instructions if given; 5 Dill. 438; 81 N. Y. 676; but when the instructions are to wait until a certain law has produced its effect on the market, a certain discretion as to time may be exercised; 21 id. 380. He may sell on credit when such is the usage of the market; 1 Sto. 43; but if he sell on change he is held to a high degree of diligence to ascertain the solvency of the purchaser; 75 Ill. 464. In the absence of instructions he may give a warranty; 1 Wall. 659; and he may insure the goods of the principal in his own name; 120 Mass. 449. He is, for many purposes, between himself and third persons, to be considered as the owner of the goods. He may, therefore, recover the price of goods sold by him in his own name, and, consequently, he may receive payment and give receipts, and discharge the debtor, unless, indeed, notice has been given by the principal to the debtor not to pay. But the title to goods consigned to a factor to be sold remains in the principal until sold, and may not be sold on execution to pay debts of the factor; 88 W. Va. 158. He has a lien on the goods for advances made by him, and for his commissions; but he is not to be considered as the owner, beyond the extent of his lien; id.; 63 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 720; 23 Wall. 85. He has no right to barter the goods of his principal; 65 Mo. 89; 44 Wis. 265; nor to pledge them for the purpose of raising money for himself, nor to secure a debt he may owe; 13 Mass. 178; 59 Ill. App. 149; 1 McCord 1; 1 Mas. 440; 5 Johns. Ch. 429; 78 Pa. 85; L. R. 10 C. P. 354. See 3 Den. 473; 18 E. L. & Eq. 261; FACTOR'S ACTS. But he may pledge them for advances made to his principal, or for the purpose of raising money for him, or in order to reimburse himself to the amount of his own lien; 2 Kent 623; 4 Johns. 103; 7 East 5; Story, Bailm. § 325; Edw. Bailm. 194; 10 Wall. 141. Another exception to the general rule that a factor cannot pledge the goods of his principal is, that he may raise money by pledging the goods for the payment of duties or any other charge or purpose allowed or justified by the usages of the trade; 2 Gall. 13; 6 S. & R. 866; 3 Esp. 183. He has a lien upon the goods of his principal in his possession, to protect himself against unpaid drafts drawn and accepted in the course of the agency; 35 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 346; and such lien is personal to the factor; 88 W. Va. 158. Where a factor disobeys instructions in selling grain which he has bought for his principal, he thereby loses his lien on money deposited with him as security; 40 Ill. 313; 114 Id. 96.

It may be laid down as a general rule that when the property remitted by the principal, or acquired for him by his order, is found distinguishable in the hands of the factor, capable of being traced by a clear and connected chain of identity, in no one link of it degenerating from a specific trust into a general debt, the creditors of the factor who has become bankrupt have no right to the specific property; 3 Stra. 1182; 8 Maule & S. 562; even where it is money in the factor's hands; 2 Burr. 1369; 14 N. H. 38; 3 Dall. 90; 2 Pick. 86; 5 id. 7; 63 Conn. 198. He may sell them to reimburse advances; 14 Pet. 479; unless restrained by an agreement with his principal, but if he has agreed to hold them for a given time he is bound to do so; 16 Fed. Rep. 516. And where the factor dies insolvent, before remitting to the shipper, the latter is entitled to satisfaction out of the proceeds of the sale or deposit in bank, as against the claim of the bank on an unmatured note; 70 Hun 90. And see 1 B. & P. 530, 648, for the rule as to promissory notes. FACTOR'S ACTS. A name given to legislative enactments in England and the United States designed to mitigate the hardships of the common-law rule governing dealings with factors, and especially with respect to pledges made by them of the goods of the principal. The object of the English legislation known under this general designation is the protection of persons dealing with those having possession of goods or documents representing the title thereto. The first acts were 4 Geo. IV. c. 84 and 6 Geo. IV. c. 94, and these were confined to persons entrusted with documents of title, not with the goods themselves. This defect was remedied by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39, of which the Ontario act is merely a copy; R. S. Ont. c. 121. The subject was again dealt with in 40 & 41 Vict. c. 39, under which many of the decisions under the former acts were practically set aside. As to the provisions of the English acts and decisions thereunder, see 5 Can. L. T. 145.

In the United States the rule of the common law that a factor cannot pledge the property of his principal has been largely altered by statute in many of the states, founded generally it is said upon the statutes of 6 Geo. IV. c. 94; 3 Wait, Act. & Def. 300. It is necessary to have reference to the legislation or absence of it in any particular state, to ascertain the law applicable to a particular case and to compare it with the English acts in order to determine the applicability of English decisions. See, as to legislation in this country, 58 Am. Dec. 165, note. See also FACTOR.

In England. (1889.) Enable a person in the possession of goods, or documents of title to goods, to validly sell or pledge the same, notwithstanding they may have been entrusted to him for a different purpose, or may have been already sold by him to someone else, or may be subject to a lien in favor of the person from whom he has bought them, or that his agency may have been revoked. Byrne. This act repeals former similar acts and consolidates their provisions. Similar statutes are to be found in the States and in Canada.

FACTORAGE. The wages or allowances paid to a factor for his services; it is more usual to call this commissions.

FACTORISING PROCESS. A process for attaching effects of the debtor in the hands of a third party. It is substantially the same process known as the garnishee process, trustee process, process by foreign attachment; Drake, Attch. § 51.

FACTORY. A building or group of buildings appropriated to the manufacture of goods, including the machinery necessary to produce the goods, and the engine or other power by which the machinery is propelled; the place where workers are employed in fabricating goods, wares, or utensils. Cent. Dict.

All buildings and premises wherein or within the close or curtilage of which steam, water, or any mechanical power is used to move or work any machinery employed in preparing, manufacturing, or finishing cotton, etc. 7 Vict. c. 15, sect. 78. By subsequent acts, this definition has been extended to various other manufacturing places; Moz. & W. L. Dict. The term includes the fixed machinery when used in a policy of insurance; 8 Ind. 479.

In Scotch Law.—A contract which partakes of a mandate and locatio ad operandum, and which is in the English and American law books discussed under the title of Principal and Agent. Bell, Comm. 259.

FACTORY ACTS. Laws enacted for the purpose of regulating the hours of work, and the sanitary condition, and preserving the health and morals, of the employees, and promoting the education of young persons employed at such labor.

The statute of 1839 (42 Geo. III. c. 73) was the first to be passed, and was followed by those of 1882, and others following at brief intervals up to 1893. For a detailed account of the English acts, see International Encyclopedia, A. 1.

In this country statutes have been passed from time to time in most if not all the states, having in view the same reformatory purpose or kindred ones, as the English Factory Act of 1833 and the others of like character which followed it. The right of the states to pass such acts is sustained under the police power and the principles by which the validity of any such legislation is to be tested is thus stated by the most recent writer on the subject of labor law: "Such statutes are doubtless constitutional in any case where the reason of the regulation is based upon considerations of the public health, safety, and comfort, or the health and morals of the operatives, and is apparent on the face of the statute, but it will not do, under the guise of police regulation, to pass statutes of which the real purpose is different, even though they be in the interest of any particular trade, or otherwise desirable. Such regulations or reformations can only be attained by combination among the workmen themselves to see that they are complied with." Stimson, Lab. L. of U. S. § 46.

The most important subjects covered by this legislation are summarized by the same author: "The preservation of the health of employees in factories by the removal of excessive dust, or for securing pure air, or requiring fans or other special devices to remove noxious dust or vapors peculiar to the trade; statutes requiring guards to be placed about dangerous machinery, belting, elevators, wells, air-shafts, etc.; statutes providing for fire-escapes, adequate staircases with rails, rubber treads, etc.; doors opening outwardly, etc.; statutes providing against injury to operatives by the machinery used, such as laws prohibiting the machinery to be cleaned while in motion, or from being cleaned by any woman or minor; laws requiring mechanical belt-shifters, etc., or connection by bells, tubes, etc., between any room where machinery is used and the engine-room; laws aimed at overcrowding in factories, and at the general comfort of the operatives; and many special laws in railways, mines, and other special occupations, such as the laws requiring warning guards to be placed before bridges upon railroads, requiring the frogs and switches or other appliances of the track to be in good condition and properly protected by timber or otherwise, providing automatic couplings to both freight and passenger trains, and in building trades, providing for railings upon scaffolds and for suitable scaffolds generally." Id.

There are in many of the states restrictions upon the employment of women and children by limiting the number of hours of labor permitted and providing for oversight of their treatment. For details of such legislation in various states, see id. § 13. It is held constitutional as to minors without doubt, resting on the theory that the state is parens patrie, and as such entitled to the control of those who are unable to contract for themselves. The effort is made to rest it on the same ground as to women; 120 Mass. 883 (in which state there is an unusual and extensive constitutional power of legislation "for the good and welfare" of the people); but elsewhere the constitutionality of such acts has been lately denied on the ground that it was class legislation; 155 Ill. 98. It is now earnestly contended that under the modern view of women under the law, as equally capable with men of contracting, and often of voting and holding office, any effort to restrict the freedom of women to contract cannot be sustained; Stimson, Lab. L. § 13. But while we may admit the full force of the argument against this class of legislation based upon the changed legal relations of women, it may nevertheless be doubted whether it does not to some extent, at least, miss the real underlying principle of such legislation. It is intended for the protection of women and the amelioration of their condition, and is more or less a recognition of the different physical constitution of woman and her peculiar and important relation to the community. Such considerations rest upon conditions which are not changed by any increase of her property rights or political privileges, and, so far as they may have been the basis of these restrictive regulations, they exist and operate with undiminished force. They are apparently overlooked by courts and text writers, including the author quoted, but must undoubtedly be reckoned with in any attempt to deal properly either with the validity or the policy of the acts in question. It is at least fairly to be considered whether they are not quite sufficient to bring the subject of the protection, not the restriction, of women fairly within the scope of the police power as determined by the criterion above quoted, viz.: considerations of public health, safety, and comfort, or the health and morals of the operatives. Every one of these things would remain to be affected by regulations for promoting the welfare of women, even if they were absolutely unshackled by the law as to other classes of rights. The underlying principle or motif of such legislation is restraint of the employer rather than of the employee.

FACTORY PRICES. The prices at which goods may be bought at factories, as distinguished from the prices of those bought in the market, after they have passed into the hands of third parties or shopkeepers. 2 Mass. 90.

FACTUM. A deed; a man's own act and deed. A culpable or criminal act; an act not founded in law. A deed; a written instrument under seal: called, also, charta. Spelman, Gloss.; 2 Bla. Com. 295.

The difference between factum and charta originally would seem to have been that factum denoted the thing done, and charta the evidence thereof; Co. Litt. 9 b. When a man denies by his plea that he made a deed on which he is sued, he pleads non est factum (it is not his deed).

In wills, factum seems to retain an active significance and to denote a making. See 11 How. 358.

A fact. Factum probandum (the fact to be proved). 1 Greenl. Ev. § 18.

A portion of land granted to a farmer; otherwise called a hide, bovata, etc. Spelm.

In French Law. A memoir which contains concisely set down the fact on which a contest has happened, the means on which a party founds his pretensions, with the refutation of the means of the adverse party. See Vicat, Voc. Jur.

FACULTY. In Canon Law. A license; an authority. For example, the ordinary, having the disposal of all seats in the nave of a church, may grant this power, which when it is delegated is called a faculty, to another. Faculties are of two kinds: first, when the grant is to a man and his heirs in gross; second, when it is to a person and his heirs as appurtenant to a house which he holds in the parish; 1 Term 429, 482; 12 Co. 100.

In Scotch Law. Ability or power. The term faculty is more properly applied to a power founded on the consent of the party from whom it springs, and not founded on property; Kames, Eq. 504.

FACULTY OF ADVOCATES. See ADVOCATES.

FACULTY OF A COLLEGE. The body of instructors or professors whose duties are to attend to the educational business, course of studies, and discipline of the college, as distinguished from the trustees in whom are vested the title to the property and management of the financial concerns of the institution.

FACULTIES, MASTER OF THE. The Archbishop of Canterbury has an officer called the Master of the Faculties, who deals with applications for the admission and removal of notaries public. The judge of the Provincial Courts of Canterbury and York is now ex officio Master of the Faculties. Byrne; Pub. Wor. Reg. Act, 1874, s. 7. See COURT OF FACULTIES.

FADERFTUM (Sax. from foeder, father, and feh, a gift). A gift or portion which a woman's father or brother gave her on her marriage. Burrill; Spelman.

FAEDERFEOTH. The portion brought by a wife to her husband, and which reverted to a widow, in case the heir of her deceased husband refused his consent to her second marriage; i. e. it reverted to her family in case she returned to them. R. & L. Dict.; Anc. Inst. Engl.

FAESTING-MEN. Approved men who were strong-armed. Subsequently the word seems to have been used in the sense of rich, and hence it probably passed into its later and common meaning of pledges or bondsmen, which, by Saxon custom, were bound to answer for each other's good behavior. Cowel; Du Cange.

FAGGOT. A badge, worn in medieval times by persons who had recanted their heretical opinions, designed to show what they considered they had merited but had escaped. Cowel.

These persons were condemned not only to the penance of carrying a faggot, but for a more durable mark of infamy, they were to have the sign of a faggot embroidered on the sleeve of their upper garment. If this badge or faggot was at any time left off, it was often alleged as the sign of apostasy. Jacob.

FAGGOT VOTE. A term applied to votes manufactured by nominally transferring land to persons otherwise disqualified from voting for members of parliament.

FAIDA. In Saxon Law. Great and open hostility which arose on account of some murder committed. The term was applied only to that deadly enmity in deference to which, among the Germans and other northern nations, if murder was committed, punishment might be demanded from any one of kin to the murderer by any one of the kin of the murdered man. Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss.

FAIL. To leave unperformed; to omit; to neglect, as distinguished from refuse, which latter involves an act of the will, while the former may be an act of inevitable necessity; 9 Wheat. 344.

Refuse. "Fail" may be equivalent to "refuse" where the condition to be performed depends on the will of a person. But where the condition does not depend on his will, but on the will of those over whom he can have no control, there is a manifest distinction between "refuse" and "fail" to comply with it. The first is an act of the will, the second may be an act of inevitable necessity. 9 Wheat. U. S. 344.

FAILLITE (Fr.). In French Law. Bankruptcy; failure. The condition of a merchant who ceases to pay his debts. 3 Massé, Droit Comm. 171; Guyot, Répert.

FAILURE. In legal parlance, the neglect of any duty may be a failure, and the commission of any fault a delinquency. When applied to a mercantile concern, it means an inability to meet its debts from insolvency. It is synonymous with insolvency. 1 Rice 126.

The state or condition of being wanting; a falling short; deficiency or lack; defect, want, absence; default; defeat. Also, default; omission; neglect; non-performance; as, failure to perform a contract. Also suspension of payment; as, failure in business, a failing debtor. Anderson.

FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION. See CONSIDERATION.

FAILURE OF EVIDENCE. A failure to offer proof, either positive or inferential, to establish one or more of the many facts, the establishment of all of which is indispensable to the finding of the issue for the plaintiff. 7 Gill. & J. 28.

FAILURE OF ISSUE. A want of issue to take an estate limited over by an executory devise.

Failure of issue is definite or indefinite. When the precise time for the failure of issue is fixed by the will, as in the case of a devise to Peter, but, if he dies without issue living at the time of his death, then to another, this is a failure of issue definite. An indefinite failure of issue is a general failure whenever it may happen, without fixing any time, or a certain and definite period, within which it must happen. 4 Kent 275. An executory devise in fee, with remainder over, to take effect on an indefinite failure of issue is void for remoteness, and hence courts are astute to devise some construction which shall restrain the failure of issue to the term of limitation allowed; id. 276, n. See 40 Pa. 18; 2 Redf. Wills 276, n.; Beach, Wills 374; DYING WITHOUT ISSUE; EN VENTRE SA MERE; SHELLEY'S CASE, RULE IN.

FAILURE OF JUSTICE. An expression used to denote the deprivation of a right or the loss of reparation for an injury as the result of the lack or inadequacy of a legal remedy. It is also colloquially applied to the miscarriage of justice which occurs when the result of a trial is so palpably wrong as to shock the moral sense of the community.

FAILURE OF RECORD. The neglect to produce the record after having pleaded it. When a defendant pleads a matter and offers to prove it by the record, and the plaintiff pleads nul tiel record, a day is given to the defendant to bring in the record; if he fails to do so, he is said to fail of his record, and, there being a failure of record the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. Termes de la Ley. See the form of entering it; 1 Wms. Saund. 92, n. 3.

FAILURE OF TITLE. The entire or partial loss of title suffered by a grantee or one who has contracted to purchase property, resulting from failure or inability of the grantor or vendor to pass a satisfactory title.

Defect or want of title. When discovered before the money has been paid, the purchaser may deduct an amount equal to the value of the land of which he is deprived. Anderson.

FAILURE OF TRUST. The lapse or inability to execute a trust, whether from the legal insufficiency or defective execution of the instrument creating it, the uncertainty of the object, or the lack of a person to take as cestui que trust. It is a doctrine of equity that a trust shall not fail for want of a trustee. See TRUST.

Defect of a proposed trust from want of constituting facts or elements or of law to effectuate the object. Anderson.

FAINT PLEADER. A false, fraudulent, or collusive manner of pleading, to the deception of a third person.

FAIR. A public mart or place of buying or selling. 1 Bla. Com. 274. A greater species of market, recurring at more distant intervals.

Though etymologically signifying a market for buying and selling exhibited articles, it includes a place for the exhibition of agricultural and mechanical products. 48 Ohio St. 509.

A fair is usually attended by a greater concourse of people than a market, for the amusement of whom various exhibitions are gotten up. McCulloch, Comm. Dict.; Wharton, Dict.

A solemn or greater sort of market, granted to any town by privilege, for the more speedy and commodious provision of such things as the subject needeth, or the utterance of such things as we abound in above our own uses and occasions. Cowell; Cunningham, Law Dict. A privileged market.

A fair is a franchise which is obtained by a grant from the crown. 2d Inst. 220; 8 Mod. 123; 1 Ld. Raym. 341; 2 Saund. 172; 1 Rolle, Abr. 106; Tomlin; Cunningham, Law Dict.

In some of the United States fairs are recognized and regulated by statute.

FAIR ABRIDGMENT. See COPYRIGHT.

FAIR CRITICISM. See CRITICISM.

FAIR KNOWLEDGE OR SKILL. A reasonable degree of knowledge or measure of skill. 95 Ind. 382.

FAIR-PLAY MEN. A local irregular tribunal which at one time existed in Pennsylvania.

About the year 1769 there was a tract of country in Pennsylvania, situate between Lycoming creek and Pine creek, in which the Proprietaries prohibited the making of surveys, as it was doubtful whether it had or had not been ceded by the Indians. Although settlements were forbidden, yet adventurers settled themselves there. Being without the pale of ordinary authorities, the inhabitants annually elected a tribunal, in rotation, of three of their number, whom they denominated fair-play men, who had authority to decide all disputes as to boundaries. Their decisions were final, and enforced by the whole community en masse. Their decisions are said to have been just and equitable. 2 Smith, Pa. Laws 196; Sergeant, Land Laws 77.

FAIR PLEADER. The name of a writ given by the statute of Marlebridge, 52 Hen. III. c. 11. See BEAT PLEADER.

FAIR PREPONDERANCE. Of evidence, a preponderance which is apparent upon fair consideration. 29 Minn. 225; 63 Ia. 486; 54 Conn. 274; 86 Pa. 286.

FAIR SALE. A sale conducted with fairness as respects the rights of all parties affected. 24 Minn. 419. A sale at a price sufficient to warrant confirmation or approval when it is required. See SALE.

FAIR VALUE. In a contract by a city to purchase a waterworks plant at "fair and equitable value, the amount is to be determined not by capitalization of the earnings nor limited to the cost of reproducing the plant, but allowance should be made for the additional value created by connection with and supply of buildings, although the company did not own the connections. 10 C. C. A. 653; s. c. 62 Fed. Rep. 863.

A reasonable equivalent. That which a thing is reasonably worth. English.

FAIRLY. Reasonably; justly; equitably. It is not synonymous with "truly" and the latter should not be substituted for it in a commissioner's oath to take testimony fairly. Language may be "truly" yet unfairly reported, and it may be fairly reported, yet not in accordance with strict truth; 17 N. J. Eq. 284; but it may be deemed synonymous with "equitably"; 41 Ala. 40. "Fairly merchantable" conveys the idea of majority in quality, or something just above it; 74 Me. 479.

FAIRWAY. The middle or deepest or most navigable channel. 202 U. S. 49. See TRAILWAY.

FAIT. Anything done. A deed lawfully executed. Comyns, Dig. Fait.

Femme de fait. A wife de facto.

FAIT ENROLLE. A deed enrolled, as a bargain and sale of freeholds. R. & L. Dict.; 1 Keb. 568.

FAIT JURIDIQUE. In French Law. A judicial fact. One of the factors or elements constitutive of an obligation.

FAITH. A term used in the law only in connection with the adjectives good and bad, as expressing the belief, intent, or purpose with which a transaction has been entered into or completed. See GOOD FAITH.

Credit; confidence; trust. Belief. Intent. In Scotch Law. An oath; a pledge. English.

FAITH AND CREDIT. See FOREIGN JUDGMENTS.

FAITHFUL. As respects temporal affairs, diligently, and without unnecessary delay; but it does not include the idea of impartiality. 16 N. J. L. 72.

FAITOURS. Idle persons; idle livers; vagabonds. Termes de la Ley; Cowell; Blount; Cunningham, Law Dict.

FAKIR. A term applied among the Mohammedans to a kind of religious ascetic or beggar, whose claim is that he "is in need of mercy, and poor in the sight of God, rather than in need of worldly assistance." Hughes, Dict. of Islam. Sometimes spelled Faqueer or Fakeer.

Faker or Fakir. One who represents the spurious as genuine. A street vendor. A Mohammedan ascetic, religious mendicant, or mendicant priest. Stand. Dict.

FALCARE (Lat.). To cut or mow down. Falcare prata, to cut or mow down grass in meadows hayed (laid in for hay), was a customary service for the lord by his inferior tenants. Kennett, Gloss.

Falcator. The tenant performing the service.

Falcatura. A day's mowing. Falcatura una, Once mowing the grass.

Falcatio. A mowing.

Falcata. That which was mowed. Kennett, Gloss.; Cowell; Jacobs.

FALCIDIA. In Spanish Law. The fourth portion of an inheritance, which legally belongs to the heir, and for the protection of which he has the right to reduce the legacies to three-fourth parts of the succession, in order to protect his interest.

FALCIDIAN LAW. In Roman Law. A statute or law restricting the right of disposing of property by will, enacted by the people during the reign of Augustus, on the proposition of Falcidius, who was a tribune, in the year of Rome 714.

Its principal provision gave power to fathers of families to bequeath three-fourths of their property, but deprived them of the power to give away the other fourth, which was to descend to the heir. Inst. 2. 22. This fourth was termed the Falcidian portion.

A similar principle exists in Louisiana, and formerly prevailed in England. See LEGITIMACY.

As to the early history of testamentary law, see Maine, Ancient Law.

In some of the states the statutes authorizing bequests and devises to charitable corporations limit the amount which a testator may give, to a certain fraction of his estate.

FALDA. In Spanish Law. The slope or skirts of a hill. 2 Wall. 673.

FALDE CURSUS. In Old English Law. A fold-course or sheep-walk. Spel.; 2 Vent. 139.

FALDAGE. The privilege which anciently several lords reserved to themselves of setting up folds for sheep in any fields within their manors, the better to manure them, and this not only with their own but their tenants' sheep. Called, variously, secta faldare, fold-course, free-fold, faldagii. Cunningham, Law Dict.; Cowell; Spelman, Gloss.

FALDATA. In Old English Law. A flock or fold of sheep. Cowell.

FALDFEY. A compensation paid by some customary tenants that they might have liberty to fold their own sheep on their own land. Cunningham, Law Dict.; Cowell.

FALDISBORY. In Ecclesiastical Law. The bishop's seat or throne within the chancel.

FALDSOCC. Liberty or privilege of foldage. See F. LDAGE.

FALDSTOOL. A folding seat similar to a camp stool, made either of wood or metal, sometimes covered with silk or other material. It was used by a bishop when officiating in other than his own cathedral church. Encyc. Dic.

Or Foldstool. A place at the south side of the altar, at which the sovereign kneels at his coronation. R. & L. Dict. A folding stool. English.

FALD WORTH. A person reckoned old enough to become a member of the deconary, and so subject to the law of frank-pledge. Spel.

FALBERGE. In Old English Law. The tackle and furniture of a cart or wain. Blount.

FALESIA. In Old English Law. A hill or down by the sea-side. Co. Litt. 5 b; Domesday.

FALK-LAND. See FOLC-LAND.

FALL. In Scotch Law. To loose. To fall from a right is to loose or forfeit it. 1 Kames, Eq. 228.

FALL OF LAND. In English Law. A quantity of land six ells square.

FALLO. In Spanish Law. The final decree or judgment given in a lawsuit.

FALLOW LAND. Land ploughed, but not sown, and left uncultivated for a time, after successive crops; land left untilled for a year or more.

FALLUM. In Old English Law. An unexplained term for some particular kind of land.

FALSA DEMONSTRATIO. In Civil Law. False designation; erroneous description of a person or a thing in a written instrument. 1 Inst. 2, 20, 30.

FALSA DEMONSTRATIO NON NOCET. See MAXIMS; DEMONSTRATIO.

FALSA MONITA. In the Civil Law. Counterfeit money. Cod. 9, 24.

FALSARE. In Old English Law. To counterfeit. Bract. fol. 276 b. Falcarius, a counterfeiter.

FALSE. Applied to the intentional act of a responsible being, it implies a purpose to deceive. 63 Vt. 201; 18 U. C. C. P. 19. Somewhat more than erroneous, untrue, or illegal; distinctively characterizes a wrongful act known to involve an error or an untruth. Anderson; 13 Wend. 320-321.

FALSE ACTION. See FEIGNED ACTION.

FALSE CHARACTER. To personate the master or mistress of a servant or his or her representative and give a false character to the servant, is an offence punishable by fine, by 32 Geo. III. c. 56. See PERSONATE.

FALSE CLAIM. A claim made by a man for more than his due. An instance is given where the prior of Lancaster claimed a tenth part of the venison in corio as well as in carne, where he was entitled to that in carne only. Manw. For. Laws, cap. 25, num. 3.

FALSE DECRETALS. A collection of decretal letters and conciliar decrees (9th century), received as authoritative for more than 500 years, but since proved to be spurious or forged; the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals. Stand. Dict.

FALSE FACT. The appearance or semblance of a fact; a fact existing only in statement, without any foundation in truth.

FALSE AND FRAUDULENT. In accepted legal meaning, the phrase stands for actual intent to deceive. 239 U. S. 317.

FALSE IMPRISONMENT. Any unlawful restraint of a man's liberty, whether in a place made use of for imprisonment generally, or in one used only on the particular occasion, or by words and an array of force, without bolts or bars, in any locality whatever. 1 Bish. Cr. Law § 533; Webb's Poll. Torts 259; 8 N. H. 550; 7 Humph. 43; 12 Ark. 43; 7 Q. B. 742; 5 Vt. 599; 3 Blackf. 46; 9 Johns. 117; 1 A. K.

Marsh 345; 36 Fed. Rep. 253; 93 Mich. 498; 78 Hun. 238. See 85 W. Va. 588.

The total, or substantially total, restraint of a man's freedom of locomotion, without authority of law, and against his will. Big. Torts 113. Any general restraint is sufficient; there need not be actual contact of the person. Any demonstration of physical violence, which apparently can be avoided only by submission, constitutes imprisonment. Submission, in such case, is not consent; id. 114; but the detention must be such as to cause escape in any direction to amount to a breach of the restraint.

Arresting the wrong person under a warrant constitutes false imprisonment; F. Moo. 457; so if there is a misnomer in the warrant, even though the person actually intended was arrested; 4 Wend. 455; and if the officer makes the arrest out of his bailiwick, or detains the person unduly; 4 B. & C. 596; an arrest under a void writ constitutes a false imprisonment; 5 Hill 242. A writ may be void because defective in language, because the court had no jurisdiction of the proceedings, or because the court had no jurisdiction to issue the writ; Big. Torts 122; 34 A. & E. Corp. Cas. 431; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 989. The clerk of the court who issues a defective writ, or one not authorized by the court, is liable; and so is a judge who orders a writ which he had no right to issue, or where he had no jurisdiction. Both the attorney and his client may be liable if the former ordered the arrest, and even when the arrest has been ordered by a judge, i. e. in a case where they participate in making the arrest; Big. Torts 128; or where the writ was issued by the misconduct of the attorney; id. 129. If the writ be voidable it must be set aside before an action for false imprisonment will lie, but otherwise if it be void; id. 131.

Malice is not an element of false imprisonment; 66 Hun. 230; 35 W. Va. 588; except so far as it affects the measure of damages; 35 Neb. 898.

In order to be restored to liberty, the remedy is, by writ of habeas corpus. An action of trespass vi et armis lies. To punish the wrong done to the public by the false imprisonment of an individual, the offender may be indicted; 4 Bl. Com. 218; 2 Burr. 993. See Bacon, Abr. Trespass (D, 3); 9 N. H. 491; 6 Ala. N. s. 778; 2 Harr. Del. 538; 3 Tex. 282; 10 Cush. 376.

One cannot maintain an action for false imprisonment where he is arrested by a proper officer, under a warrant lawful on its face, and issued by proper authority; 97 Ala. 626; 94 Mich. 1. Justification is not available as a defence unless pleaded; 2 Misc. Rep. 127.

FALSE JUDGMENT. The name of a writ which lies when a false judgment has been given in the county court, court baron, or other courts not of record. Fitz. N. B. 17, 18.

FALSE LATIN. When legal proceedings were conducted in Latin, if a word were significant though not good Latin, yet an indictment, declaration, or fine should not be made void by it; but if the word were not Latin, nor allowed by the law, and it were in a material point, it made the whole vicious. 5 Coke 121; 2 Nels. 830. Wharton.

FALSE LIGHTS AND SIGNALS. Lights and signals falsely and maliciously displayed for the purpose of bringing a vessel into danger. Exhibiting false lights or signals, with intent to bring any ship into danger, is felony, punishable, in England, with penal servitude for life; stat. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, § 47; and in the United States by imprisonment. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5358. See COLLISION.

FALSE NEWS. Spreading false news, whereby discord may grow between the queen of England and her people, or the great men of the realm, or which may produce other mischiefs, still seems to be a misdemeanor under Stat. 3 Edw. I. c. 84; Steph. Cr. Dig. § 95.

FALSE OATH. See PERJURY.

FALSE PERSONATION. See PERSONATION.

FALSE PLEA. See SHAM PLEA.

FALSE PRETENCES. In Criminal Law. False representations and statements, made with a fraudulent design to obtain "money, goods, wares, and merchandise," with intent to cheat. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2808.

A representation of some fact or circumstance calculated to mislead, which is not true. 19 Pick. 184.

Such a fraudulent representation of fact by one who knows it not to be true as is adapted to induce the person to whom it is made to part with something of value. It may relate to quality, quantity, the nature or other incident of the article offered for sale, whereby the purchaser buying it, is defrauded; 126 Ill. 139.

The pretence must relate to past events. Any representation or assurance in relation to a future transaction may be a promise, or covenant, or warranty, but cannot amount to a statutory false pretence; 10 Pick. 185; 3 Term 98; but one will be guilty if there are false representations of a past or existing fact, although a promise be also a part of the inducement to the person defrauded to part with his property; 60 Ga. 487. It must be such as to impose upon a person of ordinary strength of mind; 3 Hawks 620; 4 Pick. 178; and this will doubtless be sufficient; 11 Wend. 557; Clark, Cr. L. 278. But, although it may be difficult to restrain false pretences to such as an ordinarily prudent man may avoid, yet it is not every absurd or irrational pretence which will be sufficient. See 14 Ill. 348; 17 Me. 211; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 592; Russ. & R. 127. It is not necessary that all the pretences should be false, if one of them, per se, is sufficient to constitute the offence; 14 Wend. 547. And although other circumstances may have induced the credit, or the delivery of the property, yet it will be sufficient if the false pretences had such an influence that without them the credit would not have been given or the property delivered; 11 Wend. 557; 14 id. 547. The false pretences must have been used before the contract was completed; 13 Wend. 811. Extra-judicial admissions and statements of the defendant alone as to the falsity of the statement are not sufficient to warrant a conviction, as the falsity is in the nature of a corpus delicti which requires other proof; 40 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 440.

The question is modified in the different states by the wording of the statutes, which vary from each other somewhat. It may be laid down as the general rule of the interpretation of the words "by any false pretence," which are in the statutes, that wherever a person fraudulently represents as an existing fact that which is not an existing fact, and so gets money, etc., that is an offence within the acts. See 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 559; 3 C. & K. 98; 22 Pa. 253; 100 Cal. 352.

There must be an intent to cheat or defraud some person; Russ. & R. 317; 98 N. C. 738; 112 Mo. 585. This may be inferred from a false representation; 18 Wend. 87. The intent is all that is requisite: it is not necessary that the party defrauded should sustain any loss; 11 Wend. 18; 1 C. & M. 518, 537; 4 Pick. 177. The offence is not proven where the representations were not relied on; 98 Cal. 661. See, generally, 2 Bish. Cr. Law § 409; 19 Pick. 179; 24 Me. 77; 7 Cox, Cr. Cas. 131; 16 Am. Law Reg. N. s. 321; 126 Ill. 139; 133 Ind. 297; 137 N. Y. 530; DECRET; FRAUD.

FALSE AND PRETENDED PROPECIES. When made with intent to disturb the public peace they are punishable under 33 Hen. VIII. c. 14, § 4 Edw. VI. c. 15, and 5 Eliz. c. 15. These statutes, although un repealed, are not likely to be enforced.

FALSE REPRESENTATION. A representation which is untrue, wilfully made to deceive another to his injury. See DECEIT; MISREPRESENTATION; FRAUD. See FALSE PRETENCES.

FALSE RETURN. A return made by the sheriff, or other ministerial officer, as a writ, in which is stated a fact contrary to the truth, and injurious to one of the parties or some one having an interest in it.

In this case the officer is liable for damages to the party injured; 2 Esp. 475. When the sheriff has levied on property sufficient to satisfy an execution, and yet return it unsatisfied, he is prima facie liable to the plaintiff for the full amount of the judgment, and he must show such facts as will exonerate or excuse him; 74 N. Y. 805. In some states, every return of process, untrue in fact, is held to expose the sheriff to all the penalties of a false return; 74 N. C. 473; 81 id. 368. But when the actual damage is the result of the negligence of the party complaining, the sheriff will only be liable for nominal damages; 93 Mass. 211; 103 id. 507; 6 Nev. 58; 10 Hun 531. See RETURN OF WRITS.

FALSE SWEARING. In English Law. The misdemeanor committed by a person who swears falsely before any person authorized to administer an oath upon a matter of public concern, under such circumstances that the false swearing would have amounted to perjury if committed in a judicial proceeding; as where a person makes a false affidavit under the Bills of Sale Acts. Steph. Cr. Dig. 84.

Swearing to a statement with knowledge of its falsity, as, by an assured. Anderson; 6 Ind. 139.

A verified false assertion which deceives, or is fitted and likely to deceive, the one to whom it is made. Id.; 67 N. Y. 292.

Also, to use such profane language as the law forbids. Profane swearing is generally punished by statutes. Id.

FALSE TOKEN. A false document or sign of the existence of a fact,—in general used for the purpose of fraud. See 8 Term 96; 2 Starkie, Ev. 563; 1 Bish. Cr. L. 585; 18 Wend. 811; 14 id. 570; 9 id. 182.

FALSE VERDICT. One obviously opposed to the principles of right and justice.

The false verdict of jurors, whether occasioned by embracery or not, was anciently considered as criminal, and, therefore, exemplarily punished by attain, but by 6 Geo. IV. c. 50 the writ of attain was wholly abolished and superseded by the practice of setting aside the first verdict and granting new trials; 3 Bla. Com. 402.

FALSE WEIGHTS AND MEASURES. Weights and measures which do not conform to those established by law.

In the laws of King Edgar, nearly a century before the Conquest, we find an injunction that one measure kept at Winchester should be observed throughout the realm. In England the prerogative of fixing the standard anciently vested in the crown; in Normandy in the duke. The regulation of weights and measures cannot, however, with propriety be referred to the king's prerogative; for from Magna Charta to the present time there are about twenty acts of parliament to fix and establish the standard and uniformity of weights and measures. 1 Bla. Com. 274, n. In a case before the Court of King's Bench was held that although it was the custom of the town to sell eighteen ounces in a pound of butter, yet the jury of the court-leet were not justified in seizing the butter of a person who sold pounds less than that, but more than sixteen ounces each, the statutable weight; 3 T. R. 271; and it has been determined that no practice or usage could countervail the statutes 22 Car. II. c. 8 and 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 12, which enact that if any person shall either buy or sell salt or grain by any other measure than the Winchester bushel, he shall forfeit forty shillings and also the value of the grain or salt so sold or bought, one-half to the poor and the other to the informer; 4 T. R. 750; 8 id. 853. In this country the power to fix the standard of weights and measures is in congress; Const. U. S. art. I, s. 8. See WEIGHTS; MEASURES.

FALSEDAD. In Spanish Law. Falseness; deviation from the truth. Las Falsidades, pt. 3, tit. 26, l. 1.

FALSEHOOD. Any untrue assertion or proposition. A wilful act or declaration contrary to the truth. See 51 N. H. 207.

It has been said that the use of the term falsehood does not always and necessarily imply a lie or wilful untruth, but is generally used in the second sense here given. It is committed either by the wilful act of the party, or by dissimulation, or by words. It is wilful, for example, when the owner of a thing sells it twice, by different contracts, to different individuals, unknown to them; for in this the seller must wilfully declare the thing is his own when he knows that it is not so. It is committed by dissimulation when a creditor, having an understanding with his former debtor, sells the land of the latter, although he has been paid the debt which was due to him. Falsehood by word is committed when a witness swears to what he knows not to be true.

Crabbe thus distinguishes between falsehood and untruth: "The latter is an untruth saying, and may be unintentional, in which case it reflects no disgrace on the agent. A falsehood and a lie are intentional false sayings, differing only in degree of the guilt of the offender; falsehood being not always for the express purpose of deceiving, but a lie always for the worst of purposes." See Rosc. Cr. Ev. 563; DECEIT; FRAUD; MISREPRESENTATION.

FALSIFY. Under a statute making it a misdemeanor "wilfully to make a false answer," an indictment charging that one "falsely and fraudulently answered," is bad for omitting "wilfully;" 1 Den. C. C. 157.

In an indictment for forgery the averment that defendant swore falsely was held insufficient, without the additional words "corruptly and wilfully;" Cro. Eliz. 801; and "falsely and corruptly" were held insufficient without "wilfully;" id. 143; and falsely and maliciously were held insufficient without "wilfully and corruptly," with a quere whether one of the last two words would suffice without the other; 7 D. & R. 685; but in Cox's case, Leach 69, it was held that wilfully was not required at common law but was necessary under stat. 6 Eliz. c. 9. An indictment for perjury was held good without the averment that the defendant did falsely, corruptly, and wilfully swear, etc., and the court said: "The words falsely, corruptly, and wilfully . . . are mere expletives to swell the sentence, in the language of Lord Hardwicke, 1 Atk. 50;" 8 Yeates 407, 418. In obtaining money under false pretences it is not enough to charge that the defendant falsely pretended by certain pretences set forth, without specially averring the falsity of the pretences; 2 M. & S. 879.

The use of the word falsely in a statute (against counterfeiting) implies that there must be a fraudulent or criminal intent in the act; 5 McLean 208, 211. See also 4 B. & C. 329; 6 Com. Dig. 58; Stark. Cr. Pl. 86.

In an action for libel, "wrongfully and falsely published" will, it seems, amount to maliciously published, but it is better to add falsely and maliciously; 1 Chit. Pl. 431 and note (x); the word falsely must have great stress laid on it in an action for slander; 2 Wils. 800, 801. Case will lie for falsely and maliciously suing out a commission in bankruptcy; 2 Wils. 145; or for falsely, maliciously, and without probable cause procuring a search warrant; 1 D. & R. 97. In an action on the case for conspiracy or for malicious prosecution the allegation that the prosecution was false and malicious is not sufficient without adding probable cause; 2 Munf. 10; contra as to conspiracy; 1 Binn. 172. See FALSE SWEARING.

FALSI CRIMEN. A fraudulent subornation or concealment of truth.

FALSIFICATION. In Equity Practice. The showing an item in the debit of an account to be either wholly false or in part erroneous. 1 Sto. Eq. Jur. § 625

FALSIFY. In Chancery Practice. To prove that an item in an account before the court as complete, which is inserted to the debit of the person falsifying, should have been omitted.

When a bill to open an account has been filed, the plaintiff is sometimes allowed to surcharge and falsify such account; and if anything has been inserted that is a wrong charge, he is at liberty to show it; and that is a falsification. 2 Ves. 565; 11 Wheat. 237. See SURCHARGE.

In Criminal Law. To alter or make false.

The alteration or making false of a record is punishable at common law or by statute in the states, and, if of records of the United States courts, by act of congress of April 80, 1790; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5894.

In Practice. To prove a thing to be false. Co. Litt. 104 b.

FALSIFYING JUDGMENTS. A term sometimes used for reversing judgments. See 4 Steph. Com. 553.

FALSIFYING A RECORD. A crime against public justice punishable in England by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 93, and by statute in the several states and District of Columbia.

Changing a record by alterations, erasures, interlineations or otherwise. See ALTERATION.

FALSING. In Scotch Law. Making or proving false. Bell, Dict.

FALSING OF DOOMS. In Scotch Law. Protesting against a sentence and taking an appeal to a higher tribunal. Bell, Dict.

An action to set aside a decree. Skene.

FALSO RETORNO BREVIIUM (L. Lat.). In Old English Law. The name of a writ which might have been sued out against a sheriff for falsely returning writs. Cunningham, Law Dict.

FALSONARIUS. A person guilty of forgery; a counterfeiter.

FALSUS. Deceiving; fraudulent; erroneous. In the first two senses it is applied to persons in respect to their acts and conduct, as well as to things; and in the third sense it is applied to persons on the question of personal identity.

FAMA. Rumor; report; fame.

FAMACIDE. A killer of reputation; a slanderer. Black, L. Dict.

FAMILIA (Lat.). In Roman Law. A family.

This word had four different acceptations in the Roman law. In the first and most restricted sense it designated the paterfamilias,—his wife, his children, and other descendants subject to his paternal power. In the second and more enlarged sense it comprehended all the agnates,—that is to say, all the different families who would all be subject to the paternal authority of a common chief if he were still living. Here it has the same meaning as agnatio. In a third acceptation it comprises the slaves and those who are in manipio of the chief,—although considered only as things, and without any tie of relationship. And, lastly, it signifies the whole fortune or patrimony of the chief. See PATER-FAMILIAS; 1 Ortolan 28.

In Old English Law. A household. All the servants belonging to one master. Du Cange; Cowel. A sufficient quantity of land to maintain one family. The same quantity of land is called sometimes mansus (a manse), familia, carucata. Du Cange; Cunningham, Law Dict.; Cowel; Cressy, Church Hist. See MANSIO.

FAMILIE EMPTOR. In the Roman Law. An intermediate person who purchased the aggregate inheritance when sold per aes et libram, in the progress of making a will under the twelve tables. The purchaser was merely a man of straw, transmitting the inheritance to the hæres proper. Brown.

FAMILIE ERCSUNDÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. An action which lay for any of the co-heirs for the division of what fell to them by inheritance. Stair, Inst. I. 1, tit. 7, § 15.

FAMILIARES REGIS. Persons of the king's household. The ancient titles of the six clerks of chancery in England. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 240, 251.

FAMILY. Father, mother, and children. All the individuals who live under the authority of another, including the servants of the family. 2 Fed. Rep. 432. All the relations who descend from a common ancestor or who spring from a common root. La. Code, art. 3523, no. 16; 9 Ves. 323. The primary meaning of a testator's "family" in a will is children; 3 Ch. Div. 672.

In common parlance it consists of those who live under the same roof with the paterfamilias; those who form his fireside. But when they branch out and become the heads of new establishments, they cease to be part of the father's family; 4 Term 79; 154 Mass. 299.

While usually importing a household, including parents, children, and servants, it is not necessary, to sustain the family relation between parents and children, that they should reside together; 21 Or. 280.

The term as used in connection with homestead and exemption laws is important. See a full discussion of the cases in Thompson, Honest. & Ex. It is said to mean, in the Texas constitution, "every collective body of persons living together within the same curtilage, subsisting in common, directing their attention to common object—the promotion of their mutual interests and social happiness." 31 Tex. 680. "A family is the collective body of persons who live in one house, under one head or manager." 52 La. 431; 53 id. 706; S. C. 36 Am. Rep. 248 (and note).

The meaning of the term is usually a matter of statutory or constitutional interpretation. A widower with whom lived his son and son's wife and a household servant is the head of a family; 52 La. 481; but a widower keeping house with a female relative whom he is not bound to support has no family; 48 Tex. 517. An unmarried woman keeping house and taking care of two children of a deceased sister is the head of a family; 53 La. 706. A widower without children, who takes his mother to live with him, is the head of a family; 11 La. 104. A widower and grown-up daughter constitute a family; 14 How. Pr. 521; or merely a widower; 95 Cal. 397. An unmarried man who succeeds his father in taking care of his minor sisters may be deemed the head of a family; 27 Ark. 658. So of an unmarried man supporting his widowed sister and her small children; 20 Mo. 75; and of an unmarried man whose widowed sister lived with him and kept his house; per Dillon, J.; 16 N. B. R. 382; S. C. Fed. Cas. No. 783. So of an unmarried woman with her illegitimate child; 47 Cal. 73. But not of a man who has no family; 9 Ala. 981; 10 Allen 425. A single person in the actual occupancy of a homestead, although not the head of a family, is entitled to a homestead exemption as a family; 60 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 150. A husband and wife are a family, as to exempt property; 14 How. Pr. 519; so as to homestead; 21 Ill. 45. But having a wife and keeping house is not marrying and having a family; 11 Pa. 159. See Thomp. Honest. & Ex. §§ 44-63.

In the construction of wills, the word family, when applied to personal property, is synonymous with kindred or relations. It may, nevertheless, be confined to particular relations by the context of the will, or may be enlarged by it, so that the expression may in some cases mean children, or next of kin, and in others may even include relations by marriage; Schoul. Wills 537. The primary meaning of the word family is children, and it must be so construed in all cases unless the context shows that it was used in a different sense; 85 Va. 509. It has been more commonly held that parents are not included in the term; 8 Ves. 604; 2 Redf. Wills 73; 1 Rop. Leg. 115; 2 Ves. 110; 5 Meule & S. 126; 11 Paige 169; it may include a wife as well as children; 8 Allen 839. A statute providing that real estate shall not go "out of the family" restricts the descent to the issue of the ancestor; 8 N. J. L. 481. See HEAD OF A FAMILY.

FAMILY ARRANGEMENT. An agreement made between a father and his son, or children, or between brothers, to dispose of property in a different manner to that which would otherwise take place.

In these cases, frequently, the mere relation of the parties will give effect to bargains otherwise without adequate consideration. 1 Chitty, Pr. 67; 1 Turn. & R. 13; 23 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 73; 50 Mo. App. 1.

Such an arrangement may be upheld, although there were no rights in dispute at the time of making it, and the court will not be disposed to scan with much nicety the quantum of the consideration; L. R. 2 Ch. 294. A family arrangement is not by itself a valuable consideration; Brett, L. C. in Mod. Eq. 294. Wherever doubts and disputes have arisen with regard to the rights of different members of a family (especially when relating to legitimacy) and fair compromises have been entered into to preserve harmony, those arrangements have been sustained, albeit, perhaps, resting upon grounds which would not have been considered satisfactory if the transaction had occurred between mere strangers; Sugden, L. C. in 2 Dr. & War. 503. The impossibility of estimating money considerations in family arrangements has led to their exemption from the rules which affect other arrangements; 7 Cl. & F. 290.

In ordinary cases a father's dealings with his child who has just come of age are open to suspicion, and so are dealings with a reversioner, but if these are in the nature of a family arrangement, the court will regard them, not with suspicion, but with favor; 2 Giff. 232. It is not essential that the son should have independent advice, nor will inquiry be made as to how far the father's influence was exerted. At the same time any unusual benefit secured to the father will be scrutinized and perhaps expunged; 41 Ch. D. 200; and only the usual provisions should be inserted. It seems that resettlements under a family arrangement will justify the execution of a power under which the donee retains some benefit, which would otherwise be a fraud on the power. See 1 Swans. 129. An agreement between the children of a testator that the shares of the children shall be considered as vesting at the death of the testator divested of the survivorship clause contained in the will, will be upheld in equity; 172 Pa. 104.

Evidence of circumstances to show a family arrangement at the execution of deeds is admissible, and a deed otherwise invalid would be good evidence if it formed a component part of such arrangement; 9 S. & R. 268. See FAMILY MEETING.

FAMILY BIBLE. A Bible containing a record of the births, marriages, and deaths of the members of a family.

An entry by a father, made in a Bible, stating that Peter, his eldest son, was born in lawful wedlock, of Maria, his wife, at a time specified, is evidence to prove the legitimacy of Peter; 4 Campb. 401. But the entry in order to be evidence must be an original entry; and, when it is not so, the loss of the original must be proved before the copy can be received; 6 S. & R. 185. See 10 Watts 82.

A family Bible, containing entries of family incidents, where the parties who made the entries are dead, will be received in evidence; Whart. Ev. § 219; Tayl. Ev. 572; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 104; L. R. 1 Ex. 255; 20 La. 301; 53 Ga. 535. See 11 Cl. & F. 85; 39 Conn. 503. In order to make an entry evidence as to the birth or death of a child, it must be shown that the entry is in the handwriting of a parent; 30 Ia. 301. Entries in a family Bible or Testament are admissible in evidence even without proof that they have been made by a parent or relative; 52 Md. 709.

FAMILY EXPENSES. It has been held that the words "expenses of the family" mean such expenses as were incurred on account of and to be used in the family, and that what is included in the term must be determined by the circumstances of each case. 12 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 878; 11 Ill. App. 627. Several of the United States statutes make the wife's separate property liable for debts incurred for the expenses of the family. She has been held personally liable. Id.; 11 Oregon 72. A diamond shirt stud procured for personal use and actually used and worn by a husband was held to be a family expense. Id.; 103 Iowa 695. Provisions, clothing, etc., included in family expenses. Id.; 18 Iowa 83. Rent of a house, sewing machine, etc. are family expenses. But a reaping machine was held not a family expense. The court said: "The expenses of a family are something quite different from whatever may contribute, either remotely or directly, to the support of the family. The merchant purchases goods on credit, and by selling them at a profit supports his family; or a farmer purchases cattle on credit, and by selling them at a profit contributes materially to the comfort and support of his family. But the indebtedness so contracted does not, we think, become a family expense." Id.; 49 Iowa 536.

FAMILY MEETING (called, also, family council).

In Louisiana. Meetings of at least five relations of minors or other persons on whose interest they are called upon to deliberate, or, in default of relations, then of the friends of such minors or other persons. See 45 La. Ann. 857.

The appointment of the members of the family meeting is made by the judge. The relations or friends must be selected from among those domiciliated in the parish in which the meeting is held: the relations are selected according to their proximity, beginning with the nearest. The relation is preferred to the connection in the same degree; and among relations of the same degree the eldest is preferred. The undertutor must also be present. 6 Mart. La. N. S. 455.

The family meeting is held before a justice of the peace, or notary public, appointed by the judge for the purpose. It is called for a fixed day and hour, by citations delivered at least three days before the day appointed for that purpose.

The members of the family meeting, before commencing their deliberations, take an oath before the officer before whom the meeting is held, to give their advice according to the best of their knowledge touching the interests of the person respecting whom they are called upon to deliberate. The officer before whom the family meeting is held must make a particular record verbal of the deliberations, cause the members of the family meeting to sign it, if they know how to sign, and must sign it himself, and deliver a copy to the parties that they may have it homologated.

The sale of minor's property without the advice of a family meeting is null and void as against the purchaser; 45 La. Ann. 857.

FAMILY PHYSICIAN. A physician who regularly attends and is consulted by the members of the family as their medical adviser; but he need not attend in all cases or be consulted by all the members of the family. 17 Minn. 519; 58 Mo. 424.

FAMILY USE. That use ordinarily made by and suitable for the members of a household whether as individuals or collectively. 52 Cal. 120. The supply of water in a municipal corporation for family use includes the supply of gaols, hospitals, almshouses, schools, and other municipal institutions; id. See FAMILY; GROCERIES.

FAMOUSUS (Lat.). Defamatory; slanderous; scandalous. Used in civil and old English law to express that which affected injuriously the character or reputation.

FAMOUSUS LIBELLUS (Lat.). Among the civilians these words signified that species of injuria which corresponds nearly to libel or slander.

FAN. See FORCING FAN.

FANAL. In French Law. A small lighthouse. A lamp or apparatus in such lighthouse. A lantern placed high up on the stern of a vessel.

FANATIC. A religious enthusiast; a bigot; a person entertaining wild and extravagant notions, or affected by zeal or enthusiasm, especially upon religious subjects.

The word was formerly defined in English law as a person pretending to be inspired, and was said to be a term applied to "Quakers, Anabaptists, and all other sectaries, and factious dissenters from the church of England." Jac. L. Dict. See Stat. 13 Car. II. c. 6.

FANECA. In Spanish Law. A measure of land, which is not the same in every province. Diccionario de la Acad.; 2 White, Recop. 49. In Spanish America, the fanega consisted of six thousand four hundred square varas, or yards. 2 White, Recop. 188.

FANDEMAN. In Scotch Law. A traveller; a merchant-stranger. Skene

FARDEL. The fourth part of a yard land. Spelman, Gloss. According to others the eighth part. Noy, Complete Lawye 57; Cowel. See Cunningham, Law Dict.

FARDELLA. In Old English Law. A bundle; a pack; a fardel. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 22, § 10.

FARDING-DEAL. The fourth part of an acre of land. Spelm. Gloss.

FARE. A voyage or passage. The money paid for a voyage or passage. The latter is the modern signification. See 26 N. Y. 526; TICKET.

In case of a water company it means the tax or compensation which the company may charge for furnishing a supply of water. 111 N. C. 615. See RATES.

FARINAGIUM. A mill. Spelm. A toll of the grist of meal or flour. Jac. L. Dict.

FARLEY or FARLEU. Money paid in lieu of a heriot (q. v.). Applied also to the best chattel as distinguished from heriot,—the best beast. Cowel.

FARLINGARII. Whoremongers; adulterers.

FARM. A certain amount of provision reserved as the rent of a messuage. Spelman, Gloss.

Rent generally which is reserved on a lease; when it was to be paid in money, it was called blanche firme. Spelman, Gloss.; 2 Bla. Com. 42.

A term. A lease of lands; a leasehold interest. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 17; 1 Reeve Hist. Eng. Law 301, n.; 2 Chit. Pl. 879, n. e The land itself, let to farm or rent. 2 Bla. Com. 368.

A portion of land used for agricultural purposes, either wholly or in part. 18 Pick. 553; 2 Binn. 288.

A body of land, usually under one ownership, devoted to agriculture; either to the raising of crops, or pasturage, or both. It is not understood to have any necessary relation to, or to be circumscribed by, political subdivisions. A farm may consist of any number of acres, of one quarter section or less, or many quarter sections; of one field, or many fields; may lie in one township and county, or in more than one; 32 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 693. See 47 How. Pr. 446.

It is usually the chief messuage in a village or town whereof belongs a great demesne of all sorts. Cowel; Cunningham, Law Dict.; Termes de la Ley.

A large tract or portion of land taken by a lease under a yearly rent payable by the tenant. Tomlin. Law Dict.

From this latter sense is derived its common modern signification of a large tract used for cultivation or other purposes, as raising stock, whether hired or owned by the occupant, including a messuage with out-buildings, gardens, orchard, yard, etc. Plowd. 106; Touchst. 38.

In American law, the word has almost exclusively this latter meaning of a portion of land used for agricultural purposes, either wholly or in part. 3 Binn. 288; 18 Pick. 553; 6 Metc. 529; 2 Hill K. P. 328.

By the conveyance of a farm will pass a messuage, arable land, meadow, pasture, wood, etc., belonging to or used with it. Co. Litt. 5a; Shepp. Touchst. 98; 4 Cruise, Dig. 321; Plowd. 167.

In a will, the word farm may pass a freehold, if it appear that such was the intention of the testator; 6 Term 345; 9 East 448. See 6 East 604, n.; 8 id. 339.

FARM LET. Technical words in a lease creating a term for years. Co. Litt. 43 b; 2 Mod. 250; 1 Washb. R. Pr. Index, Lease.

FARM OUT. To rent for a certain term. The collection of the revenue among the Romans was farmed out to persons called publicani. The same system existed in France before the revolution of 1789; and in England the excise taxes were farmed out, and thereby their evils were greatly aggravated. The farming of the excise was abolished in Scotland by the union, having been before that time abandoned in England. In all these cases the custom gave rise to great abuse and oppression of the people, and in France most of the farmers-general, as they were called, perished on the scaffold. See Int. Cyc. titles Farmers-general, Excise, Publicant.

FARMER. The lessee of a farm. It is said that every lessee for life or years, although it be but of a small house and land, is called farmer. This word implies no mystery, except it be that of husbandman. Cunn. Law Dict.; Cowel; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 318.

In common parlance, and as a term of description in a deed, farmer means one who cultivates a farm, whether he owns it or not. There may also be a farmer of the revenue or of other personal property as well as lands. Plowd. 195; Cunn. Law Dict.

FARMER GENERAL. See FARM OUT.

FARMERS' ALLIANCE. A co-operative association of agriculturists formed for the purchase of supplies and sale of farm products without the intervention of traders, aiming in some cases also at social and educational elevation, and favoring political schemes conceived in the interest of the farmer. Stand. Dict. See GRANGE.

FARO. A gambling game of cards in which checks, commonly known as "chips," are used to represent money, which is staked upon the order in which the cards turn up as dealt. The players all play against the dealer, who is termed the banker. See GAMING. See KENO or FARO BANK.

FARRAGO LIBELLI (Lat.). An ill-composed book containing a collection of miscellaneous subjects not properly associated or scientifically arranged. Whart.

FARRIER. One who takes upon himself the public employment of shoeing horses.

Like an innkeeper, a common carrier, and other persons who assume a public employment, a farrier is bound to serve the public as far as his employment goes, and an action lies against him for refusing, when a horse is brought to him at a reasonable time for such purpose, if he refuses; Oliph. Horses 131; and he is liable for the unskillfulness of himself or servant in performing such work; 1 Bla. Com. 431; but not for the malicious act of the servant in purposely driving a nail into the foot of the horse with the intention of laming him; 2 Salk. 440; Hanover, Horses 215.

FARTHING. In English Law. The one-fourth part of a penny (q. v.).

FARTHING OF GOLD. A quarter-noble, (a noble being worth six shillings and eightpence). Byrne. 9 Hen V. c. 7.

FARTHING OF LAND. Sometimes written farundel or farthingdell. See FARDING-DEAL.

FARVAND. Standing by itself, this word signifies "passage by sea or water." In charter-parties, it means voyage or passage by water. 18 C. B. 880.

FARYNDON INN. The ancient designation of Serjeants' Inn, Chancery Lane, London. See INNS OF COURT.

FAS (Lat.). Right; justice. Calvinus, Lex.; 3 Bla. Com. 2. See PER FAS ET NEFAS.

FASHIONS. See PERISHABLE GOODS.

FASIUS. A faggot of wood.

FAST. "Fast" is defined as moving rapidly; quick in motion; rapid; swift. 50 S. W. 239.

FAST BILL OF EXCEPTIONS. One which may be taken in Georgia in injunction cases and the like, in time and manner to secure speedy hearing. It is certified within twenty days after the decision. 66 Ga. 353.

FAST-DAY. A day of penitential observance and religious abstinence. As to counting it in legal proceedings, see 1 Chit. Archb. Fr., 12th ed. 160; HOLIDAY.

Days of fasting and humiliation, appointed to be kept by public authority. There are fixed days of fasting enjoined by the English church, at certain times in the year, mentioned in ancient statutes, particularly the 2nd and 3rd ed., 6, c. 19. Other days of fasting, which are not fixed, are occasionally appointed by the king's proclamation. Tomlin.

FAST ESTATE. Real property. A term sometimes used in wills. 6 Johns. 185; 9 N. Y. 502.

FASTERMANNES. Securities. Bondsman. Spelman, Gloss. Men fast bound as sureties of the peace for each other under the Saxon law. Encyc. Lond.

FASTI. See DIES FASTI.

FAT CATTLE. See PERISHABLE GOODS; PROVISIONS.

FATHER. He by whom a child is begotten.

In England, by 43 Eliz. c. 2, the father and mother, grandfather and grandmother of poor, old, blind, and impotent persons are obliged to furnish them with necessities, if of sufficient ability. Statutes of the same tenor have been enacted in some states. The English statute may be considered as a part of the common law of the United States. In some states the failure to support, or the abandonment of, a minor child is a penal offence. Except under this statute, there appears to be no civil obligation on a parent to support his minor child; 11 C. B. 452; L. R. 3 Q. B. 559; or to pay his debts; 6 M. & W. 482. To the same effect in the United States; 110 Ind. 74; 38 N. J. L. 383; 13 Barb. 502; but the contrary view is held in many cases; 79 Ill. 151; Tiffany, Pers. & Dom. Rel. 233, and cases cited; see 2 Kent 190. Where a parent, though able, neglects to provide the necessities of life and necessary medical attendance for a minor child, and thereby causes its death, he is guilty of manslaughter, and, if wilfully done, of murder; Tiff. Pers. & Dom. Rel. 232; Clark, Cr. L. 177. A widow is likewise bound to maintain her minor children; 56 N. Y. 435; 10 Mo. App. 344; contra, 78 Ala. 584; 64 Ill. 383. A child is not bound at common law to maintain his parents; 70 Ind. 239; 45 N. H. 358; 32 Conn. 142; but in many states a liability to support indigent parents is imposed by statute, and in such case a third person may recover from the child for necessities furnished to such parent; 88 Mich. 91; 64 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 1123. A parent is not liable for his child's torts, unless committed by the child as his agent; 63 Ill. 312; 45 Kan. 423; 3 Fed. Rep. 862; nor is he criminally liable for his child's acts; Tiffany, Pers. & Dom. Rel. 241. See also 66 Cal. 868; 60 Wis. 511.

If the father be without means to maintain and educate his children according to their future expectations in life, courts of equity will make an allowance for these purposes out of the income of their estates, and, in an urgent case, will even break into the principal; 19 Ala. n. s. 650; 1 P. Wms. 493; 4 Johns. Ch. 100; 2 Ired. 354; 2 Ashm. 332; 5 R. I. 269; 1 Coop. Eq. 52. The father is not bound, without some agreement, to pay another for maintaining his children; 6 C. & P. 497; nor is he bound by their contracts, even for necessities, unless an actual authority be proved, or a clear omission of his duty to furnish such necessities; 20 Eng. L. & Eq. 281; 10 Barb. 483; 15 Ark. 187; 8 N. H. 270; 3 Bradf. Surre. 287; 18 Ga. 457; Ewell, Lead. Cas. 61, n.; 45 Ill. App. 447; 8 Miss. Rep. 646; or unless he suffers them to remain away with their mother, or forces them from home by hard usage; 3 Day 37; but, especially in America, very slight evidence may sometimes warrant the confidence that a contract for the infant's necessities is sanctioned by the father; Tiffany, Per. & Dom. Rel. 233; thus he is held bound where he knows the circumstances and does not object; 26 Vt. 9; 13 Met. 343; 29 Tex. 135. See PARENT; MOTHER. Where the court takes away from the father the care and custody of the children, chancery directs maintenance out of their own fortunes, whatever may be their father's circumstances; 2 Russ. 1; Macphers. Inf. 234. And if their custody be given to the mother by a decree of divorce it has been held that the duty of supporting them devolves on her; 138 Mass. 187; 26 Barb. 184; but the father still remains liable; 45 Ohio St. 452. The obligation of the father to maintain the child extends only to providing necessary support, and ceases as soon as the child is able to provide for itself, or it becomes of age, however wealthy the father may be; 2 Kent 190; unless the child becomes chargeable to the public as a pauper; 1 Ld. Raym. 699; or be physically or mentally incapable of self-support; 12 Pa. C. C. R. 447. The obligation also ceases during the minority of the child, if the child voluntarily abandons the home of his father, either for the purpose of seeking his fortune in the world or to avoid parental discipline and restraint; 10 Mass. 28; 4 Ill. 179; 14 Ala. 435. There is no legal obligation to educate the child, although some dicta and statements by text-writers are to the contrary; 1 Bla. Com. 150; 2 Kent 189; but the duty is said by a recent writer to be only a moral one, and he adds that there is no case which enforces such an obligation; Tiff. Dom. Rel. 288; 44 Mo. App. 308. Where the child's fortune warrants a greater expenditure than the father's means will permit, or where the father is unable to support the child, an allowance to the father may be made by a court of equity out of the child's property for his maintenance and education; Coop. t. Eld. 52; 4 Sandf. Ch. 617; 63 N. H. 14; 2 Kent, Com. 191; Tiff. Pers. & Dom. Rel. 236.

During the lifetime of the father, he is guardian by nature or nurture of his children. As such, however, he has charge only of the person of the ward, and no right to the control or possession either of his real or personal estate; 7 Johns. Ch. 8; 3 Pick. 218; 14 Ala. 388; 20 Vt. 251. As to the father's right to the custody of his children, see 4 Ad. & E. 624; 2 Cust. C. C. 242; [1892] App. Cases 425; 25 Kan. 308; 26 id. 650; Reed, J., in Col. App. 525; 141 Mass. 203; CUSTODY. The rights of the father, while his children remain in his custody, are to have authority over them, to enforce all his lawful commands, and to correct them with moderation for disobedience; 2 Humphr. 283; and these rights, the better to accomplish the purposes of their education, he may delegate to a tutor or instructor; 2 Kent 205. See ASSAULT; CORRECTION. As to criminal liability of the father, see 95 N. C. 688. He may maintain an action for the seduction of his daughter, or for any injury to the person of his child, so long as he has a right to its services; 2 M. & W. 539; 13 Gratt. 726; 6 Ind. 282; 24 Wend. 429; 7 Watts 62; 48 Ill. App. 371; and may even be justified in committing a homicide in protecting his child; 1 Bla. Com. 450; and the fact that a child by her father as next friend has recovered damages for a personal injury does not bar a subsequent action by him for loss of service occasioned by the same injury; 126 Mass. 180; 66 Tex. 225. The authorities are not uniform as to whether the right of the father to recover for a tort committed against the child is to be limited to the theory of loss of service, and therefore based entirely upon the doctrine of an implied relation of master and servant. Such would seem to be the English rule, which gives no remedy, even for expenses, when the child is of such tender age as to be incapable of service; 8 Scott N. E. 741; 7 D. & E. 138. Some American cases follow the same principle; 26 Mo.

App. 75; 60 N. H. 20; but the trend of the authorities is otherwise, and as was said by the Circuit Court of Appeals, in a case of injury to a child of five years of age, "they approve a more reasonable doctrine, and, basing the right of action on the parental relation instead of that of master and servant, allow the father to recover his consequential loss, irrespective of the age of the minor;" 8 C. C. A. 169; s. c. 59 Fed. Rep. 417; 2 Cush. 847; 109 N. Y. 95; 49 Cal. 336; 32 Ohio St. 800; 7 Ala. 169; 50 Ark. 477; Tiff. Pers. & Dom. Rel. 274; and see SEDUCTION; ENTICE. Generally, the father is entitled to the services or earnings of his children during their minority, so long as they remain members of his family; 4 Mass. 380; 2 Gray 257; 17 Ala. N. S. 14; 1 Bla. Com. 453; 60 Mich. 635; but he may relinquish this right in favor of his children; Field, Inf. 68; 2 Metc. Mass. 89; 7 Cow. 92; 14 Ala. N. S. 753; 11 Humphr. 104; 20 Vt. 514; 21 Pa. 223; 2 Ind. App. 264; and he will be presumed to have thus relinquished this right if he abandoned or neglects to support and educate his children; Ware 462; 3 Barb. 115; 6 Ala. N. S. 501; 15 Mass. 272; 65 N. H. 644; 92 Cal. 195; but where a father verbally agrees that his daughter shall reside in a stranger's house as a servant, he does not thereby surrender his parental control, so as to bar his right to recover for her seduction; 86 Pa. 358. An infant husband is entitled to his own wages, so far as necessary for the support of himself and family, although he married without his father's consent; 157 Mass. 73.

The emancipation of a minor may be proved by the act of the father in allowing him to draw his own wages, as well as by other acts, and no proof of a formal contract is necessary; 2 Ind. App. 264.

As to his right to earnings and emancipation, see also 3 Mass. 113; 50 N. H. 501; 1 Ware, 1st ed. 462; 89 Conn. 270; s. c. 2 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 715, with note by Redfield; 24 Me. 531; 63 N. H. 415. The father, as such, has no claim to any property acquired by the child other than earnings; 14 Allen 497.

An agreement of the father, by which his minor child is put out to service, ceases to be binding upon the child after the father's death, unless made by indentures of apprenticeship; 34 N. H. 49; 45 Mo. App. 415; 29 W. Va. 751. The power of the father ceases on the arrival of his children at the age of twenty-one; though if after that age they continue to live in the father's family, they will not be allowed to recover for their services to him upon an implied promise of payment; 3 Pa. 473; 83 N. H. 581; 22 Mo. 459; 6 Ind. 60; 10 Ill. 296; the presumption being that such services are gratuitous, but this may be rebutted; 109 N. C. 710; but see 50 Fed. Rep. 881; 145 Pa. 682. See also 34 Vt. 429; 44 N. H. 293.

A stepfather is not bound to support and educate his stepchildren; 32 Minn. 385; 113 Ill. 61; nor is he entitled to their custody, labor, or earnings, unless he assumes the relation of parent; 11 Barb. 224; 19 Pa. 380; 18 Ill. 40; 1 Busb. 110; 3 N. Y. 312; Schouler, Dom. Rel. 321; 100 N. C. 46; 17 Or. 115; but see 63 N. H. 14.

See also Schouler; Tiffany; Reeve, Dom. Rel.; KIDNAPPING; CHILD; INFANT.

FATHER-IN-LAW. The father of one's spouse.

FATHOM. A measure of length, equal to six feet. Used as a nautical measure.

The word is probably derived from the Teutonic word faz, which signifies the thread or yarn drawn out in spinning to the length of the arm, before it is run upon the spindle. Webster; Minshew.

FATUA MULIER. A whore. Du Fresno.

FATUM. In Civil Law. Fate. An overruling power. An event which can neither be anticipated nor prevented. See DAMNUM FATALE.

FATUOUS PERSON. In Scotch Law. One entirely destitute of reason; is qui omnino desipit. Erskine, Inst. b. 1, tit. 7, s. 48. An idiot. Jacob. One who is incapable of managing his affairs, by reason of a total defect of reason. He is described as having uniform stupidity and inattention of manner and childishness of speech. Bell's Law. Dict.

FATUUS. An idiot or fool. Bract. f. 420 b. Silly; ill-considered; foolish; indiscreet.

FATUUM JUDICIUM. A foolish judgment or verdict. As applied to the latter it is one rather false by reason of folly than criminally so as amounting to perjury. Bract. f. 289.

FAUBOURG. A district or part of a town adjoining the principal city; as a faubourg of New Orleans. 18 La. 286.

FAUCES TERRE (Lat. jaws of the land). Projecting headlands or promontories, including arms of the sea. Such arms of the sea are said to be inclosed within the fauces terre, in contradistinction to the open sea; 1 Kent 367. See ARM OF THE SEA.

FAULT. An improper act or omission, which arises from ignorance, carelessness, or negligence. The act or omission must not have been meditated, and must have caused some injury to another. Lec. Elém. § 738.

In legal literature it is the equivalent of "negligence." An error or defect of judgment or conduct; any deviation from prudence, rectitude, or duty; any shortcoming or neglect of care or performance resulting from inattention, incapacity, or perversity; a wrong tendency, course, or act; 2 Ind. App. 427.

Gross fault or neglect consists in not observing that care towards others which a man the least attentive usually takes of his own affairs. Such fault may, in some cases, afford a presumption of fraud, and in very gross cases it approaches as near as to be almost undistinguishable from it, especially when the facts seem hardly consistent with an honest intention. But there may be a gross fault without fraud; 2 Stra. 1099; Story, Bailm. § 18; Toullier 1, 3, t. 2, § 231.

Ordinary fault consists in the omission of that care which mankind generally pay to their own concerns; that is, the want of ordinary diligence.

A slight fault consists in the want of that care which very attentive persons take of their own affairs. This fault assimilates itself to, and in some cases is scarcely distinguishable from, mere accident or want of foresight.

This division has been adopted by common lawyers from the civil law. Although the civilians generally agree in this division, yet they are not without a difference of opinion. See Pothier, Observation générale sur le précedent Traité et sur les suivantes, printed at the end of his Traité des Obligations, where he cites Accursius, Alciat, Cujas, Duaren, D'avezan, Vinnius, and Helmeusius, in support of this division. On the other side the reader is referred to Thomasius, tom. 2, Dissertationem, page 1006; Le Brun, cited by Jones, Bailm. 27; and Toullier, Droit Civil Français, liv. 3, tit. 3, § 231.

These principles established, different rules have been made as to the responsibilities of parties for their faults in relation to their contracts. They have been reduced to three. See BAILMENT; DOLUS; NEGLIGENCE. See ALL FAULTS.

FAUTOR. In Spanish Law. Accomplice; the person who aids or assists another in the commission of a crime.

FAUX. In French Law. A falsification or fraudulent alteration or suppression of a thing by words, by writings, or by acts without either. Biret, Vocabulaire des Six Codes.

Toullier says (tom. 9, n. 168), "Faux may be understood in three ways: in its most extended sense, it is the alteration of truth, with or without intention; it is nearly synonymous with lying; in a less extended sense, it is the alteration of truth, accompanied with fraud, mutatio veritatis cum dolo facto; and lastly, in a narrow, or rather the legal, sense of the word, when it is a question to know if the faux be a crime, it is the fraudulent alteration of the truth in those cases ascertained and punished by the law." See CRIMEN FALSI.

FAVOR. Bias; partiality; lenity; prejudice.

The grand jury are sworn to inquire into all offences which have been committed and into all violations of law, without fear, favor, or affection. See GRAND JURY. When a juror is influenced by bias or prejudice, so that there is not sufficient ground for a principal challenge, he may nevertheless be challenged for favor. See CHALLENGE; Bac. Abr. Juries, E; 7 Pet. 180.

FAVORED NATION TREATMENT. See MOST FAVORED NATION TREATMENT.

FEAL. Truthful; true. The tenants by knight's service used to swear to their lords to be feal and leal. Feal homager, faithful subject.

FEAL AND DIVOT. A right in Scotland, similar to the right of turbarry in England for fuel, etc. Wharton.

It is a predial servitude peculiar to the law of Scotland, in virtue of which the proprietor of the dominant tenement possesses the right of turning up and carrying off turf from the servient tenement for the purpose of building fences, roofing houses, and the like. This, as well as the servitude of fuel, implies the right of using the nearest ground of the servient tenement on which to lay and dry the turf peats or fuel. These servitudes do not extend beyond the ordinary uses of the actual occupants of the dominant tenements, and cannot be taken advantage of for such a purpose as to burn lime-stone for sale. They are not included in the servitude of pasturage, but must be constituted either by express grant, or by possession following on the usual clause of parts and pertinents. Kirk, 11 tit. ix. s. 17. The etymology of these words has been much disputed. Feal or fail is said to come from the Sulo-Gothic word, any grassy part of the surface of the ground; and Jamieson derives divot from deive (Sax. deifan or delovan), or, as another alternative, says that it may have been formed by the monkish writers of old charters from defodere, to dig the earth. The former is the more probable conjecture. Int. Cyc.

FEALTY. That fidelity which every man who holds lands of another owes to him of whom he holds.

Under the feudal system, every owner of lands held them of some superior, from whom or from whose ancestors the tenant had received them. By this connection the lord became bound to protect the tenant in the enjoyment of the land granted to him; and, on the other hand, the tenant was bound to be faithful to his lord and to defend him against all his enemies. This obligation was called fealty or fealty; 1 Bl. Com. 331; 2 Co. Litt. 67 b; Co. Litt. 1 b; 1 Bl. Com. 331; 2 Co. Litt. 67 b; Co. Litt. 1 b; 1 Prest. Est. 420; 8 Kent 514. The term may be used of other property as well as lands; Old Nat. Brev. 41. The term is generally used to denote as well the land itself so held, as the estate in the land, which seems to be its stricter meaning. Wright, Ten. 19, 49; Cowel. The word fee is explained to signify that the land or other subject of property belongs to its owner, and is transmissible, in the case of an individual, to those whom the law appoints to succeed him, under the appellation of heirs; and, in the case of corporate bodies, to those who are to take on themselves the corporate function, and from the manner in which the body is to be continued, are denominated successors; 1 Co. Litt. 271 b; Wright, Ten. 147, 150; 2 Bl. Com. 104, 106.

The oath or obligation of fealty was one of the essential requisites of the feudal relation; 2 Shaw, Bl. Com. 45, 80; Littleton 117, 131; Wright, Ten. 85; Termes de la Ley; 1 Washb. R. P. 79; see 1 Poll. & Maitl. 277-287, and was as follows: "Hear this ye good people that I (such a one by name) faith will bear to our lord King Edward from this day forward of life and limb, of body and chattels and earthly honor, and the services which belong to him for the fees and tenements which I hold of him will lawfully perform to him as they become due to the best of my power, so help me God and the saints." Stubbs, Const. Hist. 442 n. Fealty was due alike from freeholders and tenants for years as an incident to their estates to be paid to the rever-sioner; Co. Litt. 67 b; Chal. R. P. 13. Tenants at will did not have fealty; 2 Burton. R. P. 386, n; 1 Washb. R. P. 871. It has now fallen into disuse, and is no longer exacted; 8 Kent 510; Wright, Ten. 85, 86; Cowel.

FEAR. In Criminal Law. Dread; consciousness of approaching danger.

Fear in the person robbed is one of the ingredients required to constitute a robbery from the person; and without this the felonious taking of the property is a larceny. It is not necessary that the owner of the property should be in fear of his own person; but fear of violence to the person of his child; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 718; or to his property; id. 731; 2 Russ. Cr. 73; is sufficient; 2 Russ. Cr. 71. See 25 Ind. 400; 58 Mo. 581; PUTTING IN FEAR.

FEASANCE. A doing; a performing or performance. Feasant, doing or making, —as damage feasant (q. v.). Feasor, doer, maker, —as feasors del estatute, makers of the statute; Dyer 3 b.

FEASTS. Certain established periods in the Christian church. Formerly the days of the feasts of saints were used to indicate the dates of instruments and memorable events, 6 Toullier, n. 81. The feasts of the English church were formerly used to divide the terms of the legal year, but this division was abolished by the judicature act. See TERM.

FECIAL LAW. A branch of Roman jurisprudence concerned with embassies, declarations of war, and treaties of peace: so called from feciales (q. v.), who were charged with its administration. It more nearly resembles the international law of modern times than any other department of the Roman law.

FECIAL LAW, or FETIAL LAW
See JUS FECIAL.

FECIALES. Amongst the ancient Romans, that order of priests who discharged the duties of ambassadors. Subsequently their duties appear to have related more particularly to the declaring war and peace. Calvinus, Lex.

FEDERAL. A term commonly used to express a league or compact between two or more states.

In the United States the central government of the Union is federal. The constitution was adopted "to form a more perfect union" among the states, for the purpose of self-protection and for the promotion of their mutual happiness. Freeman's Hist. Fed. Govt.; Austin, Jurispr. Lect. 6; see 92 U. S. 542.

FEDERAL COURTS. See UNITED STATES COURTS.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT. A union or confederation of sovereign states, created either by treaty, or by the mutual adoption of a federal constitution, for the purpose of presenting to the world the appearance of a single state, while retaining the rights and power of internal regulation and administration, or at least of local self-government.

The more extended the renunciation of individual sovereignty, the more powerful does the new government become and the more nearly does it approach to a substantial union. No real diminution of sovereignty is necessarily involved except the relinquishment of the power of conducting independent relations with foreign powers.

"There are two different modes of organizing a federal union. The federal authorities may represent the governments solely, and their acts may be obligatory only on the governments as such, or they may have the power of acting as to individuals, orders which are binding directly on individual citizens. The former is the plan of the (old) German so-called confederation, and of the Swiss constitution previous to 1847. It was tried in America for a few years immediately following the war of independence. The other principle, that of the existing constitution of the United States, and has been adopted within the last dozen years by the Swiss confederacy. The federal congress of the American union is a substantive part of the government of every individual state. Within the limits of its attributions, it makes laws which are obeyed by every citizen individually, executes them through its own officers, and enforces them by its own tribunals. This is the only principle which has been found, or which is even likely to produce an effective federal government. A union between the governments only is a mere alliance, and subject to all contingencies which render it precarious." Milla, Representative Government 301.

A primary difficulty, it has been said, in framing a federal government and a source of danger to its permanence, is liability to disagreements between the constituent governments or between one or more of the local governments and the federal government as to the limits of their respective powers. The scheme adopted in the American system as a provision for such cases has been thus described: "Under the more perfect mode of federation, where every citizen of each particular state owes obedience to two governments—that of his own state, and that of the federal union—it is evidently necessary not only that the constitutional limits of the authority of each should be precisely and clearly defined, but that the power to decide between them in any case of dispute should not reside in either of the governments, or in any functionary attached to it, but in any umpire independent of both. There must be a supreme court of justice, and a system of subordinate courts in every state of the union, before whose questions shall be carried, and whose judgment on them, in the last stage of appeal, shall be final. Every state of the union, and the federal government itself, as well as every functionary of each, must be liable to be sued in those courts for exceeding their powers, or for non-performance of their federal duties, and must in general be obliged to employ those courts as the instruments for enforcing their federal rights. This involves the remarkable consequence, actually realized in the United States, that a court of justice, the highest federal tribunal, is supreme over the various governments, both state and federal, having the right to declare that any new law made, or act done by them, exceeds the powers assigned to them by the federal constitution, and in consequence has no legal validity." "The tribunals which act as umpires between the federal and state governments naturally also decide all disputes between two states, or between a citizen of one state and the government of another. The usual relations between nations, war and diplomacy, being precluded by the federal union, it is necessary that a judicial remedy should supply the place. The supreme court of the federation dispenses international law, and is the first great example of what is now one of the most prominent wants of civilized society, a real international tribunal." Id. 305. See Freeman, Fed. Govt.. The American union is the most striking illustration of federal government in existence, and its permanent character was settled by the civil war which finally determined its indestructibility by action of individual states. In Europe, the empire of Germany and the republic of Switzerland are instances of the operation of successful federal governments, as are most of the South American States; while in the British Empire the Dominion of Canada and the pending Australian federation now nearly completed, as also the Greater Republic of Central America, are indications of a tendency in that direction which existing conditions are likely to increase very rapidly. See these several titles, and also UNITED STATES OF AMERICA; GOVERNMENT. See FEDERAL.

FEDERAL QUESTION. See UNITED STATES COURTS.

FEE. A reward or wages given to one for the execution of his office, or for professional services, as those of a counsellor or physician. Cowel.

Fees differ from costs in this, that the former are, as above mentioned, a recompense to the officer for his services; and the latter, an indemnification to the party for money laid out and expended in his suit; 11 B. & R. 248; 9 Wheat. 232. See 4 Rinn. 227. Fees are synonymous with charges; 66 Me. 124. See CHAMPERTY; ETRICS, LEGAL.

That which is held of some superior on condition of rendering him services.

A fee is defined by Spelman (Feuds, c. 1) as the right which the tenant or vassal has to the use of lands while the absolute property remains in a superior. But this early and strict meaning of the word speedily passed into its modern signification of an estate of inheritance; 2 Bl. Com. 108; Cowel; Termes de la Ley; 1 Washb. R. P. 81; Co. Litt. 1 b; 1 Prest. Est. 420; 8 Kent 514. The term may be used of other property as well as lands; Old Nat. Brev. 41.

The term is generally used to denote as well the land itself so held, as the estate in the land, which seems to be its stricter meaning. Wright, Ten. 19, 49; Cowel. The word fee is explained to signify that the land or other subject of property belongs to its owner, and is transmissible, in the case of an individual, to those whom the law appoints to succeed him, under the appellation of heirs; and, in the case of corporate bodies, to those who are to take on themselves the corporate function, and from the manner in which the body is to be continued, are denominated successors; 1 Co. Litt. 271 b; Wright, Ten. 147, 150; 2 Bl. Com. 104, 106.

The compass or circuit of a manor or lordship. Cowel.

A fee-simple is an estate limited to a man and his heirs absolutely. See FEE-SIMPLE.

A fee-tail is one limited to particular classes of heirs. See FEE-TAIL.

A determinable fee is one which is liable to be determined, but which may continue forever. See DETERMINABLE FEE.

A qualified fee is an interest given to a man and certain of his heirs at the time of its limitation. See QUALIFIED FEE; 75 Md. 897.

A conditional fee includes one that is either to commence or determine on some condition; 10 Co. 95 b; Prest. Est. 478; Fearn, Cont. Rem. 9. See CONDITIONS; SHELLEY'S CASE, RULE IN. See QUASI-FEE. See DEFEASIBLE FEE See REASONABLE FEE.

FEE-BILL. A schedule of the fees to be charged by clerks of courts, sheriffs, or other officers, for each particular service in the line of their duties.

FEE EXPECTANT. A name sometimes applied to an estate created where lands are given to a man and his wife in frank marriage (q. v.), to have and to hold to them and their heirs. In this case they have fee simple; but if they are given to them and their heirs, they have tail and fee-expectant. Tomlin; Kitch. 153.

FEE-FARM. Land held of another in fee,—that is, in perpetuity by the tenant and his heirs at a yearly rent, without fealty, homage, or other services than such as are specially comprised in the feoffment. Cowel. Fealty, however, was incident to a holding in fee-farm, according to some authors. Spelman, Gloss.; Termes de la Ley.

Land held at a perpetual rent. 2 Bl. Com. 43.

FEE-FARM RENT. The rent reserved on granting a fee-farm. It might be one-fourth the value of the land, according to Cowel, one-third, according to other authors. Spelman, Gloss.; Termes de la Ley.

FREE AND LIFE-RENT. In Scotch Law. Two estates in land—the first of which is the full right of proprietorship, the second the limited right of usufruct during life—may be held together, or may co-exist in different persons at the same time. The settling of the limits of the rights which in the latter case they respectively confer is of very great practical importance, and, from the loose way in which both expressions have been used by conveyancers, by no means free from difficulty. "In common language, they are quite distinct; life-rent importing a life-interest merely,—fee a full right of property in reversion after a life-rent. But the proper meaning of the word life-rent has sometimes been confounded by a combination with the word fee, so as in some degrees to lose its appropriate sense, and occasionally to import a fee. This seems to have begun chiefly in destinations 'to husband and wife, in conjunct fee and life-rent and children in fee;' where the true meaning is, that each spouse has a joint life-rent while both live, but each has a possible fee, as it is uncertain which is to survive. The same confusion of terms came to be extended to the case of a destination to parent and child—to A. B. in life-rent, and the heirs of the marriage in fee—where the word life-rent was held to confer a fee on the parent. It came gradually to be held as the technical meaning of the word life-rent to a parent, with fee to his children nascitur, that the word life-rent meant a fee in the father. Finally the expression came to be held as strictly limited in its proper meaning by the accompanying word allenerly, or some similar expression of restriction; or where the fee was given to children nati and nomi-natim, there being in that case no necessity to divert the word life-rent from its proper meaning, or, on a similar principle, where the settlement was by means of a trust created to make up the fee." Bell, Prin. s. 1712. See also Ersk. Prin. 420; FIAB.

In Scotch Law. A term used in grants or conveyances to two persons where it was intended that one should have a life estate and the survivor should have the fee; or, life estate to the parent and fee to the heir. English.

FREE-SIMPLE. An estate of inheritance. Co. Litt. 1 b; 2 Bla. Com. 106. The word simple adds no meaning to the word fee standing by itself. But it excludes all qualification or restriction as to the persons who may inherit it as heirs, thus distinguishing it from a fee-tail, as well as from an estate which, though inheritable, is subject to conditions or collateral determination. 1 Washb. R. P. 51; Wright, Ten. 146; 1 Prest. Est. 420; Littleton § 1. It is the largest possible estate which a man can have, being an absolute estate. It is where lands are given to a man and to his heirs absolutely, without any end or limitation put to the estate. Plowd. 537; 2 Bla. Com. 106; Chal. R. P. 191. See 54 Me. 428; 42 Vt. 688.

Where the granting clause of a deed conveys an estate in fee-simple, a subsequent proviso that the grantee shall not convey without the consent of the grantor is void as a restriction or alienation, general as to time and person, and therefore repugnant to the estate created; 64 Cal. 868.

In modern estates the terms fee, fee-simple, and fee-simple absolute are substantially synonymous; 45 Mo. 170.

The word "heirs" is necessary, in a conveyance, to the creation of a fee-simple, and no expression of intention, in substituted terms, will have an equivalent effect; 36 N. J. L. 434; 92 Ill. 877; 48 Md. 344; but see 54 N. H. 290; 2 Head 389; but it is otherwise in a will; 74 Pa. 173; 7 R. L. 188.

In the absence of statute, a conveyance of property to a trustee, with power to sell and convey the fee, vests in such trustee an estate in fee-simple, without the use of the word "heirs"; 113 Mo. 186. The common-law rule that a fee-simple cannot be conveyed without the word "heirs" does not apply to an exception, or an easement appurtenant to other land of the grantor or of the right to take profit in the soil; 65 Me. 448.

FREE-TAIL (Fr. tailleur, to dock, to shorten). An inheritable estate which can descend to certain classes of heirs only. It is necessary that they should be heirs "of the body" of the ancestor, and these are proper words of limitation. It corresponds with the feudum talliatum of the feudal law. The estate itself is said to have been derived from the Roman system of restricting estates. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 21; 1 Washb. R. P. 60; 3 Bla. Com. 112, n. See, also, Co. 2d Inst. 333; Tudor, Lead. Cas. 607; 4 Kent 14; Chal. R. P. 259; and it is said to exist by virtue of the statute de donis; Crabb, R. P. § 971. See, generally, 1 Gray 286; 35 N. H. 176; 113 Mo. 175; 88 Ga. 251; 155 Mass. 323; 146 Pa. 242.

An estate-tail may be general, i.e. limited to the heirs of the body merely; or special, i.e. limited to a special class of such heirs, e.g. heirs male or heirs female, or those begotten of a certain wife named; 1 H. & J. (Md.) 111. In the last case specified, if the wife died without issue, the husband was called tenant in tail after possibility of issue extinct.

The restrictions against alienation could be evaded at common law by levying a fine, suffering a recovery. In this country, an entail can generally be barred by deed.

FEED. This word is used in its ordinary sense with reference to cattle and hogs which are said to be made marketable by feeding. 60 Ill. 102.

It is also used in the sense of lending additional strength or subsequent support, as "the estate which becomes vested feeds the estoppel." 5 Man. & Ry. 202, 207; so a subsequent title acquired by the mortgagor is said "to feed the mortgage." See GRAFT.

It is also used in the phrase feeding of a cow by and on the land to signify from the land while there is food on it, and with hay by the owner of the land while at other times; 2 Q. B. Div. 49.

A certain amount of food or provender given to horses, cattle, etc., at a time. 12 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed. 891. For a stable to be a "feed stable" it is immaterial that food be kept at the stable, or that it be furnished unless ordered by the owner of the stock. It is sufficient that food is supplied for all who apply. Id. 64 Miss. 511.

FEGANGI. An escaping thief caught with stolen goods in his possession. Spel. Glos.

FEHMGERICHTE. An irregular tribunal which existed and flourished in Westphalia during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries.

From the close of the fourteenth century its importance rapidly diminished; and it was finally suppressed by Jerome Bonaparte in 1811. See Bork, Geschichte der Westphälischen Fehmgerichte; Paul Wigand, Das Fehmgericht Westphalens.

FEIGNED ACTION. In Practice. An action brought on a pretended right, when the plaintiff has no true cause of action, for some illegal purpose. In a feigned action the words of the writ are true; it differs from false action, in which case the words of the writ are false. -Co. Litt. 361, § 689.

FEIGNED DISEASES. Simulated maladies. Diseases are generally feigned from one of three causes—fear, shame, or the hope of gain. Thus a man engaged in the military or naval service may pretend to be afflicted with various maladies, in order to escape the performance of military duty; the mendicant, to avoid labor and to impose on public or private beneficence; the criminal, to prevent the infliction of punishment. The spirit of revenge, and the hope of receiving exorbitant damages, have also induced some to magnify slight ailments into alarming illness. On this subject, Fodere (vol. ii. 452) observes, at the time when the conscription was in full force in France, "that it is at present brought to such perfection as to render it as difficult to detect a feigned disease as to cure a real one." Zaccarias has given five rules for detecting feigned diseases. (1) Inquiry should be made of the relatives and friends of the suspected individual as to his physical and moral habits, and as to the state of his affairs and what may possibly be the motive for feigning disease, particularly whether he is not in immediate danger of some punishment, from which this sickness may excuse him. (2) Compare the disease under examination with the causes capable of producing it; such as the age, temperament, and mode of life of the patient. (3) The aversion of persons feigning disease to take proper remedies. This indeed will occur in real sickness; but it rarely happens when severe pain is present. (4) Particular attention should be paid to the symptoms present, and whether they necessarily belong to the disease. (5) Follow the course of the complaint, and attend to the circumstances which successively occur. Wharton.

FEIGNED ISSUE. In Practice. An issue brought by consent of the parties, or by the direction of a court of equity, or of such courts as possess equitable powers, to determine before a jury some disputed matter of fact which the court has not the power or is unwilling to decide. A series of pleadings was arranged between the parties, as if an action had been commenced at common law upon a bet involving the fact in dispute. 3 Bla. Com. 452. This is still the practice in most of the states retaining the distinction between the procedure in law and in equity. Under the reformed codes of some states issues may be framed in certain exceptional cases. In England, the practice has been disused since the passing of the stat. 8 and 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 19, permitting any court to refer any question of fact to a jury in a direct form. The act 21 and 22 Vict. c. 27, provided for trial by jury in the court of chancery.

FELAGUS (Lat.). One bound for another by oath; a sworn brother. Du Cange. A friend bound in the decennary for the good behavior of another. One who took the place of the deceased. Thus, if a person was murdered, the recompense due from the murderer went to the father or mother of the deceased; if he had none, to the lord; if he had none, to his felagus, or sworn brother. Cunningham, Law Dict.; Cowel; Du Cange.

FELD (obs. for field). As used in compound words it is said to signify wild. Blount.

FELLE. See FEAL.

FELLOW. A co-worker. A partaker or sharer of. A companion; associate; comrade. One united in a legal relation. An incorporated member of a college or collegiate foundation (whether in a university or otherwise).

FELLOW-HEIR. A co-heir.

FELLOW-SERVANTS. Those engaged in the same common pursuit, under the same general control. Cooley, Torts 641.

All who serve the same master, work under the same control, derive authority and compensation from the same common source, are engaged in the same general business, though it may be in different grades or departments of it, are fellow-servants who take the risk of each other's negligence. Thomp. Negl. 1026. As to the rights and liabilities growing out of this relation, see MASTER AND SERVANT.

Servants are fellow servants, (1) when they have a common master; (2) and are engaged in a common employment; (3) and acting within the scope of their employment; (4) but not when one is engaged in performance of duty owed by master to his servants; (5) or represents his master in a position of superior authority. 2 Thomas, Negl. 2nd ed., 1602. See MASTER AND SERVANT.

FELO DE SE (Lat.). In Criminal Law. A felon of himself; a self-murderer. See SUICIDE.

FELON. One convicted and sentenced for a felony.

A felon is infamous, and cannot fill any office or become a witness in any case unless pardoned, except in cases of absolute necessity for his own preservation and defence: as, for example, an affidavit in relation to the irregularity of a judgment in a cause in which he is a party; 2 Stra. 1148; 1 Mart. La. 25; Stark. Ev. pt. 2, tit. Infamy. A conviction in one state where the witness is offered in another does not affect his competency; see 17 Mass. 515; 3 H. & M'H. 120, 378; 1 Harr. & J. 572.

A person who has committed a felony, been convicted, served his sentence, and been discharged, has been held to be no longer a felon; 3 Erch. Div. 352; where it was held that such person can recover against one who has called him a felon.

FELONIA (Lat.). Felony. The act or offence by which a vassal forfeited his fee. Spelman, Gloss.; Calvinus, Lex. Per feloniam, with a criminal intention. Co. Litt. 391.

Felonice was formerly used also in the sense of feloniously. Cunningham, Law Dict. See next title.

FELONICE. Feloniously. Cun. Dict. Anciently it was said that this word must be used in all indictments for felony; 4 Bla. Com. 407; and Lord Coke includes it among the verba artis,—words of art, which cannot be dispensed with by any periphrasis or circumlocution. 4 Coke 89; Co. Litt. 391 a. See FELONIOUSLY.

FELONIOUS. Having the quality of a felony; malignant; malicious; villainous; perfidious. In a legal sense, done with intent to commit a crime, of the nature of a felony; done with deliberate purpose to commit a crime; in a felonious manner with deliberate intention to commit a crime; 47 Kan. 201.

FELONIOUS HOMICIDE. The killing of a human creature, of any age or sex, without justification or excuse. It may include killing oneself as well as any other person; 4 Bla. Com. 188. The mere intention to commit homicide was anciently held to be equally guilty with the commission of the act; Foster, Cr. L. 193; 1 Russ. Cr. 48, note; but a recent work states that in ancient law the mere attempt to commit a crime was not punishable; 3 Poll. & Maitl. 507. See HOMICIDE; ATTEMPT.

FELONIOUSLY. In Pleading. This is a technical word which at common law was essential to every indictment for a felony, charging the offence to have been committed feloniously: no other word nor any circumlocution could supply its place; Com. Dig. Indictment (G 6); Bac. Abr. Indictment (G 1); 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 173, 184; 1 Ben. & H. Lead. Cr. Cas. 154. It is still necessary in describing a common-law felony, or where its use is prescribed by statute; Whart. Cr. Pl. § 260; 41 Miss. 570; 18 Tex. 387; 25 Mo. 324; 68 N. C. 211; 17 Ind. 807; 84 N. H. 510.

In an indictment it is equivalent to purposely or unlawfully; 47 Kan. 201.

An indictment for burglary which does not allege that the breaking and entering was "feloniously and burglariously" done is bad, and the defect is not cured by verdict; 35 W. Va. 280.

FELONY. An offence which occasions a total forfeiture of either lands or goods, or both, at common law, to which capital or other punishment may be superadded, according to the degree of guilt. 4 Bla. Com. 94; 1 Russ. Cr. 78; Co. Litt. 391; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 37; 5 Wheat. 153. The essential distinction between felony and misdemeanor (q. v.) is lost in England since the Felony Act of 1870, though such other differences as existed before that act still exist. Moz. & W. Law Dict. At the present day in this country it simply denotes the degree or class of crime committed; 1 Bish.

New Cr. L. § 616.

Blackstone derives it from the Saxon feo or peoh, fee or feud, and the German foh, price, as being a crime punishable with the loss of the feud or benefice. 4 Com. 16. But it is observed that this Saxon word originally signified money or goods, and only in a translated sense feud or inheritance; Lye, Sax. Dict.; and another commentator remarks, "as in petit larceny the lands are not liable to escheat, and petit larceny has always been ranked among felonies, a later writer seems inclined to derive it from poies in the sense of offending. 2 Wooddes, 510." Bac. Abr. Felony. Fother defines felony as an atrocious wrong committed by a vassal towards his lord, by which the former forfeited his fief to the latter.

In American law the word has no clearly defined meaning at common law, but includes offences of a considerable gravity; 1 Park. Cr. Rep. 89; 4 Ohio St. 542. In general, what is felony under the English common law is such under ours; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 617; Clark, Cr. L. 83. A crime is not a felony unless so declared by statute, or it was such at the common law; 17 R. I. 698. If a statute creates a non-capital offence, not declaring it to be felony, the law will give it the lower grade of misdemeanor; 91 N. C. 561.

The United States Revised Statutes contain no definition of the word, and the meaning of § 4090, referring to "offences against the public peace amounting to felony under the laws of the United States," is not altogether clear. It is defined, however, by statute clearly and fully in many of the states, usually in effect, that all offences punishable either by death or imprisonment in the state prison shall be felonies. 137 N. Y. 29; 98 Mo. 668; 6 Dak. 46; 2 Flap. 551. Express words or necessary implication are required and doubtful words will not suffice; 1 Bish. New Cr. L. § 622. "When an act of congress makes punishable a crime which under the common law is felony, a fortiori when directly or by necessary implication, it declares a thing to be felony, it is felony; but where a national statute creates a non-capital offence, and is silent as to its grade, it is misdemeanor." 1 Bish. New Cr. L. § 671. See 9 Fed. Rep. 886, which holds that common-law felonies are not within the purview of the constitution unless congress so enacts.

Where a statute permits a milder punishment than imprisonment or death, this discretion does not prevent the offence being felony; 49 Me. 218; 20 Cal. 117; 117 Mo. 618. See 59 Va. 570; 38 W. Va. 58; 98 Mo. 668; contra in Illinois; 94 Ill. 501. It has also been held that common-law felonies, punishable less severely than the statutory standard, do not, therefore, cease to be felonies; 10 Mich. 169; 3 Hill, N. Y. 895; but see 5 id. 260; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 620.

Receiving stolen goods was a felony so as to justify arrest without a warrant; 5 Cush. 281; 6 Binn. 316; 2 Term 77; and held the following were not: adultery; 2 Bail. 149; 5 Rand. 627; 18 Vt. 551; assault with intent to murder; 18 Ired. 505; impeding an officer in the discharge of his duty; 25 Vt. 415; involuntary manslaughter by negligence; 15 Ga. 349; 7 S. & R. 423; mayhem; 5 Ga. 404; 7 Mass. 245; perjury; 1 R. M. Charl. 228; 5 Exch. 378; piracy; 1 Salk. 85; 10 Wheat. 495. In England none of the maritime crimes were felony; Story, Const. § 1162.

One may be guilty of misprision of felony, but not of a misdemeanor. In misdemeanor or treason one may commit the crime of a principal by procuring another to do the action in his absence; but in felony such person is only an accessory before the fact. A person against whose property a misdemeanor has been committed may sue the offender at once, but in case of felony he must by the better opinion first bring prosecution; 1 Bish. New Cr. L. § 608. Felonies cannot be prosecuted by information; 9 Fed. Rep. 898. See COMPOUNDING A FELONY.

FELONY ACT. The stat. 83 & 84 Vict. c. 23, abolishing forfeitures for felony, and sanctioning the appointment of interim curators and administrators of the property of felons. Moz. & W.; 4 Steph. Com. 10, 499.

FEMALE. The sex which bears the young.

It is a general rule that the young of female animals which belong to us are ours; nam fetus ventrem sequitur. Inst. 2. 1. 19; Dig. 6. 1. 5. 2. The rule was, in general, the same with regard to slaves; but when a female slave came into a free state, even without the consent of her master, and was there delivered of a child, the latter was free.

FEMME, FEMME. A woman.

FEMME COVERT. A married woman. See MARRIED WOMAN; COVERTURE.

FEMME SOLE. A single woman, including those who have been married, but whose marriage has been dissolved by death or divorce, and, for most purposes, those women who are judicially separated from their husbands. Moz. & W. Dict.; 2 Steph. Com. 250.

FEMME SOLE TRADER. A married woman, who, by the custom of London, trades on her own account, independently of her husband; so called, because, with respect to her trading, she is the same as a feme sole. Jacob, Dict.; 1 Cro. 63; 3 Keb. 902; 2 Bish. M. W. § 528. The custom was recognized as common law in South Carolina, but did not extend beyond trading in merchandise; 1 Hill, S. C. 429; 2 Bay 164; under it a woman could not be a feme sole carrier; 1 McMullan 50. By statute in several states a similar custom is recognized; thus in Pennsylvania, by act of Feb. 22, 1718, the wives of mariners who had gone to sea were recognized as feme sole traders when engaged in any work for their livelihood, and by act of May 4, 1855, the benefits of this act are extended to all those wives whose husbands, from drunkenness, profligacy, or other cause, neglect or refuse to provide for them, or desert them; 2 P. & L. Dig. 2895. By the latter act she may make application to the court of common pleas and obtain a decree and certificate that she is authorized to do business under said act; id. It is not necessary that there should be a decree in order that a wife may have the benefit of the act; it is remedial, and to be construed benignly; 59 Pa. 13; 131 id. 241; mere non-support does not entitle her to the privileges of the act; there must be profligacy, drunkenness, or wilful absence or neglect; 110 Pa. 486; but if, deserted by her husband, she engages in business, she cannot be held liable as a feme sole trader unless she has been decreed such; 34 Leg. Int. 5. She may convey her real estate by deed in which her husband does not join; 95 Pa. 472; and the title passes free from any claim of the husband as tenant by the curtesy; 104 Pa. 298; in which the act was declared constitutional. The husband is liable for necessities, notwithstanding the wife has been declared a feme sole trader; 9 Phila. 236; and actual residence with her husband does not take away her privileges under the act; 101 Pa. 371; and so in South Carolina; 2 Bay 162; 2 Bish. M. W. § 528. As her powers are in some respects greater than those of a married woman under the act of June 8, 1893, there is no reason for regarding the early Pennsylvania acts as superseded by the later act; 2 P. & L. Dig. 2895, note.

In North Carolina the doctrine that a feme covert may be a sole trader was considered with deliberation, and it was held that it did not obtain in that state; 1 Jones, Eq. 1. In an appeal from the District of Columbia it was said by the supreme court that "the law seems to be settled that when a wife is left by her husband, without maintenance and support, has traded as a feme sole, and has obtained credit as such, she ought to be liable for her debts," whether the husband was banished for crime or abandoned her; but by Maryland law a deed of real estate acquired by her while a feme sole trader, abandoned by her husband, was held void; 1 Pet. 105. In California under a sole trader act, excluding from the benefits of the act a married woman carrying on business in her own name, but managed by her husband, it was held that she could not escape liability as sole trader on the ground that she permitted such management; 43 Cal. 103. See 24 Miss. 416.

A married woman by statute authorized to carry on trade and perform labor or services on her sole and separate account, is personally liable on a note given for property purchased for business purposes; in such a case the court said: "The power of a married woman to make contracts relating to her separate business is incident to the power to conduct it. . . . The power to engage in business would be a barren and useless one disconnected with the right to conduct it in the way and by the means usually employed." 53 N. Y. 423; id. 93; 106 id. 74.

See, generally, Husb. Married Women, c. xi.; 2 Bish. M. W. c. xlii.

FEMICIDE. The killing of a woman. One who kills a woman. See HOMICIDE.

FEMININE. Of or belonging to females.

When the feminine is used, it is generally confined to females; as, if a man bequeathed all his mares to his son, his horses would not pass. See 3 Brev. 9.

FENATIO, or FEONATIC. In Forest Law. The fawning of deer; the fawning season. Spel. Gloss.

FENCE. A building or erection between two contiguous estates, so as to divide them, or on the same estate, so as to divide one part from another. It may be of any material presenting a sufficient obstruction; 77 Ill. 169; and has been held to include a gate; 63 Me. 308. See 19 Can. L. J. 204.

Fences are regulated by local laws. In general fences on boundaries are to be built on the line, and the cost, when made no more expensively than is required by law, is borne equally between the parties; 2 Miles 337, 395; 2 Me. 73; 11 Mass. 294; 2 Wend. 142; 13 Conn. 526; 50 Iowa 237. For modifications of the rule, see 32 Pa. 65; 28 Mo. 556. One adjoining land-owner can compel another to contribute to the expense of maintaining a partition fence only when the fence completes an inclosure which contains no other lands than those of the latter; 50 Ohio St. 722. A partition fence is presumed to be the common property of both owners of the land; 8 B. & C. 257, 259, note a; 20 Ill. 834; 24 Minn. 307. When built upon the land of one of them it is his; but if it were built equally upon the land of both, at their joint expense, each would be the owner in severalty of the part standing on his own land; 5 Taunt. 20; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 617. See 2 Washb. R. P. 79.

A class of cases has arisen, in this country, regarding the responsibility of steam railway companies for protecting their tracks by fences. In some cases they are required by statute to do so, but unless so required they are not under any obligation to do so, having no other duty than other land-owners; 8 Wood, R. R. 1843; 78 Fed. Rep. 94. A railroad company, when not required by law to fence its tracks, in doing so only exercises extraordinary diligence to prevent danger to cattle, and is not liable if it fails to maintain such fence; 85 B. W. Rep. (Ind. Ter.) 238. When the company is required by statute to fence its track, a failure to do so renders it liable to an employee for an injury caused thereby; 60 Fed. Rep. 870; and see 25 L. R. A. 320, note.

But in a very recent case (78 Fed. Rep. 94) the circuit court of appeals held that the Virginia fence act imposed a duty only to the owners of stock and not to the railroad's employees; and that the violation of the act is no ground of recovery for the death of an employee, killed by the derailling of his train by cattle which came upon the track at a place where the right of way was not fenced. The court distinguished the cases in 111 Mo. 173; 124 id. 140; 119 N. Y. 468, as arising under a special statute.

Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel the performance of the statutory duty;

The power of the states to require such fencing by statute is fully sustained; 70 Tex. 298; s. c. 33 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 286; and the extent and manner of it are within the legislative discretion; 19 id. 543; s. c. 109 Ill. 403; and such statutes are valid under the police power; id. 402, 537; 140 id. 809; 35 Minn. 503; 16 Kan. 573; 66 Pa. 184; 26 Mo. 441; (a leading case collecting authorities and approving; 27 Vt. 141;) and are not unconstitutional as imposing expense on one for the sole benefit of another; 68 Mo. 56.

As a means of compelling railroads to fence their tracks statutes have been enacted in many states making them absolutely liable in damages for killing stock, by analogy to the similar statutes respecting damage by fires from locomotives (q. v.); but such statutes have generally been held unconstitutional where the question has been raised; 58 Ala. 594; 62 id. 71; 6 Utah 253; 8 Mont. 271, 279; 98 N. C. 778; 18 Colo. 600; 16 Kan. 573; 1 Wash. 206; 25 L. R. A. 320, note.

In some states the common law requiring the owner of cattle to keep them within a sufficient enclosure is held not to be in force, and in such case a railroad company, while not required to fence, and fully authorized to transact its lawful business on its track, must exercise reasonable care to avoid injuring cattle which have wandered on their premises, and it is liable for accidents which by ordinary care could have been prevented; 46 Miss. 575; 71 Ala. 545; 27 Conn. 393; 31 Fla. 660; 59 Md. 306; 24 Vt. 487; 89 Mo. 147; 3 Wood, R. R. 1846. Where it is the duty of the company, arising out of the contract, to fence its track, a failure to comply with the terms of such contract renders the company liable for all injuries to animals consequent thereon.

See, generally, as to fencing railroads; 8 Wood, R. R. §§ 417 and 421, where these cases are collected; 5 L. R. A. 737, note, and 8 id. 135, both citing statutes and decisions; 11 id. 427 (Missouri statutes and decisions); Whart. Negl. 892; 93 Mich. 607; 65 Hun 622; 42 Ill. App. 90; 119 N. Y. 468; 124 Mo. 140; 111 id. 173.

Barbed wire fences have given rise to much litigation in this country. It is held that one is not necessarily negligent in using a barbed wire fence, but it should be so used and cared for as not to endanger persons and property, and the use of such fences imposes upon those who use them care reasonably proportionate to their danger; 112 Ind. 504; and a railroad company using barbed fences must use due diligence in running its trains, not only to avoid killing stock, but to avoid precipitating them by fright against the fence to be mangled or bruised; 63 Ga. 680. On his own land one may maintain such a fence, and it is not illegal; 82 Tex. 26, affirming 70 id. 128; and expressly disapproving 2 Tex. Unrep. Cas. 254; s. c. 2 Tex. L. Rev. 338 (commented on, 29 Alb. L. J. 23); in which it was held that "such fences are dangerous unless constructed with planks in connection with the wire." But this case was also reviewed with all analogous cases in 8 Ont. H. B. Div. 538; where it was held that it was not negligence per se to maintain such fences and they were not a nuisance. The owner is bound to keep the wires properly stretched and not hanging loose; 79 Cal. 817; 112 Ind. 504. See 10 N. J. L. 43. One who has allowed the use of his land by the public before stretching a barbed wire fence across the way is bound to give notice, in order to escape liability for injury resulting from ignorance of the obstruction; 31 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 559. If it was negligence to maintain such a fence near a private road, it would be negligence in a person riding a horse difficult to control, to approach it; 83 Tex. 26. See, generally, 16 N. J. L. 105.

In Scotch Law. To hedge in or protect by certain forms. To fence a court, to open in due form. Pitcairn, Cr. Law, pt. 1, p. 75. See GOOD AND LAWFUL FENCE.

FENCE-MONTH. A month in which it is forbidden to hunt in the forest. It begins fifteen days before midsummer and ends fifteen days after. Manw. For. Laws, c. 23. There were also fence-months for fish. Called, also, defence-month, because the deer are then defended from "scare or harm." Cowell; Spelman, Gloss.; Cunningham, Law Dict.

FENDER. A guard and protection against danger. 59 N. J. L. 403.

FENERATION. The action or practice of lending on interest; usury. In some modern dictionaries, applied to interest on money lent. Feneration at the rate of an eightieth part by the month; Colebrook, Dig. Hindu Law, l. 7.

FENGELD (Sax.). A tribute exacted for repelling enemies. Spelman, Gloss.

FENIAN. A member of a secret political association of Irish or Irish-Americans founded in New York about 1857, and having for its object to secure the independence of Ireland. As to its organization and its operation, see Enc. tit. Fenian Society.

According to some authorities this word is also defined a champion, hero, giant; or in the plural, invaders or foreign spoilers.

A very late authority designates the word as "one of the names of the ancient population of Ireland confused in modern times with fian, the name of a body of warriors who are said to have been the defenders of Ireland in the time of Finn and other legendary Irish kings." Murray, New Eng. Dict. This is in allusion to the popular tradition attributing the name to a race of heroes in Irish legendary history. See Cent. Dict.; Enc. Dict.; Enc. Brit. ix. 75.

FEOD. Said to be compounded of the two Saxon words feoh (stipend) and odh (property); by others, to be composed of feoh (stipend) and hod (condition). 2 Bla. Com. 45; Spelman, Gloss. See FEU; FEUD.

FEODAL. Belonging to a fee or feud; feudal. More commonly used by the old writers than feudal.

FEODAL ACTIONS. Real actions. 3 Bla. Com. 117.

FEODAL LAW. Feodal system. See FEUDAL LAW.

FEODALITY. Fidelity or fealty. Cowell. See FEALTY.

FEODARUM, or FEUDARAM CONSUETUDINES. See FEUDAL LAWS.

FEODARY. An officer in the court of wards, appointed by the master of that court, by virtue of the statute 32 Hen. VIII. c. 48, to be present with the escheator at the finding offices and to give in evidence for the king as to value and tenure. He was also to survey and receive rents of the ward-lands and assign dower to the king's widows. The office was abolished by stat. 12 Car. II. c. 24; Kennett, Gloss.; Cowell.

FEODATORY, or FEUDATORY. The grantee of a feud or fee. The tenant or vassal who held an estate by feudal service. Termes de Ley; 3 Bla. 48.

Also grantees, to whom lands in feud or fee were granted by a superior lord, were sometimes called homagers, and in some writings are termed vassals, feuds, and feodatories. Tomlin.

FEODY FIRMA (L. Lat.). Fee-farm, which see.

FEODUM. The form in use by the old English law-writers instead of feudum, and having the same meaning. Feudum is used generally by the more modern writers and by the feudal law-writers. Littleton § 1; Spelman, Gloss. There were various classes of feoda. See FEUDUM.

FEOFFAMENTUM. A feoffment. 2 Bla. Com. 810.

FEOFFARE. To bestow a fee. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 91.

FEOFFATOR. A feoffor; he who gives or grants a fee, or who makes a feoffment. Bract. fols. 12 b, 81.

FEOFFATUS. A feoffee; one to whom a fee is given or a feoffment made. Bract. fols. 17 b, 44 b.

FEOFFEE. He to whom a fee is conveyed. Littleton § 1; 2 Bla. Com. 20.

FEOFFEE TO USES. A person to whom land was conveyed for the use of a third party. One holding the same position with reference to a use that a trustee does to a trust. 1 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 833. He answers to the hæres fiduciarius of the Roman law.

FEOFFMENT. A gift of any corporeal hereditaments to another. It operates by transmutation of possession; and it is essential to its completion that the seisin be passed. Watk. Conv. 183.

The conveyance of a corporeal hereditament either by investiture or by livery of seisin. 1 Sullivan, Lect. 143; 1 Washb. R. P. 33; Chal. R. P. 363.

The instrument or deed by which such hereditament is conveyed.

This was one of the earliest modes of conveyance used in the common law. It signified originally the grant of a fee or feud; but it came in time to signify the grant of a free inheritance in fee, respect being had rather to the perpetuity of the estate granted, than to the feudal tenure; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 90. The feoffment was likewise accompanied by livery of seisin; 1 Washb. R. P. 33. The conveyance by feoffment with livery of seisin has become infrequent, if not obsolete, in England, and in this country has not been used in practice; Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, c. 4, § 8; Shepp. Touchst. c. 9; 2 Bla. Com. 20; Co. Litt. 9; 4 Kent 467; Perkins, c. 8; Com. Dig.; 12 Vinet, Abr. 167; Bacon, Abr.; Dane, Abr. c. 104; 1 Sullivan, Lect. 143; Stearn, Real. Act. 2; 8 Cra. 229.

FEOFFMENT TO USE. A feoffment of lands made to one person for the benefit or to the use of another. In such case the feoffee was bound in conscience to hold the lands according to the use, and could himself derive no benefit. Sometimes such feoffments were made to the use of the feoffor. The effect of such conveyance was entirely changed by the statute of uses. See Wms. R. P., 6th ed. 155; USE. Since the statute a feoffment directed to operate to the use of any other person than the feoffee, though it be a common-law conveyance, so far as it conveys the land to the feoffee, derives its effect from the statute of uses, so far as the use is limited by it to the person or persons in whose favor it is declared. Thus, if A be desirous to convey to B in fee, he may do so by enfeoffing a third person, C, to hold to him and his heirs to the use of B and his heirs, the effect of which will be to convey the legal estate in fee-simple to B. For since the statute of uses, the legal estate passes to the feoffee by means of the livery as it would have done before; but no sooner has this taken place than the limitation to uses begins to operate, and C thereby becomes seised to the use defined or limited, the consequence of which is that by force of the legislative enactment the legal estate is eo instanti taken out of him, and vests in B, for the like interest as was limited in the use, i. e. in fee-simple. B thus becomes the legal tenant as effectually as if the feoffment had been made to himself, and without the intervention of a trustee. This method is not much practised in consequence of the livery of seisin, which has become obsolete. See 2 Sand. Us. 13; Watk. Conv. 289; FEOFFMENT.

FEOFFOR. He who makes a feoffment. 2 Bla. Com. 20; Litt. § 1.

FEOD (Sax.). A reward; wages; a fee. The word was in common use in these senses. Spelman, Feuds.

FEORME. A certain portion of the produce of the land due by the grantee to the lord according to the terms of the charter. Spel. Feuds c. 7.

FERÆ BESTIÆ. Wild beasts.

FERÆ NATURÆ (Lat. of a wild nature; untamed). A term used to designate animals not usually tamed, or not regarded as reclaimed so as to become the subject of property.

Such animals belong to the person who has captured them only while they are in his power; for if they regain their liberty his property in them instantly ceases, unless they have animus revertendi, which is to be known only by their habit of returning; 2 Bla. Com. 886; 3 Binn. 546; Brooke, Abr. Proprietie 37; Com. Dig. Biens, F; 7 Co. 17 b; Inst. 2. 1. 15; [1896] 1 Q. B. 106.

Property in animals feræ naturæ is not acquired by hunting them and pursuing them; if, therefore, another person kills such animal in the sight of the pursuer, he has a right to appropriate it to his own use; 3 Cal. 175. But if the pursuer brings the animal within his own control, as by entrapping it or wounding it mortally, so as to render escape impossible, it then belongs to him; id.; though if he abandons it another person may afterwards acquire property in the animal; 20 Johns. 75. The owner of land has a qualified property in animals feræ naturæ when, in consequence of their inability and youth, they cannot go away. See Year B. 12 Hen. VIII. (9 B. 10 A); 2 Bla. Com. 394; Bacon, Abr. Game.

The supreme court of the United States recently held a Louisiana statute constitutional which prescribed that dogs are only to be regarded as personal property when recorded on assessment rolls. The court said: "The very fact that they are without protection of the criminal laws shows that property in dogs is an imperfect or qualified nature, and that they stand, as it were, between animals feræ naturæ, in which until subdued there is no property, and domestic animals, in which the right of property is complete." Sentell v. N. O. & C. R. R. Co., April 26, 1897. See DOGS; GAME; ANIMALS.

FERCOSTA (Ital.). In Scotch Law. A kind of small vessel or boat. Skene.

FERDELLA TERRÆ. A fardel land; ten acres; or perhaps a yard-land. Cowel.

FERDFARE (Sax.). A summons to serve in the army. An acquittance from going into the army. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 47, 23.

FERDINGUS. Apparently a freeman of the lowest class, being named after the colseti. Anc. Inst. Eng.

FERDWITE. An acquittance of manslaughter committed in the army; also a fine imposed on persons for not going forth on a military expedition. Cowel.

FERIA (Lat.). In Old English Law. A week-day; a holiday; a day on which process may not be served; a fair; a ferry. Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss.; Cowel; 4 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 17.

FERIE (Lat.). In Civil Law. Holidays. Numerous festivals were called by this name in the early Roman empire. In the later Roman empire the single days occurring at intervals of a week apart, commencing with the seventh day of the ecclesiastical year, were so called. Du Cange.

All ferie were dies nefasti. All ferie were divided into two classes,—"ferie publicæ" and "ferie private." The latter were only observed by single families or individuals in commemoration of some particular event which had been of importance to them or their ancestors. Smith, Dict. Antiq.

FERIAL DAYS. Originally and properly, days free from labor and pleading. In statute 27 Hen. VI. c. 5, working-days. Cowel.

FERTA. In European Law. A wound; stroke. Spel. Glos.

FERLING. In English Law. The fourth part of a penny; also, the quarter of a ward in a borough.

FERLINGATA. A fourth part of a yard-land.

FERLINGUS, or FERLINGUM. A furlong (q. v.). Co. Litt. 5 b.

FERM, or FEARM. A house or land, or both, let by lease. Cowel.

FERME (Sax.). A farm; a rent; a lease; a house or land, or both, taken by indenture or lease. Plowd. 195; Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Cowel. See FARM.

FARMER, FERMOR. A lessee; a farmer. One who holds a term, whether of lands or an incorporeal right, such as customs or revenue.

FERNIER. In French Law. One who farms any public revenue.

FERMISONA. The winter season for killing deer, as tempus pinguetinis is the summer season. Tomlin.

FERMORY. In Old Records. A place in monasteries, where they received the poor (hospicio excipiebant), and gave them provisions (ferm, firma). Spel. Glos.

FERNIGO. In English Law. A waste ground or place where ferns grow. Cowel.

FERRATOR. A farrier (q. v.).

FERRI. In Civil Law. To be borne, i. e. on or about the person, in contradistinction from portari, to be carried on an animal.

FERRIAGE. The toll or price paid for the transportation of persons and property across a ferry. 85 Cal. 606.

FERRIFODINA. In Old English Law. An iron mine. Townsh. Pl. 273.

FERRUM (Lat. iron). In Old English Law. A horse-shoe.

FERRUERE. The shoeing of horses. Kelham.

FERRY. A liberty to have a boat upon a river for the transportation of men, horses, and carriages with their contents, for a reasonable toll. 42 Me. 9; 3 Zab. 208; Woolr. Ways 217. The term is also used to designate the place where such liberty is exercised; 4 Mart. La. N. s. 426. Ferry properly means a place of transit across a river or arm of the sea; but in law it is treated as a franchise, and defined as the exclusive right to carry passengers across a river, or arm of the sea, from one vill to another, or to connect a continuous line of road leading from one township or vill to another. It is not a servitude or easement. It is wholly unconnected with the ownership or occupation of land, so much so that the owner of the ferry need not have any property in the soil adjacent on either side. 12 C. B. N. s. 32.

An exclusive right of ferry exists where one acquires the sole and exclusive privilege of taking tolls for such service. The element of receiving payment is essential, as one may lawfully transport his own goods in a boat, where an exclusive right of ferry is held by another; 73 Mo. 655.

In England, ferries are established by royal grant or by prescription, which is an implied grant; in the United States, by legislative authority, exercised either directly or by a delegation of powers to courts, commissioners, or municipalities; 7 Pick. 344; 11 Pet. 420; 20 Conn. 218; 8 Me. 385; 18 Ark. 19. Without such authority no one, though he may be the owner of both banks of the river, has the right to keep a public ferry; 3 Mo. 470; 13 Ill. 27; 6 Ga. 130; 11 Pet. 420; Willes 608; though after twenty years' uninterrupted use such authority will be presumed to have been granted; 2 Dev. 403; 1 N. & M'C. 389; 4 Ill. 53; 7 Ga. 348; but see 10 Ky. L. Rep. 940. The franchise of a ferry will, in preference, be granted to the owner of the soil, but may be granted to another; and by virtue of the right of eminent domain the soil of another may be condemned to the use of the ferry, upon making just compensation; 6 B. & C. 703; 5 Yerg. 180; 7 Humph. 80; 2 Dev. 403; 6 Ga. 359; 6 Dana 242; 8 Me. 385; 2 Cal. 262. If the termini of the ferry be a highway, the owner of the fee will not be entitled to compensation; 3 Kent 421; 4 Zab. 718; 7 Gratt. 205; 1 T. B. Monr. 848; though in Pennsylvania and other states a different doctrine prevails; 9 S. & R. 31; 3 Watts 219; 20 Wend. 111; 4 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 530; 8 Yerg. 897. See EMINENT DOMAIN.

One state has the right to establish ferries over a navigable river separating it from another state or from a foreign territory, though its jurisdiction may extend only to the middle of such river; and the exercise of this right does not conflict with the provision in the constitution of the United States conferring upon congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states," nor with any law of congress upon that subject; 11 Wend. 536; 8 Yerg. 887; 3 Zab. 206; 3 Gilman 197; 83 N. Y. 89; 74 Tex. 460. The granting of a temporary license to operate a ferry within the city limits, is valid; 108 Mo. 530. A state may at its pleasure erect a new ferry so near an older ferry as to impair or destroy the value of the latter by drawing away its custom, unless the older franchise be protected by the terms of its grant; 15 Pick. 248; 6 Dana 43; 9 Ga. 517; 6 How. 507; 16 id. 524; 7 Ill. 197; 1 La. Ann. 283; 10 Ala. N. S. 87; 25 Wend. 638. See 145 Pa. 404; 188 U. S. 287. But if an individual, without authority from the state, erect a new ferry near an older ferry, lawfully established, as to draw away the custom of the latter, such individual will be liable to an action on the case for damages, or to a suit in equity for an injunction in favor of the owner of the latter; 6 M. & W. 284; 67 N. The grant to a city by the legislature of the right of licensing ferries, does not empower the city to grant exclusive ferry privileges; 108 Mo. 550.

The franchise of a ferry is an incorporeal hereditament, and as such it descends to heirs, is subject to dower, may be leased, sold, and assigned; 5 Com. Lim. 732; 10 Barb. 223; 4 Zab. 716; 11 B. Monr. 861; 9 Mo. 580.

The owners of ferries are common carriers, and liable as such for the carriage of the goods and persons which they receive upon their boats. They are bound to have their ferries furnished with suitable boats, and to be in readiness at all proper times to transport all who apply for a passage; Ang. They must have their flats so made and so guarded with railings that all drivers with horses and carriages may safely enter thereon; and as soon as the carriage and horses are fairly on the drops or slips of the flat, and during their transportation, although driven by the owner or his servant, they are in the possession of the ferryman, and the owners of the ferry are answerable for the loss or injury of the same unless occasioned by the fault of the driver; 1 M'Corr 439; 16 E. FERRYMAN. One employed in taking persons across a river or other stream, in boats or other contrivances, at a ferry. 8 Ala. 160; 8 Dana 159.

FERTILIZERS. A statute whose controlling purpose is to guard the agricultural public against spurious and worthless compounds sometimes sold as fertilizers, by fixing on sellers a statutory guaranty that fertilizers sold by them contain the chemical ingredients and in the proportions represented, and furnishing to buyers cheap and reliable means of proving deception and fraud, should any be attempted, is within the pale of legitimate police regulation, as the accomplishment of these objects will greatly promote the prosperity and success of agricultural industry. 22 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed. 835; 84 Ala. 93, 5 Am. St. Rep. 332.

The manufacture of fertilizers is exempt from taxation. This does not extend to a mill which produces cottonseed meal, which, though it can be used as a fertilizer is not produced primarily for that purpose and is used quite as freely for food. Id., vol. 12, p. 351; 49 La. Ann. 750.

FESTAS IN CAPPIS. In Old English Law. Grand holidays, on which choirs were accustomed to wear caps. Jac. L. Dict.

FETIAL LAW. See JUS FETIALE.

FESTING-MAN. A bondman; a surety; a pledge; a frank-pledge. It was one privilege of monasteries that they should be free from festing-men, which Cowel explains to mean not to be bound for any man's forthcoming who should transgress the law. Cowel.

FESTING-PENNY. Earnest (q. v.) given to servants when hired or retained. The same as arles-penny. Cowel.

FESTINUM REMEDIUM (Lat. a speedy remedy). A term applied to those cases where the remedy for the redress of an injury is given without any unnecessary delay. Bacon, Abr. Assise, A. The action of dower is festinum remedium, and so is that of assise.

FESTUCA. In Frankish Law. A rod or staff or (as described by other writers) a stick, on which imprecatory runs were cut, which was used as a gage or pledge of good faith by a party to a contract, or for symbolic delivery in the conveyance or quit-claim of land, before a court of law, anterior to the introduction of written documents by the Romans. 2 Poll. & Maitl. 86, 184, 190; Maitl. Domesday Book and Beyond 823.

FESTUM (Lat.). A feast, a holiday, a festival.

FETTERS. A sort of iron put on the limbs of a malefactor or a person accused of crime.

When a prisoner is brought into court to plead, he shall not be put in fetters; Co. 2d Inst. 815; Co. 3d Inst. 84; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 119; Kel. 10; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 417; 4 Bla. Com. 322.

In the first case in this country in which the old common-law doctrine was considered and enforced, the court held that to try a prisoner in shackles was to deprive him of his rights, and that a conviction, under such circumstances, would be reversed; 42 Cal. 185, followed in 64 Mo. 81 (aff. 1 Mo. App. 438). A single expression on this subject seems to be opposed to these cases. An English writer, commenting on the action of a barrister who withdrew and refused to proceed with a case because the judge ordered his client fettered during the trial, considers the removal of fetters to be a mere matter of courtesy, being designed to relieve the prisoner, so far as is practicable, from all that might enlist prejudice against him or disturb his self-possession, and that such removal cannot be considered a matter of right; 43 L. T. 890.

An officer having arrested a defendant on a civil suit, or a person accused of a crime, has no right to handcuff him unless it is necessary or he has attempted to make his escape; 4 B. & C. 596. It is not conclusive on a question of escape that the arresting officer did not handcuff the prisoner; 84 N. C. 829.

FEU. In Scotch Law. A holding or tenure where the vassal in place of military service makes his return in grain or money. Distinguished from wardholding, which is the military tenure of the country. Bell, Dict.; Erskine, Inst. lib. ii. tit. 8, § 7.

FEU ANNUALS. In Scotch Law. The reddendo, or annual return from the vassal to a superior in a feu holding. Wharton, Dict., 2d Lond. ed.

FEU ET LIEU (Fr.). In Old French Canadian Law. Hearth and home, meaning actual settlement by a tenant on the land.

FEU HOLDING. A holding by tenure of rendering grain or money in place of military service. Bell, Dict.

FEUAE. In Scotch Law. The tenant or vassal of a feu. Bell, Dict.

FEUD. Land held of a superior on condition of rendering him services. 2 Bla. Com. 106.

A hereditary right to use lands, rendering services therefor to the lord, while the property in the land itself remains in the lord. Spelman, Feuds c. 1.

The same as feod, fief, and fee. 1 Sullivan, Lect. 128; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 84; Dalrymple, Feud. Pr. 99; 1 Washb. E. P. 18; Mitch. R. P. 80.

In Scotland and the North of England, a combination of all the kin to revenge the death of any of the blood upon the slayer and all his race. Termes de la Ley; Whishaw. See FEUDISM; See HONORARY FEUD IMPROPER FEUDS; MILITARY FEUDS.

FEUDA. Fees.

FEUDAL ACTIONS. See FEODAL ACTIONS.

FEUDAL COURTS. During the 13th century in England the central courts were beginning to analyze and distinguish the different principles upon which the local courts exercised their jurisdiction. By the end of Edward I's reign they were sufficiently clearly drawn to enable one to distinguish four main groups of local courts: the communal, the franchise, the manorial, and the feudal courts.

The latter depend upon the principle that the lord of tenants can hold a court for his tenants merely because they are his tenants. A lord of tenants will also often have a franchise or franchises by virtue of which he exercises a wider jurisdiction; but because his purely feudal jurisdiction does not depend upon a special grant from the crown it is in theory at any rate, clearly distinguishable from the jurisdiction which he exercises as lord of a franchise.

Such courts became, in the course of the 13th century gradually of less importance. This was due chiefly to three causes: Firstly, the feudal principle would have led to a series of courts one above the other; and the higher courts would have been the courts of provinces. Secondly, such courts were not in fact needed because of the growth of the jurisdiction of the king's court. Thirdly, feudalism has its two sides—its property side and its jurisdictional side. Under the circumstances of the time, the jurisdiction involved in feudalism gradually declined, and it became merely appendant to land owning. This development gave rise to the manorial jurisdiction of later law.

FEUDAL LAW, FEODAL LAW. A system of tenures of real property which prevailed in the countries of western Europe during the middle ages, arising from the peculiar political condition of those countries, and radically affecting the law of personal rights and of movable property.

Although the feudal system has never obtained in this country, and is long since extinct throughout the greater part of Europe, some understanding of the theory of the system is essential to an accurate knowledge of the English constitution, and of the doctrines of the common law in respect to real property. The feudal tenure was a right to lands on the condition of performing services and rendering allegiance to a superior lord. It had its origin in the military immunities of the Northern, then overran the falling Roman empire. Many writers have sought to trace the beginning of the system in earlier periods, and resemblances more or less distinct have been found in the tenures prevailing in the Roman republic and empire, in Turkey, in Hindustan, in ancient Tuscany, as well as in the system of Celtic chieftainship. Hallam, id. Ag. Vol. 1; Stuart, Soc. in Europe; Roman Empire, Hist. Charters V.; Pinkerton, Diss. on the Goths; Montesquieu, Esp. des Loix, livre xxx. c. 2; Meyer, Exposit. Origine et Progrès des Inst. judiciaires, tom. 1, p. 4.

But the origin of the feudal system is so obvious in the circumstances under which it arose, that perhaps there can be no dispute between it and the earlier systems than that all are the outgrowth of political conditions somewhat similar. It has been said that the system is nothing more than the natural fruit of conquest; but the fact that the conquest was by immigrants, and that the conquerors made the acquired country their permanent abode, is an important element in the case, and so far as other conquests have fallen short of this the military tenures resulting have fallen short of the feudal system. The military chieftains of the northern nations allotted the lands of the countries they occupied among themselves and their followers, with a view at once to strengthen their own power and ascendancy and to provide for their followers.

Some lands were allotted to individuals as their own proper estates, and these were termed allodial; but, for the most part, those lands which were not retained by the chieftain he assigned to his comites, or knights, to be held by his permission, in return for which they assumed him their allegiance and undertook for him military service.

It resulted that there was a general dismemberment of the political power into many petty nations and petty sovereignties. This violence and disorders of the system rendered it necessary both for the lords to seek followers and for the weak to seek a protecting allegiance; and this operated on the one hand to lead the vassals to divide again among their immediate retainers the lands which they had received from the paramount lord, upon similar terms, and by this subinfeudation the number of fiefs was largely increased, and the same circumstances operated on the other hand to absorb the allodial estates by inducing allodial proprietors to surrender their lands to some neighboring chieftain and receive them again from him under feudal tenure. Every one who held lands upon a feudal tenure was bound, when called upon by his benefactor or immediate lord, to furnish him, and such lord was, in turn, subordinate to his superior, and bound to defend him, and so on upwards to the paramount lord or king, who in theory of the law was the ultimate owner of all the lands of the realm. The services which the vassals were bound to render to their lords were of a military nature; but many other benefits were required, such as the power of the lord or the good will of the tenant would sanction.

This system came to its height upon the continent in the empire of Charlemagne and his successors. It was completely established in England in the time of William the Conqueror, and William Rufus, his son; and the system thus established may be said to be the foundation of the English law of real property and the position of the landed aristocracy, and of the civil constitution of the realm. And when we reflect that in the middle ages real property had a relative importance upon beyond that of movable property, it is not surprising that the system should have left its traces for a long time upon the law of personal relations and personal property. The feudal tenures were originally temporary, the term of the lord, or from year to year; afterwards they came more commonly to be held for the life of the vassal; and gradually they acquired an inheritable quality, the lord recognizing the heir of the vassal as the vassal's successor in his service.

The chief incidents of the tenure by military service were—aids,—a pecuniary tribute required by the lord in an emergency, e. g. a ransom for his person if taken prisoner, or money to make his son a knight or to marry his daughter. Relief,—the consideration which the lord demanded upon the death of a vassal for the vassal's heir to succeed to the possession; and connected with this may be mentioned primer seisin, which was the compensation that the lord demanded for having entered upon the land and protected the possession until the heir appeared to claim it. Forfeiture,—a condition exacted by the lord for giving his consent that the vassal should transfer the estate to another, who should stand in his place in respect to the services owed. Escheat,—Where on the death of the vassal there was no heir, the land reverted to the lord; also, where the vassal was guilty of treason; for the guilt of the vassal was deemed to taint the blood, and the lord would no longer recognize him or his heirs. Wardship and Marriage,—Where the heir was a minor, the lord, as a condition of permitting the estate to descend to one who could not render military service, assumed the guardianship of the heir, and, as such, exercised custody both of his person and of the property, without accounting for the profits, until the heir, if a male, was twenty-one and could undertake the military service. If female, until she was of a marriageable age, when on her marriage her husband might render the services. The lord claimed, in virtue of his guardianship, to make a suitable match for his ward, and if wards refused to comply they were mulcted in damages.

Feudal tenures were abolished in England by the statute 12 Car. II. c. 24; but the principles of the system still remain at the foundation of the English and American law of real property. Although in many of the states of the United States all lands are held to be allodial, it is the theory of the law that the ultimate right of property is in the state; and in most of the states escheat is regulated by statute. "The principles of the feudal system are so interwoven with every part of our jurisprudence," says Ch. J. Tully, "that to attempt to eradicate them would be to destroy the whole." 3 S. R. 447; 9 id. 888. "Though our property is allodial," says Ch. J. Gibson, "yet feudal tenures may be said to exist among us in their consequences and the qualities which they originally imparted to estates; as, for instance, in precluding every limitation founded on an abeyance of the fee." 3 Watts 71; 1 Whart. 327; 7 S. R. 188; 13 Pa. 85.

Many of these incidents are rapidly disappearing, however, by legislative changes of the law. The principles of the feudal law will be found in Littleton's Ten., Wright's Tenures; 2 Bla. Com. c. 3; Dalrymple's Hist. of Feudal Property; Sullivan's Lectures; Book of Feuds; Spelman's Treatise of Feuds and Tenures; Cruise's Digest; Le Grand Coutumier; the Baile Laws; the Capitularies; Les Etablissements de St. Louis; Assise de Jerusalem; Pothier, des Fiefs; Merlin, *Rep. The principal original collection of the feudal law of continental Europe is a digest compiled at Milan in the twelfth century, Feudorum Consuetudines, which is the foundation of many of the subsequent compilations. A Latin manuscript will perhaps find no more convenient source of information than Blackstone's Commentaries, Sharswood's ed., vol. 2, 3, and Greenleaf's Cruise, Dig. Intro.

FEUDARY. A tenant who holds by feudal tenure. Held by feudal service. Relating to feuds or feudal tenures. See FEODARY.

FEUDATARY. See FEODATARY.

FEUDOTE. A recompense for engaging in a feud, and the damages consequent, it having been the custom in ancient times for all the kindred to engage in their kinsman's quarrel. Jac. L. Dict.

FEUDE, or DEADLY FEUD. A German word, signifying implacable hatred, not to be satisfied but with the death of the enemy. Such was that among the people in Scotland and in the northern part of England, which was a combination of all the kindred to revenge the death of any of the blood upon the slayer and all his race. Termes de la Ley.

FEUDIST. A writer on feuds, as Cujacius. Spel. Gloss.

FEUDORUM LIBEL. The Books of Feuds published during the reign of Henry III., about the year 1152. The particular customs of Lombardy as to feuds began about that time to be the standard of authority to other nations, by reason of the greater refinement with which that branch of learning had been there cultivated. This compilation was probably known in England, but does not appear to have had any other effect than to influence English lawyers to the more critical study of their own tenures, and to induce them to extend the learning of real property so as to embrace more curious matter of similar kind. "Thus, tenures in England continued a peculiar species of feuds, partaking of certain qualities in common with others; but when once established here, growing up with a strength and figure entirely their own. While most of the nations of Europe referred to the Books of Feuds as the grand code of law by which to correct and amend the imperfections in their own tenures, there is not in English law books any allusion that intimates the existence of such a body of constitutions." 2 Reeves, Hist. Eng. Law 55.

FEUDO. In Spanish Law. Feud or fee. White, New Recop. b. 2, tit. 2, c. 2.

FEUDUM. A feud, fief, or fee. A right of using and enjoying forever the lands of another, which the lord grants on condition that the tenant shall render fealty, military duty, and other services. Spelman, Gloss. It is not properly the land, but a right in the land. This form of the word is used by the feudal writers. The earlier English writers generally prefer the form feodum; but the meaning is the same.

Feudum antiquum. A fee descended from the tenant's ancestors. 2 Bla. Com. 212. One which has been possessed by the relations of the tenant for four generations. Spelman, Gloss.

Feudum apertum. A fee which the lord might enter upon and resume either through failure of issue of the tenant or any crime or legal cause on his part. Spelman, Gloss. 2 Bla. Com. 245.

Feudum francum. A free feud. One which was noble and free from tallage and other subsidies to which the plebeia feuda (vulgar feuds) were subject. Spelman, Gloss.

Feudum hauberticum. A fee held on the military service of appearing fully armed at the ban and arriere ban. Spelman, Gloss.

Feudum improprium. A derivative fee.

Feudum individuum. A fee which could descend to the eldest son alone. 2 Bla. Com. 215.

Feudum laicum. A lay fee.

Feudum ligum. A liege fee. One where the tenant owed fealty to his lord against all other persons. Spelman, Gloss.; 1 Bla. Com. 367.

Feudum maternum. A fee descending from the mother's side. 2 Bla. Com. 212.

Feudum militare. A knight's fee, held by knight service and esteemed the most honorable species of tenure. 2 Bla. Com. 62.

Feudum nobile. A fee for which the tenant did guard and owed fealty and homage. Spelman, Gloss.

Feudum novum. One which began with the person of the feudatory, and did not come to him by descent.

Feudum novum ut antiquum. A new fee held with the qualities and incidents of an ancient one. 2 Bla. Com. 212; Wms. R. P. 126.

Feudum paternum. A fee which the paternal ancestors had held for four generations. Calvinus, Lex.; Spelman, Gloss. One descendible to heirs on the paternal side only. 2 Bla. Com. 223. One which might be held by males only. Du Cange.

Feudum proprium. A genuine original feud or fee, of a military nature, in the hands of a military person. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 57.

Feudum talliatum. A restricted fee. One limited to descend to certain classes of heirs. 2 Bla. Com. 112, n.; 1 Washb. R. P. 66; Spelman, Gloss.

The distinction between feodum antiquum and feodum novum has had an important bearing upon the law of descent with respect to the admission of collaterals and the exclusion of ascendants. The theory of Blackstone, which is characterized by both Christian and Pollock & Maitland as "ingenious," will be found fully stated in 2 Com. 271, while for the latest criticism of it and other theories on the subject, see 3 Poll. & Maitl. 325.

An old Norman term used to denote a stretch of land, and rarely a tenure or mass of rights. Maitl. Domes. Bk. & Beyond, 152. See FEUM.

FEUM. An older form of feudum (q. v.). Maitl. Domesday Book and Beyond 152.

FEW. An indefinite expression for a small or limited number. In cases where exact description is required, the use of the word will not answer; 63 Vt. 60; 2 Car. & P. 300; Black, L. Dict.

FLANCER. To pledge one's faith. Kelham.

FIANZA (Span.). Surety. The contract by which one person engages to pay the debt or fulfil the obligations of another if the latter should fail to do so.

FIAR. In Scotch Law. One whose property is charged with a life-rent. Where a right is taken to a husband and wife in conjunct fee and life-rent, the husband, as the persona dignior, is the only fiar. Ersk.

Prin. 421.

FIARS PRICES. The value of grain in the different counties of Scotland, fixed yearly by the respective sheriffs, in the month of February, with the assistance of juries. These regulate the prices of grain stipulated to be sold at the fiar's prices, or when no price has been stipulated. Ersk. 1. 4. 6.

FIAT. An order of a judge or of an officer whose authority, to be signified by his signature, is necessary to authenticate the particular acts. A short order or warrant of the judge, commanding that something shall be done. See 1 Tidd, Pr. 100, 108. See JOINT FIAT.

FIAT IN BANKRUPTCY. An order of the lord chancellor that a commission of bankruptcy shall issue. 1 Deac. Bank. 108. Fiats are abolished by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 116.

FIAUNT. An order; command. See FIAT.

FICTIO. The legal assumption that something which is or may be false is true.

The expedient of fictions is sometimes resorted to in law for the furtherance of justice. The law-making power has no need to resort to fictions: it may establish its rules with simple reference to the truth; but the courts, which are confined to the administration of existing rules, and which lack the power to change those rules, even in hard cases, have frequently resorted to the device that the application to the actual facts might cause, by assuming, in behalf of justice, that the actual facts are different from what they really are. Thus, in English law, where the administration of criminal justice is by prosecution at suit of the crown, the courts, rather than disregard the rules under which all other parties stand in respect to their neglect to appear and prosecute their suits, adopt the fiction that the king is legally ubiquitous and always in court, so that he can never be non-suited. The employment of fictions is a singular illustration of the justice of the common law, which did not hesitate to conceal or affect to conceal the fact, that a rule of law has undergone alteration, its letter remaining unchanged.

Fictio in the old Roman law was properly a term of pleading, and signified a false averment on the part of the plaintiff which the defendant was not allowed to traverse; as that the plaintiff was a Roman citizen, when in truth he was a foreigner. The object of the fiction was to give the court jurisdiction; Maine, l. c. 25.

Fictions are to be distinguished on the one hand from presumptions of law, and on the other hand from estoppels. A presumption is a rule of law prescribed for the purpose of getting at a certain conclusion, though arbitrary; if the subject is intrinsically liable to doubt from the remoteness, discrepancy, or actual defect of proofs.

Thus, an infant under the age of seven years is conclusively presumed to be without discretion. Proof that he had discretion the court will not listen to. In the nature of the subject, there must be a limit, which it is better should be a general though arbitrary one than be fluctuating and uncertain in each case. An estoppel, on the other hand, is the rule by which a person is precluded from asserting a fact by previous conduct inconsistent therewith on his own part or the part of those under whom he claims, or by an adjudication upon his rights which he cannot be allowed to question.

This distinction is thus expressed by a Scotch writer:—"A fictio juris differs from a presumption. Things are presumed which are likely to be true; but a fiction of law assumes for truth what is neither false, or at least is as probably false as true. Thus, an heir is feigned or considered in law as the same person with his ancestor; thus, also, writings against which certification is obtained in a reduction-improbation are judged to be false, fictio juris, though the most convincing proof shall be brought that they once existed and were genuine. Fictions of law must in all their effects be always limited to the special purpose of equity for which they were introduced. Ersk. Prin. 431.

The familiar fictions of the law and of the earlier common law were very numerous; but the more useful of them have either been superseded by authorized changes in the law or have gradually grown as it were into distinct principles, forming exceptions or modifications of those principles to evade which they were at first contrived. There is no just reason for resorting to indirection to do that which might be done directly, fictions are rapidly disappearing before the increasing harmony of our jurisprudence. See 4 Ben. 800; 3 Pothier, Obl., Evans' ed. 43. But they have doubtless been of great utility in conducting to the gradual amelioration of the law; and, in this view, action, equity, and legislation have been named together as the three instrumentalities in the improvement of the law. They have been employed historically in the order here given. Sometimes two of them will be seen operating together, and there are legal systems which have escaped the influence of one or the other of them. But there is no law in which the order of their appearance has been changed or inverted. Maine, Anc. Law 54.

Theoretical writers have classified fictions as of five sorts: abeyance, when the fee of land is supposed to exist for a time without any particular owner during an outstanding freehold estate; 2 Bla. Com. 107; 1 Cruise, Dig. 67; 1 Com. Dig. 175; 1 Viner, Abr. 104; the doctrine of remitter, by which a party who has been disseised of his freehold, and afterwards acquires a defective title, is remitted to his former good title; that one thing done to-day is considered as done at a preceding time by the doctrine of relation; that, because one thing is proved, another shall be presumed to be true, which is the case in all presumptions; that the heir, executor, or administrator stand by representation in place of the deceased. Again, they have been classified as of three kinds: positive, when a fact which does not exist is assumed; negative, when a fact which does exist is ignored; and fictions by relation, when the act of one person is taken as if it were the act of a different person,—e. g., that of a servant as the act of his master; when an act at one time or place is treated as if performed at a different time or place; and when an act in relation to a certain thing is treated as if it were done in relation to another thing which the former represents,—e. g., where delivery of a portion of goods sold is treated as giving possession of the whole; Best, Pres. 27.

Fictions being resorted to simply for the furtherance of justice; Co. Litt. 150; 10 Co. 43; 1 Cowp. 177; several maxims are fundamental to them. First, that that which is impossible shall not be feigned; D'Aguesseau, Œuvres, tome iv. pp. 427, 447 c, Plaidoyer; 2 Rolle 509. Second, that no fiction shall be allowed to work an injury; 8 Bla. Com. 43; 17 Johns. 348. Third, a fiction is not to be carried further than the reasons which introduced it necessarily require; 1 Lilly, Abr. 610; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 320; Best, Pres. § 20.

Consult Dalloz, Dict.; Burg. Ins. 130; Ferguson, Moral Phil. pt. 5, c. 10, § 8; 1 Toullier 171, n. 203; 2 id. 217, n. 208; 11 id. 10, n. 2; Maine, Anc. Law; Benth. Jud. Ev.; 1 Poll. & Mail. 469.

FICTIO OF LAW. A legal assumption that a thing is true, which is either not true, or which is as probably false as true.

FICTITIOUS ACTION. A suit brought on pretence of a controversy when no such controversy in truth exists. Such actions have usually been brought on a pretended wager, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on a point of law. Courts of justice were constituted for the purpose of deciding really existing questions of right between parties; and they are not bound to answer impertinent questions which persons think proper to ask them in the form of an action on a wager; 12 East 248. Such an attempt has been held to be a contempt of court; and Lord Hardwicke in such a case committed the parties and their attorneys; Rep. t. Hardw. 237. See, also, Comb. 425; 1 Co. 63; 6 Cra. 147; FEIGNED ACTIONS.

FICTITIOUS PARTY. Where a suit is brought in the name of one who is not in being, or of one who is ignorant of the suit and has not authorized it, it is said to be brought in the name of a fictitious plaintiff. To bring such a suit is deemed a contempt of court; 4 Bla. Com. 183.

FICTITIOUS PAYEE. When a contract, such as negotiable paper, is drawn in favor of a fictitious person, and has been indorsed in such name, it is deemed payable to bearer as against all parties who are privy to the transaction; and a holder in good faith may recover on it against them; Pars. Bills & N. 691, n.; 2 E. Bl. 178, 288; 19 Ves. 311; 30 Miss. 122; 54 Ill. 239; 11 Barn. 249; 2 Yeates 480. And see 10 E. & C. 468; 2 Sandf. 88; 2 Duer 121; 104 Mass. 336; 2 Neb. 29.

The maker of such a note, by negotiating it, transfers title to it without indorsement, and it is presumed that the note came into the possession of the holders with the names of all the indorsers on it, and prima facie he is created as a holder for value; 5 N. Y. Supp. 753; 6 Bosw. 202; 8 Hill 112; provided that the acceptor or indorser be ignorant of the fact that the payee is fictitious; 21 Ohio St. 483; 1 Camp. 180; and to entitle the holder of such a note to a recovery it must appear affirmatively that he was ignorant of the fact that the payee was a fictitious person; 4 E. D. Sm. 88. It was said by Lord Ellenborough that as between the original parties who put it into circulation with a knowledge of the fiction, it might be held void as an inoperative instrument, but if money from the holder actually gets into the hands of the acceptor it may be recovered back as money had and received; 1 Camp. 180; id. addenda. 180 b, 9. See also Peak. Add. Cas. 146; Sto. Prom. Notes 30. In the hands of a bona fide holder the note or bill is good against the maker; 79 N. Y. 536; 22 Ia. 404; 11 Ind. 103; 40 N. H. 21.

A bona fide holder for a valuable consideration of a bill drawn payable to a fictitious person and indorsed in that name by the drawer may recover the amount of it in an action against the acceptor for money paid or money had and received upon the idea that there was an appropriation of so much money to be paid to the person who should become the holder of the bill; 3 Term 174; and the mere fact of the acceptance of such a bill is evidence that the value has been received for it; id. 182; in this case three judges thought that the bill was to be considered as payable to bearer, and in the leading case of Minet v. Gibson that view was taken and it was held that a recovery from the acceptor may be had upon a count upon a bill payable to bearer, where such acceptor is aware that the payee is a fictitious person; 3 Term 481. This judgment was affirmed by the House of Lords, though with a dissent by Eyre, C. B., and Heath, J., judges, with whom Lord Thurlow coincided; 1 H. Bl. 569; s. c. 6 Bro. P. C. 235. The case has been termed "anomalous" by a text writer who quotes the dissenting opinion of Eyre, C. B., as one "whose reasoning, it is conceived, has never been refuted;" 2 Ames, Bills & Notes 864. But the same writer admits that "the doctrine of the case has been generally adopted;" id. In an action on such a bill, to show that the acceptor is aware that the payee is a fictitious person, evidence is admissible to show the circumstances under which he had received other bills payable to fictitious persons; 2 H. Bl. 187, 288. See also 18 C. B. n. s. 694; L. R. 1 C. P. 463.

When a note is made payable to the name of some person not having any interest, and not intended to become a party to the transaction, whether a person of such a name is or is not known to exist, the payee may be deemed fictitious; 2 N. H. 446.

A note payable to a company or firm having no existence legal or de facto, has been held to be such a note; 11 Ind. 101; 40 N. H. 21; 4 E. D. Smith 83. See 6 Wend. 627; Byles, Bills, Wood's ed. 388.

FICTITIOUS PERSON. A person having no real existence. A patent to a fictitious person is in legal effect no more than a declaration that the Government thereby conveys the property to no one, and in such a case the doctrine that a subsequent bona fide purchaser is protected does not apply. 199 U. S. 63.

FICTITIOUS STOCK. See Stock.

FIDE-JUBERE. In Civil Law. To become fide-jussor; to pledge one's self; to act as surety for another. Among the words designated as words of obligation or forms of stipulation. Fide-jubes? do you make yourself fide-jussor? Fide-jubeo, I do make myself fide-jussor. Inst. 3. 15. 1.

FIDE-JUSSIO. An act by which any one binds himself as an additional security for another. This giving security does not destroy the liability of the principal, but adds to the security of the surety. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Halifax, Annals, b. 2, c. 16, n. 10.

FIDE-JUSSOR. In Civil Law. One who becomes security for the debt of another, promising to pay it in case the principal does not do so. 3 Bla. Com. 108, 291.

He differs from a co-obligor in this, that the latter is equally bound to a debtor with his principal, while the former is not liable till the principal has failed to fulfil his engagement; Dig. 12. 4. 4; 16. 1. 13; 24. 8. 64; 88. 1. 87; 50. 17. 110; 6. 14. 50; Hall, Pr. 63; Pund. Adm. Pr. 300; Clerks, Prax. tit. 63.

The obligation of the fide-jussor was an accessory contract; for, if the principal obligation was not previously contracted, his engagement then took the name of mandate. Lec. Elém. § 872; Code Nap. 2012.

FIDE-PROMISSOR. See FIDE-JUSSOR.

FIDEI - COMMISSARIUS (L. Lat.). In Civil Law. One who has a beneficial interest in an estate which, for a time, is committed to the faith or trust of another. This term has nearly the same meaning as cestui que trust has in the common law. 1 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 295; Story, Eq. Jur. § 966.

Fidei-commissary and fide-commissary, Anglicized forms of this term, have been proposed to take place of the phrase cestui que trust, but do not seem to have met with any favor.

According to Du Cange, the term was sometimes used to denote the executor of a will.

FIDEI-COMMISSUM (L. Lat.). In Civil Law. A trust. A devise was made to some person (hæres fiduciarius), and a request annexed that he should give the property to some one who was incapable of taking directly under the will. Inst. 2. 23. 1; 1 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 295; 15 How. 807, 407, 409. A gift which a man makes to another through the agency of a third person, who is requested to perform the will of the giver. The Louisiana civil code prohibits fidei-commissa; 3 La. Ann. 482; thus abolishing express trusts, but not affecting implied trusts; 2 How. 619.

The rights of the beneficiary were merely rights in curtesy, to be obtained by entreaty or request. Under Augustus, however, a system was commenced, which was completed by Justinian, for enforcing such trusts. The trustee or executor was called hæres fiduciarius, and sometimes fide-jussor. The beneficial heir was called hæres fidei-commissarius.

The uses of the common law are said to have been borrowed from the Roman fidei-commissa; 1 Greenl. Cruise 295; Bacon, Read. 19; see Bishp. Eq. 50; 1 Madd. 446; Story, Eq. Jur. § 966. The fidei-commissa are supposed to have been the origin of the common-law system of entails; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 21; 1 Washb. R. P. 60. This has been doubted by others. See SUBSTITUTION.

FIDELIS. Faithful; trustworthy.

FIDELITAS. Fealty; fidelity.

FIDEM MENTIRI. When a tenant does not keep that fealty which he has sworn to the lord. Leg. Hen. I. c. 53.

FIDES. Faith; honesty; confidence. See GOOD FAITH.

FIDUCIA (Lat.). In Civil Law. A contract by which we sell a thing to some one—that is, transmit to him the property of the thing, with the solemn forms of emancipation—on condition that he will sell it back to us. This species of contract took place in the emancipation of children, in testaments, and in pledges. Pothier, Pand.

FIDUCIARIUS TUTOR. See PUPIL; TUTOR.

FIDUCIARY. This term is borrowed from the civil law. The Roman laws called a fiduciary heir the person who was instituted heir, and who was charged to deliver the succession to a person designated by the testament. Merlin, Repert. But Pothier, Pand. vol. 23, says that fiduciarius hæres properly signifies the person to whom a testator has sold his inheritance under the condition that he should sell it to another. Fiduciary may be defined in trust, in confidence.

The law forbids one standing in such a position making any profit at the expense of the party whose interests he is bound to protect, without full disclosure; Bishp. Eq. § 238; 10 H. L. Cas. 26, 81, 45. What constitutes a fiduciary relation is often a subject of controversy. It has been held to apply to all persons who occupy a position of peculiar confidence towards others, such as a trustee, executor, or administrator, director of a corporation or society; 52 Barb. 581; 78 Pa. 302; agent; 1 Johns. Ch. 550; medical or religious adviser; 24 Pa. 232; article in 10 Jur. N. S. 91; husband and wife; 86 Pa. 512; or a son; 13 Ch. Div. 338. See L. R. 3 Eq. 461; Hill, Trustees 547. Many cases have arisen in New York under the laws allowing arrest for debts incurred in a fiduciary capacity. The term seems to refer rather to the good faith than the ability of the party; 8 How. Pr. 298. See 4 Sandf. 707; 6 How. Pr. 86; 2 Abb. Pr. 444; 24 How. Pr. 274; 5 Rob. (N. Y.) 502. Under the bankrupt laws of 1841, and March 2, 1867, § 33, providing that debts contracted in a fiduciary capacity should not be barred by a discharge, the following cases fall within the act; an agent who appropriates money put into his hands for a specific purpose of investment; 1 Edm. 206; collector of city taxes who retains money officially collected; 7 Metc. 152; one who receives a note or other security for collection; 5 Denio 269; commission merchant; 54 Ga. 125; and it does not alter the rule that the debt has been reduced to judgment before the discharge; 53 Iowa 158. This exception from the operation of a discharge in bankruptcy relates to technical trusts, not merely such as the law implies from the contract, but those actually and expressly constituted; 87 N. Y. 307; 129 id. 23. In the following cases the debt has been held not a fiduciary one; a factor who retains the money of his principal; 2 How. 202, 208; 2 La. Ann. 1023; 104 Mass. 245; an agent under an agreement to account and pay over monthly; 5 Biss. 324; one with whom a general deposit of money is made; 72 N. C. 403; a debt created by a person acting as an attorney in fact; 127 Mass. 41. See, also, 82 N. C. 395; 57 Miss. 598; 90 Ill. 371; 31 La. An. 809; 46 Cal. 547.

FIDUCIARY CONTRACT. An agreement by which a person delivers a thing to another on the condition that he will restore it to him. The following formula was employed: Ut inter bonos agere oportet, ne propter te fidemque tuam fraudas. Cicero, de Offic. lib. 3, cap. 13; Lec. du Dr. Civ. Rom. § 237. See 2 How. 202; 6 W. & S. 13; 7 Watts 415.

FIEF. A fee, feud, or feud.

FIEF D'HAUBERK. A fee held on the military tenure of appearing fully armed on the ban and arrière-ban. Feudum hauberticum. Spelman, Gloss.; Calvinus, Lex.; Du Cange. A knight's fee. 2 Bla. Com. 62.

FIEF TENANT. The holder of a fief or fee.

FIEL. In Spanish Law. An officer who keeps possession of a thing deposited under authority of law. Las Partidas, pt. 3, tit. 9, l. 1.

FIELD. A cultivated tract of land. 81 N. C. 585; 97 Mass. 412; but not a one-acre lot used for cultivating vegetables; 7 Heisk. 510.

FIELDAD. In Spanish Law. Sequestration. This is allowed in six cases by the Spanish law where the title to property is in dispute. Las Partidas, pt. 3, tit. 8, l. 1.

FIELD-ALE, or FIEKDALE. The drinking of ale by bailiffs and other officers in the field, at the expense of the hundred; an old English custom long since prohibited. Toml.

FIERDING COURTS. Ancient Gothic courts "in the lowest instance;" so called because four were instituted within every superior district or hundred. Their jurisdiction was limited within forty shillings, or three marks; 3 Steph. Com. 393; 3 Bla. Com. 84; Stiernhook, De Jure Goth. i. 1, c. 2.

FIERI FACIAS (Lat. that you cause to be made). In Practice. A writ directing the sheriff to cause to be made of the goods and chattels of the judgment-debtor the sum or debt recovered.

It receives its name from the Latin words in the writ, used when legal proceedings were conducted in Latin (quod fieri facias de bonis et catallis, that you cause to be made of the goods and chattels). It is the form of execution in common use where the judgment-debtor has personal property.

The foundation of this writ is a judgment for debt or damages; and the party who has recovered such a judgment is generally entitled to it, unless he is delayed by the stay of execution which the law allows in certain cases after the rendition of the judgment, or by proceedings in error.

The execution, being founded on the judgment, must, of course, follow and be warranted by it; 2 Saund. 73 h, k; Bingham, Judg. 186; 2 Cow. 454. Hence, where there is more than one plaintiff or defendant, it must be in the name of all the plaintiffs against all the defendants; 6 Term 525. It is either for the plaintiff or the defendant. When it is against an executor or administrator for a liability of the testator or intestate, it is conformable to the judgment, and must be only against the goods of the deceased, unless the defendant has made himself personally liable by his false pleading, in which case the judgment is de bonis testatoris ei, et si non, de bonis propriis; 1 S. & R. 453; 4 id. 394; 18 Johns. 502; 1 Hayw. 598; 2 id. 112.

At common law, the writ bound the goods of the defendant or party against whom it was issued, from the teste day; by which it was understood that the writ bound the property against the party himself, and all claiming by assignment from or by representation under him; 4 East 538; so that a sale by the defendant of his goods to a bono fide purchaser did not protect them from a feri facias tested before, although not issued or delivered to the sheriff till after the sale; Cro. Eliz. 174; Cro. Jac. 451; 1 Sid. 271; but by the statute of frauds, 29 Car. II. c. 3, § 16, it was enacted "that no writ of feri facias, or other writ of execution, shall bind the property of the goods of the party against whom such writ of execution issued forth, but from the time that such writ shall be delivered to the sheriff," etc., who must "indorse upon the back thereof the day of the month and year whereon he or they received the same;" and the same or similar provisions have been enacted in most of the states; 2 S. & R. 157; 1 Whart. 377; 8 Johns. 440; 3 Harr. Del. 512; 32 Mo. 387; 14 Wis. 202. The property in the goods is not altered, but remains in the defendant until the actual execution of the writ; Wats. Sher. 176.

The execution of the writ is made by levying upon the goods and chattels of the defendant or party against whom it is issued; and, in general, seizing a part of the goods in the name of the whole on the premises is a good seizure of the whole; 1 Ld. Raym. 725; 4 Wash. C. C. 29; 1 Munt. 269; 2 Hill, N. Y. 606; 5 Ired. 192; 7 Ala. N. S. 619. But see 1 Whart. 377; 6 Halst. 218. It may be executed at any time before and on the return-day; 18 Tex. 507; but not on Sunday, where it is forbidden by statute (20 Car. II. c. 7, which has been substantially followed in the United States); Watson, Sher. 173; 5 Co. 92; Comyns, Dig. Execution, C. 5. After the death of the plaintiff, the sheriff may execute a f. fa. tested in his lifetime, and under it seize his goods in the hands of his executor or administrator; Wats. Sher. 173.

The sheriff cannot break the outer door of a house for the purpose of executing a feri facias; 5 Co. 92; nor unlash an outer door; 4 Hill, N. Y. 437; nor can a window be broken for this purpose; W. Jones 429. He may, however, enter the house, if it be open, and, being once lawfully entered, he may break open an inner door or chest to seize the goods of the defendant, even without any request to open them; 4 Taunt.

619; 3 R. & P. 228; Cowp. 1; Troub. & H. Pr. 1116. Although the sheriff is authorized to enter the house of the party to search for goods, he cannot enter that of a stranger for that purpose, without being guilty of a trespass, unless the defendant's goods are actually in the house; Comyns, Dig. Execution (C 5). The sheriff may break the outer door of a barn; 1 Sid. 186; 1 Keb. 639; or of a store disconnected with the dwelling-house and forming no part of the curtilage; 16 Johns. 287. See 1 Sm. L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 228, with note on the subject; BREAK'ING.

At common law a fi. fa. did not authorize a sheriff to seize bank-bills, checks, or promissory notes; but it is otherwise now, by stat. 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, § 12, and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82; and this is now the law of many of the United States; 3 Va. Cas. 246; 1 Bail. 39; Hempst. 91; 4 N. H. 138; 29 Pa. 240. So money may be taken; 1 Bail. 39; 1 Cra. 117; 13 Johns. 220. The writ applies generally to goods and chattels, but the common-law rules as to what may be taken are very much extended; see as to the different species of property in England; Watson, Sheriff ch. x. sec. ii., and as to what interest may be taken; id. sec. iii.; as to railway property; 24 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 5; copyright and patent; 40 Am. Rep. 123; growing crops; 31 Am. L. Reg. 602; seat in the stock exchange; 28 Cent. L. J. 444; board of trade shares; 22 Am. L. Reg. 438; 3 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 171; 4 id. 65; property in custodia legis; 28 Am. Rep. 35; interest of heirs; 44 Am. Dec. 335; trust funds; 7 Cent. L. J. 483; equitable interest; 9 Can. L. T. 125, 145; 17 Can. L. J. 54; pension money; 21 Ir. L. T. 47. For the form of the writ, see 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. App. xxvii.; as to proceeding in equity in aid of executions at law, see CREDITORS' BILL. See, generally, Murfree, Freeman, Executions ch. X; Watson, Sheriff; EXECUTION; LEVY; SHERIFF.

FIERI FECI (L. Lat.). In Practice. The return which the sheriff or other proper officer makes to certain writs, signifying, "I have caused to be made."

When the officer has made this return, a rule may be obtained upon him after the return-day, to pay the money into court, and, if he withholds payment, an action of debt may be had on the return, or assumption for money had and received may be sustained against him; 3 Johns. 183.

FIFTEENTHS. An aid; aid granted from time to time to the crown by parliament, consisting of a fifteenth part of the personal property in every township, borough, and city in the kingdom. In the eighth year of Edward III. the valuation of the kingdom was fixed and a record made in the exchequer of the amount (twenty-nine thousand pounds). This valuation was not increased as the property in the kingdom increased in value; whence the name came in time to be a great misnomer. Co. 2d Inst. 77; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 604; 3 Bla. Com. 609; Cowel.

FIFTY DECISIONS, THE. In the process of the making of the Digest or Pandects under the authority of Justinian, all moot points in the law which could be satisfactorily settled only by imperial authority were determined as the work progressed by a series of imperial ordinances of Justinian known as the "Fifty Decisions" (529-532). Taylor, Jurispr., 144.

FIGHT. Does not necessarily imply that both parties should give and take blows. It is sufficient that they voluntarily put their bodies in position with that intent. 73 N. C. 155; 40 Ga. 148. See PRIZE-FIGHT.

FIGHTWITE (Sax.). A mulct or fine for making a quarrel to the disturbance of the peace. Called also by Cowel fortis-factura pignora. The amount was one hundred and twenty shillings. Cowel.

FIGURES. Numerals. They are either Roman, made with letters of the alphabet; for example, MDCLXXVI; or they are Arabic, as follows: 1770.

Roman figures may be used in contracts and law proceedings, and they will be held valid; but Arabic figures, probably owing to the ease with which they may be counterfeited or altered, have been holden not to be sufficient to express the sum due on a contract; but it seems that if the amount payable and due on a promissory note be expressed in figures or oiphers, it will be valid. Story, Bills § 42, note; Story, Pr. Notes § 21.

Figures to express numbers are not allowable in indictments; but all numbers must be expressed in words at length, except in setting forth a copy of a written instrument. And complaints are governed by the same rule in cases over which magistrates have final jurisdiction. But the decisions on this point are not uniform. And in most of them the proper distinction between the use of figures in the caption and in the body of an indictment has not been observed. In America, perhaps the weight of authority is contrary to the law as above stated. But, at all events, a contrary practice is unclerical, uncertain, and liable to alteration; and the courts which have sustained such practice have uniformly cautioned against it. See 13 Viner, Abr. 310; 1 Chitty 819; 84 Conn. 280; 33 Me. 489.

Bills of exchange, promissory notes, checks, and agreements of every description are usually dated with Arabic figures; it is, however, better to date deeds and other formal instruments by writing the words at length. See 5 Toullier, n. 330; 4 Yeates 278; 3 Johns. 233; 2 Miss. 256; 6 Blackf. 533; 1 Vt. 330.

FILACER. An officer of the common pleas, king's bench, and exchequer, whose duty it was to file the writs on which he made process. There were fourteen of them; and it was their duty to make out all original process. Cowel; Blount. The office was abolished in 1837.

FILARE. In Old English Practice. To file. Townsh. Pl. 67.

FILE (Lat. Filum). A thread, string, or wire upon which writs and other exhibits in courts and offices are fastened or filed for the more safe-keeping and ready turning to the same. Spelman, Gloss.; Cowel; Tomlin, Law Dict. Papers put together and tied in bundles. A paper is said also to be filed when it is delivered to the proper officer, and by him received to be kept on file. 18 Viner, Abr. 211; 1 Littleton 113; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 7, 207. See where filed by a wife as agent; 120 Mass. 130.

The origin of the term indicates very clearly that the filing of a paper can only be effected by bringing it to the notice of the officer, who anciently put it upon the string or wire; 38 Ala. 248.

Filing a paper, in modern usage, consists in placing it in the custody of the proper official by the party charged with the duty, and the making of the proper indorsement by the officer. 2 S. Dak. 525. In the sense of a statute requiring the filing of a paper or document, it is filed when delivered to and received by the proper officer to be kept on file. The word carries with it the idea of permanent preservation of the thing so delivered and received; that it may become a part of the public record. It is not synonymous with deposited; 67 Hun 560.

The word "file" is derived from the Latin word filum, and relates to the ancient practice of placing papers on a thread or wire for safe keeping and ready reference. "Filing" is not complete until the document is delivered and received. "Shall file" means to deliver to the office and not send through the United States mails. 241 U. S. 76.

FILED AWAY. A recital in a divorce decree, that a part of the judgment for alimony was paid by defendant, and that the case was "filed away" was in effect, keeping control of the case to be redocketed upon notice. 135 Ky. 198, 122 S. W. 120.

FILEINJAD (Brit.). A name given to villains in the laws of Hoel Dda. Barring. Obs. St. 302.

FILIATE. To declare whose child a bastard is. 2 W. Bla. 1017.

FILIATION. In Civil Law. The descent of son or daughter, with regard to his or her father, mother, and their ancestors.

Nature always points out the mother by evident signs, and, whether married or not, she is always certain: mater semper certa est, etiam vulgo concepta. There is not the same certainty with regard to the father, and the relation may not know or may feign ignorance as to the paternity; the law has therefore established a legal presumption to serve as a foundation for paternity and filiation.

When the mother is or has been married, her husband is presumed to be the father of the children born during the coverture, or within a competent time afterwards, whether they were conceived during the coverture or not: pater is est quem nuptie demonstrant.

This rule is founded on two presumptions: one on the cohabitation before the birth of the child; and the other that the mother has faithfully observed the vow she made to her husband.

This presumption may, however, be rebutted by showing either that there has been no cohabitation, or some physical or other impossibility that the husband could be the father. See ACCESS; BASTARD; GESTATION; NATURAL CHILDREN; PATERNITY; PUTATIVE FATHER.

FILICETUM. In English Law. A ferny or brackly ground; a place where fern grows. Co. Litt. 4 b; Shep. Touch. 95.

FILIOLUS. Properly a little son; a god-son. Tomlin, Dugd. Warwicksh. 697. See also FILIOUS.

FILIUS (Lat.). A son. A child.

As distinguished from heir, filius is a term of nature, heres a term of law. 1 Powell, Dev. 811. In the civil law the term was used to denote a child generally. Calvinus, Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur. Its use in the phrase natus filius would seem to indicate a use in the sense of legitimate son, a bastard being the illegitimate son of nobody; though the word is usually rendered a son, whether legitimate or illegitimate. Vicat, Voc. Jur.

FILIUS FAMILIAS (Lat.). A son who is under the control and power of his father. Story, Conf. Laws § 61; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

FILIUS MULIERATUS (Lat.). The first legitimate son born to a woman who has had a bastard son by her husband before her marriage. Called, also, mulier, mulier putné. 2 Bla. Com. 248.

FILIUS NULLIUS (Lat. son of nobody). A bastard. Called, also, filius populi (son of the people). 1 Bla. Com. 459; 6 Co. 65 a.

FILIUS POPULI. A son of the people; a natural child.

FILL. To occupy the whole capacity or extent of, so as to leave no space vacant.

To possess and discharge the duties of an office. The election of a person to an office constitutes the essence of his appointment, but the office cannot be considered as actually filled until his acceptance, either expressed or implied; 2 N. H. 202.

In a subscription for shares in a corporation the word "fill" amounts to a promise to pay assessments; 10 Me. 478. As to the use of the word in connection with a doctor's prescription, see 61 Ga. 505; DRUGGIST.

FILLY. A young mare; a female colt. An indictment charging the theft of a "filly" is not sustained by proof of the larceny of a "mare;" 1 Tex. App. 448.

FILUM AQUÆ (Lat. a thread of water). This may mean either the middle line or the outer line. Altum filum denotes high-water mark. Blount. Filum is, however, used almost universally in connection with aquæ to denote the middle line of a stream. Medium filum is sometimes used with no additional meaning. The common-law rule was that conveyances of land bounded on streams, above tide water, extend usque ad filum aquæ. See RIVER; WATER-COURSE.

FILUM FORESTÆ (Lat.). The border of the forest. 2 Bla. Com. 419; 4 Inst. 303; Manw. Puritie.

FILUM VLÆ (Lat.). The middle line of a road; a term used to indicate the middle line or thread of a street or road. 2 Sm. L. Cas. 98. See 121 Mass. 18; 119 id. 231; 88 Pa. 453; 57 Mo. 582; 87 Ill. 348. Where a description of land gives a street or road as a boundary, it is presumed that the title passes ad medium filum vie; 33 Pa. 124. See BOUNDARY; HIGHWAY; STREET.

FIN. End, limit, period of limitation. (Fr.) End; extremity; termination; expiration. Also, end in the sense of aim, design, etc. Also, chief point, essential part. Wesely Fr. Dict.

FIN DE NON RECEVOIR. In French Law. An exception or plea founded on law, which without entering into the merits of the action shows that the plaintiff has no right to bring it, either because the time during which it ought to have been brought has elapsed, which is called prescription, or that there has been a compromise, accord, and satisfaction, or any other cause which has destroyed the right of action which once subsisted. Pothier, Proc. Civ. pt. 1, c. 2, s. 2, art. 2; Story, Conf. Laws § 580.

FINAL. Last; conclusive; pertaining to the end. In law it is usually employed in contrast with interlocutory (q. v.) with respect to pendency of suits.

FINAL IN THE ACTION. The language "the decision of the motion shall be final in the action" means final in the sense of ending the matter instead of final in the sense of being an appealable order. 143 Ky. 139, 136 S. W. 130.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT. See RISE.

FINAL COSTS. Such costs as are to be paid at the end of the suit; costs, the liability for which depends upon the final result of the litigation.

FINAL DECISION. One from which no appeal or writ of error can be taken. 47 Ill. 167; 6 El. & Bl. 408.

A decision from which there is no appeal. English.

The words in the Judicial Code, § 218, "final decisions in the district courts" mean the same thing as "final judgments and decrees" as used in former acts regulating appellate jurisdiction. 252 U. S. 36.

FINAL DECREE.

Whether a decree is final or interlocutory depends upon its essential purport and effect and not upon its characterization in pleadings. 258 U. S. 82. See DECREE.

FINAL DETERMINATION. See FINAL DISPOSITION.

FINAL DISPOSITION. Such a conclusive determination of the subject-matter embraced in a submission to arbitrators, that after the award is made nothing further remains to fix the rights and obligations of the parties, and no further controversy or litigation can arise thereon.

Such an award that the party against whom it is given may perform it without any further ascertainment of rights or obligation. See 50 Me. 401.

A disposition which leaves nothing further to be done. In an award a disposition that leaves no matter undetermined. English.

The "final disposition" of a suit means the final determination of the suit. In an act allowing the Court of Claims "at any time while any suit or claim is pending before or an appeal from the said court, or within two years next after the final disposition of any such suit or claim, on motion on behalf of the United States, to grant a new trial in any such suit or claim," "final disposition" means the final determination of the suit on appeal (if an appeal is taken), or if none is taken, then its final determination in the Court of Claims. The final determination of a suit is the end of litigation therein. 13 Wall. (U. S.) 669.

FINAL HEARING. The trial of an equity case upon the merits, as distinguished from the hearing of any preliminary questions arising in the cause, which are termed interlocutory. 24 Wis. 171.

FINAL JUDGMENT. See JUDGMENT.

FINAL ORDER. A "final order" either determines the action itself, decides some matter litigated by parties, or operates to divest some right in such manner as to put it out of the power of the court making the order, after the expiration of the term, to place the parties in their original position. 18 B. Mon. (Ky.) 826; 141 Ky. 404, 132 S. W. 1024.

A "final order" is one that disposes of the merits of the cause; that settles the rights of the parties under the issues made by the pleadings. 115 Ky. 783, 74 S. W. 1091.

FINAL ORDER OR JUDGMENT. A "final order or judgment" either terminates the action itself, decides some matter litigated by the parties, or operates to divest some right in such manner as to put it out of the power of the court making the order, after the expiration of the term, to place the parties in their original position. 7 Bush (Ky.) 623.

A "final judgment or order" is such an order as at once puts an end to the action; it must not merely decide that one of the parties is entitled to relief of a final character, but it must give that relief by its own force, or be enforceable for that purpose, either without further action by the court, or by process of contempt. 145 Ky. 315, 140 S. W. 533.

FINAL PASSAGE. In Parliamentary Law. The vote on a passage of a bill or resolution in either house of the legislature after it has received the prescribed number of readings and has been subjected to such action as is required by the fundamental law governing the body or its own rule. See 54 Ala. 618.

The passage of a bill before a legislative body after all the preliminaries have been carried out. English.

The constitution of Alabama provided that no bill could become a law unless on its final passage it be read at length and the vote taken by yeas and nays. It was held that the final passage of a bill within this section was a vote on its passage in either house of the General Assembly after it had received three readings on three different days in that house. 13 A. & E. Eny. 2nd ed., 20; 54 Ala. 605.

FINAL PROCESS. Writs of execution. So called to distinguish them from mesne process, which includes all process issuing before judgment rendered. 8 Steph. Com. 489. See ORIGINAL PROCESS; MESNE PROCESS.

FINAL RECOVERY. The ultimate judgment of a court. 100 Mass. 91. It has also been construed as referring to the verdict, as distinguished from the judgment. 6 Allen 248.

FINAL SENTENCE. One which puts an end to a case. Distinguished from interlocutory. See SENTENCE.

FINAL SETTLEMENT. In Probate and Administration. The final account of an executor or administrator closing the business of the estate, with the order of the court thereon approving it and discharging the accountant. 18 N. E. Rep. ( ) 1181; 4 Wash. 682; 87 Ind. 114; 65 Ala. 442.

FINALIS CONCORDIA (Lat.). A decisive agreement. A fine. A final agreement.

A final agreement entered by the parties by permission of court in a suit actually brought for lands. Subsequently the bringing suit, entry of agreement, etc., became merely formal, but its entry upon record gave a firm title to the plaintiff; 1 Washb. R. P. 70; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 143; Tudor, Lead. Cas. 689.

Fine est amicitabilis compositio et finalis concordia ex consensu et concordia domini regis vel iudiciorum (a fine is an amicable settlement and decisive agreement by consent and agreement of our lord the king or his justices). Glanville, lib. 6, c. 1.

Talis concordia finalis dicitur eo quod finem imponit negotio, adeo ut neutra pars litigantium ab eo extero poterit recidere (such concord is called final because it puts an end to the business, so that neither of the litigants can afterwards recede from it). Glanville, lib. 9, c. 3; Cunningham, Law Dict.

FINANCES. The public revenue or resources of a government or state. The income or means of an individual or corporation. It is somewhat like the fiscus of the Romans. The word is generally used in the plural.

Money resources generally. The state of the finances of an individual or corporation, being his condition in a monetary point of view. The cash he has on hand, and that which he expects to receive, as compared with the engagements he has made to pay.

FINANCIER. One who manages the finances or public revenue. Persons skilled in matters appertaining to the judicious management of money affairs.

FIND. The word find or finding does not always imply the same thing in legal proceedings. Where a cause is tried by the court, the finding means the fact which the court considers the evidence establishes, but find, as used in a statute in respect to the truth of a complaint for the revocation of a license, implies that the board is satisfied from the evidence, and the conclusion may be informally expressed. 74 Wis. 267.

FINDER. One who lawfully comes to the possession of another's personal property, which was then lost.

The finder of lost property at common law had a valid claim to the same against all the world except the true owner; 1 Stra. 504; 62 Me. 275; 1 E. D. Sm. 393; 11 R. I. 588; 28 Gratt. 601; 16 Ore. 269; and money or property found on the premises of another has been held, in the case of a servant in a hotel, as against the proprietor, to belong to the finder; 90 Pa. 377; so a stranger who finds money in a shop may retain it as against the shop-owner; 21 L. J. Q. B. 75; unless it has been simply laid aside and left by mistake; 10 Allen (Mass.) 548; 1 Misc. Rep. (N. Y.) 22; or a conductor who finds money on the cars may retain it as against the company; 56 N. Y. 175; or an employe in a mill, who finds bank-notes among old papers bought to be manufactured over; 62 Ind. 281. Drift-logs found on the banks of a river may be rightfully retained by the finder as against the riparian owner; 86 Tenn. 14; but an aerolite which buries itself in the ground belongs rather to the owner of the soil on which it falls than to one who observes it and digs it out; 86 Ia. 71. In a very recent English case, where a workman employed by a corporation to clear out a pool on its land found two rings in the mud at the bottom of the pool, the corporation was held entitled to recover the rings in an action of detinue; [1896] 2 Q. B. 44. In that case Lord Russell of Killowen, C. J., put the decision on the ground that the possession of land carried with it everything attached to it, or under it, and he expressly distinguished the last English case above cited, which, he said, stood by itself on the special ground that the notes being dropped in the public part of the shop were never in the custody of the shopkeeper; accordingly he says: "It is somewhat strange that there is no more direct authority on the question; but the general principle seems to me to be that where a person has possession of house or land, with a manifest intention to exercise control over it and the things which may be upon or in it, then, if something is found on that land, whether by an employe of the owner or by a stranger, the presumption is that the possession of that thing is in the owner of the locus in quo."

A commentator upon these cases says: "This language applies to land with respect to which the public has no easement, which differentiates the case from findings in shops and other public places. The real distinction, however, is this, that those things belong to the owner of the premises in which they are found, which, either from their nature, or from the circumstances attending the loss, become practically part and parcel of the freehold, such as the rings, covered by the water and mud, which undoubtedly belonged to the owner of the land, and the aerolite which buried itself in the ground to the depth of three feet; or, to use the language of some of the cases, those things belong to the owner which may be regarded as accretions to his land, such as the aerolite, the rings, or drift-logs; though the latter may be pursued and taken by a former finder, from whom they have escaped." 36 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 588.

Where a man buys a chattel which unknown to himself and the vendor contains valuable property, he will, as to that, be considered merely as a finder. When a person purchased at a public auction a bureau, and appropriated to his own use a purse containing money, found in a secret drawer, the existence of which at the time of the sale was not known to any one, it was held that there was a delivery of the bureau but not of the purse and money, and it was a simple case of finding and subject to the law in such cases; 7 M. & W. 623. See Br. Leg. Max., 8th Am. ed. 807.

The finder is entitled to certain rights, and liable to duties which he is obliged to perform. This is a species of deposit, which, as it does not arise ex contractu, may be called a quasi deposit; and it is governed by the same general rules as common deposits. The finder is required to take the same reasonable care of the property found as any voluntary depositary ex contractu; Doctor & Stud. Dial. 2, c. 38; 2 Bulstr. 306, 312; 1 Rolle 125; 50 Vt. 688; 107 Mass. 251.

The finder is not bound to take the goods he finds; yet, when he does undertake the custody, he is required to exercise reasonable diligence in preserving the property; and he will be responsible for gross negligence. Some of the old authorities laid down that "if a man find butter, and by his negligent keeping it putrefy, or if a man find garments, and by his negligent keeping they be moth-eaten, no action lies." So it is if a man find goods and then lose them again. Bacon, Abr. Bailment, D; and in support of this position, Leon. 123, 223; Ow. 141; 2 Bulstr. 21, are cited. But these cases, if carefully examined, will not, perhaps, be found to decide the point as broadly as it is stated in Bacon. A finder would be held responsible for gross negligence, or fraud; Story, Bailm. § 85.

On the other hand, the finder of an article is entitled to recover all expenses which have necessarily occurred in preserving the thing found; Domat, l. 2, t. 9, s. 2, n. 2. But unlike salvors by water, he can claim nothing beyond this; 2 H. Bla. 254; 37 Conn. 96; 27 Ohio 435; Shoul. Bailm. 28.

And when the owner does not reclaim the goods lost, they belong to the finder; 1 Bla. Com. 296; 2 id. 9; 2 Kent 290; and should there be several finders, they share in common; 33 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 1055. The acquisition of treasure by the finder is evidently founded on the rule that what belongs to none naturally becomes the property of the first occupant; res nullius naturaliter fit primi occupantis. Money or goods that are lost are the only kind that can be said to be found. It is property that the owner has involuntarily parted with, and not property that he has intentionally concealed in the earth for safekeeping; 16 Ore. 269. Money left on a desk in a bank, provided for the use of the depositors, is not lost so as to entitle the finder to the same, as against the bank; 1 Misc. Rep. 22. It seems that the title of the owner to property lying at the bottom of the sea is not divested, however long it may remain there, and no other person can acquire such title except by condemnation and sale in admiralty; 38 Fed.

Rep. 503. One who finds property at sea is only a salvor. When a ship was almost becalmed in high seas a floating chest was found and with but little trouble taken on board. It contained 70 doubloons. It was held that the finders were not entitled to the whole property, though no claims or marks of ownership, but should be compensated by a moiety as for salvage services. The other moiety was directed to be paid into court; Fed. Cas. No. 6820.

As to the criminal responsibility of the finder, the result of the authorities is that if a man finds goods that have been actually lost, or are reasonably supposed by him to have been lost, and appropriates them, with intent to take the entire dominion over them, really believing when he takes them that the owner cannot be found, it is not larceny; but if he takes them with like intent, though lost or reasonably supposed to be lost, but reasonably believing that the owner can be found, it is larceny; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 335, 387; 2 id. 8; Clark, Cr. L. 255; 29 Ohio St. 184; s. c. 23 Am. Rep. 731; 11 Cox, C. C. 103, 227, 333; 2 C. & K. 841; 53 Ind. 343. If a finder attempts to retain lost property as against the owner, or converts it to his own use, when he knows the owner, he will be guilty of larceny; 1 Humph. 228; 2 Sneed 285. See as to this rule and its qualification Broom, Com., 4th ed. 955; Mart. & Yerg. 226. There must be a felonious intent; 116 Mass. 42; s. c. 17 Am. Rep. 138 and note. Though it is the duty of the finder to seek out the owner and restore the property with due diligence, yet the want of promptness on the part of the finder does not prove felonious intent in keeping the property; 22 Ill. App. 177. The question is, whether the finder, when he came into possession, believed the owner could be found; 2 Green, Cr. L. Rep. 85. In Regina v. Thurborn, Parke, B., observes that it cannot be doubted that if, at this day, the punishment of death was assigned to theft and usually carried into effect, the misappropriation of lost goods would never be held to constitute that offence. Whart. Cr. L. § 901. See TAKING.

See as to title by accession, accretion, and by finding, 35 Cent. Law J. 868.

FINDING. The result of the deliberations of a jury or a court. 1 Day 238; 2 id. 12; 16 Blatchf. 63.

If the court below neglect or refuse to make a finding one way or the other as to the existence of a material fact which has been established by uncontradicted evidence, or if it finds such a fact when not supported by any evidence whatever, and an exception be taken, the question may be brought up for review in that particular. Both of these are questions of law and proper subjects for review in an appellate court; 147 U. S. 72.

Where a case is tried by a court without a jury, its findings upon questions of fact are conclusive, in the United States supreme court; 121 U. S. 535; 120 id. 20. Error in the findings of fact by the court are not subject to revision if there is any evidence upon which such findings could be made; 184 U. S. 494.

FINE. In Conveyancing. An amicable composition or agreement of a suit, either actual or fictitious, by leave of the court, by which the lands in question become, or are acknowledged to be, the right of one of the parties. Co. Litt. 120; 2 Bla. Com. 349; Bacon, Abr. Fines and Recoveries. Fines were abolished in England by stat. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74. Their use was not unknown in the United States, but has been either expressly abolished or become obsolete. See 1 Steph. Com. 514.

A fine is so called because it puts an end not only to the suit thus commenced, but also to all other suits and controversies concerning the same matter. Such concordas, says Doddridge (Eng. Lawyer 84), have been in use in the civil law, and are called transactio, whereof they say thus: Transactio est de eis que in controversia sunt, a lite futura aut pendente ad certam compositionem reducuntur, dando aliquid vel accipiendo. Or shorter, thus: Transactio est de re dubia et lite accipiente ne dum ad finem ducta, non gravita pactio. It is commonly defined an assurance by matter of record, and is founded upon a supposed previously existing right, and upon a writ requiring the party to perform his covenant; although a fine may be levied upon any writ by which lands may be demanded, charged, or bound. It has also been defined an acknowledgment on record of a previous gift or feoffment, and prima facie carries a fee, although it may be limited to an estate for life or in fee-tail. Prest. Conv. 200, 202, 298, 299; 2 Bla. Com. 349.

The stat. 18 Edw. I., called modus levandi fines, declares and regulates the manner in which they should be levied and carried on; and that is as follows: The party to whom the land is conveyed or assured commences an action at law against the other, generally an action of covenant, by suing out a writ of præcipe, called a writ of covenant, that the one shall convey the lands to the other, on the breach of which agreement the action is brought. The suit being thus commenced, then follows the licentia concordandi, or leave to compromise the suit. The concord, or agreement itself, after leave obtained by the court; this is usually an acknowledgment from the deforciant that the lands in question are the lands of the complainant. The note of the fine, which is only an abstract of the writ of covenant and the concord, naming the parties, the parcels of land, and the agreement. The foot of the fine, or the conclusion of it, which includes the whole matter, reciting the parties, day, year, and place, and before whom it was acknowledged or levied. See Cruise, Fines; Bacon, Abr. Fines and Recoveries; Comyns, Dig. Fine.

In Corporation Law. A term applied to the charge made against a member of a building and loan association who fails to make his monthly payment when due. It has been lately held, that such fines are not by way of penalty, but are rather to be considered as liquidated damages, fixed by consent of the parties, for the loss sustained by the association by reason of the failure of the defaulting member to make prompt payment, and since such payments are essential to the success of the plan of the association, and for the interest of its members as a whole, the fines will be enforced, independently of statutory provisions, if reasonable in amount and equitable in their application; 36 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 1085. This case also holds that a fine of "ten cents per share, to be imposed for each and every month that payment is not made," is reasonable. It has also been held that where the by-law provides for a fine of twenty cents per month on each one hundred dollars borrowed, the fine for one month is not repeated and added to that of each succeeding month, but only twenty cents on each one hundred dollars can be imposed in any one month; and when the constitution of a building association prescribes the fines to be imposed on delinquent members, it thereby fixes the limit beyond which the association cannot go; but it may by by-law waive some part of the fines so authorized, and impose smaller ones, and in that case the by-law will govern; 25 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 587.

In Criminal Law. Pecuniary punishment imposed by a lawful tribunal upon a person convicted of crime or misdemeanor. See Shepp. Touchst. 2; Bacon, Abr. Fines and Amercements; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 940. It may include a forfeiture or penalty recoverable in a civil action; 11 Gray 373; 6 Neb. 37.

The amount of the fine is frequently left to the discretion of the court, who ought to proportion the fine to the offence. To prevent the abuse of excessive fines, the constitution of the United States directs that "excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted." Amendment to the Constitution, art. 8; Cooley, Const. Lim. 377.

This applies to national and not to state legislation; 5 Wall. 480; 7 Pet. 243. The supreme court cannot, on habeas corpus, revise the sentence of an inferior court on the ground that the fine was excessive; 7 Pet. 568. See INDENTURE OF A FINE; COGNITOR; COGNISSE; JOINT FINE.

FINE FOR ALIENATION. A sum of money which a tenant by knight's service, or a tenant in capite by socage tenure, paid to his lord for permission to alienate his right in the estate he held to another, and by that means to substitute a new tenant for himself. 2 Bla. Com. 71, 99; 6 N. Y. 467, 495. These fines are now abolished. In France, a similar demand from the tenant, made by the lord when the former alienated his estate, was called lods et vente. This imposition was abolished, with nearly every other feudal right, by the French revolution.

FINE CAPIENDO PRO TERRIS. An obsolete writ which lay for a person who, upon conviction by jury, had his lands and goods taken, and his body imprisoned, to be remitted his imprisonment, and have his lands and goods redelivered to him, on obtaining favor of a sum of money, etc. Reg. Orig. 142.

FINE SUB COGNIZANCE DE DROIT COME CEO QUE IL AD DE SON DONE. A fine upon acknowledgment of the right of the cognizee as that which he hath of the gift of the cognizor. By this the deforciant acknowledges in court a former feoffment or gift in possession to have been made by him to the plaintiff. 2 Bla. Com. 352; Cunningham, Law Dict.; Shepp. Touchst. c. 2; Comyns, Dig. Fine.

FINE SUB COGNIZANCE DE DROIT TANTUM. A fine upon acknowledgment of the right merely. Generally used to pass a reversionary interest which is in the cognizor. 2 Bla. Com. 351; Jacob, Law Dict.; Comyns, Dig.

FINE SUB CONCESSIT. A fine granted where the cognizor, in order to make an end of disputes, though he acknowledges no precedent right, yet grants to the consignee an estate de novo, usually for life or years, by way of a supposed composition. 2 Bla. Com. 353; Shepp. Touchst. c. 2.

FINE SUB DONE, GRANT ET RENDER. A double fine, comprehending the fine sur cognizance de droit come ceo and the fine sur concessit. It may be used to convey particular limitations of estates and to persons who are strangers or not named in the writ of covenant; whereas the fine sur cognizance de droit come ceo, etc., conveys nothing but an absolute estate, either of inheritance, or at least freehold. Salk. 340. In this last species of fines the cognizee, after the right is acknowledged to be in him, grants back again or renders to the cognizor, or perhaps to a stranger, some other estate in the premises. 2 Bla. Com. 353; Viner, Abr. Fine; Comyns, Dig. Fine; 1 Washb. R. P. 33.

FINE FOR ENDOWMENT. A fine anciently payable to the lord by the widow of a tenant without which she could not be endowed of her husband's lands. Abolished under Henry I., and by Magna Charta. Moz. & W.

FINE-FORCE. An absolute necessity or inevitable constraint. Old N. B. 78; Plowd. 94; 6 Co. 11; Cowel.

FINE NON CAPIENDO PRO IULCHERE PLACITANDO. An obsolete writ to prohibit officers of court from taking fines for fair pleading.

FINE AND RECOVERY ACT. The statute 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 74. This act abolished fines and recoveries. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 364, n.; 1 Steph. Com. 514. See FINE.

FINE PRO REDISSEISINA CAPIENDO. An old writ which lay for the release of one imprisoned for a redisseisin, on payment of a reasonable fine. Reg. Orig. 222.

FINE FACERE (Lat.). To make or pay a fine. Bracton 106; Skene.

FINES LE ROY. In Old English Law. A sum of money which any one is to pay the king for any contempt or offence; which fine any one that commits any trespass, or is convicted that he falsely denies his own deed, or did anything in contempt of the law, shall pay to the king. Termes de la Ley; Cunningham, Law Dict.

FINIRE. In English Law. To fine, or pay a fine. Cowel. To end or finish a matter.

FINIS. End; conclusion; limit.

FINISHED.

The question whether a house has been "finished" is one of fact; and the owner's moving into it is not conclusive proof of the fact, where the owner accepted an order to be paid when the house is finished; 121 Mass. 584.

FINITIO. An ending; death as the end of life. Blount; Cowel.

FINIUM REGUNDORUM ACTIO. In Civil Law. An action for regulating boundaries. 1 Mackelley, Civ. Law § 271.

FINORS. Those that purify gold and silver, and part them by fire and water from coarser metals; and therefore in the statute of Hen. VII. c. 2, they are also called "parters." Termes de la Ley.

FIRDFARE. In English Law. A summoning forth to a military expedition (indictio ad profectorem militarem). Spel. Glos.

FIRDIRINGA (Sax.). A preparation to go into the army. Leg. Hen. I.

FIRDSOCNE (Sax.). Exemption from military service. Spelman, Glos.

FIRDWITE (Sax.). A mulct or penalty imposed on military tenants for their default in not appearing in arms or coming to an expedition. Cowel. A penalty imposed for murder committed in the army. Cowel.

FIRE. The effect of combustion. Webster, Dict.

The legal sense of the word is the same as the popular. 1 Pars. Marit. Law 231.

Fire is not a peril of the sea. In Scotch law, however, fire is an inevitable accident. Bell, Dict.

Whether a fire arises purely by accident, or from any other cause, when it becomes uncontrollable and dangerous to the public, a man may, in general, justify the destruction of a house on fire for the protection of the neighborhood; for the maxim salus populi est suprema lex applies in such case; 11 Co. 18. See ACCIDENT; ACT OF GOD; EMINENT DOMAIN; 8 Wms. Saund. 422 a, note 2; 8 Co. Litt. 57 a, n. 1; 1 Cruise, Dig. 151, 152; 1 Rolle, Abr. 1; Bacon, Abr. Action on the Case, F; 2 Lois des Batim. 124; 1 Term 810; 6 id. 489; Ambl. 619.

When real estate is let, and the tenant covenants to pay the rent during the term, unless there are proper exceptions to such covenants, and the premises are afterwards destroyed by fire during the term, the rent must be paid although there be no enjoyment; for the common rule prevails, res perit domino. The tenant, by the accident, loses his term; the landlord, the residence; Story, Eq. Jur. § 102; Woodf. L. & T. 408.

The owner of property may kindle and have a fire on his own premises for any lawful purpose, such as burning waste in husbandry, without liability for injury to the property of another, if it is done with due care as to time, manner, and circumstances, and with respect to casual fires, also having due regard to the conditions of weather, wind, and proximity of inflammable material; Thomas, Negl. 640; Webb, Poll. Torts 618, and note. Even in the extreme case of one who had been warned of the danger that his haystack would take fire and endanger others, the contention that the question should have been put to the jury whether he had acted bona fide, to the best of his judgment, and that the standard of ordinary prudence was too uncertain as a criterion, was unsuccessfully pressed, and the care of a prudent man was held to be the proper measure of duty; 3 Bing. N. C. 468.

Very early in England, the duty of every man to safely keep his own fire was a stringent custom of the realm, i. e. at common law; Y. B. 2 Hen. IV. 18, pl. 5; and this, it is said, may be founded on ancient German custom, when a man carries fire more than nine feet from his hearth, only at his peril; L. Langb. co. 147, 148 (A. D. 658). Poll. Torts 618. The rule applied as well to out-door fires, and in a case grounded upon the common custom of the realm for negligently keeping his fire; 1 Ld. Raym. 264; s. c. 1 Salk. 13. Liability for domestic fires begun accidentally and without accident is removed in England by stats. of Anne and Geo. III. 11 Q. B. 347. The rule of modern times is without doubt affected by the great increase of business uses to which fire is applied, such as for mills, railroads, and the like, and in England the leading case of Rylands v. Fletcher (which itself concerned a reservoir, but the application of which has passed far beyond the class of facts on which it was determined), laid down the rule "that the person who, for his own purposes, brings on his lands, and collects and keeps there, anything likely to do mischief if it escapes, must keep it in at his peril, and, if he does not do so, is prima facie answerable for all the damage which is the natural consequence of its escape." This principle was expressly applied to railroads; L. R. 3 Q. B. 758; and to an engine brought on a highway; 8 Q. B. Div. 507. The case of Rylands v. Fletcher is itself one of those landmarks of judicial decision, the results and extent of which are difficult to estimate, and it is not easy to conceive of a subject-matter to which it can apply with greater force than to fire.

In the United States, as to Rylands v. Fletcher, judicial opinion is not uniform: it has been approved; 106 Mass. 194; 125 id. 283; 185 id. 508; and distinctly disapproved; 51 N. Y. 478. See Big. L. Cas. 497. But it may be safely asserted as a rule that "a man who negligently sets fire on his own land, and keeps it negligently, is liable to an action at common law for any injury done by the spreading or communication of the fire directly from his own land to the property of another, whether through the air or along the ground and whether he might or might not have reasonably anticipated the particular manner and direction in which it is actually communicated;" 107 Mass. 494; 70 N. Y. 112; 28 Minn. 139; 46 id. 147; 95 Mich. 303; 43 Cal. 437. One accidentally but not negligently firing his house is not liable for the spread of the fire by wind; 99 Ind. 16. The spreading of a fire does not raise a presumption of negligence; 81 Mo. 80; if there was none in starting it; 64 Miss. 661; 44 N. J. L. 230. As to setting fire and restraining it, the rule is that ordinary prudence, honest motives, in the one, and due diligence as to the other, exempt one from liability; 3 Ia. 80; and the burden of proof is on the plaintiff; 18 Me. 82. The same principles as a rule apply to fires generally as to those caused by locomotives when there is statutory authority for doing so.

Although it is well settled, both in this country and in England, that the right to operate a railroad includes the use of fire in locomotives; 93 Pa. 341; 140 N. Y. 808; and, if every reasonable precaution has been observed to prevent injury, the railroad company will not be liable; 114 N. Y. 11; 4 Md. 242; yet it must show the absence of negligence on its part, at least so far as concerns safety of construction and care in the operation of its locomotives, and the freedom of the track from combustibles (see infra); Webb, Poll. Torts 561, n.; 49 Fed. Rep. 807; 3 Houst. 447; 41 La. Ann. 90; 86 Mich. 615. In some states this burden is put upon the company by statute; 30 Md. 115; 50 Ia. 338; 63 Ill. 95; and in others by decisions according to the rule; 63 Mo. 498; 44 N. J. L. 247; 90 N. C. 374; 4 Neb. 288; 14 Cal. 387; in other states the plaintiff must fix upon defendant both the origin of the fire, and negligence in one of the points referred to; 36 Ia. 121; 31 Ind. 143; 142 N. Y. 11; 91 U. S. 454. But the owner is, in the absence of statute, held to the duty of ordinary care, and his negligence will defeat recovery; 44 Mich. 169; 90 Ill. 586; or if the spreading of the fire was due to the negligence of the servants of the owner there is no liability; 69 Miss. 139. It has been held that the fact that fire has been communicated by a passing locomotive is prima facie evidence of negligence; 4 U. S. App. 427; 85 Mo. 178; 86 Neb. 180; 66 Hun 632; 62 Miss. 383; 42 Ill. App. 527; 22 Fed. Rep. 811. See 11 L. R. A. 506, note. The company must exercise as great a degree of care to protect the public from injury by fire as is required in favor of its patrons; 67 Hun 409; and the failure to provide the best appliances to prevent injury to property by fire is want of ordinary care; 44 Pac. Rep. (Nev.) 423; contra, 83 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 280; but the rule is that the company is only bound to exercise due care with respect to providing the best appliances; 82 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 846; 140 N. Y. 808; 142 id. 11; and compliance with a statute requiring a guard against the emission of sparks, except during certain months, does not exempt the company from the exercise of that care to which they are bound in law, to avoid injuring the property of their neighbor; 11 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 378.

A question, the settlement of which has caused much litigation, was whether a railroad company was liable for damage to property not adjoining the track, nor set on fire directly from the locomotive, but by the spreading of the fire from the property first ignited. The rule now firmly established is that the company is liable for such injury naturally and by the ordinary course of events resulting from the fire started by the locomotive; 38 N. H. 242; 63 Conn. 331; 42 Me. 579; 98 Mass. 414; 107 id. 494; even where the property was at a considerable distance from the track; C. P. 98; s. c. 6 id. 14; 30 Mich. 181; or if several owners intervene; 13 Mete. 99.

The stubborn resistance to the establishment of this rule and its extended discussion by the courts of so many jurisdictions would be surprising but that it is readily accounted for by the fact that early decisions in New York and Pennsylvania were made the basis of strong contention against it in every state when the question first arose. Ryan v. N. Y. C. R. Co., 32 N. Y. 210; and Pa. R. Co. v. Kerr, 68 Pa. 353, where the cases relied upon to sustain the position that where the fire communicated from the sparks to a house near the track, and thence extended to another at a distance, the company was not liable for the loss of the latter, notwithstanding the fact that the sparks were allowed to escape. In the New York case it was determined that the negligence was too remote, and the injury not the natural and probable result; but later in the same court, in an action against a railroad company for the loss of a railroad tie and a tie as by coal from a locomotive, an effort was made to distinguish the case, and it was held that the question of proximate cause was properly left to the jury; 49 N. Y. 420. It was further shaken (usually upon the idea of distinguishing it), in 35 id. 200; 99 id. 158; and its weight as authority practically ended by 115 id. 579; and 118 N. Y. 224.

The Pennsylvania case was also "distinguished" in a case in which the same court held that where sparks from an engine fired a railroad tie and it resulted in burning two fields and fences, the proximity of the cause is a question for the jury, who must determine whether the facts constituted a continuous succession of events so linked as to be a natural whole, or whether the chain is so broken as to become independent, and the final result cannot be said to be the natural and probable consequence of the negligence of the defendants, and that it might and ought to have been foreseen under the circumstances; 80 Pa. 373; but Pa. R. Co. v. Kerr was expressly approved and followed in a later case in which damage by a fire, spread by burning oil carried by a running stream, was held too remote, and the stream was considered to be an intervening agent; in this case the court said that the facts were ascertained and there was nothing to put to the jury, and on this theory it was distinguished from the case in 80 Pa. This case had what the chancellor of New Jersey termed substantially its counterpart in that state, in a claim for damages against the railroad for the burning of a railroad, and strong disapproval of the Pennsylvania case and the earlier case in New York was expressed. The stream was considered similar to other material forces, and a natural link in the chain of causation. The result was held to be the rule as applied being thus stated: "When a fire originates in the negligence of a defendant, and is carried by a material force, whether it be the wind, the law of gravitation, combustible matter existing in a mass of nature, or otherwise, to the plaintiff's property and destroys it, and it appears that no object intervened between the point where the fire started and the injury, which would have prevented the injury, if due care had been taken, the defendant is legally answerable for the loss; 32 N. J. Eq. 647. The only point which suggested difficulty in applying to this class of cases the general doctrine of liability for the result of negligence is brought out with distinctness in the different views taken by the Pennsylvania and New Jersey courts of cases precisely similar as to the facts, and that difference may be considered, as concerning rather the doctrine of proximate cause than as having special relation to fires from locomotives. The cases in 35 N. Y. 214 and 62 Pa. 353 are said to "stand alone," and to be "in conflict with the English or American case as yet reported"; 59 Ill. 349; "much shaken" and "each qualified and explained in its own jurisdiction, by later decisions so as to take from its weight"; 62 Conn. 331; and finally the United States supreme court speaking through a Pennsylvania justice says of the two cases: "Those cases have been the subject of much criticism since they were decided; and it may, perhaps, be doubted whether they have always been understood. If they were intended to assert the doctrine that when a building has been set on fire through the negligence of a party, and a second building has been fired from the first, it is a conclusion of law that the owner of the second has no recourse to the negligent wrong-doer, they have not been accepted as authority for such doctrine, even in the states where the decisions were made." Strong, J., in 14 U. S. 469, 474, citing 40 N. Y. 420 and 80 Pa. 373; and cases contra of other states.

The result is to settle the rule as stated that, whether the fire is traceable to its negligence directly or indirectly, the company is liable when the fire started by its locomotive was the proximate cause of the injury complained of, and this applies as well to the class of cases hereafter noted in this title. The application of the doctrine is illustrated by a very recent case which held that when the fire negligently set was carried by moderately high wind, though not unusual, the wind was not the proximate cause, and the company was liable; 2 Kan. App. 319. When the fire is communicated indirectly, the question as to what is the proximate cause of the injury is ordinarily not one of science or of legal knowledge, but of fact for the jury to determine, in view of the accompanying circumstances; 94 U. S. 489; 59 Ill. 349; 71 id. 572; 39 Md. 115; 40 N. J. L. 299; 50 Cal. 578; 58 Mo. 366; 16 Kan. 262; and, notwithstanding the earlier cases discussed supra; 143 N. Y. 182; and 90 Pa. 122.

A railroad company has the right to keep its right of way free from combustibles by burning off grass, etc., but in such case it is bound at its peril to keep such fire within bounds; 110 Ind. 538. See 11 L. R. A. 506, note. Indeed, though not an insurer, the railroad company must keep its track reasonably clear of such danger; 62 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 385; 23 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 421; 33 Fla. 406; 105 Mass. 199; 39 N. J. L. 209 (but see 34 Pac. Rep. (Wyo.) 953); and is liable for damages from fire, caused by its negligence with respect to a fire which spreads from the track; 115 N. C. 687; and the care exercised in constructing and operating the engine is no defence; 27 Ill. App. 60; 54 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 779; 24 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 264; nor is the diligence of the company in attempting to quench the fire; 67 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 1129; it is for the jury to determine the question of negligence or care with respect to allowing weeds to grow on the right of way; 75 Va. 499; 58 Wis. 335; or the time and manner of setting and guarding the fire; 63 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 647; the company must exercise ordinary care which is proportioned to, and measured by, the amount of danger, and is liable for the want of it; 26 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1052; such fire if started for a lawful purpose is itself no evidence of negligence, which must be proved by the person complaining; 60 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 69; nor is unlawful speed of a train unless the fire would not otherwise have occurred; 32 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 834.

It has been held that when a fire is caused by the sparks of a locomotive, communicating with dried grass which a railroad company has permitted to accumulate in the line of its track, and thence spreading to the property of an adjacent land-owner, it is a question for a jury whether the company was guilty of negligence, irrespective of any question as to negligence or omission of duty on the part of the land-owner; 26 Wisc. 223; s. c. 7 Am. Rep. 69; 40 Cal. 14; s. c. 6 Am. Rep. 595; contra, 54 Ill. 594; s. c. 5 Am. Rep. 155; 11 W. Va. 14; 13 So. Rep. (Miss.) 158. Direct evidence of the accumulation of such inflammable material was held sufficient evidence of defendant's liability; 29 Minn. 58; 74 N. C. 377; 92 Ill. 437; but allowing such accumulation is not negligence per se, unless such as a prudent man having regard to the same hazard would not permit; 30 La. 78; 87 Ind. 108; and there must be a connection between the negligence and the injury and no intervening cause (such as in this case a high wind carrying a burning brand over a ridge to a marsh adjoining plaintiffs); 79 Wis. 140.

Generally the accumulation of inflammable material near the track is contributory negligence; 42 Neb. 105; 63 Tex. 57; but it is not so to permit the natural growth of stubble and grass to remain; 87 Mo. 117; nor to deposit wood near the track under a contract with the company; 57 Ind. 150; erecting a wooden building near a railroad track is not negligence per se; 94 Ky. 71; but the owner assumes the risks incident thereto, and cannot recover if it is burned without fault on the part of the company; 62 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 385. In Indiana a plaintiff must not only aver freedom from fault but absence on his part of contributory negligence; 96 Ind. 40, 62. And what is termed the Illinois negligence rule is: where fire is ignited on the right of way of a railroad, by reason of an accumulation of grass left there, and communicated to the adjoining field by the negligence of the owner in not keeping it free from combustible materials, the owner cannot recover for the injury thereby occasioned, unless the negligence of the company is greater than his own; 54 Ill. 504.

In many states statutes have been passed making railroad companies absolutely liable for damage caused by fires from locomotives, and such statutes have been almost uniformly held to be constitutional; 105 Mass. 199; 145 id. 129; 37 Me. 92; 85 id. 502; 54 Conn. 447. In two very recent cases the United States supreme court held that such a statute does not violate the constitution of the United States, as depriving the company of property without due process of law, or as denying it the equal protection of the laws, or as impairing the obligation of the contract made between the state and the company by its incorporation under general laws imposing no such liability; 105 U. S. 1; id. 27. Such statutes apply to property not adjoining the right of way, if set on fire by intervening property ignited by the locomotive; 62 id. 840; 41 S. C. 86; 2 Colo. App. 159; and are not void as interfering with the federal jurisdiction over interstate commerce; 63 N. H. 25; 16 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 429. In Iowa it was held that the company was prima facie liable; 50 Ia. 840. Under such a statute imposing absolute liability contributory negligence is not a defence; 25 L. R. A. (Mo.) 161; and the company is liable for the spreading of the fire even when the person whose property was first set on fire requested the railroad men to let it burn, as he wished to burn up the bogs; 52 Conn. 264. See 25 L. R. A. 161.

As to liability for damages from fires by reason of the failure to furnish water to extinguish them, see WATER.

FIRE-ARM. An instrument used in the propulsion of shot, shell, or bullets by the action of gunpowder exploded within it.

In 1697 a royal charter was granted to the gun-makers of London empowering them to search for, prove and mark hand guns, pistols, etc., and by the statutes of 1616 and 1653 the proving of all fire arms was made compulsory. These statutes have been superseded by the gun-barrel proof act 31 and 32 Vict., which regulates the duties and powers of the London and Birmingham proof-houses, and which makes the forging or counterfeiting of proof-marks or stamps, and the selling, or having in possession for the purpose of sale, of fire-arms bearing such forged or counterfeited mark or stamp, a misdemeanor.

As to what constitutes a fire-arm, the decisions have been somewhat conflicting. A pistol so dilapidated that it could not be discharged by the trigger has been held to be a firearm and a deadly weapon; 53 Ala. 508; so where the mainspring was so disabled as not to allow it to be discharged in the regular way; 61 Ga. 417; but not so where the weapon could not be discharged by a cap on the tube; 48 Ala. 89. The separate parts of a pistol found on the offender's person have held a fire-arm; 62 id. 8. See ARMS; WEAPON.

All sorts of guns, fowling-pieces, blunderbusses, pistols, etc. R. & L. Dict. A weapon acting by the force of gun-powder. Anderson; 53 Ala. 509. A contrivance which can be carried on the person from which a deadly missile is thrown by some explosive. English. See ARMS.

FIRE DEPARTMENT. A department of the government of a city, town, or village charged with the prevention or extinction of fires. 13 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 73; Cent. Dict. A city is not liable to the owner of property injured by fire in consequence of its neglect to provide and keep in repair suitable fire apparatus, or to provide and keep in repair the public wells, cisterns or waterworks. Id., 79; 67 Fed. Rep. 349.

As Public Property. The firemen of a municipality are paid out of taxes levied for that purpose, and they are maintained to protect the lives and property of citizens of the Commonwealth. The firemen of a city are just as essential to its safety and proper government as is its police force. The fire department can only be effective by having engines, engine houses, and appliances which are usual in meeting the demands on the department. The property of a city used in connection with its "fire department" is, in our opinion, "public property," used for public purposes and is necessary, to its government. 105 Ky. 344, 49 S. W. 320.

FIRE-ESCAPE. An apparatus constructed to afford a safe and convenient method of escape from a burning building.

Regulations have been enacted in most of the states, often by municipal ordinances, providing that all factories, hotels, schools, buildings, theatres, hospitals, public buildings, and flat or tenement houses shall be equipped with safe and suitable means of escape in case of fire. Such regulations are of a highly penal character, and are to be strictly construed; 105 Pa. 222; 106 id. 321; 15 R. I. 112. They are not of such a character as to interfere with the use and enjoyment of private property; 10 Daly 377.

The original duty to provide fire-escapes rests with the owner or proprietor; 78 N. Y. 810; 58 Hun 376; and the fact that he has erected them in compliance with the statute will not exempt him from providing additional ones when ordered so to do; 10 Daly 377; but in some states it has been held that when the real owner has leased his premises the tenant in actual occupancy and possession, who places his operatives in a position of danger and enjoys the benefit of their services, becomes responsible under the law; 105 Pa. 222; 106 id. 321; 42 Ohio St. 458; (contra, 16 N. Y. Sup. Ct. Rep. 750.) But these cases seem to place the question of liability more on the ground of the relation of master and servant, it being held that as an absolute duty is laid upon the owner by statute, a servant sustaining an injury by breach of such duty may maintain an action on the case for such injury; 70 N. Y. 120; 11 R. I. 451. A building becomes a public nuisance if not supplied with such appliances as required by statute; 16 Abb. 195. And the mere relation of landlord and tenant will not bar the action; 78 N. Y. 810. It is not the duty of the tenant to search for defects and report them to the owner; id.; nor will the owner be permitted to wait until he is officially directed to provide fire-escapes; id.; 58 Hun 376; although no such obligation existed at common law; 30 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 893; 181 N. Y. 90; 126 Mass. 84; 80 Am. Rep. 641.

They must be reasonably secure, although they need not be the best that can be devised; 131 N. Y. 90; and the number required depends on the size of the building, the number of employees, and the inflammable character of the materials there used; 61 Hun 254; having erected a reasonably safe fire-escape, the owner is not responsible if a fire cuts off access to it; 100 Pa. 321. See Thomas, Negl. 772; Ray, Neg. Imp. Dut. 660; NEGLIGENCE.

FIRE INSURANCE. A contract to indemnify the insured for loss or damage, occasioned by fire, during a specified period. Flanders, Fire Ins. 17. See INSURANCE.

FIRE ORDEAL. See ORDEAL.

FIRE POLICY. See INSURANCE; POLICY.

FIRE-PROOF. Incombustible; not in danger from the action of fire.

A statement that a building is fire-proof necessarily excludes the idea that it is of wood, and necessarily implies that it is constructed of some substance fitted for the erection of fire-proof buildings. The characterization of one portion of a building as fire-proof suggests a comparison with other portions of the same building, and warrants the conclusion that the specified portion is different from the remainder; 103 N. Y. 459; 7 N. E. Rep. 321. In an insurance policy, a condition that books be kept in a fire-proof safe is complied with if the safe be of the kind commonly regarded as fire-proof; 4 Tex. Civ. App. 82. The insured does not by this clause warrant his safe to preserve the books; id. Such a clause, commonly called the iron-safe clause, is a warranty the breach of which avoids the policy; 20 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 218; 81 id. 321; but not when the stipulation was inserted by fraud without knowledge of the insured; 84 Ga. 759. See INSURANCE.

To say of any article that it is fire-proof conveys no other idea than that the material out of which it is formed is incombustible.

FIRE RAISING. In Scotch Law. The wilfully setting on fire buildings, growing or stored cereals, growing wood, or coalheughs. Ersk. Pr. 577. See ARSON.

FIRE AND SWORD. Letters of fire and sword were the ancient means for dispossessing a tenant who retained possession contrary to the order of the judge and diligence of the law. They were directed to the sheriff, and ordered him to call the assistance of the county to dispossess the tenant. Bell, Dict.; Erskine, Inst. lib. iv. tit. 8, § 17.

FIRE AND WATER. See INTERDICTION OF FIRE AND WATER.

FIRE-WORKS. A contrivance of inflammable and explosive materials combined of various proportions for the purpose of producing in combustion beautiful or amusing scenio effects, or to be used as a night signal on land or sea, or for various purposes in war. Cent. Dict.

Percussion caps for signalling railway trains are held to be explosive preparations, although the court considered they were not "fireworks" as the latter term is known to commerce; 3 B. & S. 128. Under a clause in an insurance policy forbidding the keeping of gunpowder, fireworks are not prohibited; 66 Cal. 178. See INSURANCE; RISKS AND PERILS; CAUSA PROXIMA NON REMOTA SPECTATUR.

Any device of paper or pasteboard containing explosives which make a noise or produce colored lights. English.

FIREBARE. A beacon or high tower by the seaside, wherein are continual lights, either to direct sailors in the night, or to give warning of the approach of an enemy. Cowell.

FIREBOTE. An allowance of wood or estovers to maintain competent firing for the tenant. A sufficient allowance of wood to burn in a house. 1 Washb. R. P. 99. Tenant for life or years is entitled to it; 2 Bla. Com. 35. Cutting more than is needed for present use is waste; 8 Dane, Abr. 288; 8 Pick. 312; Cro. Eliz. 593; 7 Bingh. 640. The rules in England and in this country are different in relation to the kind of trees which the tenant may cut; 7 Pick. 152; 7 Johns. 227; 6 Barb. 9; 2 Zabr. 521; 2 Ohio St. 180; 13 Pa. 438; 3 Leon. 16.

FIREMAN A PUBLIC OFFICER. A fireman is a public officer within the meaning of the term in its broadest sense. 145 Ky. 240, 140 S. W. 197.

FIRKIN. A measure of capacity, equal to nine gallons. The word firkin is also used to designate a weight, used for butter and cheese, of fifty-six pounds avoirdupois.

FIRLOT. A Scotch measure of capacity containing two gallons and a pint. Speilman.

FIRM. The persons composing a partnership, taken collectively.

The name or title under which the members of a partnership transact business.

The word is used as synonymous with partnership. The words "house," "concern," and "company" are also used in the same sense. This name is in point of law conventional, and applicable only to the persons who, on each particular occasion when the name is used, are members of the firm. A firm is usually described, in legal proceedings, as certain persons trading or carrying on business under and using the name, style, and firm of, etc. See 9 Q. B. 361; 9 M. & W. 347; 1 Chitty, Bailm. 49.

The firm name is part of the good will of a partnership, and where, on a dissolution, one of the partners transfers to the others all his interest in the firm business and assets, with the understanding that they are to succeed to the business, the retiring partner cannot use the firm name in a business of like kind carried on in the vicinity; 33 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 88.

It may be that the names of all the members of the partnership appear in the name or style of the firm, or that the names of only a part appear, with the addition of "and company," or other words indicating a participation of others, as partners, in the business; 16 Pick. 428; or that the name of only one of the partners, without such addition, is the name of the firm. It sometimes happens that the name of neither of the partners appears in the style of the firm; 9 M. & W. 284. In New York, Georgia, and Louisiana, no partner is permitted to transact business in the name of a person not interested in the firm. A. & E. Encyc.

The proper style of the firm is frequently agreed upon in the partnership articles; and where this is the case, it becomes the duty of every partner, in signing papers for the firm, to employ the exact name agreed upon; Colly. Partn. § 215; Story, Partn. § 202. This may be necessary, not only to bind the firm itself; Story, Partn. § 102; but also to prevent the partner signing from incurring a personal liability both to third persons and to his copartners; Story, Partn. §§ 102, 202; 2 Jac. & W. 268; 11 Ad. & E. 339; Pothier, Partn. nn. 100, 101. Where persons associate themselves together and carry on business under a common name, and the association is not a corporation, they may be regarded as partners, whatever names they may have adopted; 4 Ind. App. 20.

So, the name which a partnership assumes, recognize, and publicly use becomes the legitimate name and style of the firm, not less so than if it had been adopted by the articles of copartnership; 2 Pet. 186, 188; 21 Md. 538; and a partner has no implied authority to bind the firm by any other than the firm name thus acquired; 9 M. & W. 284; 85 S. C. 572; 48 Ga. 570; 51 Wis. 170. Wherefore, where a firm consisted of J B & C H, the partnership name being J B only, and C H accepted a bill in the name of "J B & Co.," it was held that J B was not bound thereby; 9 M. & W. 284. See DAVEIS 823.

If the firm have no fixed name, a signing by one, in the name of himself and company, will bind the partnership; 2 Ohio 61; 57 Ga. 86; and a note in the name of one, and signed by him "For the firm, etc.," will bind the company; 5 Blackf. 99. Where the business of a firm is to be carried on in the name of B & D, a signature of a note by the names and surnames of the respective parties is a sufficient signature to charge the partnership; 8 C. B. 792. Where a written contract is made in the name of one, and another is a secret partner with him, both may be sued upon it; 2 Ala. 134; 5 Watts 454.

Where partners agree that their business shall be conducted in the name of one person, whether himself interested in the partnership business or not; that is the partnership name, and the partners are bound by it; 6 Hill 322; 1 Denio 405, 471, 481; 60 Ark. 82. By agreement among themselves, the individual names of partners, or of any one of them, may be used to bind the firm and create obligations good against the partnership; 73 Wis. 70. Where the name used is the name of one of the partners, and he does business also on his own private account, a contract signed by that name will not bind the firm, unless it appears to have been entered into for the firm; but, if there be no proof that the contract was made for the firm, the presumption will be that it was made by the partner on his own separate account, and the firm will not be responsible; Story, Partn. § 139; Pars. (Jas.) Partn. 76; 5 Pick. 11; 1 Du. N. Y. 405; 17 S. & R. 165; 5 Mass. 176; 5 Pet. 539. See PARTNERS; PARTNERSHIP.

The name of the firm should be distinct from the names of all other firms. When there is confusion in this respect, the partners composing one firm may, in some cases, be made responsible for the debts of another. See Peake, Cas. 80; 7 East 210; 3 Bell, Comm. 670; 8 Mart. La. N. S. 89; Pars. Partn. 120. As to the right of a surviving partner to carry on the business in the name of the firm, see 7 Sim. 137; Story, Partn. § 100, n.; Colly. Partn. § 163, n.

Merchants and lawyers have different notions respecting the nature of a firm. Merchants are in the habit of looking upon a firm as a body distinct from the members composing it; Lindl. Partn. 218; 59 La. Ann. 383; 14 Fed. Rep. 615. See 64 Ga. 243; 77 Ind. 361; 64 Ia. 261. The law looks to the partners themselves; any change among them destroys the identity of the firm; what is called the property of the firm is their property, and what are called the debts and liabilities of the firm are their debts and their liabilities. In point of law, a partner may be the debtor or creditor of his copartners; but he cannot be either debtor or creditor of the firm of which he is himself a member; 4 Mylne & C. 171.

A firm can neither sue nor be sued, otherwise than in the name of the partners composing it; Pars. (Jas.) Partn. 76. Consequently, no action can be brought by the firm against one of its partners, nor by one of its partners against it; for in any such action one person at least would appear both as plaintiff and defendant, and it is considered absurd for any person to sue himself, even in form; 1 B. & Ald. 664; 4 Mylne & C. 171; 6 Taunt. 598; 6 Pick. 320; 5 Gill & J. 487. For the same reason, one firm cannot bring an action against another if there be one or more persons partners in both firms; 6 Taunt. 597; 2 B. & P. 120; unless by statute; as in Pennsylvania, by the act of April 14, 1838.

An appeal or writ of error taken in the name of a firm and not giving the names of the individuals comprising it will be dismissed, and the defect cannot be amended; 11 Wall. 86; 21 How. 393; 22 id. 87.

Whenever a firm is spoken of by its name or style, the courts admit evidence to show what persons did in fact constitute the firm at the time in question; 6 Taunt. 15; 4 Maule & S. 18; 2 Keen 255. If persons trade or carry on business under a name, style, or firm, whatever may be done by them under that name is binding as much as if real names had been used; 1 Chitty, Bailm. 707; 2 C. & P. 296; 3 Campb. 548.

Any change in the persons composing a firm is productive of a new signification of the name. If, therefore, a legacy is left to a firm, it is a legacy to those who compose it at the time the legacy vests; see 2 Keen 255; 3 Mylne & C. 507; 7 De G. M. & G. 678; and if a legacy is left to the representatives of an old firm, it will be payable to the executors of the survivors of the partners constituting the firm alluded to, and not to its successors in business; 11 Ir. Eq. 451; 1 Lindl. Partn. 218. Where a creditor takes a note made by one partner in the firm name after its dissolution, whereby the time of payment of a firm debt is extended, the other party is discharged from liability; 17 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 390. Again, an authority given to a firm of two partners cannot, it would seem, be exercised by them and a third person afterwards taken into partnership with them; 6 Bing. N. C. 201. See 4 Ad. & E. 332; 16 Sim. 121; 7 Hare 351; 4 Ves. 649.

A name may be a trade-mark; and, if it is, the use of it by others will be illegal, if they pass off themselves or their own goods for the firm or the goods of the firm whose name is made use of; 2 Keen 218; 4 K. & J. 747. Moreover, if this is done intentionally, the illegality will not be affected by the circumstance that the imitators of the trade-mark are themselves of the same name as those whose mark they imitate; 13 Beav. 200; 3 De G. M. & G. 806.

Where one partner acts for the firm in demanding illegal charges and detains goods until they are paid, every member of the firm is liable for damages; 130 N. Y. 340.

An action by a firm may be defeated by a defence founded on the conduct of one of the partners. If one member of a firm is guilty of a fraud in entering into a contract on behalf of the firm, his fraud may be relied on as a defence to an action on the contract brought by him and his copartners; for their innocence does not purge his guilt. See Ry. & M. 178; 3 Beav. 128; 10 id. 523; 3 Drew. 3; 9 B. & C. 241. The above rule seems not to rest upon the ground that the act of the one partner is imputable to the firm; Pars. (Jas.) Partn. 139; it governs when the circumstances are such as to exclude the doctrine of agency. Thus, if a partner pledges partnership property, and in so doing clearly acts beyond the limits of his authority, still, as he cannot dispute the validity of his own act, he and his copartners cannot recover the property so pledged by an action at law; 5 Exch. 489. So, although a partner has no right to pay his own separate debt by setting off against it a debt due from his creditor to the firm, yet if he actually agrees that such set-off shall be made, and it is made accordingly, he and his copartners cannot afterwards in an action recover the debt due to the firm; 7 M. & W. 204; 9 B. & C. 532; 1 Lindl. Partn. 169, 170; 1 Maule & S. 751. When a partner executing a firm note waives exemptions, and signs the firm name, the waiver is confined to the partner signing; 94 Ala. 628. An individual note given by a partner, and indorsed by him in the firm name without authority, in satisfaction of a debt which the creditor knows to be that of the individual, is not enforceable by the latter against the firm; 18 N. Y. Sup. 867.

If a person becomes surety to a firm, it is important to ascertain whether he clearly contemplated changes in the firm, and agreed to become surety to a fluctuating body, or not. If he did, his liability is not discharged by any change among the members constituting the partnership at the time he became surety; 10 B. & C. 122; 5 B. & Ald. 281; but if no such intention can be shown, then a contract of suretyship entered into with a firm will be deemed to be binding so long only as the firm remains unchanged, and consequently any change in it, whether by the death or the retirement of a partner; 7 Hare 50; 3 Q. B. 703; 10 Ad. & E. 30; or by the introduction of a new partner; 2 W. Bla. 934; immediately puts an end to the surety's liability so far as subsequent events are concerned. In all such cases the surety's position and risk are altered, and, whether he has in fact been damaged by the change or not, he has a right to say, non in hæc fœdera veni. Similar doctrines apply to cases where a person becomes surety for the conduct of a firm; 5 M. & W. 580. See 6 Q. B. 514; 4 B. & P. 34; 8 Cl. & F. 214; 1 Lindl. Partn. 172-174; De G. 300; 2 Rose 239, 228; 4 Dow. & C. 428.

FIRM NAME. The name or title of a firm in business. See FIRM.

FIRMA (L. Lat.). A farm or rent reserved on letting lands, anciently frequently reserved in provisions. Spelman, Gloss.; Cunningham, Law Dict.

A banquet; supper; provisions for the table. Du Cange.

A tribute or custom paid towards entertaining the king for one night. Domesday; Cowel.

A rent reserved to be paid in money, called then alba firma (white rents, money rents). Spelman, Gloss.

A lease. A letting. Ad firmam tradidi (I have farm let). Spelman, Gloss.

A message with the house, garden, or lands, etc., connected therewith. Co. Litt. 5 a; Shepp. Touchst. 98. See FARM.

FIRMA BURGI. The right to receive the tolls, rents, or other profits of a burgh or borough; it was granted to the local authority by the king or other lord of the borough upon payment of a fixed sum. Byrne.

FIRMA FEODI (L. Lat.). Fee-farm. See FEODI-FIRMA.

FIRMAN. A passport granted by the Great Mogul to captains of foreign vessels to trade within the territories over which he has jurisdiction; a permit.

FIRMABATIO. The right of a tenant to his lands and tenements. Cowel.

FIRMARIUM. A place in monasteries and elsewhere where the poor were received and supplied with food. Spelman.

FIRMARIUS (L. Lat.). A fermor. A lessee of a term. Firmarii comprehend all such as hold by lease for life or lives or for year, by deed or without deed. Co. 2d Inst. 144, 145; 1 Washb. R. P. 107; 8 Pick. 312; 7 Ad. & E. 637.

FIRMITAS. In English Law. An assurance of some privilege, by deed or charter.

FIRMLY. Where a statute requires an affidavit that an appellant from an award of a board of arbitrators "firmly believes injustice has been done," it is not sufficient to express belief, omitting the word firmly. The word is a strong expression intended to put the affiant on his guard. It cannot be dispensed with without substituting something equal to it in substance; as to what shall be so considered, there may be liberal construction. Verily is as strong a word as firmly, and is sufficient; 4 S. & R. 134.

FIRMURA. Liberty to scour and repair a mill-dam, and carry away the soil, etc. Blount.

FIRST. In a will the word "first" may not import precedence of one bequest over another. 59 Me. 830; 57 id. 523.

FIRST BILL. The term "first bill" used in credit insurance policy, means the particular articles contracted for at one time. 133 Ky. 746, 118 S. W. 1004.

FIRST-CLASS. Occupying the highest standing in a particular classification. In a contract for "first-class" work, it is for the jury to decide as to whether the terms were substantially complied with; 67 Hun 652.

Funeral. Term "first-class funeral" when applied to a particular individual, generally has reference to the previous social status and pecuniary condition of the person to be interred; for what might be considered extravagant in one case would be seemingly moderate in another. 13 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 552; 11 N. Y. St. Rep. 649.

Securities. First-class interest-paying securities does not include stocks or second mortgages. Id.; 35 N. J. Eq. 470.

Station. A first-class station of a railway is a station at which all trains, other than mail, express, and special, are advertised to stop and take up and set down passengers. Id.; L. R. 8 Eq. 671.

Title. The stipulation by a vendee of real estate that the title should be "first-class" could mean nothing more than that it should be marketable. Id.; 120 N. Y. 253.

FIRST-CLASS MATTER. Matter received at the United States post-offices, in writing or sealed against inspection.

Includes written matter, namely: Letters, postal cards, post cards (private mailing cards), and all matter wholly or partly in writing, whether sealed or unsealed, except manuscript copy accompanying proof sheets or corrected proof sheets of the same and the writing authorized by law to be placed upon matter of other classes. (Sec. 426, 441, and 447, Postal Laws and Regulations.) Matter sealed or otherwise closed against inspection is also of the first class. (Secs. 380 and 453, Id.) Note: Typewriting and carbon and letterpress copies thereof are the equivalent of handwriting and are classed as such in all cases. U. S. Off. Postal Guide, 1924, 8.

FIRST-CLASS MISDEMEANANT. Under the Prisons Act (28 & 29 Vict. c. 126, s. 67) prisoners in the county, city, and borough prisons convicted of misdemeanor and not sentenced to hard labor, are divided into two classes, one of which is called the first division; and it is in the discretion of the court to order that such a prisoner be treated as a misdeemeanant of the first division, usually called "first-class misdeemeanant," and as such not to be deemed a criminal prisoner, i. e. a prisoner convicted of a crime.

FIRST DEGREE. The words "in the first degree" should be taken in their ordinary acceptance, and not in the legal sense which they may bear in other states under peculiar statutes. They naturally mean simply that the defendant was guilty of the first or highest degree of murder. 70 S. W. 292.

FIRST FRUITS. The first year's whole profits of the spiritual preferments. There were three valuations (valor beneficium) at different times, according to which these first fruits were estimated, made in 1253, 1288, and 1318. A final valuation was made by the 26 Hen. VIII. c. 3.

They now form a perpetual fund, called Queen Anne's bounty, the income of which is used for the augmentation of poor livings. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 284, and notes; 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 260.

FIRST IMPRESSION (Lat. primæ impressionis). First examination. First presentation to a court for examination or decision. A cause which presents a new question for the first time, and for which, consequently, there is no precedent applicable in all respects, is said to be a case of the first impression. Austin, Jur. sect. xxv. ad fin. See IMPRESSION; PRIME IMPRESSIONS.

FIRST PURCHASER. In the English law of descent, the first purchaser was he who first acquired an estate in a family which still owns it. A purchase of this kind signifies any mode of acquiring an estate, except by descent. 2 Bla. Com. 220.

FISC. In Civil Law. The treasury of a prince; the public treasury. 1 Low. C. 361.

Hence, to confiscate a thing is to appropriate it to the fisc. Pallett Droit Public, 21, n. says that fiscus, in the Roman law, signified the treasury of the prince, and aerarium the treasury of the state. But this distinction was not observed in France. See Law 10, ff. De jure Fisci.

FISCAL. Belonging to the fisc, or public treasury. A fiscal agent does not necessarily imply a depositary of the public funds, so as, by the simple use of it in a statute without any directions in this respect to make it the duty of the state treasurer to deposit with him any moneys in the treasury; 27 La. Ann. 20.

FISCAL COURT. See COURT OF LIMITED POWERS.

FISCUS. A great basket. The word signified a wicker-basket or pannier in which the Romans were accustomed to keep and carry about large sums of money (Cic. I, Verr. c. 8; Phaedr. Fab. ii, 7), and hence fiscus came to signify any person's treasure or money chest.

The importance of the imperial fiscus soon led to the practice of appropriating the name to that property, which the Cæsar claimed as Cæsar, and the word fiscus, without any adjunct, was used in this sense. (Juv. Sat. iv. 54.) Ultimately the word came to signify, generally, the property of the state, the Cæsar having concentrated in himself all the sovereign power, and thus the word fiscus finally had the same signification as aerarium, in the republican period. In the later periods, the words were used indiscriminately, but only in the sense of the imperial chest, for there was then no other public chest. Wharton; Smith's Dict. Antiq.

FISH. An animal which inhabits the water, breathes by means of gills, swims by the aid of fins, and is oviparous.

Fishes in rivers and in the sea are considered as animals feræ naturæ; consequently, no one has any property in them until they have been captured; and, like other wild animals, if, having been taken, they escape and regain their liberty, the captor loses his property in them.

FISH ROYAL. A whale, porpoise, or sturgeon thrown ashore on the coast of England belonged to the king as a branch of his prerogative. Hence these fish are termed royal fish. Hale, De Jure Mar. pt. 1, c. 7; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 290; Plowd. 305; Bracton, l. 3, c. 8.

FISHERY. A place prepared for catching fish with nets or hooks. This is commonly applied to the place of drawing a seine or net. 1 Whart. 181.

A common of fishery is not an exclusive right, but one enjoyed in common with certain other persons. 8 Kent 329.

A free fishery is said to be a franchise in the hands of a subject, existing by grant or prescription, distinct from an ownership in the soil. It is an exclusive right, and applies to a public navigable river, without any right in the soil. 3 Kent 329.

A several fishery is one by which the party claiming it has the right of fishing, independently of all other, so that no person can have a coextensive right with him in the object claimed; but a partial and independent right in another, or a limited liberty, does not derogate from the right of the owner. 5 Burr. 2814.

A distinction has been made between a common fishery (communis piscarium), which may mean for all mankind, as in the sea, and a common of fishery (communium piscarie), which is a right, in common with certain other persons, in a particular stream. 8 Taunt. 183. Angell seems to think that common of fishery and free fishery are convertible terms. Law of Watercourses, c. 6, ss. 3, 4.

Woolrich says that sometimes a free fishery is confounded with a several, sometimes it is said to be synonymous with common, and again it is treated as distinct from either. Law of Waters, etc., 97.

A several fishery, as its name imports, is an exclusive property; this, however, is not to be understood as depriving the territorial owner of his right to a several fishery when he permits to another person permission to fish; for he would continue to be the several proprietor, although he should suffer a stranger to hold a coextensive right with himself. Woolr. Wat. 96.

These distinctions in relation to several, free, and common of fishery are not strongly marked, and the lines are sometimes scarcely perceptible. "Instead of going into the black-letter books to learn what was a fishery, and a free fishery, and a several fishery," says Huston, J., "I am disposed to regard our own acts, even though differing from old feudal law." 1 Whart. 182.

The right of fishery is to be considered with reference to navigable waters and to waters not navigable; meaning, by the former, those in which the tide ebbs and flows; by the latter, those in which it does not. By the common law of England the fisheries in all the navigable waters of the realm belong to the crown by prerogative, in such way, nevertheless, as to be common to all the subjects: so that an individual claiming an exclusive fishery in such waters must show it strictly by grant or prescription. In that country navigable waters meant tide waters, but different conditions have resulted in the application of the rule cessat ratio cessat lex, and while the same principle is recognized that navigable waters belong to the state and non-navigable ones to the riparian proprietor, the recognition of tide-water as the test of navigability is abandoned. See NAVIGABLE WATERS.

In rivers not navigable the fisheries belong to the owners of the soil or to the riparian proprietors; 2 Bla. Com. 30; Gould, Wat. 42, 46; Hale, De Jure Mar. c. 4; 1 Mod. 105; 4 Burr. 2162; Dav. 153; 7 Co. 16 a; Plowd. 154 a. In such rivers the owner of the adjoining soil has an exclusive right of fishery in front of his land to the thread of the river, except so far as this right has been qualified by legislative regulation; but this right is limited to the taking of fish, and does not carry with it the right to prevent the passage of fish to lakes and ponds for breeding purpose; 5 Pick. 99.

The common-law doctrine accepting the tide-water test of navigability has been declared to be the law in several of the United States; 17 Johns. 195; 20 id. 90; 9 N. H. 321; 1 Pick. 180; 5 id. 199; 5 Day 72; 1 Baldw. 60; 5 Mas. 191; 5 Harr. & J. 193; 2 Conn. 481; 103 Mass. 446, 447; 37 Me. 472. But in some states, as Pennsylvania, North Carolina, and South Carolina, the right of fishery in the great rivers of those states, though not tide-waters, is held to be vested in the state and open to all the world; 2 Binn. 475; 14 S. & R. 71; 1 M'Cord 580; 8 Ired. 277; 34 Ohio 492. See 89 Pa. 346; 75 Hun 472. This modification of the common-law doctrine has been applied not to the abandonment of the distinction between the public and private rights of fisheries as affected by navigability, but to the establishment of a different test of navigability, made necessary by the difference of physical conditions in the two countries already alluded to. So in the leading Pennsylvania case the point of the decision was that neither the quality of fresh or salt water, nor the flux or reflux of the tide, would determine whether a river should be considered navigable or not; 2 Binn. 475. After changing the test of navigability, these cases applied the rule of the public character of streams actually navigable which had been in England determined by the mere test of tide water. See 7 Pet. 320; 60 Pa. 339.

In this country each state has the exclusive control of fisheries in the tide waters and beds of tide waters within its jurisdiction, subject to the paramount right of navigation; 139 U. S. 240; 94 id. 391. This right is said by Cooley to be "considered as pertaining to the state by virtue of an authority existing in every sovereign, and which is called the eminent domain. Some of these rights are complete without any action on the part of the state, as is the case with . . . the rights of fishery in public waters." Cooley, Const. Lim. 651, 524. The jurisdiction of a state is coextensive with its territory, coextensive with its legislative powers, and within what are generally recognized as the territorial limits of a state, by the law of nations, a state can define its boundaries on the sea and the boundaries of its counties; 3 Wheat. 398; within its limits a state has authority to regulate the time and manner of the taking of fish by the public in the waters therein; 1 Metc. 95; 20 Pick. 186; 24 Me. 493; 75 id. 507; and so far as public and common rights are concerned, the state has control over fisheries; 35 Me. 118.

The control of fisheries to the extent of at least a marine league from the shore belongs to the nation on whose coast the fisheries are prosecuted. Bays wholly within the territory of a nation, not exceeding two marine leagues in width at the mouth, are within its territorial jurisdiction; 139 U. S. 240.

The fact that congress has never assumed control over fisheries is persuasive evidence that the right to control them remains in the state; 139 U. S. 240. In England it was held that the ownership of the crown in the bed of navigable waters is for the benefit of the subject, and cannot be used in any such manner to derogate from or interfere with the right of navigation, which belongs by law to all subjects of the realm; and that consequently the grantees of a particular portion, who occupied it for a fishery, could not be lawfully authorized to charge and collect anchorage dues from vessels anchoring therein; 20 C. B. n. s. 1.

By the award of the arbitrators under the treaty with Great Britain (27 Stat. L. 948), it was settled that the United States had no exclusive jurisdiction in Behring Sea outside the ordinary three-mile limit, and no right of property in, or protection over, the fur seals frequenting the islands of the United States when found outside of such three-mile limit. Therefore the act of March 2, 1899, declaring that Rev. St. sec. 1936, which forbids the killing of fur-bearing animals in Alaska and the waters thereof, shall apply to "all the dominion of the United States in the waters of Behring Sea," must be construed to mean the waters within three miles of the shores of Alaska; 75 Fed. Rep. 518.

Private or several fisheries in navigable waters may be established by the legislatures, or may, perhaps, be acquired by prescription clearly proved; 16 Pot. 869; 6 Cow. 369; 5 Ired. 118; 4 Md. 363; 10 Cush. 369; 39 Mich. 636; and in some of the United States there are such private fisheries established during the colonial period, which are still held and enjoyed as such; as, in the Delaware; 1 Whart. 143; 1 Baldw. 76. The right of private fishery may exist not only in the riparian proprietor, but also in another who has acquired it by grant or otherwise; Co. Litt. 123 a, n. 7; Schultes, Aq. Rights 40; Ang. The free right of fishery in navigable waters extends to the taking of shell-fish between high and low water-mark; 2 B. & P. 473; 5 Day 23; 37 Me. 472; 15 How. 132; 103 Mass. 217.

Oysters which have been taken, and have thus become private property, may be planted in a new place flowed by tide-water, and where there are none naturally, and yet remain the private property of the person planting them; 14 Wend. 43; 34 Barb. 592; 2 R. #### FISH COMMISSIONER.

The Act of February 9, 1871, provides for the appointment of a commissioner of fish and fisheries, with all necessary powers looking to the preservation and increase of food fishes throughout the country. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4205.

FISHGARTH. A dam or weir in a river for taking fish, especially in the rivers of Ouse and Humber. Tomlin.

FISHERIES ARBITRATION. The right to fishing on the high seas, without the territorial limits of any state (a marine league, or three geographical miles from the shore) is a right common to all mankind, and cannot be granted or restricted by any particular nation. 13 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 560; 5 Ired. L. 118, 42 Am. Dec. 155. By the award of arbitrators under the treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain it was decided "that the United States has not any right of protection or property in the fur seals frequenting the islands of the United States in Behring sea when such seals are found outside the ordinary three-mile limit." Id.; 27 Am. L. Rev. 703.

FISHERIES COMMISSION.

The relation of the United States with the British provinces on the Atlantic has been the subject of important negotiations. By the treaty of 1818, the United States have the right to fish on certain specified coasts of British America without reference to the distance from shore, while as to all other coasts they are excluded from fishing within three marine miles of the shore. The treaty of Washington of 1871 removes the three-mile restriction. Art. XIX. yields a corresponding right to all British subjects as to the Atlantic coasts of the United States north of the 30th parallel, and concedes to each nation the right to import, free of duty, fish and fish oils into the ports of the other. The treaty was to continue in operation for ten years, and further until two years' notice from either party. In Art. XXII. it is stated that the British government asserts that these provisions of the treaty would work greatly to her disadvantage. Provision was accordingly made, by the same article, for the appointment of a commission, which is known as the Fisheries Commission, to determine the amount of compensation to be paid by the United States. The tribunal, consisting of three members, met at Halifax, N. S., June 16, 1877, and the business sessions lasted from July 28 to November 23, 1877. The award was five and one-half million dollars in gold to Great Britain. The United States commissioner did not sign the award, stating that "in his opinion the advantages accruing to Great Britain under the treaty of Washington are greater than those conferred on the United States. . . . He deemed it his duty to state further, that it is questionable whether it is competent for the board to make an award under the treaty, except with the unanimous consent of its members." See U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 2505, 2506; 12 Am. Law Rev. 380.

FISHING BANKS. A fishing ground of comparative shoal water in the sea. 21 Ore. 523.

FISHING-BILL. A term used in equity for a bill that seeks a discovery upon general, loose, and vague allegations. Story, Eq. Pl. § 325; on that ground alone, such a bill will be at once dismissed; 32 Fed. Rep. 208.

Referring to a bill in equity or to interrogatories, "fishing" imports seeking to pry into the title or individual affairs of an adverse party.

A "fishing bill" is a bill in which the plaintiff shows no cause of action, and endeavors to compel the defendant to disclose a cause in the plaintiff's favor. Anderson; 11 Barb. 298. A bill in equity that seeks a discovery upon general, loose, and vague allegations. Id. 32 F. R. 263.

FISK. In Scotch Law. The revenue of the crown. Generally used of the personal estate of a rebel which has been forfeited to the crown. Bell, Dict.

FISTUCA (Lat.; spelled, also, festuca; called, otherwise, baculum, virga, fustis). The rod which was transferred, in one of the ancient methods of feoffment, to denote a transfer of the property in land. Spelman, Gloss. See FESTUCA.

FIT. Suitable; appropriate; conformable to a duty. Fit for cultivation refers to that condition of soil which will enable a farmer with a reasonable amount of skill to raise regularly and annually, by tillage, grain or other staple crops; 34 Cal. 581; 13 Ired. L. 37; 29 Kan. 598.

FIVE CIVILIZED NATIONS. Several of the more powerful Indian tribes occupying the Indian Territory, known as the "five civilized nations," namely the Cherokees, Chickasaws, Choctaws, Creeks, and Seminoles, and the tribes incorporated into these nations, have adopted to a great extent the habits of civilized life, and have established a well-organized constitutional government secured to them by treaties and Acts of Congress. Each nation has its elective executive head, a dual legislative and a judiciary system, with superior and inferior courts. They may enact laws for the regulation of their internal affairs provided such laws are not in conflict with the constitution and laws of the United States, and the proceedings and judgments of their courts in cases within their jurisdiction stand on the same footing and are entitled to the same faith and credit as those of the territories of the Union. (4 Okla. 5.) 16 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 214. See INDIAN TERRITORY.

FIVE MILE ACT. An act of parliament passed in 1603, 17 Chas. II. c. 2, forbidding nonconformists who refused to take the oath of non-resistance to come within five miles of any corporation in which they had preached since the passing of the act of oblivion in 1600. This act was nullified by the toleration act of 1689.

This was the popular title both of the statute 35 Eliz. c. 2, and of the statute 17 Car. 2. c. 2. The Act of Elisabeth forbade "popish recusants" who had been convicted of failing to attend the services of the Established Church to move more than five miles from their usual places of abode; and the statute of Charles, amongst other things, prohibited persons preaching in non-conformist places of worship, from being, except when on a journey, within five miles of any city, incorporated town or borough sending burgesses to Parliament. Byrne.

FIX. To determine; to settle; 52 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 673. A constitutional provision to the effect that the general assembly shall fix the compensation of officers, means that it shall prescribe or "fix" the rule by which such compensation is to be determined. 18 Ohio 9.

FIX COMPENSATION. "Fix" declares stability and confirmation. The opposite of change. In the phrase "increase and fix the compensation" it is the natural complement of the power to increase,—establishes the increase. 248 U. S. 408.

FIXING BAIL. In Practice. Rendering absolute the liability of special bail.

The bail are fixed upon the issue of a ca. sa. (capias ad satisfaciendum) against the defendant; 3 N. & M.C. 589; 16 Johns. 117; 3 Harr. N. J. 9; 11 Tex. 15; and a return of non est thereto by the sheriff; 4 Day 1; 2 Bail. 492; 3 Rich. S. C. 145; 1 Vt. 276; 7 Leigh 371; made on the return-day; 2 Metc. Mass. 590; 1 Rich. S. C. 421; unless the defendant be surrendered within the time allowed ex gratia by the practice of the court; 8 Conn. 816; 9 S. & R. 24; 2 Johns. 101; 1 Dev. N. C. 91; 11 Gill & J. 92; 8 Cal. 532; 17 Ga. 68.

In New Hampshire, 1 N. H. 472; Massachusetts, 2 Mass. 485; Missouri, 69 Mo. 359; Tennessee, 5 Yerg. 183; and Texas, 7 Tex. App. 279; bail are not fixed till judgment on a sci. fa. is obtained against them, except the death of the defendant after a return of non est to an execution against him.

The death of the defendant after a return of non est by the sheriff prevents a surrender, and fixes the bail inevitably; 5 Binn. 332; 4 Johns. 407; 3 M'Cord 49; 4 Pick. 120; 4 N. H. 29; 12 Wheat. 604. See 1 Ov. 224; 1 Ohio 35; 2 Ga. 331.

In Georgia and North Carolina, bail are not fixed till judgment is obtained against them; 3 Dev. 155; 61 Ga. 197, 492. See BAIL.

FIXTURES. Personal chattels affixed to real estate, which may be severed and removed by the party who has affixed them, or by his personal representative, against the will of the owner of the freehold. There is much dispute among the authorities as to what is a proper definition. Bro. Fixt. 1; Tyler's Fixt. 35; 6 Am. L. Rev. 412, where various definitions are reviewed.

Anything fixed or attached to a building, and used in connection with it, movable or immovable. Whenever the appendage is of such a nature that it is not part and parcel of the building, but may be removed without injury to the building, then it is a movable fixture and does not pass with a conveyance of the freehold. If, however, it be so connected with the building, that it cannot be severed from it without injury to the building, then it is part of the realty and passes with the conveyance of the soil; 95 Ala. 77.

Questions frequently arise as to whether given appendages to a house or land are to be considered part of the real estate, or whether they are to be treated as personal property: the latter are movable, the former not.

The annexation may be actual or constructive. 1st, By actual annexation is understood every mode by which a chattel can be joined or united to the freehold. The article must not be merely laid upon the ground; it must be fastened, fixed, or set into the land, or into some such erection as is unquestionably a part of the realty; otherwise it is in no sense a fixture; Bull. N. P.

34; 8 East 88; 9 id. 215; Pothier, Traité des Choses § 1; 20 Wend. 636; 3 Blackf. 111. Locks, iron stoves set in brickwork, posts, window-blinds, and a mirror firmly attached to the chimney breast by molding, afford examples of actual annexation; see 5 Hayw. 100; 20 Johns. 29; 1 Harr. & J. 289; 3 M'Cord 533; 9 Conn. 63; 1 Miss. 508, 620; 7 Mass. 432; 15 id. 159; 4 Ala. 314; 36 W. Va. 671; 43 Ill. App. 585; 2d, by constructive annexation. Some things have been held to be parcel of the realty, which are not annexed or fastened to it; for example, deeds or chattels which relate to the title of the inheritance and go to the heir; Shep. Touch. 469; 31 Barb. 632; 41 N. H. 503. Cars used in connection with a drier in a brickyard, and which are indispensable to the use of the drier, are part of the realty, and a mechanic's lien will attach thereto; 37 Ill. App. 60. So wires and insulators used in forming and completing the connection between an electric light and power plant and the places supplied with light and heat by such plant; 32 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 69; 48 Kans. 182; gas burners, chandeliers, and the like; 31 N. J. L. 181; 4 Mete. Ky. 357; 18 L. T. N. S. 300. Tubs, vats, and casks placed in a brewery with a design of permanent use therein and which are too large to pass out of any existing opening are part of the realty; 47 Fed. Rep. 756. So deer in a park, fish in a pond, and doves in a dove-house, go to the heir, and not to the executor, being, like keys and heirlooms, constructively annexed to the inheritance; Shep. Touch. 90; Pothier, Traité des Choses § 1. But loose, movable machinery used in prosecuting any business to which the freehold is adapted cannot be considered part of the real estate nor in any way appurtenant to it; 12 N. H. 205; 6 Exch. 295; 14 Allen 136; 55 Fed. Rep. 229. See, however, 2 W. & S. 116, 380.

The criterion of an irremovable fixture is the united application of three requisites: (1) real or constructive annexation of the article in question to the freehold; (2) appropriation or adaptation to the use or purpose of that part of the realty with which it is connected; (3) the intention of the party making the annexation to make the article a permanent accession to the freehold; 117 Ind. 176; 42 Kan. 213.

The general rule is, that fixtures once annexed to the freehold become part of the realty. But to this rule there are exceptions: as, first, where there is a manifest intention to use the fixture in some employment distinct from that of the occupant of the real estate; second, where it has been annexed merely for the purpose of carrying on a trade; 8 East 88; 4 Watts 390; for the fact that it was put up for such a purpose indicates an intention that the thing should not become part of the freehold. See 1 H. Bla. 200. Buildings may, by agreement of parties, be erected upon land without becoming affixed thereto; 150 U. S. 483. But if there is a clear intention that the thing should be permanently annexed to the realty, its being used for purposes of trade would not, perhaps, bring the case within one of the exceptions; 1 H. Bla. 200. The tendency of modern authorities is to make the intention of the parties the general rule for deciding whether an article is realty or personalty; L. R. 7 C. P. 828; 12 N. Y. 170; 17 Am. Dec. 690; 96 Ala. 44. But the intention must be definitely expressed by words or acts; mere unexpressed mental intention is of no avail; 16 Ill. 480; 43 N. H. 390; 48 P. 808. See 42 Mich. 889, and note. This intention will prevail except as against innocent purchasers; 117 Ind. 176.

With respect to the different classes of persons who claim the right to remove a fixture, it has been held that where the question arises between an executor and the heir at law the rule is strict that whatever belongs to the estate to which the fixture appertains will go to the heir; but if the ancestor manifested an intention (which it is said may be inferred from circumstances) that the things affixed should be considered personalty, they will be so treated, and will go to the executor. See Bac. Abr. Executor, Administrator; 2 Stra. 1141; 1 P. Wms. 94; Bull. N. P. 84; 19 Cl. & F. 812; 86 Am.

Rep. 448. As between a vendor and a vendee the same strictness applies as between an executor and an heir at law; for all fixtures which belong to the premises at the time of the sale, or which have been erected by the vendor, whether for purposes of trade or manufacture or not, as potash-kettles for manufacturing ashes, and the like, chandeliers and gas-brackets, pass to the vendee of the land, unless they have been expressly reserved by the terms of the contract; 6 Cow. 863; 20 Johns. 29; Ewell, Fixt. 271; Tyler, Fixt. 519; 28 Weekly Law Bul. 149; (see also 1 Daly. N. Y. 487; 10 Rich. L. 135;) a faucet attached to a hot-water boiler and a rosebush in the yard pass by deed of the realty; 19 N. Y. Sup. 831; but a filter capable of delivering 105 gallons of water per minute, resting loosely on a factory floor, is a fixture; 62 Hun 618. The same rule applies as between mortgagor and mortgagee; 15 Mass. 159; 147 id. 500; 1 Atk. 477; 16 Vt. 124; 12 N. H. 205; Ewell, Fixt. 271. Wires for conducting an electrical current to lamps pass as fixtures under a mortgage of the electric light plant; 12 Pac. Rep. (Ariz.) 694; and the annunciator and all the wires of an electric-bell system are part of the realty of a hotel and pass as fixtures under a mortgage; 63 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 257; in which case steam radiators and an office-desk attached to the building were held to be fixtures, while gas-burners and chandeliers were held not to pass as such to the mortgagee; contra, as to the last point; 24 N. Y. Supp. 70; and in 28 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 694, it was held that steam radiators and valves were not annexed to the realty, but being exactly analogous to gas fixtures were severable from the realty. The question whether ranges, hot-water boilers, sinks, and wash-tubs are fixtures under a mortgage depends on when and how they are attached to the house; 24 N. Y. Supp. 70; and as between devisee and the executor, things permanently annexed to the realty at the time of the testator's death pass to the devisee,—his right to fixtures being similar to that of a vendee; 2 B. & C. 80; Ferard, Fixt. 246. Tapestry which has been cut and pieced so as to cover the walls of a room and the space left by the doors and mantelpiece, and was hung by being nailed to wooden buttons let into the plaster and nailed to the brick work, passed as a fixture under the devise of the mansion-house; [1896] 2 Ch. 497; see also 3 L. R. Eq. 382, where, under the provisions of a will, tapestry, pictures, and frames filled with satin and attached to the walls, and also statues, figures, vases, and stone garden seats purchased and set in place by the testator who was tenant for life, which were essentially part of the house or the architectural designs of the building or grounds, however fastened, were fixtures, and could not be removed, but glasses and pictures not in panels, not being part of the building, were not fixtures.

Where a husband, managing his wife's property as her agent, voluntarily, at his own expense, places thereon a boiler, engine, and connections for furnishing power, and subsequently joins his wife in executing a mortgage on the land, the boiler and engine are not trade fixtures, and the husband, as against the purchasers at sheriff's sale on proceeding, under the mortgage, has no right to remove them; 180 Pa. 383.

But as between a landlord and his tenant the strictness of the ancient rule has been much relaxed. The rule here is understood to be that a tenant, whether for life, for years, or at will, may sever at any time before the expiration of his tenancy, and carry away all such fixtures of a chattel nature as he has himself erected upon the demised premises for the purposes of ornament, domestic convenience, or to carry on trade; provided, always, that the removal can be effected without material injury to the freehold; 16 Day 323; 16 Mass. 449; 2 Dev. 376; 1 Bail. 541; 19 N. Y. 234; Ewell, Fixt. 76; 69 Tex. 146; 42 Kan. 23; 47 Ill. App. 38; and this is so whether it be made of wood or brick; 142 U. S. 396. There have been adjudications to this effect with respect to bakers' ovens; salt-pans; carding-machines; cider mills and furnaces; steam-engines; soap-boilers' vats and copper stills; mill-stones; Dutch barns standing on a foundation of brick-work set into the ground; a varnish-house built upon a similar foundation, with a chimney; and to a ball-room, erected by the lessee of an inn, resting upon stone posts slightly imbedded in the soil; and also in regard to things ornamental or for domestic convenience: as, furnaces; stoves; cupboards and shelves; bells and bell-pulls; gas-fixtures; portable hot-air furnace; 4 Gray 256; 127 Mass. 125, and note; 34 Am. Rep. 353; 89 Pa. 506; 92 Mich. 532; 55 Fed. Rep. 229; pier and chimney-glasses, although attached to the wall with screws; marble chimney-pieces; grates; window-blinds and curtains. The decisions, however, are adverse to the removal of hearth-stones, doors, windows, locks and keys; because such things are peculiarly adapted to the house in which they are affixed; also, to all such substantial additions to the premises as conservatories, greenhouses (except those of a professional gardener), stable, pig-styes and other out-houses, shrubbery and flowers planted in a garden. Nor has the privilege been extended to erections for agricultural purposes; though it is difficult to perceive why such fixtures should stand upon a less favored basis than trade fixtures, when the relative importance of the two arts is considered; Tyl. Landl. & Ten. § 644; 3 East 38; 13 Pa. 438. But some American authorities question the correctness of the doctrine in its application to the United States; 2 Pet. 137; 20 Johns. 29; Ferard, Fixt. 60. A railroad company, occupying land under an agreement, on the termination of such, may remove the rails which have been laid; 142 U. S. 396.

The time for exercising the right of removal is a matter of some importance. A tenant for years may remove them at any time during his term and afterwards, if he is in possession and holding over rightfully; 7 M. & W. 14; 14 Cal. 59; 40 Ind. 145; 55 Fed. Rep. 239. But tenants for life or at will, having uncertain interests in the land, have, after the determination of their estates not occasioned by their own fault, a reasonable time within which to remove their fixtures; 9 Atk. 13; 19 N. J. 258; 102 Mass. 193; but a tenant at will whose tenancy can only be terminated after reasonable notice, has not this privilege; 37 Minn. 459.

If a tenant quits possession of the land without removing such fixtures as he is entitled to, the property in them immediately vests in the landlord, and though they are subsequently severed, the tenant's right to them does not revive. If, therefore, a tenant desires to have any such things upon the premises at the expiration of his term, for the purpose of valuing them to an incoming tenant, or the like, he should take care to get the landlord's consent; otherwise he will lose his property in them entirely; 1 B. & Ad. 894; 2 M. & W. 450; Tyl. Fixt. 73; 32 W. Va. 68. The rights of parties with respect to particular articles are sometimes regulated by local customs, especially as between outgoing and incoming tenants; and in cases of this kind it becomes a proper criterion by which to determine the character of the article, and whether it is a fixture or not.

FLACO. A place covered with standing water.

FLAG. A symbol of nationality carried by soldiers, ships, etc., and used in many places where such a symbol is necessary or proper.

Nationality is determined by the flag when all other requisites are complied with: 5 East 808; 3 B. & P. 201; 1 C. Rob. Adm. 1; 1 Dods. Adm. 81, 131; 9 Cra. 388; 2 Pars. Marit. Law 114, 118, n. 129.

A ship navigating under the flag and pass of a foreign country is to be considered as bearing the national character of the country under whose flag she sails; Wheat. Int. L. 3d Eng. ed. § 840. In an unusual case during the French and German war a vessel really of Swiss (neutral) ownership bore the German flag because Swiss subjects were not permitted to fly the Swiss federal flag and France had refused to recognize any Swiss maritime flag. The French Conseil des Prises held, reversing the decision below, that she was not a German vessel and restored her to her owners; Daloz. Jur. Gén. pt. iii. p. 94 (14 espèces).

A cargo documented as foreign property in the same manner as the ship by which it is carried, and covered by a foreign flag, is not, under the English rule, the subject of capture; 5 Rob. Rep. 2; id. 5, note. In that country, although the ship is held to be bound by the character imposed upon it by the authority of the government from which all the documents issue, yet goods which have no dependence upon the authority of the state may be differently considered; and if the goods be laden in time of peace, though sailing under a foreign flag, they are not subjects of capture; id.; but these licenses are construed with great liberality in the British courts of admiralty; Stew. Vice Adm. 360.

The doctrine of the courts in this country has been very strict as to this point, and it has been frequently decided that sailing under the license and passport of protection of the enemy in furtherance of his views and interests was, without regard to the object of the voyage or the port of destination, such an act of illegality as subjected both ship and cargo to confiscation as prize of war; 8 Cra. 181; id. 203; id. 444; 2 Wheat. 143; 4 id. 100. These decisions placed the objection to such licenses on the ground of pacific dealing with an enemy and as amounting to a contract that the party to whom the license is given should, for that voyage, withdraw himself from the war and enjoy the repose and blessings of peace. The illegality of such intercourse was strongly condemned; and it was held that, the moment a vessel sailed on a voyage with an enemy's license on board, the offence was irrevocably committed and consummated, and that the delictum was not done away even by the termination of the voyage, but the vessel and cargo might be seized after arrival in a port of the United States and condemned as lawful prize. See 1 Kent 85, 104; Wheat. Int. L. (3d Eng. ed.) 340.

By the rules of the United States Navy the use of a foreign flag to deceive an enemy is permissible, but it must be hauled down before a shot is fired, and under no circumstances will it be allowable to commence an action or to fight a battle without the display of the national flag; Snow, Int. L. 96.

Law of the Flag. An expression applied to the municipal law of the country to which a ship belongs of which the flag is the symbol, when that law is resorted to in preference to the lex loci contractus for the construction and effect of a contract or the determination of a liability affecting the ship or her cargo.

The law of the flag is "to regulate the liabilities and regulations which arise among the parties to the agreement, be it of affreightment or by hypothecation, upon this principle, that the ship-owner who sends his vessel into a foreign port gives a notice by his flag to all who enter into contracts with the shipmaster, that he intends the law of that flag to regulate those contracts, and that they must either submit to its operation or not contract with him or his agent at all;" Foote, Priv. Int. L. 408; and in England this rule is usually followed, the tendency being that, in the absence of indication of the intention of the parties the presumption is in favor of the law of the ship's flag; Scrutton, Chart. Part. 11; contra, 3 Moo. P. C. N. s. 272;

199 U. S. 397; 13 Q. B. D. 589; 10 id. 540; in which cases it was held that the lex loci contractus must prevail. In his treatise on merchant shipping (3d ed. 170) MacLachlin thus states the rule as to the effect of the law of the flag on the authority of the master. "The agency of the master is devolved upon him by the law of the flag. The same law that confers his authority, ascertains its limits, and the flag at the mast-head is notice to all the world of the extent of such power to bind the owners or freighters by his act. The foreigner who deals with this agent has notice of that law, and, if he be bound by it, there is no injustice. His notice is the national flag which is hoisted on every sea and under which the master sails into every port, and every circumstance that connects him with the vessel isolates that vessel in the eyes of the world, and demonstrates his relation to the owners and freighters as their agent for a specific purpose and with power well defined under the national maritime law; id.; this was suggested by the author quoted as a possible explanation of the apparently anomalous exception of bottomry bonds from the general rule that the lex loci contractus prevails.

This precise rule was followed in the leading English case of Lloyd v. Guibert, where the question was as to the master's authority to bind the ship-owner; L. R. 1 Q. B. 115; s. c. 6 B. & S. 100, and 33 L. J. Q. B. 245; s. c. on appeal 35 id. 74; 6 B. & S. 120.

In this case, in the Queen's Bench, Blackburn, J., in language almost exactly following that above quoted, applied the law of the flag (French), which did not recognize a personal liability of the owner in a bottomry bond, as against the lex loci contractus (Danish), or the laws of the place of performance (English), or that of the place when the cargo was loaded (Haytien). The court after noting the "singular absence of authority" said that two American cases had been cited; 1 La. 528 and 3 Sto. 465, adding that "neither of these decisions is binding on us, but we have derived very great assistance from them." As to the last of these cases there follows this comment: "The very learned judgment of Mr. Justice Story just referred to affords a complete answer to a plausible argument in which was suggested that the general maritime law clothed the master with power to bind his owners absolutely, and that the municipal law of the owner's country was analogous to secret restrictions in the ostensible authority of a partner or other agent clothed with general power." In the Exchequer Chamber, where the judgment was affirmed, Willes, J., said: "The general rule, that where the contract of affreightment does not provide otherwise, there, as between the parties to such contract, in respect of sea damage and its incidents, the law of the ship should govern, seems to be not only in accordance with the probable intention of the parties, but also most consistent and intelligible, and therefore most convenient to those engaged in commerce." The same doctrine was applied by the English Court of Appeal to the master's control over the cargo as well as the ship, by Brett, L. J., in L. R. 7 P. D. 137; by Dr. Lushington in Br. & L. 88, and in a later case by Sir J. Hannen, who sustained a sale of part of a damaged cargo, where it was shown by the result to have been unnecessary, such sale being authorized by the law of the flag; [1891] Prob. 828. But see 1 La. 249; id. 528, where the lex loci contractus was held to prevail.

In 3 Sto. 465, although the law of the flag was, in fact, enforced, the decision cannot be said to have followed the rule laid down by MacLachlin, as in that case the particular point decided was as to liability of the owner to the freighter, when the former was a citizen of a state the laws of which did not recognize such liabilities, while by the law of the state in which the freighter resided and also of the foreign port where the cargo was shipped, such a liability existed, and the lex domicilii of the ship-owners was held to govern the contract. See also 8 Pet. 538; BOTTOMRY.

As to the effect of the law of the flag upon the construction of a contract of affreightment, the decisions in this country as a rule are usually governed by the lex loci contractus. In the case of The Brantford City, Judge Brown thus stated this rule: "The 'law of the flag' . . . does not embody any rule of legal construction. Literally, it is but a concise phrase to express a simple fact, namely, the law of the country to which the ship belongs, and whose flag she bears, whether it accords with the general maritime law or not. In so far, however, as the law of the flag does not represent the general maritime law, it is but the municipal law of the ship's home. It has, therefore, no force abroad, except by comity. But foreign law is not adopted by comity, unless some good reason appear in the particular case why it should be preferred to the law of the former. The most frequent and controlling reasons are the actual or presumed intent of the parties or the evident justice of the case arising from its special circumstances.

On this ground, the law of the ship's home is applied by comity, to regulate the mutual relations of the ship, her owner, master, and crew, as among themselves; their liens for wages, and modes of discipline; 1 W. Rob. 35; 1 Low. 455; 3 Fed. Rep. 577; 29 id. 127. For the same reason it is also applied, by comity, to torts on the high seas, as between vessels of the same nation, or vessels of different nations subject to similar laws, though not if they are subject to different laws; 105 U. S. 24. Independently of the intent of the parties, the law of the flag has no application to cases of tort, as between ships or persons of different nationalities and conflicting laws; and Federal law, by which stipulations of a common carrier exempting him from the consequence of his own negligence are held to be against public policy and void, is controlling in suits brought here upon shipments made here on board foreign ships under bills of lading signed by foreign masters, though such stipulations be valid by the law of the ship's flag." 29 Fed. Rep. 373.

This case is expressly approved by the supreme court in a case upon the same point, which is the leading American case upon this branch of the subject; 129 U. S. 397, 401. See comments on this case by the circuit court of appeals; 67 Fed. Rep. 493. Precisely the contrary view, under almost identical circumstances, was held in the case of The Missouri and the doctrine of Lloyd v. Guibert was held to extend to this particular point; 41 Ch. Div. 321. Where both the law of the flag and the lex loci contractus were British, the law of England was held to govern the contract; 63 Fed. Rep. 268; 40 id. 627; affg. 56 id. 247. In a shipment of goods in England, in an English vessel, on an ordinary bill of lading, the liability of the vessel is to be determined according to the law of the place of shipment, as the law of the flag; 19 Fed. Rep. 101. So also where the bill of lading was made expressly subject to "a live stock contract," and there was an express provision in that contract that all questions relating to the bill of lading should be determined by British law; 24 Fed. Rep. 922. But the circuit court of appeals, in a similar case, where the bill of lading contained the "so-called flag clause" (that liability should be determined by the law of England, but there was no reference to this in the charter, made in this country), held it no evidence to modify the latter and that it was ineffective to substitute the law of the flag for the lex loci contractus with respect to the stipulation for exemption from liability for negligence; 66 Fed. Rep. 607; affg. 58 id. 126.

Generally it may be said that the doctrine of the Missouri is in conflict with the current of authority in England, it being usually held in that country that as to such stipulations in the bill of lading the lex loci contractus prevails; 9 Q. B. D. 118; 10 id. 521, 540; 12 id. 590; 8 Moo. P. C. N. s. 272; and to the same effect and under precisely similar circumstances is a judgment of the court of cassation in France, imperfectly stated in a note to the case last cited and fully reported in 75 Journal du Palais (1884) 225, and see 1 Dalloz 449. This question, it may be remarked, is as yet scarcely to be considered as settled by any hard-and-fast rule of law, and the only certain guide, says Bowen, L. J., "is to be found in applying sound ideas of business, convenience, and sense to the language of the contract itself with a view to discovering from it the true intention of the parties."

Flag of Truce. A white flag displayed by one of two belligerent parties to notify the other party that communication and a cessation of hostilities are desired.

Although each party has the right to send such a flag, there is no obligation on the commander of the enemy's forces to receive it; Snow, Int. L. 96; although it is usual to do so except in very exceptional cases; Davis, Int. L. 238; but if he receive the flag he may take all reasonable precautions to protect himself from any injury that may result from the presence of an enemy within his lines; he may detain the messenger at the outposts or may cause him to be blindfolded, but such messenger is entitled, if the bearer of a bona fide message, to complete inviolability of person; but during an engagement, firing is not necessarily to cease on the appearance of a flag of truce, unless it be made clear that it is exhibited as a token of submission; Snow, Int. L. 97. The rules of war justly forbid the sending of flags of truce for the purpose of obtaining information either directly or indirectly, and a messenger forfeits his inviolability of person and may be detained and subjected to punishment as a spy if he take advantage of his mission to abet an act of treachery. See Davis; Snow, Int. L.; and also article 45 of the Project of an International Declaration concerning the laws and customs of war proposed in the Brussels conference of 1874. This proposal, though not formally adopted because of a failure of unanimous assent, is of great value as a compact statement of the generally accepted views at that time of the great powers of Europe on the subjects covered by it. It may be found in Wheat. Int. L., 8d Eng. ed. § 411 l.

In naval operations the senior officer alone is authorized to dispatch or admit flags of truce. The firing of a gun from the senior officer's vessel is generally understood as a warning to approach no nearer. The flag of truce should be met at a suitable distance by a boat or vessel in charge of a commissioned officer having a white flag plainly displayed from the time of leaving until her return, and the same precautions must be observed in dispatching such a flag; Snow, Int. L. 97. See BANNER.

FLAG OF TRUCE. A white flag, which, when displayed by a belligerent, denotes a desire to enter into negotiations with the enemy. The bearer of such a flag cannot insist upon being admitted, and if he offers himself during the progress of an engagement, the enemy is not obliged to cease firing, and is not responsible if the bearer of the flag is accidentally killed or injured. Though the bearer is not expected to refrain from making observations or from reporting what he may learn without effort on his part, he is punishable as a spy if he abuses the flag by surreptitiously obtaining military knowledge thereunder. 16 A. & E. Ency. 2d ed., 1159.

FLAG OF THE UNITED STATES. By the act entitled "An act to establish the flag of the United States," passed April 4, 1818, 3 Story, U. S. Laws 1007, it is enacted—

§ 1. That from and after the fourth day of July next, the flag of the United States be thirteen horizontal stripes, alternate red and white; that the union be twenty stars, white in a blue field.

§ 2. That, on the admission of every new state into the Union, one star be added to the union of the flag; and that such addition shall take effect on the fourth day of July then next succeeding such admission. See Preble, Hist. of Amer. Flag.

It has been held in an unreported case in Illinois that a statute requiring the national flag to be floated over every school-house during school hours is unconstitutional, on the ground that, it transcended the police power of the state, Wright, J., contending that the legislature could not enact a statute with penal sanctions unless it had for its object "the maintenance of the police authority of the state, the morals of the state, or the health of the state." The question that arose in this case was whether, in a group of college buildings, each building was compelled to display a separate flag, and the decision that one flag floated from a flagstaff for the group of buildings, was not a compliance with the law is severely criticised in 30 Am. L. Rev. 746.

FLAGELLAT. Whipped; scourged. An entry on old Scotch records. 1 Pitt. Crim. Tr. pt. 1, p. 7.

FLAGRANS (Lat.). Burning; raging; in actual perpetration. Flagrante bello, while war is actually in progress. Flagrant necessity, an urgent and immediate peril or emergency which will excuse an act under other circumstances unlawful.

FLAGRANS CRIMEN. In Roman Law. A term denoting that a crime is being or has just been committed: for example, when a crime has just been committed and the corpus delictum is publicly exposed, or if a mob take place, or if a house be feloniously burned, these are severally flagrans crimen.

The term used in France is flagrant delit. The Code of Criminal Instruction gives the following concise definition of it, art. 41: "Le délit qui se commet actuellement ou qui vient de se commettre, est un flagrant délit."

FLAGRANTE DELICTO (Lat.). In the very act of committing the crime. 4 Bla. Com. 307.

FLAGRANTLY. "Flagrantly against the evidence" means that it is palpably against the evidence. 160 Ky. 45, 189 S. W. 546.

FLANGE WHEEL. A wheel contrived for an omnibus, with a disc capable of being lowered against the wheel into a groove in the rail of the tramway and drawn up when running on the pavement, has been held a flange wheel. 6 C. P. D. 70.

FLAT. When used as a description of anything respecting an arm of the sea means a level place over which the water stands or flows. 34 Conn. 424.

A floor or separate division of a floor, fitted for housekeeping and designed to be occupied by a single family. Cent. Dict.

A building, the various floors of which are fitted up as flats, either residential or business.

A flat is in law a house, though in fact only a part of one in the ordinary sense; L. R. 8 Q. B. D. 423; and the contract between the owner and the occupier is classed among "contracts for permissive use." Holland, Jur. 254.

The owner of a building who rents flats therein retains control of all portions not actually demised to tenants; [1898] Q. B. 177; 9 Allen 17; he is bound to keep such portions in a reasonable state of repair, and a failure so to do renders him liable in damages; 101 Mass. 251; 106 id. 94; 129 id. 33; 151 id. 162; 81 Me. 818; 67 id. 545; 31 Hun 80; 93 N. Y. T. 918; 68 id. 685; 127 id. 881; 180 id. 269; 4 C. B. N. S. 556; 8 C. P. 326; but the owner is not an insurer, and when he has constructed his roofs, pipes, or drains with the reasonable foresight commonly exercised by prudent men, he will not be responsible for a latent defect or an unusual stress of circumstances; 27 N. B. 499; L. R. 6 Ex. 217; 89 N. Y. Sup. Ct. Rep. 246; 5 Q. B. D. 602. Where the upper rooms only are leased, a covenant is implied on the part of the lessor to give such rooms the necessary support; 26 N. Y. 498; 28 Mo. App. 116; and he is under a negative duty to do nothing to lessen or decrease such support, or to render it insecure; 50 Hun 181; 46 id. 521.

It is the duty of the owner to keep the elevators in a reasonable state of repair, employ competent persons to work them, exercise due regard to the safety of the persons using them, keep the approaches to them properly lighted, and keep the entrance to them on each floor closed when the cage is not at that floor; 3 T. L. R. 500. See ELEVATOR.

As regards the furnishing of artificial light in halls and passage-ways, it has been held that in the absence of contractual obligation there is no legal duty on the part of the owner to furnish such light; 26 N. Y. Supp. 801; 131 N. Y. 674; contra, 154 Mass. 235.

The janitor, being appointed and removable by the owner, is, when engaged in the discharge of his general duties, the landlord's servant. Any particular tenant may sue the owner for damages, if the general services so contracted for are not rendered, but when a janitor is engaged by a tenant on some special service, such tenant becomes dominus pro tempore, and as such he incurs a liability similar to the landlord's; so when he attempts to interfere with or assume the direction of the janitor when the latter is discharging any general duty. See [1893] 1 Ch. 1. In either case his duties and liabilities are regulated by the general principles of the law of Master and Servant (q. v.).

The distinction between the tenants of flats and lodgers and guests at a hotel is, that while the latter may have the exclusive enjoyment of their lodgings or rooms, they have not, as have the tenants of flats, the exclusive possession; 30 L. J. M. C. 74.

See, generally, APARTMENT; LEASE; LANDLORD AND TENANT.

A place within a river, cove, creek, or harbor, more or less under water; "a shallow or 'shoal water.'" Anderson; 34 Conn. 376.

A flat place on a mountain top.

FLAVIANUM JUS (Lat.). A treatise on civil law, which takes its name from its author, Cneius Flavius. It contains forms of actions. Vicat, Voc. Jur.

FLECTA. A feathered or fleet arrow. Cowell.

FLEDUTE. A discharge or freedom from amercements where one having been an outlawed fugitive cometh to the place of our lord of his own accord. Termes de la Ley.

The liberty to hold court and take up the amercements for beating and striking. Cowell.

The fine set on a fugitive as the price of obtaining the king's freedom. Spelman, Gloss.

FLEDWITE. FLIGHWITE (Sax. flyth, flight, and wite, punishment.) A discharge from amercements, where a person having been a fugitive came to the peace of our King, of his own accord, or with license. Termes de la Ley; Cun. L. Dict. But some authorities add to this definition a quere whether it is not rather a fine set upon a fugitive to be allowed to return to the king's place. Cowell; Holt-house.

FLEE FROM JUSTICE. To leave one's home, residence, or known place of abode, or to conceal one's self therein, with intent in either case to avoid detection or punishment for some public offence. 48 Mo. 240; 8 Dill. 381.

FLEET. A place of running water where the tide or float comes up.

A famous prison in London, so called from a river or ditch which was formerly there, on the side of which it stood. It was used especially for debtors and bankrupts, and persons charged with contempt of the courts of chancery, exchequer, and common pleas. Abolished in 1843 and pulled down in 1845. Such persons as had been sent there were thereafter sent to the Marshalsea. Moz. & W.; Hayden's

Dict. Dates.

FLEET BOOKS. The original records of the marriages celebrate in the Fleet Prison between 1686 and 1754. These books are not, it is said, admissible in evidence to prove a marriage, as they were not made under public authority, but on a question of pedigree they might, perhaps, be admitted to show the name under which a woman passed at the time of her marriage there. Tayl. Ev. § 1430. These books are now deposited in the office of the registrar-general.

Consist of about three hundred large books, or registers, and about a thousand "pocket books" containing entries of marriages and baptisms celebrated in or about the Fleet Prison between 1674 and 1754. Up to 1821, when they were purchased by the Government, they were in private hands. After 1821 they were in the Registry of the Consistory Court of London, from which they passed to the Registrar-General under the Non-Parochial Registers Act, 1840, s. 6, Byrne.

FLEET MARRIAGES. Under the common law, neither banns, license, nor clergyman were absolutely necessary for the validity of a marriage. One of the means by which persons might validly be married was mere consent of the parties in the presence of witnesses. Another valid means was a clandestine marriage by a person in priest's orders. The Fleet marriages were clandestinely performed, in defiance of ecclesiastical authority, by persons who were, or pretended to be, in priest's orders; and they were therefore valid either qua clandestine marriages celebrated by a priest, or qua matrimonial contracts in the presence of witnesses. They were celebrated by a class of disreputable persons living in or about the Fleet Prison, who cared nothing for ecclesiastical censures, in any room—frequently a tap-room—which they saw fit to use. The first on record took place in 1613. From 1674 to 1754 many thousands of these marriages took place. In 1753 the statute 26 Geo. 2, c. 33 was passed and made any such marriage impossible as from 25th March, 1754. Byrne; Burn, 2nd ed. Hist. Fleet Mar.

FLEM. A fugitive bondman or villein. Spelman. The possession of the goods of such fugitives was called flemeswite. Fleta, lib. 1. c. 147.

(From Sax. flean, to kill or slay.) An outlaw. Tomlin.

FLESH. Includes live flesh and dead flesh. 2 Pa. Dist. Rep. 437.

FLET. A house or home. Cowell.

FLETA. The title of an ancient law-book, supposed to have been written by a judge while confined in the Fleet Prison; written about 1290.

It is written in Latin, and is divided into six books. The author lived in the reigns of Edward II. and Edward III. See lib. 2, cap. 86, § Item quod nullus; lib. 1, cap. 20, § que caperunt; 10 Coke, pref. Edward II. was crowned A. D. 1308. Edward III. was crowned 1328, and reigned till A. D. 1377. During this period the English law was greatly improved, and the lawyers and judges were very learned. Hale, Hist. Comm. Law 103; 4 Bla. Com. 427, says of this work "that it was for the most part law until the alteration of tenures took place." The same remark he applies to Britton and Hengham.

But a late work speaks of it as "little better than an ill-arranged epitome." 1 Poll. & M. Hist. Engl. Law 188.

FLICHWITE. A fine on account of brawls or quarrels. Spel. Gloss.

FLIGHT. In Criminal Law. The evading the course of justice by a man's voluntarily withdrawing himself. Formerly, if the jury found that the party fled for it, whether he were found guilty or not of the principal charge, he forfeited his goods and chattels. 4 Bla. Com. 887. Evidence of the flight of an accused person has a tendency to establish guilt; 164 U. S. 492. See FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE; EXTRADITION.

FLIGHTWITE. The same as FLEDWITE (q. v.).

FLOAT. A certificate authorizing the party possessing it to enter a certain amount of land. 30 How. 504. See 7 C. C. A. 288.

A Mexican grant of quantity, as of a certain number of leagues of land lying within a larger tract, whose boundaries are given, is a float, subject to location within the tract by the government before it can attach to any specific lands; 149 U. S. 652; 127 id. 428.

FLOATABLE. A stream capable of floating logs, etc., is said to be floatable. 2 Mich. 519.

FLOATING CAPITAL. Capital retained for the purpose of meeting current expenditure.

It includes raw materials destined for fabrication, such as wool and flax products in the warehouses of merchants or manufacturers; such as cloth or linen and money for wages and stores. De Laveleye, Pol. Ec.

FLOATING DEBT. That mass of lawful and valid claims against a corporation, for the payment of which there is no money in the corporate treasury specifically designed, nor any system of taxation or other means of providing money to pay, particularly provided. 71 N. Y. 374.

FLODEMARK. High-tide mark. Blount. The mark which the sea at flowing water and highest tides makes upon the shore. And. 189; Cunningham, Law Dict.

FLOGGING. Thrashing or beating with a whip or lash. This system of punishment was abolished in the army by act of Aug. 5, 1861; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1342; in the navy June 6, 1872; id. § 1642. See WHIPPING.

FLOOD. An inundation of water over land not usually covered by it. Such an accident is an Act of God. 4 Harr. Del. 449. See ACT OF GOD.

FLOODING LAND. See EMINENT DOMAIN; WATER; WATERCOURSE.

FLOOR. The section of a building between horizontal planes. 145 Mass. 8. "Floor cloth canvas" has been held to be synonymous with "oil cloth foundations"; 1 Otto 362. In a lease the words "first floor" are equivalent to the "first story" of a building and include the walls unless other words control the meaning; 145 Mass. 8.

The horizontal part of the interior of a building upon which persons walk. English.

The floor of a court, in England, is that part between the judge's bench and the front row of counsel. Litigants appearing in person, in the High Court or Court of Appeal, are supposed to address the court from the floor. R. & L. Dict.

In Parliamentary Practice. That member of a public body in session whose right it is to speak, i. e. who has been recognized by the chairman, or other person presiding at the time, is said to "have the floor"; in other words, to be entitled to address the meeting in preference to any other member. Id.

FLORENTINE PANDECTS. A copy of the Pandects, discovered accidentally at Amalfi, Italy, about 1187, and afterwards removed to Florence. Buit. Hor. Jur. 90.

FLORIDA. The name of one of the states of the United States of America, being the fourteenth admitted to the Union. It was discovered by Ponce de Leon in 1513; settled by Huguenots in 1562, and permanently settled by Spaniards at St. Augustine in 1565; and ceded to Great Britain in 1763, to Spain in 1783, and to United States in 1819. The Americans took possession in 1821.

It was admitted into the Union in 1845 by virtue of the act of congress entitled: "An act for the admission of the states of Iowa and Florida into the Union," approved March 3, 1845, and the present constitution was adopted Feb. 25, 1845.

The declaration of rights, in addition to the usual guarantees, provides as follows: That the paramount allegiance of every citizen is due to the federal government, and that no power exists with the people of the state to dissolve its connection therewith; and that the state shall ever remain a member of the American Union, and any attempt to dissolve said union shall be treated with the whole power of the state.

FLOREN (called also Guilder). A coin, originally made at Florence.

The name formerly applied to coins, both of gold and silver, of different values in different countries. In many parts of Germany, the florin, which is still the integer or money-unit in those countries, was formerly a gold piece, value about two dollars and forty-two cents. It afterwards became a silver coin, variously rated at from forty to fifty-six cents, according to locality; but by the German conventions of 1837 and 1858 the rate of nine-tenths fine and one hundred and sixty-three and seven-tenths grains troy per piece was adopted, making the value forty-one cents. This standard is the only one now used in Germany; and the florin or guilder of the Netherlands is, also, coined at nearly the same standard (weight, one hundred and sixty-six grains; fineness, eight hundred and ninety-six thousandths), the value being the same. The florin of Tuscany is only twenty-seven cents in value.

FLOTAGES. Things which float by accident on the sea or great rivers. Blount.

The commissions of water-bailiffs. Cunningham, Law Dict.

FLOTSAM, FLOTSAN. A name for the goods which float upon the sea when cast overboard for the safety of the ship, or when a ship is sunk. Distinguished from Jetsam and Ligan. Bracton, lib. 2, c. 5; 5 Co. 106; Comyns, Dig. Wreck, A; Bacon, Abr. Court of Admiralty, B; 1 Bla. Com. 292. See JETTISON; LIGAN.

FLOU-MARKE. Flode-mark, which see.

FLOWAGE. The overflowing with water, the water which thus overflows. Webster.

The natural flowage of water from an upper estate to a lower one is a servitude which the owner of the latter must bear, though the flowage be not in a natural watercourse with well defined banks; 95 Mich. 588; 48 Cal. 346; 98 id. 157. Where one drains water from his land into the highway, causing another's crops to be damaged by flowage through a drain connected with the highway, he is liable; 44 Ill. App. 649. See EMINENT DOMAIN; WATER; WATERCOURSE.

FLOWING LANDS. Raising and settling back water on another's land by a dam placed across a stream or watercourse which is the natural drain and outlet for the surplus water on such land, 2 Gray 235. See EMINENT DOMAIN; WATER; WATERCOURSE.

FLUCTUS. Flood; flood tide. Bracton fol. 255.

FLUMEN (L. Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a servitude which consists in the right of turning the rain-water, gathered in a spout, on another's land. Erskine, Inst. b. 2, t. 9, n. 9; Vicat, Voc. Jur. See STILLICIDIUM.

FLUMINE VOLUCRES. Wild fowl; water fowl. 11 East 571.

FLUVIOUS. A public river; flood tide.

FLY FOR IT. Anciently, it was the custom in a criminal trial, to inquire after a verdict of not guilty, "Did he fly for it?" Abolished by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28. Wharton.

The question "Did he fly for it?" was anciently put to a jury in order to enable them to find whether one charged with treason or felony had fled in order to avoid justice. Byrne.

FLYING SWITCH. This is made by uncoupling the cars from the locomotive while in motion, and throwing the cars on to the side track, by turning the switch, after the engine has passed it, upon the main track. 20 Iowa 89. See RAILROAD.

FLYMA. One escaped from justice; a fugitive. Anc. Inst. Flyman Frymth, was the offence of harboring a fugitive; id.

FOCAGE. Housebote; firebote. Cowell.

FOCALE (L. Lat.). In Old English Law. Firewood. The right of taking wood for the fire. Fire-bote. Cunningham, Law Dict.

FODERUM (L. Lat.). Food for horses or other cattle. Cowel.

In feudal law, fodder and supplies provided as a part of the king's prerogative for use in his wars or other expeditions. Cowel.

FODERTORIUM. Provisions to be paid by custom to the royal purveyors. Cowel.

FODUS (Lat.). A league; a compact.

FEMINA VERO CO-OPERTA. A feme covert.

FENERATION. See FENERATION.

FENUS NAUTICUM (Lat.). The name given to marine interest.

The amount of such interest is not limited by law, because the lender runs so great a risk of losing his principal. Erskine, Inst. b. 4, t. 4, n. 76. See MARINE INTEREST.

FESCA. Herbage; grass. Cowel.

FETICIDE. In Medical Jurisprudence. Of late years this term has been applied to designate the act by which criminal abortion is produced. 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 298; Guy, Med. Jur. 138. See INFANTICIDE.

FETURA (L. Lat.). In Civil Law. The produce of animals, and the fruit of other property, which are acquired to the owner of such animals and property by virtue of his right. Bowyer, Mod. C. L. c. 14, p. 81.

FETUS (Lat.). In Medical Jurisprudence. An unborn child. An infant in ventre sa mère.

An arbitrary distinction is made by some writers between fœtus and embryo, the latter term being used for the product of conception up to the fourth month of gestation and the former term after the fourth month.

Although it is often important to know the age of the fœtus, there is great difficulty in ascertaining the fact with the precision required in courts of law. The great difference between children at birth, as regards their weight and size, is an indication of their condition while within the womb, and is a sufficient evidence of the difficulty as to the age of the fœtus by its weight and size at different periods of its existence.

Thousands of healthy infants have been weighed immediately after birth, and the extremes have been found to be two and eighteen pounds. It is very rare indeed to find any weighing as little as two pounds, but by no means uncommon to find them weighing four pounds. So it is with the length, which varies as much as that of the adult does from the average height of the race.

Neither can anything positive be learned from the progress of development; for although the condition of the bones, cartilages, and other parts will generally mark with tolerable accuracy the age of a healthy fœtus, yet an uncertainty will arise when it is found to be unhealthy. It has been clearly proved, by numerous dissections of newborn children, that the fœtus is subject to diseases which interfere with the proper formation of parts, exhibiting traces of previous departure from health, which had interfered with the proper formation of parts and arrested the process of development.

Interesting as the different periods of development may be to the philosophical inquirer, they cannot be of much value in legal inquiries from their extreme uncertainty in denoting precisely the age of the fœtus by unerring conditions.

Jur. 291. And see the articles BIRTH, DEAD-BORN; EN VENTRE SA MÈRE; FETICIDE; INFANTICIDE; LIFE; PREGNANCY; QUICKENING.

FOG. Watery vapor precipitated in the lower part of the atmosphere, and disturbing its transparency. It differs from cloud only in being near the ground. Webster.

It has been held that fog is a generic term, descriptive of all conditions of the atmosphere increasing the perils of navigation, and that its meaning should not be limited to the strictly technical definition of the word, excluding mist or falling snow. 13 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 727; 71 Fed. Rep. 215.

Every vessel must, in a fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rain storm, go at a moderate speed, having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions; 187 U. S. 380. A speed of six miles per hour is excessive for a steamer in a dense fog, where she is emerging from New York harbor and is likely to meet vessels from many points of the compass; 153 U. S. 64.

The owner of a sailing vessel cannot substitute for the fog-horn which she is required by the sailing regulations to carry, an instrument blown by steam, and in their opinion more efficient than the fog-horn; 5 U. S. App. 314. See 153 U. S. 94. A vessel is not properly equipped at sea which has no spare mechanical fog-horn; 55 Fed. Rep. 117.

A steamer failing to slack its speed in a fog is at fault in case of collision; 5 U. S. App. 314; 1 id. 614; 54 Fed. Rep. 542; 52 id. 400; [1892] Prob. 105. See COLLISION.

FOGAGIUM (L. Lat.). Coarse, rank grass which has not been eaten off in the summer. Cowel.

FOI. In French Feudal Law. Faith; fealty. Guyot, Inst. Feod. c. 2.

FOINISUM. The fawning of deer. Spel. Gloss.

FOITERERS. Vagabonds. Blount.

FOLC-GEMOTE (spelled, also, folk-mote, folemote, folkgemote; from folc, people, and gemote, an assembly).

A general assembly of the people in a town, burgh, or shire.

During the time at which the separate tribal nations of Britain were under the control or supremacy of the kingdoms of Northumbria, York, and West Saxony successively, the term was applied to the council of the freemen of each village. Tacitus calls it the nation assembled in arms. Their meetings were held each fortnight, and the members bound themselves reciprocally to the peaceful behavior of themselves, their families, and their dependents; 2 Burke, Abr. Eng. Hist. ch. 7. They chose their rulers, the folc kings, at this tribal moot, settled matters of unjust trading, the common tillage and pasturage, and all things that concerned the common household; 1 Soc. Eng. 126, 139. The conqueror so far as possible endeavored to preserve the customs of the people, but with the growth of the royal power the most important questions were referred to the councillors of the king, comprising the bishops, abbots, and eorldeirmen who succeeded the folc kings in the folcs or shires and designated the witenagemote or council of the wise men; this in turn dissolved into the curia regis; Inderwick, King's Peace. About this period the spelling of the word changes from folc-moot to folk-moot. The meeting of the folk-moot was then transferred to London, and was held thrice a year, and the principal duties laid upon it were to hear royal proclamations and statutes, to choose mayors and burgesses, and to pronounce upon offenders the sentence of outlawry; 1 Poll. and Maitl. 648. The folk-moot and the witenagemote are said to have been the foundation of the English Parliament. See Stubbs, Sel. Chars. 10-13; Inderwick, King's Peace; Bagehot, Physics and Politics; Manwood, For. Laws; Spelman, Gloss.; De Brady, Gloss.; Cunningham, Law Dict.; PARLIAMENT; WITENAGEMOTE.

FOLCLAND (Sax.). Land of the people. Spelman, Gloss. Said by Blackstone to be land held by no assurance in writing, but to have been distributed amongst the common people at the pleasure of the lord, and resumable at his discretion. 2 Bla. Com. 90; Cowel.

It was, however, probably, land which belonged to the community, and which, being parcelled out for a term to people of all conditions, reverted again to the commons at the expiration of the term. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 8; Whart. Law Dict., 2d Lond. ed.

The subject of land-tenure among the Anglo-Saxons is very obscure. Doubtless all land was originally held in common by the tribe or kingdom, and out of this after a time portions of it were disposed of to individuals. Individual ownership was generally designated by the term alod, which comprised original allotments which had the name ethel, and those which were carved out of the common lands by grant or charter. The tenure of the latter was designated by the term bockland, which is described as "land which is held under a bock, under a privilege, modelled on Roman precedents, expressed in Latin words, armed with ecclesiastical sanctions, and making for alienation and individualism." 8 Eng. Hist. Rev. 1-17. The folcland which was not granted as bockland could be let out for temporary occupation as tenement. A late theory maintained in the review quoted by Dr. Vinogradoff is that folcland indicated an estate, not belonging to the folk, but held by folk-right or customary law, and not subject to disposition of the holder. id.; Medley, Eng. Const. Hist. 16. On this theory the modern copy-holders are termed the historical successors of the owners of folcland; id. 86; Follock, Land Laws 48. Nothing is certain except that the terms referred to were used, but their precise scope is the merest speculation, and successive writers invent new theories with the freedom which is invited by the lack of definite historical or documentary information. The subject affords ample scope for theorizing, as most of what is written upon the subject is of this character, and it is said that the word folcland is only found technically used three times in Anglo-Saxon literature. The theory of Vinogradoff, above stated is curiously supported by Professor Maitland, in his Domesday Book and Beyond (which appears while this article is still in press). He says, referring to the author cited: "His argument has convinced us; but as it is still new we will take leave to repeat it with some few additions of our own." The subject of book-land and folk-land is elaborately discussed and the three documents in which the latter word occurs, as above stated, are fully described. The conclusion is thus stated: "Land, it would seem, is either book-land or folk-land. Book-land, is land held by book, by a royal and ecclesiastical privilege. Folk-land is land held without book, by unwritten title, by the folk-law. 'Folk-land' is the term which modern historians have rejected in favour of the outlandish alod. The holder of folk-land is a free landowner, though at an early date the king discovers that over him and his land there exists an alienable superiority. Partly by alienations of this superiority, partly perhaps by gifts of land of which the king is himself the owner, book-land is created. Edward's law speaks as though it were dealing with two different kinds of land. But really it is dealing with two different kinds of title: the same land might be both book-land and folk-land, the book-land of the minister, the folk-land of the free men who were holding, not indeed 'of' but still 'under' the minister. They or their estates had held under the king, but the king had booked their land (which also in a certain sense was his land) to a church. . . . 'Bookland' is a briefer term than 'land held by book-right'; 'folk-land' is a briefer term than 'land held by folk-right'. The same piece of land may be held by book-right and by folk-right; it may be book-land and folk-land too."

See Medley, Eng. Const. Hist. 16; Stubbs, Const. Hist. 86; 1 Poll. and Maitl. 88; Kemble, Sax. in Eng. 306; Lodge, Essays in Anglo-Saxon Law 68; Maitland, Domesday Book 226, 258.

FOLC-RIGHT. The common right of all the people. A law common to all the realm, mentioned by King Edward the elder. It is doubtless in the same sense that the phrase common law originated. 1 Bla. Com. 65, 67.

FOLD-COURSE. In English Law. Land used as a sheep-walk.

Land to which the sole right of folding the cattle of others is appurtenant; sometimes it means merely such right of folding. The right of folding on another's land, which is called common foldage. Co. Litt. 6 a, note 1; W. Jones 375; Cro. Car. 482; 2 Ventr. 139.

FOLD-SOKE. A feudal service which consisted in the obligation of the tenant not to have a fold of his own but to have his sheep lie in the lord's fold. He was said to be consuetus ad foldam, tied to his lord's fold. The basis of this service is thus expressed by a recent writer: "It is manure that the lord wants; the demand for manure has played a large part in the history of the human race." Maitland, Domesday Book 78. In East Anglia the peasants had sheep enough to make this an important social institution; id. 442.

FOLDGAGE. A privilege possessed in some places by the lord of a manor, which consists in the right of having his tenants' sheep to feed on his fields, so as to manure the land. The name of foldage is also given in parts of Norfolk to the customary fee paid to the lord for exemption at certain times from this duty. Elton, Com. 45, 46. See FOLD-SOKE.

FOLGARI. Menial servants; followers. Bract.

FOLGERAS. See HEORDFESTE.

FOLGERE. In Old English Law. A freeman who has no house or dwelling of his own, but is the follower or retainer of another (heorhfaest), for whom he performs certain predial services. Anc. Inst. Eng.

FOLGERS. Menial servants or followers. Cowel.

FOLGOTH. Official dignity.

FOLIO. A leaf. The references to the writings of the older law-authors are usually made by citing the folio, as it was the ancient custom to number the folio instead of the page, as is done in modern books.

A certain number of words specified by statute as folio. Wharton. Originating, undoubtedly, in some estimate of the number of words which a folio ought to contain.

In Michigan it has been held that a legal folio is one hundred words: 88 Mich. 689; and that number is generally made a folio by statute: R. S. U. S. § 828.

FOLK-LAND. See FOLC-LAND.

FOLK-MOOT. See FOLC-GEWOTE; WITTENA-GEWOTE.

FOLLOWING BASIS. An agreement that an adjustment in general average shall be made on the "following basis," followed by a statement of the amount to be contributed for the valuation of the ship after collision, and the valuation of the freight and the cargo, does not mean that the freight shall be assessed on its gross valuation, but merely that the valuation shall be taken as the foundation upon which the adjustment shall be made according to law; and if the law applicable prescribes that the freight shall be assessed at one half its gross value, as in California, this will prevail. 58 Fed. Rep. 801.

FONDS PERDUS. In French Law. Capital is said to be invested a fonds perdu when it is stipulated that in consideration of the payment of an amount as interest, higher than the normal rate, the lender shall be repaid his capital in this manner. The borrower, after having paid the interest during the period determined, is free as regards the capital itself. Arg. Fr. Merc. Law 560.

The repayment of a sum by paying an instalment of it with the interest. English.

FONSADERA. In Spanish Law. Any tribute or loan granted to the king for the purpose of enabling him to defray the expenses of a war.

FONTANA. A fountain of water. Bract. fol. 238.

FOOD. What is fed upon to support life by being received within and assimilated by the organism of an animal or plant; nutriment; aliment; provisions; victuals. Webster.

The exposure of unwholesome provisions for sale as food is not criminal, unless the person guilty thereof knew of their unwholesome character; 44 Mo. App. 429. Although a statute suppressing the manufacture of oleomargarine may be unnecessarily oppressive, redress can only be had through the legislature; 127 U. S. 678. See OLEOMARGARINE.

A dealer who sells food sealed in a can to a buyer who knows that the seller has not prepared nor inspected it, and is ignorant of its contents, except so far as results from the fact that he has purchased it from others, gives no implied warranty that it is wholesome and fit for use; 89 N. Y. Supp. 1052. See ADULTERATION; HEALTH.

FOOD AND DRUG ACTS. Acts intended to serve one or both of two purposes: To preserve the public health, and to prevent deception. The title of the federal law, the so-called Food and Drugs Act, June 30, 1906 which is typical, is "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes." West. P. F. & D. L. 1.

FOOT. A measure of length, containing one-third of a yard, or twelve inches. See ELL. Figuratively it signifies the conclusion, the end; as, the foot of the fine, the foot of the account. See 10 Metc. 28; 5 McLean 804.

FOOT OF THE FINE. The fifth part or the conclusion of a fine. It includes the whole matter, reciting the names of the parties, day, year, and place, and before whom it was acknowledged or levied. 2 Bla. Com. 351.

FOOT FRONT. See FRONT FOOT.

FOOTGELD. An amercement for not cutting out the ball or cutting off the claws of a dog's feet (expediating him). To be quit of footgeld is to have the privilege of keeping dogs in the forest unlawed without punishment or control. Manw. For. Laws, pt. 1, p. 86; Crompton, Jur. 197; Termes de la Ley; Cunningham, Law Diet.; EXPEDIATING

FOOTPRINTS. Impressions made by the feet of persons, or their shoes, boots, or other covering for the feet, on the ground, snow, or other surface. In the same category are also impressions of shoe-nails, patches, abrasions, or other peculiarities therein. When found at or near the scene of a crime they often lead to the identification of guilty parties.

"The presumption founded on these circumstances has been appealed to by mankind in all ages, and in inquiries of every kind, and it is so obviously the dictate of reason, if not of instinct, that it would be superfluous to dwell upon its importance." Will, Circ. Ev. 194. It is said that evidence of footprints and their correspondence with defendant's feet may be proved even when his agency is disputed, not as alone convincing, or indeed, available, but as tending to establish a case; Whart. Cr. Ev. § 795; even where the defendant's proof tended to establish an alibi; 25 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 820. Evidence of footprints alone has been held insufficient to convict; 1 F. & F. 354; 19 Ia. 230; 17 Fla. 669; and unless the measurement is careful and accurate, or there is some peculiarity shown, the probative force is slight; 31 Fla. 240; 3 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 406; 57 Ga. 432; 89 Mo. 168; but in many cases such peculiarities have been shown and evidence of the footprints admitted; 8 Tex. Cr. App. 30; 117 Ill. 271; 59 Ga. 788; 17 Kan. 458; 10 Crim. L. Mag. 890; but a conviction on such evidence will be reversed for refusal to admit proof for the defendant that he has never worn a shoe which would make such a print; 12 Tex. Crim. App. 219; the discovery and comparison should be prompt with relation to the crime; 53 Ga. 253; and the measurement should be accurate; 12 Tex. Crim. App. 219; 8 id. 392; though it need not be immediate, the question of time going to the weight of the evidence, not to its competency; 68 Cal. 576.

The identification of such tracks is a matter of common observation, which does not require expert testimony; 63 N. Y. 590; 68 Ala. 509; 84 N. C. 750; and only the peculiarity of the tracks and the facts of identification may be proved, but not the opinion of the witness whether they were made by the defendant; 7 Neb. 320; 88 Ala. 193; 98 id. 10; but a witness has been permitted to prove the measurement of the tracks and their exact correspondence with the shoe of the defendant; 30 Tex. App. 482; the examination and the comparison need not be made in the presence of the defendant; 84 N. C. 750; nor can he be compelled to put his foot in the track to make evidence against himself; 63 Ga. 667; but where he was compelled to do so the evidence was admitted; 74 N. C. 646; and tracks have been voluntarily made by the accused before the jury for comparison with those proved; 80 Ga. 269. Comparison of the shoes with the footmarks should be made before the former are put in the marks; 1 Lew. C. C. 116; and where this was not done the evidence on the subject was rejected; id.

Such evidence, even if established beyond doubt, is liable, as in all cases of circumstantial evidence, to be the subject of fabrication, or erroneous inference; see the case of Mayenc, Gabriel 403, where the shoes of another person were put on by one committing a crime; and the celebrated case of Thornton, fully reported in Will, Circ. Ev. 236, where an alibi was successfully proved after apparently conclusive circumstantial evidence, including footprints.

Proof may be made by horse-tracks corresponding with those made by a horse of defendant; 83 Tex. Crim. App. 112; or that shoes taken from such horse fitted the tracks; 28 Ala. 44; and when the prisoner had reversed the shoes of his horse after reaching the house, to give the impression that two persons had been there, the artifice led to his detection by the discovery of recent nail-marks in the horse's hoof; Spooner's Case, 2 Chand. Am. Crim. Tr.; but horse-tracks alone are not sufficient to convict; 65 Ia. 614; and see 8 Tex. Cr. App. 332.

For a full discussion of the subject, see Will, Circ. Ev. 194-204, in which will be found most of the cases here cited and many others.

The mark of a foot: footstep; a trace; a footprint. Worcester Dict.

In Criminal Law. On a question of identity, footprints are admissible as evidence if they correspond to those which would be made by the boots probably worn, (63 N. Y. 590), or the horse probably ridden, (23 Ala. 44), yet alone are inadequate to justify a conviction. (1 Post. & F. 354.) 2 Bishop, New Crim. Pro. 2nd ed., 943.

FOR. In place of or in front of. 37 Wis. 265. Because or on account of; by reason of; as agent for; in behalf of. 31 N. Y. 103; AGENT. Used in connection with a period it means "during," where publication is required for at least thirty days, one publication thirty days before the sale would not be a compliance. 18 Neb. 139. And see 16 Ohio 563; 12 Kan. 493. It may, if necessary, be inserted in a statute by judicial construction; 25 Minn. 522.

In a contract it implies a condition precedent; Hob. 41; 5 M. & S. 187. See also 12 Mod. 455.

In French Law. A tribunal. Le for interieur, the interior forum; the tribunal of conscience. Poth. Obl. pt. 1, c. 11, art. 3.

FOR ACCOUNT OF. A phrase used in an order, draft, or memorandum to designate the person against whom, or account against which, the thing or sum is to be charged.

FOR THE ACCOUNT, SELLING. A method of selling stock by stock brokers. The broker may, in executing the order of a client, enter into a contract for the specific amount of stock ordered to be bought or sold, or may include such order with others he may have received in a contract for the entire quantity, or in quantities at his convenience.

Neither in stock exchange contracts is there any real appropriation to any particular client of any particular stock in any transaction entered into with the jobber. Each transaction only forms an item in an account with that jobber, or more correctly, with the house generally—that is to say, specific delivery or acceptance of that amount of stock is not necessarily made; but the transaction is liable to be balanced at any time during that account by a counter transaction by the same broker on behalf of the same or any client, or even on his own behalf, so that the balance only of all purchases and sales of that particular stock made by the broker in the house generally is to be finally accepted or delivered by him, and this through the instrumentality of the clearing house and the system of tickets. 182 U. S. 487, quoting Dos Passos on Stock Brokers and Stock Exchanges, 276.

FOR COLLECTION. See INDORSEMENT.

FOR DEPOSIT TO THE CREDIT OF. See INDORSEMENT.

FOR GOOD CAUSE. A statute authorizing a continuance "for good cause" in the absence of a party is satisfied by proof of the illness of plaintiff in another state, and the ignorance of his attorney of the names of the witnesses and the details of the case. 35 Cal. 636.

Has no certain meaning in a stipulation for canceling a contract. 14 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 1074; 40 Mich. 324. In a statute for the removal of a public officer for good cause, the cause must be one which touches the qualifications of the officer for the office, and shows that he is not a fit or proper person to perform the duties thereof. Id.; 45 Neb. 321.

Where the charter of a railroad provided that the report of the commissioners appointed to appraise compensation for land might be set aside for good cause shown, it was held that nothing was good cause for setting aside the report but such matters as led to a reasonable apprehension that an injustice had been done in settling the amount of damages, or some improper conduct on the part of the commissioners, the company, or their agents in regard to the assessments. Id.; 14 N. J. L. 162.

FOR AT LEAST. As applied to a number of days required for notice this phrase includes either the first or last day, but not both. 28 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 578. See TIME. See AT LEAST.

FOR THAT. In Pleading. Words used to introduced the allegations of a declaration. "For that" is a positive allegation; "For that whereas" is a recital. Hamm. N. P. 9.

FOR THAT WHEREAS. Introductory words in pleading. See Hamm. N. P. 9. These words are used in the introduction of the statement of the plaintiff's case as a recital in the declaration in all actions except trespass, in which there being no recital the expression was "For that." 1 Burr. Inst. Cler. 170.

FOR USE. Words used to describe a suit, judgment, or decree in which the nominal plaintiff sues for the benefit or advantage of another. This is necessary in some cases where an assignee is obliged to sue in the name of the assignor. The style of the suit is "for use, etc., vs. B."

Loans for use are distinguished from loans for consumption; the former being those in which the article bailed is to be used and returned and the latter those in which it may be consumed and returned in kind.

FOR VALUE AND WITHOUT NOTICE. See PURCHASER FOR VALUE AND WITHOUT NOTICE.

FOR WHOM IT MAY CONCERN. A general clause in a policy of insurance, intended to apply to all persons who have any insurable interest. 1 Phill. Ins. 152. This phrase, or some similar one, must be inserted, to give any one but the party named as the insured rights under the policy. See 1 Term 313, 464; 1 B. & P. 316, 345; 2 Maule & S. 485; 12 Mass. 80; 13 id. 589; 6 Pick. 198; 2 Pars. Marit. Law 29, 477; 13 East 274.

FORAGE. Hay and straw for horses, particularly in the army. Jac.

FORAGIUM. Straw when the corn is threshed out. Cowel.

FORAKER ACT. The act which temporarily provided a civil government and revenues for the Island of Porto Rico. 182 U. S. 247. (Approved April 12, 1900, 31 Stat. 77, c. 191.)

FORANEUS. One from without; a foreigner; a stranger. Calv. Lex.

FORATHE. One who can take oath for another who is accused of one of the lesser crimes. Manw. For. Laws 3; Cowel.

FORBALCA. In Old Records. A forebalk; a balk (that is, an unplowed piece of ground) lying forward or next the highway. Cowel.

FORBAIVER. To deprive forever. To shut out. 9 Ric. II. cap. 2; 6 Hen. VI. cap. 4; Cowel.

FORBANNITUS. A pirate; an outlaw.

FORBARRE. To deprive one of a thing forever. Cowel.

FORBATUDUS. The aggressor slain in combat. Jac.

FORBEARANCE. A delay in enforcing rights. The act by which a creditor waits for the payment of a debt due him by the debtor after it has become due. It is sufficient consideration to support assumption.

An agreement to forbear bringing a suit for a debt due, although for an indefinite time, and even although it cannot be construed to be an agreement for a perpetual forbearance, if followed by actual forbearance for a reasonable time, is a good consideration for a promise; 183 Mass. 287; 123 id. 297; 110 id. 889.

See ASSUMPT; CONSIDERATION.

FORCE. Restraining power; validity; binding effect.

A law may be said to be in force when it is not repealed, or more loosely, when it can be carried into practical effect. An agreement is in force when the parties to it may be compelled to act, or are acting, under its terms and stipulations.

Strength applied. Active power. Power put in motion.

Actual force is where strength is actually applied or the means of applying it are at hand. Thus, if one break open a gate by violence, it is lawful to oppose force to force. See 2 Salk. 641; 8 Term 78, 357. See BATTERY.

Implied force is that which is implied by law from the commission of an unlawful act. Every trespass quare clausum fregit is committed with implied force. Co. Litt. 57 b, 161 b, 162 a; 1 Saund. 81, 140, n. 4; 5 Term 361; 8 id. 78, 358; Bac. Abr. Trespass; 8 Wils. 18; Fitzh. N. B. 890; 5 B. & P. 365, 454.

Mere nonfeasance cannot be considered as force, generally; 2 Saund. 47; Co. Litt. 161.

If a person with force break a door or gate for an illegal purpose, it is lawful to oppose force to force; and if one enter the close of another vi et armis, he may be expelled immediately, without a previous request; for there is no time to make a request; 2 Salk. 641; 8 Term 78, 357. When it is necessary to rely upon actual force in pleading, as in the case of a forcible entry, the words "manu forti," or "with a strong hand," should be adopted; 8 Term 357; 4 Cush. 441. But in other cases the words "vi et armis," or "with force and arms," are sufficient.

Municipal officers seizing private property under an order condemning it for a street, are not guilty of forcible trespass if they use no more force than necessary, even though the owner be present forbidding them; 100 N. C. 497. See FULL FORCE.

FORCE AND ARMS. A phrase used in declarations of trespass and in indictments, but now unnecessary in declarations, to denote that the act complained of was done with violence. 2 Chitty, Pl. 846, 850; 2 Steph. Com. 364. See FORCE.

FORCE AND FEAR, called also "vi metulque," means that any contract or act extorted under the pressure of force (vis) or under the influence of fear (metus) is voidable on that ground, provided, of course, that the force or the fear was such as influenced the party. Brown.

FORCE MAJEURE (Fr.). Superior or irresistible force. Emerig. Tr. des Ass. c. 12. See VIS MAJOR.

FORCED HEIRS. In Louisiana. Those persons whom the testator or donor cannot deprive of the portion of his estate reserved for them by law, except in cases where he has a just cause to disinherit them. La. Civ. Code, art. 1482. As to the portion of the estate they are entitled to, see LEGITIME. The causes for which forced heirs may be deprived of this right must be stated in the testament and also established by proof by the other heirs; id. Art. 1492.

FORCED OUT. Where a license to a corporation was to cease if the licensor was "forced out of the company," and one who had acquired all the stock, except that held by the licensor, procured from the company an assignment of all its property, and induced it to cease doing business, it was held that the licensor was "forced out of the company." 148 Ill. 115.

The phrase "forced out of the company" held to mean exclusion from the active and responsible management of the business of the corporation, and from the beneficial enjoyment of the anticipated profits of the enterprise. 13 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 741; 143 Ill. 115.

FORCED SALE. In Practice. A sale made at the time and in the manner prescribed by law, in virtue of execution issued on a judgment already rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction; a sale made under the process of the court, and in the mode prescribed by law. 6 Tex. 110.

A forced sale is a sale against the consent of the owner. The term should not be deemed to embrace a sale under power in a mortgage. 15 Fla. 336.

When the owner of a homestead estate consents to a sale under an execution or other legal process, the sale is not forced, but is as voluntary as when he directly effects the sale and executes the conveyance. Anderson; 33 Cal. 276. A sale under a power in a mortgage is a voluntary, not a forced sale. Id.; 15 Fla. 340.

FORCES. The military and naval resources of a country.

Regular Forces. While a declaration of war in the usual form calls upon all citizens to proceed to hostilities against the enemy, in practice this duty is limited to those persons who are impressed with military character by the national authority, to such, in short, as constitute the regular army and navy, (now include the aviation forces).

Irregular Forces. The employment of savages, etc., by civilized states as allies or subordinates in wars with other savages. Except as against their kind, the employment of savages is now condemned. The employment of guerrillas, banditti, etc., come under this head.

Navy Forces. In the United States the following are recognized as armed forces of the state at sea: (1) The officers and men of the navy, naval reserve, naval militia, and their auxiliaries; (2) the officers and men of all other armed vessels cruising under lawful authority. (Am. Naval Code. art. 9) Taylor, Int. Pub. Law. See MILITARY FORCES.

FORCHEAPUM. Pre-emption. Blount.

FORCIBLE ENTRY OR DETAINMENT. A forcible entry or detainer consists in violently taking or keeping possession of lands or tenements, by means of threats, force, or arms, and without authority of law. Comyns, Dig.; Woodf. Landl. & Ten. 973; 2 Bish. Cr. L. 489.

Such an entry as is made with strong hand, with unusual weapons, and unusual number of servants or attendants, or with menace of life or limb; an entry which only amounts in law to a trespass is not within statutes relating thereto. 21 Or. 541.

To make an entry forcible, there must be such acts of violence, or such threats, menaces, or gestures, as may give reason to apprehend personal injury or danger if standing in defence of the possession. But the force made use of must be more than is implied in any mere trespass; 8 Term 357; 10 Mass. 409; 1 Add. Pa. 14; Tayl. Landl. & Ten. § 786.

Driving the tenant from the premises by deadly weapons and an array of numbers is a forcible entry; 100 N. C. 466. It is sufficient to support an action of forcible entry that it was made against the will of the individual when in peaceable possession, and there need have been no actual force; 46 Mo. App. 11; 48 id. 148; 52 id. 226.

Proceedings in case of a forcible entry or detainer are regulated by the statutes of the several states, and relate to a restitution of the property, if the individual who complains has been dispossessed, as well as to the punishment of the offender for a breach of the public peace. And the plea of ownership is no justification for the party complained of; for no man may enter even upon his own lands in any other than a peaceable manner. Nor will he be excused if he entered to make a distress or to enforce a lawful claim, nor if possession was ultimately obtained by entreaty; Woodf. L. & T. 741, n.; 3 Mass. 215; 1 Dev. & R. 324; 8 Litt. 184; 8 Term 301; but, contra, it has been held, that an intruder in quiet possession of land may be forcibly expelled by the owner; 21 Or. 541; 64 Cal. 5. If the owner is guilty of a breach and trespass on the person of the intruder in taking possession of his land, he is liable for that, but his possession is lawful, and an action of trespass quare clausum is not maintainable against him; 9 Allen 530; 1 W. & S. 90; 54 Pa. 88. This follows the English doctrine as expressed by Parke, B., that, where a breach of the peace has been committed by a freeholder who, in order to get possession of his land, assaults a person wrongfully holding possession of it, although the freeholder may be responsible to the public for a forcible entry, he is not liable to the other party; and in an action brought against him, it is a sufficient justification that the tenant was in possession against the will of the owner; 14 M. & W. 437. See article in 4 Am. Law Rev. 429. A lessee never in possession cannot maintain unlawful detainer against the lessor, either at common law or statute; 48 Mo. App. 19. A change of possession pending a suit for forcible entry and detainer does not affect the right of recovery; 141 Ill. 395.

Upon an indictment for this offence at common law, the entry must appear to have been accompanied by a public breach of the peace; and, upon a conviction for either a forcible entry or detainer, the court will award restitution of the premises in the same manner as a judge in a civil court, under a statutory proceeding, is authorized to do upon a verdict rendered before him; 1 Ld. Raym. 512; 8 Term 360; Cro. Jac. 151; Al. 50; Tayl. Landl. & Ten. § 794.

Neither title nor right of possession is at issue, or can be made at issue, in an action of forcible entry and detainer; 8 Mont. 365.

FORCING FAN. A "forcing fan" is a mechanical contrivance used in a coal mine for supplying pure or fresh air, which, by a process of suction, withdraws the impure air from the air courses in the mine and causes the vacuum thus created to immediately fill by the pure air entering the mine at the main entry, from which it goes into the various entries, brattices or trap doors and curtains being maintained at certain openings to prevent the escape of the fresh air from the passage through which it is conveyed to the places of work. 160 Ky. 731, 170 S. W. 19.

FORDA. In Old Records. A ford or shallow, made by damming or penning up the water. Cowel.

FORDAL (Sax.). A butt or headband. A piece.

FORDANNO. A first assailant. Spel. Glos.

FORDIKA. In Old Records. Grass or herbage growing on the edge or bank of dikes or ditches. Cowel.

FORE (Sax.). Before. (Fr.) Out. Kelham.

FORECLOSE. To shut out; to bar. Used of the process of destroying an equity of redemption. 1 Washb. R. P. 689; Dan. Ch. Pr. 1204; Coote, Mortg. 511; 9 Cow. 882.

FORECLOSURE. In Practice. A proceeding in chancery by which the mortgagor's right of redemption of the mortgaged premises is barred or closed forever.

The modern significance of the term, as applied to mortgages, is that of a sale under a judgment of foreclosure, and not the judgment itself; 93 Cal. 600.

This takes place when the mortgagor has forfeited his estate by non-payment of the money due on the mortgage at the time appointed, but still retains the equity of redemption; in such case, the mortgagee may file a bill calling on the mortgagor, in a court of equity, to redeem his estate presently, or, in default thereof, to be forever closed or barred from any right of redemption.

In some cases, however, the mortgagee obtains a decree for a sale of the land under the direction of an officer of the court, in which case the proceeds are applied to the discharge of incumbrances, according to their priority. See 2 Johns. Ch. 100; 9 Cow. 348; 1 Sumn. 401; 7 Conn. 152; 5 N. H. 30; 1 Hayw. 482; 5 Ohio 554; 5 Yerg. 240; 2 Pick. 540; 2 Gall. 154; 4 Me. 495; 1 Washb. R. P. 580; Dan. Ch. Pr. 1204; Beach, Mod. Eq. Pr. 735.

In an action to foreclose a mortgage, there is no occasion for an entry for breach of condition; 60 Com. 24. Where, before beginning suit to foreclose for default in paying interest, the defaulted interest was paid and accepted, such acceptance is a waiver of any claim of forfeiture on account of the default; 85 Iowa 612.

As to the subject generally, and also as to Railway Foreclosure, see MORTGAGE.

FOREFAULT. In Scotch Law. To forfeit; to lose.

FOREGIFT. A premium paid by a lessee for his lease, separate and distinguished from the rent. A payment in advance.

FOREGOERS. Royal purveyors. 26 Edw. III. c. 5.

FOREHAND RENT. In English Law. A species of rent which is a premium given by the tenant at the time of taking the lease, as on the renewal of leases by ecclesiastical corporations, which is considered in the nature of an improved rent. 1 Term 466; 3 Atk. Ch. 473; Crabb, R. P. § 155.

FOREIGN. That which belongs to another country; that which is strange. 1 Pet. 348.

Every nation is foreign to all the rest; and the several states of the American Union are foreign to each other with respect to their municipal laws; 2 Wash. C. C. 282; 4 Conn. 517; 2 Wend. 411; 12 S. & R. 203; 2 Hill, S. C. 319; 7 T. B. Monr. 585; 5 Leigh 471; 3 Pick. 298; 10 Wall. 192; 99 Mass. 888.

But the reciprocal relations between the national government and the several states composing the United States are not considered as foreign, but domestic; 5 Pet. 898; 6 Id. 317; 9 Id. 607; 4 Cra. 384; 4 Gill & J. 1. 68.

FOREIGN ANSWER. An answer not triable in the county where it is made. Stat. 15 Hen. VI. c. 5; Blount.

FOREIGN OPPOSER. An officer in the exchequer who examines the sheriff's estreats, comparing them with the records, and apposeth (interrogates) the sheriff what he says to each particular sum therein. Coke, 4th Inst. 107; Blount; Cowel, Foreigne. The word is written opposer, opposeth, by Lord Coke; and this signification corresponds very well to the meaning given by Blount, of examiner (interrogator) of the sheriff's accounts.

FOREIGN ASSIGNMENT. An assignment made in a foreign country or in another state. 2 Kent 405. See ASSIGNMENT.

FOREIGN ATTACHMENT. A process by virtue of which the property of an absent and non-resident debtor is seized for the purpose of compelling an appearance, and, in default of that, to pay the claim of the plaintiff. See ATTACHMENT.

FOREIGN BILL OF EXCHANGE. A bill that is drawn in one country and made payable in another; and so if the parties to it reside in the same state, but the bill is drawn in one state and made payable in another state. Tiedeman, Com. Rep. § 3. See BILL OF EXCHANGE.

FOREIGN BOUGHT AND SOLD. A custom in London, which, being found prejudicial to sellers of cattle in Smithfield, was abolished. Wharton.

FOREIGN CHARITY. One created or endowed to be administered in a state or country foreign to that of the domicile of the benefactor. A bequest by a testator whose will is probated in one state establishing a charitable use to be administered by a corporation to be created by and in another state; all the trustees (thirteen in number) except two being non-residents of the state of domicile of the testator, is a foreign charity. The court of chancery of New Jersey will not administer such a charity, but when it is valid by the law of that state and of the state where it is to be executed, and the trustees have the legal capacity to receive the fund and carry out the charity, the court will order its payment to them, leaving it to the courts of the other state to see to its due administration. 84 N. J. Eq. 101. Such is the general rule; Boyle on Char. 134; Perry, Tr. § 741; Tudor, Char. Tr. 259; Hill, Trust. 408; Sto. Eq. Jur. § 1184; 19 Beav. 597. See also 2 Swanst. *181; Amb. 230; 1 Russ. 112; 1 Phil. 185; 18 Beav. 552; Taml. 79. CHARITABLE USE.

FOREIGN COINS. Coins issued by the authority of a foreign government.

There were formerly several acts of Congress passed which rendered certain foreign gold and silver coins a legal tender in payment of debts upon certain prescribed conditions as to the fineness and weight, but by the third section of the act of Feb. 21, 1837, 11 Stat. L. 103, it was provided: "That all former acts authorizing the currency of foreign gold or silver coins, and declaring the same a legal tender in payment for debts, are repealed; but it shall be the duty of the director of the mint to cause assays to be made from time to time of such foreign coins as may be known to our commerce, to determine their average weight, fineness, and value, and to embrace in his annual report a statement of the results thereof."

The value of foreign coins as expressed in the money of account of the United States shall be that of the pure metal of such coin of standard value; and the values of the standard coins in circulation of the various nations of the world shall be estimated annually by the director of the mint, and be proclaimed by the secretary of the treasury; R. S. § 3561; 22 Wall. 346.

The value of foreign coins as ascertained by the estimate of the director of the mint and proclaimed by the secretary of the treasury is conclusive upon custom-house officers and importers; 115 U. S. 28.

FOREIGN COMMERCE. "Commerce which in some sense is necessarily connected with these nations, transactions which either immediately or at some stage of their progress must be extra-territorial. The phrase can never be applied to transactions wholly internal." "Nor . . . because the products of domestic enterprise in agriculture or manufactures, or in the arts, may ultimately become the subjects of foreign commerce, that the control of the means or the encouragements by which enterprise is fostered and protected is legitimately within the import of the phrase foreign commerce." 14 How. 568, 578.

Relating to the United States. Every species of commercial intercourse between the United States and foreign nations. 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 192. Foreign commerce is under the regulation of Congress, by Constitutional provision. 3 Moore, Carriers 2nd ed., 1758. See COMMERCE; CARRIER; INTERSTATE COMMERCE; FOREIGN TRADE.

FOREIGN CORPORATION. One created by or under the laws of any other state or government.

A corporation is a person in most senses and for most purposes of legal administration, and for the purposes of determining the jurisdiction of the federal courts it is a citizen, but it is not such in the sense that a natural person is one, and hence for most purposes corporations are "foreign" as between the states. It is settled that it is not a citizen within the meaning of the constitutional guarantees entitling "the citizens of each state to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states;" 18 Pet.

519; 10 Wall. 566; 125 U. S. 181; 136 id. 114; 48 Ill. 172; 47 Ind. 236; 23 N. J. L. 429. It is said that corporations are persons within the meaning of the clauses of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution concerning the deprivation of property, and concerning the equal protection of the laws; Miller, Const. U. S. 668; but another recent writer considers it "past all doubt that the framers of this provision had no idea in their minds that it would be turned into a means of protecting foreign corporations and guaranteeing to them the same privileges which are enjoyed by domestic corporations. Such a doctrine would sweep away all the previous constitutional doctrine on the question of the status of foreign corporations," giving them the privileges and immunities which they have been held not to possess, and practically preventing their taxation and regulation, or any discrimination in the privileges or terms of business accorded to them and to domestic corporations. "Down to the present time, such construction has not been arrived at, although, such is the steady tendency of the federal judiciary to enlarge the rights of corporations, that it cannot be predicted whether it will not be reached in the near future;" 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7877. The status of foreign corporations is settled by decisions of the United States Supreme Court from which certain general principles are readily deducible, and are very well stated in 6 Thompson, Corp. §§ 7875 and 7781. "A corporation can have no legal existence out of the boundaries of the sovereignty by which it is created. It exists only in contemplation of law, and by force of the law, and where that law ceases to operate, and is no longer obligatory, the corporation can have no existence. It must dwell in the place of its creation, and cannot migrate to another sovereignty;" Taney, C. J., in Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519; 1 Black 286; 32 W. Va. 164. It may contract in other states within the scope of its own powers and subject to the laws of the lex loci contractus or the lex loci solutionis, as the case may be, as it was aptly said, natural persons may contract where they do not reside. "And what greater objection can there be to the capacity of an artificial person, by its agents, to make a contract within the scope of its limited powers, in a sovereignty in which it does not reside, provided such contracts are permissible by the law of the place?" 1 Pars. Sel. Cas. (Pa.) 180, 225. See 13 Pet. 388; 12 N. Y. 495; 18 Wis. 109; 10 Mo. 1059; 11 Paige 635. In the absence of proof, the validity of such contracts is presumed; 90 Ala. 207; 45 Ga. 34; 3 Duer 648.

In a very recent case it was said that a corporation organized under the laws of one state, which carries on its business in another state, carries with it into the latter state its corporate powers unless prohibited from exercising any of them by the laws or public policy of the state in which it so carries on business; 73 Fed. Rep. 956.

"Every power, however, which a corporation exercises in another state, depends for its validity upon the laws of the sovereignty in which it is exercised, and a corporation can make no valid contract without their sanction, express or implied;" Taney, C. J., in 13 Pet. 519, 588; any other exercise of power by it rests absolutely upon the doctrine of comity; id.; and is subject to the laws and regulations, process and remedial jurisdiction of the state of business or temporary domicile; 81 Me. 477; 2 Paine 501; 25 N. J. L. 381; 39 Fed. Rep. 290; 99 Mass. 148; 48 Barb. 478; and this comity stops short of permission to exercise any powers in excess either of the powers of domestic corporations of the same class; 38 Barb. 574; 128 N. Y. 205; 50 Fed. Rep. 838; 33 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 15, 16; or of the powers authorized by its own charter; 8 Head 337; 51 Mich. 145; 4 Johns. Ch. 370. So a telegraph company incorporated in Maryland, whose operations were by its charter limited to that state was refused, by the Delaware courts, a mandamus to compel a telephone company to furnish to it a telephone in aid of its business in Delaware; 31 Atl. Rep. (Del.) 714.

Foreign corporations are sometimes by the legislation of a state made domestic corporations for certain purposes, as for jurisdiction; 12 Wall. 65; 46 Fed. Rep. 47; 107 U. S. 581; 118 id. 161; and to determine when this is so is sometimes a matter of great difficulty; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7891; but where, by the concurrent action of two states, a railroad company is chartered or consolidated for police and jurisdictional purposes, it is as a whole treated as a domestic corporation of each state; id.; and cases cited in notes 2 and 3: 1 Black 286; 22 Fed. Rep. 561, 566; 12 Gratt. 655; 41 id. 551; 18 Md. 193; 5 R. I. 233; 12 Wall. 65; 25 Neb. 156, 164. See also as to the status of such corporations; 5 Railw. & Corp. L.J. 515.

The right of federal control of interstate commerce results in certain restraints upon the power of the states to regulate and tax foreign corporations so far as their business is held to be foreign or interstate commerce within the meaning of the federal constitution. The only limitation, however, on the powers of a state to exclude or exact conditions from a foreign corporation arises when the corporation is in the employ of the federal government or its business is strictly commerce, interstate or foreign; 125 U. S. 181; 119 id. 110. Such commerce receives the same protection when carried on by corporations or by individuals; 114 U. S. 106; and includes transportation; 15 Wall. 232; 125 U. S. 465; 135 id. 161; telegraph lines; 127 id. 640; which are also subject to federal regulation under acts of congress authorizing their location under certain conditions, on post roads; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1977; 96 U. S. 11; 105 id. 460; the sale of merchandise by a corporation of one state whether made without the state or by commercial travellers, to a resident of another; 92 Ala. 145; 57 Ark. 24; the sale of patented or copyrighted articles or books; 2 Biss. 309; 53 Ind. 454, the right to vend them anywhere within the United States being secured by the constitution and patent and copyright laws; Const. U. S. art. I, § 8; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4884; but insurance is not commerce, and hence corporations engaged in that business may be regulated; 8 Wall. 108; 10 id. 566; 118 Pa. 322; 83 Wis. 607; 62 Ga. 379.

Subject to these constitutional limitations, the states may in their discretion, impose conditions upon foreign corporations, as essential to enable them to do business; 125 U. S. 181; 136 id. 114; 119 id. 110; they may discriminate between them and domestic corporations by a tax upon the privilege of doing business in the state, and, if it be considered good policy, make that discrimination so burdensome as to amount to exclusion; 48 Ill. 172; and the federal constitution does not secure to them against inequality of taxation either as to system or rates as compared with domestic corporations; 129 Pa. 463; 33 Fed. Rep. 121; but such tax was held contrary to the state constitution; 74 Cal. 113; though "it is clear that it violates no principle of the federal constitution as the supreme court of California seem to suppose;" 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7877, n. 3; and another state court has said that the state cannot impose upon foreign and domestic corporations taxes differing in principle; per Beasley, C. J., 31 N. J. L. 531; but this reasoning has been characterized as a dictum; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 8090; as the corporation in question being engaged in interstate commerce was exempt from discrimination on that ground; And see 42 La. Ann. 428. In the United States circuit court in California it was held by Field and Sawyer, J.J., that the principle of taxation prescribed by the state constitution was in violation of the protection secured by the fourteenth amendment against unequal taxation; 18 Fed. Rep. 722; 18 id. 365. These decisions, though appealed from, are said not to have been determined by the supreme court; 33 id. 121; where it was held that a tax upon some special business carried on by individuals or corporations is not prohibited.

And the supreme court, before any of these cases, had held that the provision of the Illinois constitution, requiring taxation to be uniform and equal, means by general law, uniform as to the class upon which it operates; 92 U. S. 575; in which the syllabus, thus stating the decision, is said to be evidently drawn by the justice writing the opinion (Miller, J.); 6 Thomp. Corp. § 8099. Again it was held that the amendment "does not prevent the classification of property for taxation"; 115 U. S. 321; nor "prohibit special legislation," as to lay a tax on the franchise or business of a corporation measured by its dividends; 134 id. 594; or gross receipts; 142 id. 339, affg. 44 Fed. Rep. 310. See also 134 U. S. 232. The provisions of state constitutions securing uniformity and equality of taxation have been held not violated by a specific tax upon a particular business; 60 Ga. 597; 33 Fed. Rep. 121; or on gross receipts of a foreign corporation on business within the state; 142 U. S. 339; or upon such corporations as a class; 85 Pa. 513, cited with approval in the last case.

The state power of taxation of such corporations is subject to certain restrictions in addition to those already stated, but as a general rule the property of the corporation owned or used within the state is alone the proper subject of taxation. The difficulty is to determine from the cases what this is. The power has been sustained as to franchises; 6 Wall. 594, 611; even of an interstate corporation acting under U. S. R. S. § 5283; 125 U. S. 530; 141 id. 40; as to tangible property within the state even if employed in interstate commerce; 18 Wall. 5, 203; 105 U. S. 460; 125 id. 530; 137 id. 117, 640; and with respect to the situs for this purpose, personal property may be separated from its owner; 141 id. 18, in which the principle was applied to rolling-stock (q. v.), of which as a general rule the situs is the domicile of the corporation; 50 Md. 417; 53 Mo. 18; but subject to exceptions growing out of its character and use; 39 Ia. 58; 62 Ill. 395. See 6 Thomp. Corp. § 8097, and note 8.

This power does not reach the capital of a company domiciled without the state, though a tax on a proportion of it has been sustained as a license; 47 Ind. 511; and so has a tax called an excise, on capital of a corporation having its domicile within and its business without the state; 99 Mass. 148; or a franchise tax assessed according to legislative discretion; 97 N. Y. 136; measured by the capital found to be employed within the state; 91 N. Y. 574; 104 id. 240; which is justified on the theory that part of the capital is employed within the state; 129 N. Y. 558. See TAXATION. Independently of the power of taxation foreign corporations may be excluded from doing business in other states or, if permitted to do it, are subject to such terms and conditions as the legislature may see fit to impose; 99 Mass. 148; 28 Ohio St. 521; 47 Ind. 236; 29 Mich. 238; 18 How. 404; 5 Sawy. 88; 8 Wall. 168; 10 id. 410. Such conditions may include: restrictions upon the right of eminent domain (q. v.); payment of license fees; 125 U. S. 181; provisions that any restriction imposed by the home state of the foreign corporation shall also be imposed upon corporations of that state in the domestic state; 92 N. Y. 311; 104 Ill. 653; such provisions when, as is usual, they are in the form of a license or tax are not objectionable on the ground of inequality; 115 Ind. 257, 506; 29 Kan. 672. So statutes are upheld requiring such corporations to file their charter, etc.; 130 U. S. 291; or their agents to file evidence of their authority; 101 Ind. 413; or to keep a known place of business, and a resident agent; or to appoint an attorney for service of process in suits against the company; 4 Colo. 369; in default of which contracts are voidable; 5 Sawy. 88; 6 Ore. 481; 91 Ala. 387; and all such statutes are self-enforcing; 91 id. 337.

When by constitution or statute such corporations are restricted from doing business within the state, in default of compliance with the provisions thereof, the decisions are not uniform as to what amounts to a violation of the prohibition. Such a statute does not prevent a foreign trust company, which has not complied therewith, from purchasing securities of a railroad company in the state, and taking a mortgage upon its property to secure them, since such isolated act is not doing business in the state; 47 Fed. Rep. 593; writing a policy of insurance by a foreign insurance company upon property situated in Wisconsin involves the doing of business in Wisconsin, although the contract was in point of fact executed in another state; 76 Wis. 285. A foreign insurance company is not considered as doing business in Pennsylvania where no person in the state is authorized to accept application for insurance, receive or collect money thereon, or on any other account for the company, but all applications are sent direct to the foreign office; 172 Pa. 117. The same question arises when corporations "doing business" within a state are taxed, and these words are held to mean the transaction of a substantial part, not the whole, of its business; 105 N. Y. 76; the maintenance of a sales agency; 44 Fed. Rep. 324; or having part of its railroad in another state than that of its incorporation; 21 Wall. 492, affg. 66 Pa. 64; but not a mere license; 117 N. Y. 241; nor having an office in the state of its creation when its manufacturing business is carried on in another state; 46 N. J. Eq. 270.

The conclusion from an examination of the authorities is stated to be, that isolated transactions do not amount to such doing business as is prohibited, therefore the ordinary operations of commerce are not restricted nor the right to make contracts, which is secured by the construction of the commercial clause of the federal constitution, as already stated; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7936. In the work already cited are collected a great number of acts held valid in states where statutes of the class referred to are in operation. A familiar case is that of a policy of insurance written on property in a state whose laws have not been complied with by the company; a distinction has been taken between one procured by the company or a broker for it, and those solicited by citizens of the state and written in isolated instances, the situs of the contract in the latter case being the state of the insurance company; 31 Mich. 346; 37 N. J. L. 33. But this distinction is criticised and said not to be sound; 4 Thomp. Corp. § 7937, n. 2; and the weight of authority is said to be that where the foreign insurance company has an agency in another state, and has not complied with its restrictive statutes, a policy written out and returned from the home office, upon an application received and transmitted by the agent, is valid, although the agent has not complied with the statutes of the foreign state; 7 Biss. 315, 372.

Most of the statutes of this class prescribe penalties, either by qui tam action or indictment, upon agents for violations of them, and it is held that such a state statute making it a misdemeanor for a person in the state to procure insurance for a resident there from an insurance company not incorporated under its laws, and which had not filed the bond required by the laws of the state relative to insurance, is not a regulation of commerce, and does not conflict with the constitution of the United States; 153 U. S. 648. Such an act in Pennsylvania was held not to apply to the owner of property who merely obtained insurance on his own property; 139 Pa. 605.

A foreign corporation which has not complied with a statute requiring all foreign corporations to file a statement in the office of the secretary of state showing the location of its agent, the names of its officers, etc., as a condition precedent to doing business in the state, cannot recover upon a bond conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duty of an agent appointed to conduct business in the state; 74 Fed. Rep. 597; 93 Pa. 352; 7 Biss. 80; contra, 21 N. Y. Supp. 876; 32 Ohio St. 388. The agent of a foreign corporation which has not filed its statement under this act, is presumed to know of his incapacity and becomes personally liable to one with whom he dealt on account of such corporation, and this responsibility is in addition to the statutory penalty for acting as the agent of a foreign corporation without complying with the provisions of the act; 145 Pa. 30.

When such restrictive statutes exist, contracts made in violation of them are treated in some states as voidable at the election of the other party; 8 N. Y. 266; 37 N. J. L. 83; 6 Gray 370; 42 N. H. 547; 45 Mich. 108; except as against a bona fide holder of negotiable paper for value and without notice; 8 Gray 200; or it is held that the remedy is suspended until the statute is complied with; 64 Ind. 1, 548; or that they are only void when the statute expressly so provides, as held in an able and learned opinion by Bartholomew, J., in 3 N. Dak. 138; s. c. 54 N. W. Rep. 544; 62 N. H. 622; 5 Biss. 381; 37 Fed. Rep. 243; 155 Mass. 250; or not void when the statute provides a penalty; 132 U. S. 282; 36 Ia. 546; 33 W. Va. 566; 83 Ala. 115 (but see 88 id. 275, 280, and 89 id. 198). In other states it is held that the contract cannot be enforced; 80 Pa. 15; 11 Wis. 394; 55 Ill. 85; 55 Vt. 526; but the corporation cannot set up its own non-compliance with a statute to avoid its own contract; 145 Pa. 30; 102 Mass. 221; 141 Ill. 85; 68 Ind. 347; 80 Ia. 56; 102 U. S. 415. Such contracts may be validated by the legislature, by subsequent act; 98 Ill. 483. The rule avoiding them as against public policy is not to be extended; L. R. 19 Eq. 465. Whether compliance with such statutes is presumed or must be averred and proved is a point on which the decisions differ; it is held that there is such presumption in 55 Ark. 163, 325; 30 Mich. 201; 73 Mo. 368; 106 Ind. 242; and an analogous case is 28 N. Y. 324. On the other hand, it has been frequently held that compliance must be averred and proved; 89 Ala. 198; 88 id. 275, 280; 55 Vt. 520; but this view is considered illogical and unsound by a recent writer; 31 Am. L. Rev. 19; and also by a leading authority who considers the best opinion to be that compliance need not be averred; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7965; citing as conclusive the analogous case in which failure of a liquor dealer to have a license is held to be a good defence to an action for liquor sold; 145 U. S. 421; although no one would think of averring and proving his license. With much reason, therefore, it was held that such averment is not necessary, and nothing short of a distinct averment of non-compliance will make proof to the contrary necessary; 55 Ark. 625.

The question of the power of a foreign corporation to take hold and transmit title to land is one of public policy, and no general rule can be formulated from the decisions and statutes which must (as in most matters affecting land titles) be referred to with reference to a particular state. Enabling statutes will be found in many states, either general, or where such legislation is permissible, for special cases. It can at least be suggested that in the absence of any such legislation, or of express decisions, serious doubt, will arise as to the power. The conclusion is reached by Judge Thompson that in the absence of prohibitory local law, there is much authority that, if authorized to do so in the state of their creation, corporations may hold land in other states; 117 Ill. 287; 19 Fed. Rep. 78; 25 Vt. 433; 5 McLean 111; 35 Mich. 214; unless forbidden to do so either by the public policy of the state; 8 Biss. 284; 73 Ill. 142; or its statute law; 132 Pa. 591, where the subject is considered at length by Paxson, J., with respect to general enabling laws and proceedings by the state in such cases; 14 Pet. 123; 32 Fed. Rep. 22. See 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7914.

It is sometimes held that the power exists for business purposes, as an office; 18 Pa. 13; 67 Ill. 568; 117 id. 287; and it has been held that a Connecticut company having no business there could operate as a land company in New Hampshire; 19 Fed. Rep. 78; contra, 67 Ill. 567; but the tendency of American legislation is to permit the holding of land by foreign corporations, for business but not for speculation; 6 Thomp.

Corp. § 7917. The right of such corporation to take and hold title to real estate cannot be questioned in ejectment by it against a former managing director; 153 U. S. 523. See ALIEN.

The power of acquiring land has been held to exist until forbidden; 101 U. S. 832; and as against every one except the state, proceeding for a forfeiture; 14 Pet. 123; 73 Ind. 68; 110 Ill. 65; 117 id. 237; 98 U. S. 621. Of such proceedings it is said that the only one in this country is that in Pennsylvania cited infra; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7918, n. 3.

Land may generally be taken by devise; 24 Pa. 474; 31 W. Va. 621; but only by corporations having charter power so to take; 29 Barb. 650; 72 Ill. 50; see 15 Ohio St. 537; 38 Conn. 342; and upon the question of devise generally, see 9 Cow. 437. Foreign corporations have usually the power to acquire land by foreclosure of mortgages; 30 N. J. Eq. 408; 6 McLean 1; 13 Gray 491; and in such cases the state only and not the mortgagor can set up a want of power; 28 Nob. 672; 79 Ind. 172.

In all cases involving the right of foreign corporations to hold lands the lex rei sitae governs; Sto. Conf. L. § 428; 4 Sandf. 253; 29 Barb. 650. See ESCHATEL.

Whenever a foreign corporation has the power to contract in a state or country it may enforce it or recover damages for a breach in like manner as other persons may do in like case; 2 Stra. 807; 2 Ld. Raym. 1535, note; 5 Cra. 61; 13 Pet. 519; 6 Cow. 46; 4 Johns. Ch. 370; 18 Wis. 109; 6 Metc. 391; 5 McLean 111; 13 Vt. 67; 17 Me. 34; 1 Hill, S. C. 44. From these and many other cases it is clearly a principle long and well settled that, unless prohibited by local statutory law, a corporation of one state may sue in another by its corporate title. Such prohibitory legislation exists in many states as already sufficiently shown; supra. When it does not exist this right of action extends to all cases and causes of action as to which a remedy exists in favor of other persons or domestic corporations; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7978; and see id. §§ 7880-8. An action by such corporation for libel has been sustained; 35 Ill. App. 627.

In such actions when, as in most jurisdictions, it is unnecessary to aver or prove the corporate existence in suits by or against corporations (see 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7658), or at least only to make very formal allegation of it (id. § 7661); the same rule applies to foreign corporations; id. § 7984; 31 Ind. 283; 26 Ohio St. 662; nor, as has been held, in the absence of a statute either expressly or by authoritative construction requiring it, need there be an averment of compliance with statutory pre-requisites for doing business; 2 Dak. 260; 40 N. Y. Supp. 860; 25 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 8; the ground of dispensing with the averment of compliance with such statutes is the presumption of legality and compliance with local law, discussed, supra.

Apart from this question, which only affects the right of action upon contracts made within the state, the foreign corporation has, as to all other matters, the same rights and remedies as other non-residents; 4 Colo. 369; 67 Ind. 549; 8 N. M. 237. See 73 Cal. 500. It may foreclose a mortgage even when by statute disqualified from acquiring real estate; 91 Pa. 491; 36 Minn. 108; contra, 89 Ala. 198; and purchase at the execution sale; 49 Ind. 14; or maintain an action on an insurance policy; 11 Colo. 419; or for a tax wrongfully paid; 9 Mont. 145. Where a foreign corporation, by the law of its domicile, continues to exist after the expiration of its charter for the purpose of suing on debts accrued before such expiration, it may also sue in such case in New York; 40 N. Y. Supp. 860.

In suits against foreign corporations the question of jurisdiction is of first importance, and it is the general rule that a corporation, like a natural person, cannot be sued in personam in a state within whose limits it has never been found; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7988. This conclusion springs naturally from the principle that a "corporation being the creation of local law, can have no legal existence beyond the limits of the sovereignty where created; "8 Wall. 181; but this rule is subject to exceptions growing out of the theory that, under certain circumstances, such corporations will be held in law to have acquired a domicile within a state, at least so far as to subject them to suit.

In England in spite of dicta to the contrary; L. R. 7 Q. B. 293; 1 Ex. Div. 237; there was said by the Lord Chief Justice to be no case prior to 1885 holding foreign corporations suable in that country; 54 L. J. Q. B. Div. 527. The necessities of the case resulted in a rule authorized by statute providing for acquiring jurisdiction over a foreign corporation carrying on business in England by service on a "head officer" in charge of its business there; and the court of appeal sustained the jurisdiction so acquired; 58 L. J. Q. B. Div. 508; 88 Ch. Div. 446. See 5 H. L. Cas. 416.

In the United States the exceptions to the general rule first stated are thus classified by Thompson: (1) Where a corporation has established a permanent agency in the state or country; (2) when it is agreed with the state that process may be served in it; (3) when it is agreed with the opposite party that an action may be brought against it to enforce a contract against it in a state or country other than its domicile; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7988. These exceptions were rendered necessary to meet the case of corporations in recent years doing business so extensively outside of the domicile of their creation, and particularly of what are known as "tramp corporations," purposely organized in another state to do business in their own and evade its laws; besides, trading corporations being equally migratory with individuals, the reason originally assigned for want of jurisdiction had ceased to exist; id. § 7989. Accordingly it may be considered that corporations may acquire business domiciles in other states and countries, and, wherever they do so, they may be sued without the aid of local statute law; id. In most, if not all of the states, however, statutes exist requiring foreign corporations to appoint an agent for process as a condition of doing business in the state, and so, also, by local statutes, jurisdiction is affirmatively assumed. See 129 Mass. 444; 4 Mo. App. 595; 74 Mo. 457; 3 Hun 171; 40 N. H. 548; 41 Ga. 680; 46 Ala. 641; 83 id. 498; 32 N. J. L. 15; 24 id. 222; 29 Fed. Rep. 17; 44 id. 31; 115 N. Y. 437. Delaware Constitution, 1897, Art. ix. § 5. The principles upon which the jurisdiction rests are that it must appear in the record that the corporation was engaged in business in the state, and that the person upon whom service was made represented the company there in the business; and while the certificate of service is prima facie evidence of the latter fact, it is open to contradiction when the record is offered in evidence in another state; Field, J., in 106 U. S. 850.

A corporation may subject itself to the jurisdiction of a foreign state by contract with a private person; 60 L. T. N. S. 924; or with the state; 91 Ala. 337. See 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7992.

Foreign corporations are sometimes held not liable to suit, except ex contractu, upon domestic contracts; 55 Ga. 194; or for torts committed within the state; 112 N. Y. 815; 76 Ala. 388; 16 Fed. Rep. 438; 25 N. J. L. 381; unless the statutory jurisdiction extends to any cause of action; 84 N. Y. 63; 40 Md. 595; 21 Wis. 506; nor are they liable to suits by non-residents on foreign contracts; 46 Vt. 697; contra, 182 Mass. 432.

The United States circuit court has no inherent power, as a court of equity, at the suit of domestic shareholders, to dissolve an English mining company, owning and operating a mine in the United States, and to wind up its business operations; nor has it any such power under the act of parliament known as the "Companies Act, 1862;" 68 Fed. Rep. 644; 8 C. 7 C. C. A. 412.

With respect to what constitutes a valid service on a foreign corporation, the subject is generally regulated by statutes which must be consulted with reference to any given case, and reference may be made to 6 Thomp. Corp. Ch. 198, where the decisions are collected as to service on different classes of officers and agents. The decisions of the United States Supreme Court establish the rule that jurisdiction cannot be acquired by service upon an officer casually within the state for purposes not connected with the business of the corporation; 18 How. 404; 106 U. S. 350; 137 id. 98; 149 id. 94; 150 id. 653; 156 id. 518. The same view is supported by the weight of authority in the state courts; 141 Pa. 462; 71 Ga. 246; 26 Minn. 233; 91 Ill. 170; 32 N. J. L. 15; 2 McArthur 146; 40 Ill. App. 547; Alderson, Jud. Writs and Proc. 219; Murfree, For. Corp. 210; contra, 87 N. Y. 137; 61 Mich. 226; 47 La. Ann. 389; but in two of these states the federal courts have refused to follow the ruling of the state court; 22 Fed. Rep. 635; 44 id. 31; 68 id. 442.

So an insurance company having an isolated transaction in a state through a broker who deals with the company through another broker is not "doing business" or "found" in the state so as to be liable to substituted service or to service on the brokers; 55 Fed. Rep. 751.

Foreign corporations, it is said, cannot be logically dealt with as non-residents within the meaning of attachment laws, where they have become domesticated so far as to be liable to actions in personam; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 8060; 29 Mo. 75; 7 Bush 116. See 27 N. J. L. 206; 64 Ga. 18. Formerly a foreign attachment could not be issued in courts of the United States; 4 Cra. 421; 3 Dill. 474; 103 U. S. 794; but in 1872 the federal, circuit, and district courts were authorized to adopt the state laws in force relative to attachments; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 915; and the federal courts now apply state statutes relating to attachments to foreign corporations; 51 Fed. Rep. 580. Such corporations may also be summoned as garnishees whenever they would be liable for the debt attached, or by residence or agency are amenable to process; 9 N. H. 394; 31 Pa. 114; 102 Ill. 249; 9 Conn. 430; or when they do business in the state and have a managing agent there; 51 Fed. Rep. 580.

It has been held that the dissolution of a corporation dissolves a foreign attachment against it, on the ground that to compel an appearance was the primary object of the process; 8 W. & S. 207; but the soundness of this case has been doubted on the ground that jurisdiction having attached to the res continues for the real object of the suit, — satisfaction of the demand; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 8062; and this view is supported by another case which holds that comity does not interfere with it; 68 Ill. 348. But in a very recent case it was held that a state statute providing that corporations shall continue to exist for a certain period after the time fixed for dissolution, for the purpose of prosecuting and defending suits, and that no body of persons acting as a corporation shall set up want of legal organization as a defence to a suit against them as a corporation, does not control or affect foreign corporations merely doing business in the state; and a suit against such a corporation abates upon its dissolution, so that, if a judgment be thereafter entered against it, the same is void; 74 Fed. Rep. 425. See DISSOLUTION OF CORPORATIONS.

A corporation, by doing business in another state and becoming liable to suit there, both in state and federal courts, does not lose its right to claim, for the purposes of federal jurisdiction, a citizenship in the state by which it was created; Murf. For. Corp. 236. When sued in a foreign state it may remove the cause to a federal court; id.; 104 U. S. 5; 22 Fed. Rep. 353. But it is otherwise if the effect of the legislation under which it enters the foreign state be to confer corporate privileges upon it in that state. In such case the company is a citizen of both states; 22 Fed. Rep. 568; 104 U. S. 5.

See, generally, Murfree: Reno. For. Corp.;

Patterson, Fed. Restraint St. Action § 118; Beach, Insurance Ch. 2; Thompson, Corp. tit. xix.; INTERSTATE COMMERCE; POLICE POWER; TAXATION; UNITED STATES COURTS: MERGER.

It is not a "citizen," within the meaning of the Constitution, and cannot maintain a suit in a Federal court against a citizen of a different State from that by which it was created, unless the persons who compose the corporate body are all citizens of that State. The legal presumption is that its members are citizens of the State in which alone the body has a legal existence. Anderson; 1 Black, 295-96; 94 U. S. 535 et al.

By comity, if not forbidden by its charter, nor by the laws of that State, a corporation may exercise its powers in another State. Id.; 101 U. S. 352.

FOREIGN COUNTY. Another country. It may be in the same kingdom, it will still be foreign. See Blount, Foreign.

FOREIGN COURT. The circuit court of the United States is not a foreign court relatively to the court of chancery of New Jersey; 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 426.

FOREIGN CREDITOR. One who is resident in a state or country foreign to that of the domicile of the debtor or the status of his property.

FOREIGN DECREE. See FOREIGN JUDGMENT.

FOREIGN DIVORCE. One obtained in a state or country other than that in which the marriage was solemnized and the parties, or at least the one against whom the proceeding is taken, are domiciled. See DIVORCE.

FOREIGN DOMICIL. See DOMICIL.

FOREIGN DOMINION. In English Law. A country, at one time subject to a foreign prince; which, by conquest or cession, has become a part of the dominion of the British Crown. 5 B. & S. 290.

FOREIGN ENLISTMENT ACT. The statute 39 Geo. III. c. 69, for preventing British citizens from enlisting as sailors or soldiers in the service of a foreign power. Wharton, Lex.; 4 Steph. Com. 226. See NEUTRALITY.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE. Drafts drawn on a foreign state or country. See BILL OF EXCHANGE.

FOREIGN FACTOR. One who resides in a country foreign to that of his principal. See FACTOR.

FOREIGN FISHING. Oil, manufactured from whales caught by the crew of an American vessel, is not the product of foreign fishing within the purview of the revenue laws of the United States, though it has since been owned and brought into port by persons in the foreign service. 2 Sumn. 336.

FOREIGN-GOING SHIP. In the English Merchant Shipping Act, any ship employed in trading between some place or places in the United Kingdom, and other places specified in said act outside the limits of the kingdom.

FOREIGN JUDGMENT. A judgment of a foreign tribunal.

It is a general rule that foreign judgments are admitted as conclusive evidence of all matters directly involved in the case decided, where the same question is brought up incidentally. 1 Greenl. Ev. 547, and note; 12 Pick. 572; 7 Bost. L. Rep. 461. Such judgments and decrees in rem, whether relating to immovable property or movables within the jurisdiction of the foreign court, are binding everywhere; L. R. 4 H. L. 414; [1897] 1 Q. B. 53; [1890] 2 Q. B. 455. This rule applies to admiralty proceedings in rem founded on actual possession of the subject-matter, and garnishment proceeding in a like case.

It seems to be the better opinion that judgments in personam regular on their face, which are ought to be enforced in another country, are conclusive evidence, subject to a re-examination, in the courts where the new action is brought, only for irregularity, fraud, or lack of jurisdiction as to the cause or parties; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 546; Westl. Priv. Int. Law 373; Story, Conf. Laws § 607; 2 Swanst. 325; Dougl. 6, n.; 3 Sim. 437; 6 Q. B. 283; 4 Munf. 241; 15 N. H. 237; 13 Gray 591; 90 Mass. 273; 20 Conn. 544; 21 Iowa 53; but see 23 Conn. 28; 8 Paige, Ch. 44; 5 Wall. 290. It was formerly held that they were prima facie evidence merely. See 2 H. Bl. 410; Dougl. 1, 6; 3 Maule & S. 20; 9 Mass. 483; 34 N. J. Eq. 130; 13 Gray 591; 21 Ia. 370; 13 John. 193; 83 Me. 406. But this theory has been entirely overthrown, the doctrine of their conclusive character having been settled in England by the case of Bank of Australia v. Nias, L. R. 6 Q. B. 179. It is also fully recognized in this country; 26 N. Y. 143; 49 id. 571; 5 Hamm. 545; 54 Me. 28; 55 id. 339; and see the case of Hilton v. Guyot, infra.

The subject of the conclusiveness of foreign judgments has been treated with much diversity of opinion in the English courts. That they are prima facie evidence to sustain an action is clear according to all the authorities, but whether conclusive, and if not so in all cases, what defenses may be admitted, was for a long time not definitely settled by the English courts. The cases were very fully reviewed by Judge Redfield with this result.

"So that now it may be regarded as fully established in England, that the contract resulting from a foreign judgment is equally conclusive, in its force and operation, with that implied by any domestic judgment. But there is still a very essential and important distinction between the two. Domestic judgments rest upon the conclusive force of the record, which is absolutely unimpeachable. Foreign judgments are mere matters en pais, to be proved the same as an arbitration and award, or an account stated; to be established, as matter of fact before the jury; and by consequence subject to any contradiction or impeachment which might be urged against any other matter resting upon oral proof. Hence any fraud which entered into the concoction of the judgment itself is proper to be adduced, as an answer to the same; but no fraud which occurred and was known to the opposite party, before the rendition of such foreign judgment, and which might, therefore, have been brought to the notice of the foreign court, can be urged in defence of it. It is proper to add, that while the English courts thus recognize the general force and validity of foreign judgments, it has been done under such limitations and qualifications that great latitude still remains for breaking the force of, and virtually disregarding such foreign judgments as proceed upon an obvious misapprehension of the principles governing the case; or where they are produced by partiality or favoritism, or corruption, or where upon their face they appear to be at variance with the instinctive principles of universal justice. But these are rare exceptions." Sto. Conf. Laws, Redfield's ed. § 618 a-618 k. And a very recent commentator states precisely the same conclusion from the English cases; 35 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 277.

An English writer on the subject attributes the vacillation of the courts of that country to the fact that two doctrines have been discussed as the basis of the conclusive effect given to a foreign judgment. The earlier theory was that of comity, which, as defined by Blackburn, J., in opposing the doctrine, is that "it is an admitted principle of the law of nations, that a state is bound to enforce within its territories the judgment of a foreign tribunal;" L. R. 6 Q. B. 139. This doctrine was supported by Lords Nottingham, Ellenborough, Kenyon, Cockburn, and Brougham, and Chief Baron Pigot, Sir G. Jessel, and Sir R. Phillimore; 2 Swanst. 326, n.; 4 Campb. 28; 4 M. & S. 141; 7 Term 681; 30 L. J. C. P. 177; 2 Cl. & F. 470; Ir. Rep. 1 C. L. 471; 50 L. J. P. 80; L. R. 4 P. C. 144. Of the objections raised the most important was said to be uncertainty; Piggott, For. Judg. 6. See Sto. Conf. Laws § 593. The other theory, termed that of obligation, is that when a competent court has adjudicated a certain sum to be due, a legal obligation arises to pay that sum, and an action of debt to enforce the judgment may be sustained. This was first enunciated by Parke, Baron, in 1845; 9 M. & W. 810; 14 L. J. Ex. 145; it was approved in 1870 by Blackburn and Mellor, JJ.; L. R. 6 Q. B. 139; and by the same judges and Lush and Hannen, JJ., id. 155.

Both ideas are involved in what the English writer last cited terms the theory of obligation and comity, which is in substance this: A legal obligation arises in the state where the judgment was rendered, accompanied by a correlative sanction under which the obligation may be made effective so long as the defendant is within the jurisdiction of the foreign court; but when, by his absence from that jurisdiction, the remedy is no longer available, the obligation will, in another state or country, be clothed by comity with an auxiliary sanction to replace the correlative sanction which it has lost; Piggott, For. Judg. 18.

The foreign court must have had jurisdiction, and when the defendant was not a subject of or resident in the country in which the judgment was obtained, so that there existed nothing imposing on him any duty to obey it, the judgment cannot be enforced in an English court; L. R. 6 Q. B. 155; 67 L. T. 767. But the conclusiveness of a judgment when there was jurisdiction is illustrated by a decision that a mistake of English law as to an English contract, apparent on the face of the proceedings, was not ground of defence to a foreign judgment; L. R. 6 Q. B. 139.

In this country the subject has recently been elaborately discussed by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Hilton v. Guyot, in the argument and opinions of which are collected all the authorities. In that case it was held that "when an action is brought in a court of this country, by a citizen of a foreign country, against one of our own citizens, to recover a sum of money adjudged by a court of that country to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff, and the foreign judgment appears to have been rendered by a competent court, having jurisdiction of the cause and of the parties, and upon due allegations and proofs, and opportunity to defend against them, and its proceedings are according to the course of a civilized jurisprudence, and are stated in a clear and formal record, the judgment is prima facie evidence, at least, of the truth of the matter adjudged; and it should be held conclusive upon the merits tried in the foreign court, unless some special ground is shown for impeaching the judgment, as by showing that it was affected by fraud or prejudice, or that, by the principles of international law, and by the comity of our own country, it should not be given full credit and effect;" 159 U. S. 113.

In the opinion of the majority of the court, Mr. Justice Gray reviews all the leading American and English cases, and examines in detail existing laws and usages of civilized nations, and reaches the conclusion that "where there has been opportunity for a full and fair trial abroad before a court of competent jurisdiction, conducting the trial upon regular proceedings, after due citation or voluntary appearance of the defendant, and under a system of jurisprudence likely to secure an impartial administration of justice between the citizens of its own country and those of other countries, and there is nothing to show either prejudice in the court, or in the system of laws under which it was sitting, or fraud in procuring the judgment, or any other special reason why the comity of this nation should not allow it full effect, the merits of the case should not, in an action brought in this country upon the judgment, be tried afresh, as on a new trial or an appeal, upon the mere assertion of the party that the judgment was erroneous in law or in fact."

But the court goes further and rest the decision upon the principle of reciprocity, adopting and applying the rule that "judgments rendered in France, or in any other foreign country, by the laws of which our own judgments are reviewable upon the merits, are not entitled to full credit and conclusive effect when sued upon in this country, but are prima facie evidence only of the justice of the plaintiff's claim."

Accordingly, it was held that, such being the practice of the French courts, with regard to American judgments, the judgment recovered in France, which was the cause of action, was not conclusive, but subject to review upon its merits.

Chief Justice Fuller delivered a dissenting opinion in which concurred Harlan, Brewer, and Jackson, JJ., taking the ground that the question was not one of comity, but to be determined upon the broad principle of public policy that there should be an end of litigation, and that this applied equally to foreign and domestic judgments.

The principles of this decision were at the same time applied to a Canadian judgment which was held conclusive inasmuch as the pleadings showed a submission to the jurisdiction of a competent court. Mere averments that the judgment was "irregular and void," and that there was "no jurisdiction or authority on the part of the court to enter such a judgment upon the facts and the pleadings" are but averments of legal conclusions and so insufficient to impeach the judgment; and it was held that, in answer to an action upon a foreign judgment the specific facts must be given upon which it is supposed to be irregular and void or based upon fraud. If rendered upon regular proceedings and due notice or appearance, and not procured by fraud, in a foreign country, by whose laws judgment of one of our own courts, under like circumstances, is held conclusive of the merits, it is conclusive between the parties in an action brought upon it in this country, as to all matters pleaded and which might have been tried; 159 U. S. 235.

Foreign adjudications as respects torts are not binding; Whart. Conf. L. § 793, 827; and a judgment in Germany for infringement of trade-mark cannot be set up in the United States; 50 Fed. Rep. 869. See TRADE-MARK.

The various states of the United States are considered as foreign to each other, with respect to this subject; 137 U. S. 287. In Louisiana it has been decided that a judgment rendered by a Spanish tribunal under the former government of that state is not a foreign judgment; 4 Mart. La. 301, 310.

Foreign judgments may be evidenced by exemplifications certified under the great seal of the state or country where the judgment is recorded, or under the seal of the court where the judgment remains; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 501; by a copy proved to be a true copy, or by the certificate of an officer authorized by law, which certificate must itself be properly authenticated; 2 Cra. 238; 5 id. 335; 2 Cal. 155; 7 Johns. 514; 8 Mass. 273; 60 Ill. App. 309. The acts of foreign tribunals which are recognized by the law of nations, such as courts of admiralty and the like, are sufficiently authenticated by copies under seal of the tribunal; 5 Cra. 335; 3 Conn. 171. The record of a judgment of a foreign court, not of record and of inferior territorial jurisdiction, is not admissible in evidence, in the absence of proof of facts showing that the court had jurisdiction; 37 Ill. App. 23. See 119 N. C. 453.

The constitution of the United States provides that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state; Const. Art. IV. § 1. It is enacted by the act of May 20, 1790, that the records and judicial proceedings of the courts of any state shall be proved or admitted in any other court within the United States, by the attestation of the clerk and the seal of the court annexed, if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the judge, chief justice, or presiding magistrate, as the case may be, that the said attestation is in due form. And the said records and judicial proceedings, authenticated as aforesaid, shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts of the state from whence the said records are or shall be taken; and by the act of March 27, 1804, that from and after the passage of this act all records and exemplifications of office books, which are or may be kept in any public office of any state, not appertaining to a court, shall be proved or admitted in any other court or office in any other state, by the attestation of the keeper of the said records or books, and the seal of his office thereto annexed, if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the presiding justice of the court of the county or district, as the case may be, in which such office is or may be kept, or of the governor, the secretary of state, the chancellor, or the keeper of the great seal of the state, that the said attestation is in due form and by the proper officer; and the said certificate, if given by the presiding justice of a court, shall be further authenticated by the clerk or prothonotary of the said court, who shall certify, under his hand and the seal of his office, that the presiding justice is duly commissioned and qualified; or, if the said certificate be given by the governor, the secretary of state, the chancellor, or keeper of the great seal, it shall be under the great seal of the state in which the said certificate is made. And the said records and exemplifications, authenticated as aforesaid, shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court and office within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts or offices of the state from whence the same are or shall be taken; and the provisions of both acts shall extend to the records, etc., of the territories; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 906.

The object of this clause was to prevent judgments from being disregarded in other states; 25 Mich. 247; it relates only to the validity and force of judgments rendered in one state where proved in another; 12 Fed. Rep. 375. It does not change the nature of a judgment; 13 Pet. 312; but places judgments rendered in another state on a different footing from what are known at common law as foreign judgments; 9 Wheat. 1; 3 N. J. L. 466; 6 id. 236. The clause makes the record evidence but does not affect the jurisdiction either of the court in which the judgment is rendered or of that in which it is offered in evidence. The judgment of a foreign state differs only from a foreign judgment in not being re-examinable for fraud in obtaining them, if the court had jurisdiction; 127 U. S. 265, 292. A judgment rendered in another state is to be regarded as a domestic judgment; 27 Pa. 247; 53 Vt. 177; but it is not on the footing of a domestic judgment so far as to be enforced by execution, but the manner of their enforcement is left to the state in which they are sued on, pleaded, or offered in evidence. When pleaded and proved they are conclusive, and if their enforcement is denied it amounts to the denial of a right secured by the constitution of the United States; 146 U. S. 637. The constitution and the rule of comity include only judgments in civil actions, not in criminal prosecutions; 17 Mass. 514. A judgment for a penalty cannot be enforced in another state, but whether a law is penal is to be determined by the courts called upon to enforce it; and if the court of another state declines to give it full faith and credit because, in its opinion, it is for a penalty, it denies the constitutional right; 146 U. S. 637. As to the effect of a decree of divorce in another state, see DIVORCE. The judgment of a state court has the same validity and effect in any other state as it has in the state where it was rendered; 6 Wheat. 129; 9 How. 520; 50 Mo. App. 873; 141 U. S. 87; 48 Fed. Rep. 510. The judicial proceedings within the act are only such as have been rendered by a competent court, with full jurisdiction; 9 Mass. 462; 45 Ill. App. 533; 50 N. J. L. 636; 17 Wend. 821; 11 How. 165; it may be a superior court of record or an inferior tribunal; 80 N. H. 78; 13 Ohio 209; including a judgment of the justice of the peace; 94 Tenn. 721. A judgment may be attacked on the ground of a want of jurisdiction; Mill. Const. U. S. 632; 18 Wall. 457; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 315; 27 Ohio St. 600; 22 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 178; 99 Cal. 374; 138 U. S. 439; 138 id. 107; thus a judgment against a defendant who was not served with proper process, and who did not appear, would be entitled to no credit in another state; 11 How. 165; 137 U. S. 287; 2 Misc. Rep. 570; but facts establishing the want of jurisdiction must be shown; 74 Fed. Rep. 51. A judgment of a foreign state, against several defendants jointly, in an action in which one of them was not served with process, cannot, in Rhode Island, be enforced against one of such defendants who in the foreign action was served with process; 83 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 4. See 4 Harring. 281; 3 id. 241, 517. In cases where the court had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, fraud in obtaining the judgment may be set up as a defence; 139 Ill. 311; 70 Hun 197; or if it will constitute a ground of collateral attack; id.; 148 Ill. 536; but see 5 Wall. 290; but fraud cannot be pleaded as a ground of attack, in one Federal court, upon a judgment obtained in another; 138 U. S. 439. The constitution does not give to a judgment all the attributes to which it was entitled in the state where it was rendered; 7 Gill. & J. 434; but if duly certified, it is admissible in evidence in any state; 7 Cal. 54, 247; a state may give a judgment rendered in another state any effect it may think proper, always provided it does not derogate from the legal effect conferred upon it by the constitution and the laws of congress in this behalf; 9 Mass. 462. In case, however, full faith and credit is not given to the judgment of another state, any judgment thereon will be erroneous; 7 Wall. 139. When the court rendering the judgment has jurisdiction, its judgment is final as to the merits; 5 Wall. 302; 14 Tex. 352; 9 Mass. 462; 7 Gill. 430; 67 Fed. Rep. 459; 62 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 806; but no greater effect can be given to a judgment than it had in the state where it was rendered; 17 Wall. 529; 18 N. Y. 468. If a judgment or decree is enforceable in the state where it is rendered, it is enforceable in any other state; 9 Pet. 86; but the constitutional provision does not give validity to a void judgment or decree; 12 Wheat. 218; 4 N. J. L. 192; 14 Pet. 49; 148 N. Y. 34. It does not impose on any state the duty of following the decision of another state as to the construction of the statutes of the latter; 8 McCrary 609; 18 Hun 507; nor enforcing within its territory the law of another state. A judgment entered in pursuance of a warrant of attorney, in a state in which such judgments are authorized, has the same force when sued on in another state as a judgment in an adversary proceeding; an action thereon can only be defeated by want of jurisdiction by fraud in procuring the judgment, or defences based on matter arising after the judgment was rendered; any defence to the original cause of action is conclusively negatived by the judgment; but the sufficiency of the warrant may be inquired into and is to be determined from the evidence of the law of the state of its entry; 62 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 806. Where a judgment is revived by scire facias, without service on or appearance by the defendant, the plaintiff cannot recover thereon in another state where the defendant resides, after the statute of limitations has run against the original judgment; such revival is either a new proceeding substituted for an action of debt, and hence invalid without service, or a continuation of the original action, and therefore barred; 181 U. S. 642; 35 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 489. And in an action on such judgment the statute of the former governs and not that of the place where the judgment was rendered; 65 Hun 17.

A judgment in personam against a corporation, obtained in a federal court of a sister state, is conclusive on the merits of the case in the courts of every other state when made the basis of an action; and the directors and managers of the corporation are as conclusively bound by the judgment as the corporation itself; 46 Fed. Rep. 584.

Judgments of the Indian courts in the Indian Territory stand on the same footing with those of the Federal territorial courts, and are entitled to the same faith and credit; 59 Fed. Rep. 836.

The provisions of the act of Congress relating to the authentication of records and judicial proceedings must be complied with in order to secure the admission of the exemplification as evidence in a suit upon the judgment in another state; it is not necessary that such exemplification should be used in pleading or in a statement of claim or affidavit of defence; 124 Pa. 280. As to pleading, see 27 Cent. L. J. 400; 26 Abb. N. C. 815.

As to the effect to be given to foreign judgments, see Story, Conf. Laws; Freem. Judgt. 590; Dalloz, Étranger; Piggott, Foreign Judgments; 20 Myers, Federal Decisions 608; 4 Law Magazine & Rev., 4th ed. 417; CONFLICT OF LAWS; JUDGMENT; FOREIGN CORPORATION.

FOREIGN JURISDICTION. The exercise by one government, within the territory of another, of powers acquired by it in any manner whatsoever, whether by treaty, grant, usage, sufferance, or otherwise.

A jurisdiction other than that of the former.

FOREIGN JURISDICTION ACT. In English Law. The stat. 6 & 7 Vict. c. 94, by which it was provided that the crown may exercise any power or jurisdiction it may have in any foreign place or country in the same manner as if obtained by cession or conquest; and that any act done in pursuance of such power or jurisdiction shall be as valid as if done according to the local law then in force in such place. 1 Steph. Com. 103.

FOREIGN JURY. One drawn from a county other than that in which issue is joined. See JURY.

FOREIGN KINGDOM. One under the dominion of a foreign prince. 19 Johns. 375.

FOREIGN LANGUAGE. When in an action of slander the words complained of were spoken in German a declaration setting forth the words in English is not sufficient; the words must be stated in the foreign language, as spoken, with an avowment of the signification in English, and that they were understood by those who heard them; 3 Wend. 894. See also Cro. Eliz. 496, 885; SLANDER.

When a will was made and proved in French and in the probate it was translated into English, but as it appeared, falsely, the translation was not conclusive, but the English court of chancery held that it might determine according to what the translation ought to be; 1 P. Wms. 526.

FOREIGN LAW. The laws of a foreign country.

The courts do not take judicial notice of foreign laws; and they must, therefore, be proved as matters of fact; 4 Mood. Parl. Cas. 21; 3 Esp. 168; 1 D. & L. 614; 40 Tex. 291; 9 Humphr. 546; 2 Barb. Ch. 582; 19 Vt. 182; 9 Mo. 8; 60 Ind. 128; 64 Ga. 184; 8 Mass. 99; 2 Dow. & C. 171; 4 Conn. 517; 1 Paige 220; 10 Watts 159; 9 Gill 1; written laws, by the text, or a collection printed by authority, or a copy certified by a proper officer, or, in their absence, perhaps, by the opinion of experts as secondary evidence; Story, Conf. Laws § 641; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 486; 14 How. 426; 2 Cra. 287; 8 Ad. & E. 208; 6 Wend. 476; 10 Ala. N. S. 885; 4 Tex. 98; 10 Ark. 516; they may be construed with the aid of text-books as well as of experts; 2 Low. 149; where experts are called, the sanction of an oath is said to be required; 4 Conn. 517; 12 id. 384. See 12 Vt. 896; Story, Conf. Laws § 641; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 488, note. As to the manner of proving unwritten laws of foreign countries, the decisions show a divergence of opinion; the rule, as laid down by Lowell, J., in the case of The Pashawick, 9 Low. 148, where the reasoning of Lord Stowell, in Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, 9 Hag. Const. 54, is cited with approval, is, that the unwritten law of England may be proved in the United States courts not by experts only, but also by text-writers of authority, and by the printed reports of adjudged cases; Whart. Ev. § 800. But mere citations of English statutes and authorities cannot be accepted as proving English laws; 50 Fed. Rep. 78. But in respect to the laws of other foreign countries, where a system obtains wholly different from our own, the rigid proof by the testimony of experts alone should be insisted on. See 11 Cl. & F. 85; 14 E. L. & Eq. 249; 4 Cow. 508, n.; 1 Wall. Jr. C. C. 47; 4 Johns. Ch. 507; as to who can prove such laws; 48 N. H. 176; 1 Johns. 385; 3 La. Ann. 391. It need not be a lawyer; 74 Ill. 197; 96 N. H. 153; 8 C. B. 812; 37 Neb. 614; 139 U. S. 397. The United States courts take judicial notice of the laws of every state and territory in the United States; 35 Fed. Rep. 643; but the decisions of the various state courts are not harmonious on this point as far as regards the laws of each other. In Tennessee; 9 Heisk. 873; and Rhode Island; 11 R. I. 411; the courts will take judicial notice of the laws of sister states; in Illinois, of the jurisdiction of courts in other states; 17 Ill. 577; and the supreme court has decided that where a state recognizes acts done in pursuance of the laws of another state, the courts of the first state should take judicial cognizance of such laws so far as may be necessary to judge of the acts alleged to be done under them; 8 Wall. 518. In Louisiana, where a statute of another state has been properly brought to the notice of the court, it will in all future cases take notice of that statute and presume the law of the foreign state to be the same until some change is shown; 21 La. Ann. 594; 5 Ind. App. 89. In Pennsylvania it has been held that the courts should take notice of the local laws of a sister state in the same manner as the supreme court of the United States would do on a writ of error to a judgment; 27 Pa. 479; but see, contra, 9 Wis. 828; 20 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 385. See 81 Fla. 10. A copy of the authorized statute-book is recognized as proof of a foreign law in Pennsylvania; 2 Pa. 83; and the construction of those statutes may be proved either by the reports of cases, or by one familiar therewith; 163 Pa. 245; 170 Pa. 84.

Foreign unwritten laws, customs, and usages may be proved, and are ordinarily proved, by parol evidence; and when such evidence is objected to on the ground that the law in question is a written law, the party objecting must show that fact; 15 S. & R. 87; 2 La. 154.

The manner of proof varies according to circumstances. As a general rule, the best testimony or proof is required; for no proof will be received which presupposes better testimony attainable by the party who offers it. When the best testimony cannot be obtained, secondary evidence will be received; 2 Cra. 237. See 14 Cent. L. J. 125, where there is a general article on this title. A foreign law must be proved like any other fact, and in the absence of such proof it will be presumed that the common law prevails, in the foreign jurisdiction; 52 Mo. App. 60.

Exemplified or sworn copies of written laws and other public documents must, as a general thing, be produced when they can be procured; but should they be refused by the competent authorities, then inferior proof may be admitted; 4d.

When our own government has promulgated a foreign law or ordinance of a public nature as authentic, that is held sufficient evidence of its existence; 1 Cra. 38; 1 Dall. 462; 12 S. & R. 208.

When foreign laws cannot be proved by some mode which the law respects as being of equal authority to an oath, they must be verified by the sanction of an oath.

The usual modes of authenticating them are by an exemplification under the great seal of a state, or by a copy proved by oath to be a true copy, or by a certificate of an officer authorized by law, which must itself be duly authenticated; 9 Cra. 288; 2 Wend. 411; 6 id. 475; 5 S. & R. 538; 15 id. 84; 9 Wash. C. C. 175; 52 Md. 274; 38 Ark. 645; 67 Ill. 645.

Witnesses in Cuba examined under a commission touching the execution of a will testified, in general terms, that it was executed according to the law of that country; and, it not appearing from the testimony that there was any written law upon the subject, the proof was held sufficient; 8 Paige, Ch. 446.

A defendant pleaded infancy in an action upon a contract governed by the law of Jamaica: held that the law was to be proven as a matter of fact, and that the burden lay upon him to show it; 8 Johns. 190.

Proof of such unwritten law is usually made by the testimony of witnesses learned in the law and competent to state it correctly under oath; 2 Cra. 287; 1 Pet. C. C. 225; 2 Wash. C. C. 175; 15 S. & R. 84; 4 Johns. Ch. 520; Cowp. 174; 2 Hagg. Adm. App. 15-144; 100 Mass. 79; 14 How. 400.

In England, certificates of persons in high authority have been allowed as evidence in such cases; 8 Hagg. Eccl. 767, 769.

The public seal of a foreign sovereign or state affixed to a writing purporting to be a written edict, or law, or judgment, is of itself the highest evidence, and no further proof is required of such public seal; 2 Cra. 238; 2 Conn. 65; 1 Wash. C. C. 368; 4 Dall. 413, 416; 6 Wend. 475; 9 Mod. 66; 85 Fed. Rep. 184.

But the seal of a foreign court is not, in general, evidence without further proof, and must, therefore, be established by competent testimony; 3 Johns. 810; 2 H. & J. 183; 4 Cow. 526, n.; 8 East 221.

By the act of May 26, 1790, it is provided "that the acts of the legislatures of the several states shall be authenticated by having the seal of their respective states affixed thereto;" R. S. § 905. See RECORD. It may here be observed that the rules prescribed by acts of congress do not exclude every other mode of authentication, and that the courts may admit proof of the acts of the legislatures of the several states, although not authenticated under the acts of congress. Accordingly, a printed volume, purporting on its face to contain the laws of a sister state, is admissible as prima facie evidence to prove the statute law of that state; 4 Cra. 384; 12 S. & R. 208; 6 Binn. 321; 4 Leigh 571; 5 Ind. App. 89; 97 Ala. 417; 70 Hun 145; 63 Mo. App. 617; contra, 2 Hawks 441; 2 Harring. 84; 2 Wend. 411; 2 La. Ann. 654; 9 Wis. 828. By act of Aug. 8, 1846, a standard copy of the laws and treaties of the United States is fixed, and made competent evidence in all courts without further proof or authentication. R. S. § 908.

Foreign laws have, as such, no extra-territorial force, but have an effect by comity; Sto. Const. § 1305. In the absence of pleading and proof to the contrary, the laws of another state are presumed to be like those of the state in which the action is brought; 35 Neb. 375; 37 id. 644; 93 Cal. 172; 144 Pa. 205; 76 Hun 200. See 142 U. S. 101; 40 La. Ann. 768; 83 Tenn. 616. While a state court is bound to take judicial cognizance of the principles of common law as it prevails in other states, this is not true of the statutes of such states; 40 La. Ann. 768; 50 Ark. 237; 78 Wis. 893; 86 Tenn. 50; 88 Minn. 421. But see 156 Mass. 65. Until the fact is shown, they will be assumed to be the same as those of the forum; 1 Harr. & J. 637. See 5 Cl. & F. 14; 8 H. L. C. 19; LEX FORI.

A person claiming title under a foreign corporation is chargeable with knowledge of its chartered powers and restrictions; 19 N. Y. 207.

The effect of foreign laws when proved is properly referable to the court; the object of the proof of foreign laws is to enable the court to instruct the jury what is, in point of law, the result from foreign laws to be applied to the matters in controversy before them. The court are, therefore, to decide what is the proper evidence of the laws of a foreign country; and when evidence is given of those laws, the court are to judge of their applicability to the matter in issue; Story, Conf. Laws § 638; Greenl. Ev. 488; 2 H. & J. 193; 8 id. 334, 243; 4 Conn. 517; Cowp. 174; 20 A. L. Reg. n. s. 379. As to proof of foreign laws generally, see 14 Cent. L. FOREIGN MATTER. Matter which must be tried in another county. Blount. Matter done or to be tried in another county. Cowell.

FOREIGN MINISTER. An ambassador or envoy from a foreign country. See AMBASSADOR.

In the diplomatic sense, a minister who comes from another jurisdiction or government. Anderson; 5 Pet. * 56.

The modern law of nations recognizes a class of public officers, who, while bearing various designations, chiefly significant in the relation of rank, precedence, or dignity, possess in substance the same functions, rights, and privileges,—being agents of their respective governments for the transaction of diplomatic business abroad, possessing also such powers as their respective governments may please to confer, and enjoying, as a class, established legal rights and immunities of person and property in the governments to which they are accredited as the representatives of sovereign powers.

Disregarding questions of dignity, these diplomatic agents might all be denominated ambassadors, because they are immediate officers of the sovereign; or envoys, because they are persons sent; or ministers, because engaged in public service or duty; or procurators, because they are the protectors of their respective governments; or legates, because officially employed as the substitute of the superior; or nuncios, or internuncios, because they are messengers to or between governments; or deputies, because they are deputed; or commissioners, because they hold and discharge commissions; or chargés d'affaires, because they are charged with business; or agents, because they act for their governments. All these and other designations of public ministers, are found in the history of modern negotiations, the name having no fixed relation to the functions or powers, or true nature of the office. Id. See AMBASSADOR; ENVOY; CHARGÉS DES AFFAIRES; etc.

FOREIGN MONEY. Mercantile paper may be given for the payment of a certain sum in denominations of foreign money. A. & E. Ency. 2nd Ed. 105; Chitty on Bills, 123 et al. But whether an instrument payable generally in money or currency of a foreign state is negotiable, is not settled. Id. In 27 Mich. 191 it was held that a note payable in "Canada currency" is negotiable, whereas in 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 71 it was held that a note payable in "Canada money" is not negotiable. The court declared that "Canada money" was but a commodity, not legal tender for debts, nor money within the meaning of the rule as to negotiable instruments. Id.

FOREIGN OFFICE. The department of state through which the British sovereign communicates with foreign powers.

FOREIGN PLEA. See PLEA.

FOREIGN PORT. A port or place which is wholly without the United States. 10 Johns. 875; 3 Gall. 4, 7; 1 Brock. 235. A port without the jurisdiction of the court; 1 Dods. 201; 4 C. Rob. 1; 1 W. Rob. 29; 6 Erch. 886; 1 Bl. & H. 66, 71. The ports of the several states of the United States are foreign to each other so far as regards the authority of masters to pledge the credit of their vessels for supplies; 10 Wall. 199; 99 Mass. 888. Practically, the definition has become, for most purposes of maritime law, a port at such distance as to make communication with the owners of the ship very inconvenient or almost impossible. See 1 Pars. Mar. Law 142, n.; PORT.

FOREIGN PROCESS ACTS. English statutes providing for the service of process of certain courts in places beyond their territorial jurisdiction.

FOREIGN RELATIONS. See UNITED STATES.

FOREIGN SERVICE. Servitium forinsecum. See FORINSECTUS.

FOREIGN STATE. A foreign nation or country. In the United States the states are considered as foreign to each other with respect to those subjects which are controlled by their municipal law. See FOREIGN JUDGMENT; EXTRADITION; FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE.

FOREIGN TRADE. The exportation and importation of commodities to or from foreign countries, as distinguished in the United States from interstate or coastwise trade. See 1 Holmes 421; FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Held to include trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, within a revenue statute specifically providing that it should be included. 13 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 833; 1 Holmes (U. S.) 421. Under an act exempting from duty lumber to be used in the construction and equipment of "vessels built in the United States for the purpose of being employed in the foreign trade," the term "the foreign trade" limits the application of the act to vessels owned by Americans. It does not apply to those built for foreigners. Id.: 15 Blatchf. (U. S.) 26. See FOREIGN COMMERCE.

FOREIGN TROOPS. While foreign troops entering or passing through our territory with the permission of the Executive are exempt from territorial jurisdiction, it is doubtful whether in the absence of a treaty or positive legislation to that effect there is any power to apprehend or return deserters. 183 U. S. 424.

FOREIGN VESSEL. A vessel owned by residents in or sailing under the flag of a foreign nation. This term does not mean a vessel in which foreigners domiciled in the United States have an interest; 1 Gal. 58.

An omission in the registry and enrolment of an American vessel does not make her foreign, but, at best, only deprives her of her American privileges. Crabbe 271. See FLAG. The patent laws were not intended to apply to and govern a vessel of a foreign, friendly nation; 19 How. 188. See PATENT.

FOREIGN VOYAGE. A voyage whose termination is within a foreign country. 3 Kent 177, n. The length of the voyage has no effect in determining its character, but only the place of destination; 1 Stor. 1; 8 Sumn. 342; 2 Bott. L. Rep. 146; 2 Wall. C. C. 264; 1 Pars. Mar. Law 81.

FOREIGN WATERS. By U. S. Rev. St. § 4370 tugboats towing in whole or in part in foreign waters are exempt from a penalty therein imposed on foreign tugboats for towing vessels of the United States.

Where the treaty between the United States and Great Britain of June 15, 1846, fixed the boundary between the two countries in the strait of San Juan de Fuca by a line following the middle of the strait, but also secured to each nation a right of free navigation over all the waters of the strait, all the waters north of the boundary line were held to be "foreign waters," within the meaning of said section; 7 U. S. App. 188; a. c. 50 Fed. Rep. 437; reversing 48 id. 819.

FOREIGNER. One who is not a citizen. Cowel.

In the Old English Law, it seems to have been used of every one not an inhabitant of a city, at least with reference to that city; 1 H. Bla. 218. See, also, Cowel, Foreigne.

In the United States, any one who was born in some other country than the United States, and who owes allegiance to some foreign state or country. 1 Pet. 343, 349. An alien. See ALIEN; CITIZEN.

FOREJUDGE. To deprive a man of the thing in question by sentence of court.

Among foreign writers, says Blount, forejudge is to banish, to expel. In this latter sense the word is also used in English law of an attorney who has been expelled from court for misconduct. Cowel; Cunningham, Law Dict.

FOREMAN. The presiding member of a grand or petit jury. See GRAND JURY; JURY.

FORENSIC. See FORENSIS.

FORENSIC MEDICINE. See MEDICAL JURISPRUDENCE.

FORENSIS. Forensic. Belonging to court. Forensis homo, a man engaged in causes. A pleader; an advocate. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.

FORESAID. In Scotch Law. Aforesaid. Sometimes foresaid, in the plural; 2 How. St. Tr. 719; and also in the form foresaid; 1 Pitt. Cr. Tr. pt. 1, 107.

FORESCHOKE (Lat. Derelictum). Forsaken; especially with reference to lands abandoned by the tenant. Termes de la Ley; Cowel; Moz. & W.

FORESHORE. That part of the land immediately in front of the shore; the part of it which is between high and low water marks, and alternately covered with water and left dry by the flux and reflux of the tides. It is indicated by the middle line between the highest and lowest tides (spring and neap).

This is popularly described as the land between high and low water marks. It is to be found in arms of the sea. It forms part of the adjoining county, the justices of which have cognizance of offences committed there, whether it is or is not at the time covered with water. It also forms part of the adjoining parish. Byrne.

The property in the foreshore is prima facie vested in the Crown, but a part of it may belong to a subject by an ancient grant from the Crown, or by prescription. This ownership of the Crown is for the benefit of the community, and cannot be used in any way so as to derogate from or interfere with the public rights of navigation and fishery. Id. See ALLUVION; DERELICT.

FORESIGHT. See DUE DILIGENCE AND FORESIGHT.

FOREST. A certain territory of wooded ground and fruitful pastures, privileged for wild beasts and fowls of forest, chase, and warren, to rest and abide in the safe protection of the prince for his princely delight and pleasure, having a peculiar court and officers. Man. For. Laws, cap. 1, num. 1; Termes de la Ley; 1 Bla. Com. 280.

A royal hunting-ground which lost its peculiar character with the extinction of its courts or when the franchise passed into the hands of a subject, Spelman, Gloss.; Cowel; Man. For. Laws, cap. 1; 2 Bla. Com. 83; 1 Steph. Com. 665 See NEW FOREST.

FOREST COURTS. In English Law. Courts instituted for the government of the king's forest in different parts of the kingdom, and for the punishment of all injuries done to the king's deer or venison, to the vert, or greensward, and to the covert in which the deer were lodged. They comprised the courts of attachments or woodmote, of regard, of swanmote, and of justice-seat (which several times see); but since the revolution of 1688 these courts, it is said, have gone into absolute desuetude. 3 Steph. Com. 439; 2 Bla. Com. 71.

But see 8 Q. B. 981, where a mandamus to the verderers of a royal forest was refused, on the ground that the court of the Chief Justice in Eyre had power to compel the verderers to permit the exercise of the rights sought to be enforced.

FOREST LAW. The old law relating to the forest, under which the most horrid tyrannies were exercised, in the confiscation of lands for the royal forests. Hallam's Const. Hist. ch. 8.

The privilege of reserving the forest for the use of the sovereign alone was instituted by the Saxon kings, who, however, occasionally conferred it upon a subject by special license; and a charter of the forest is said to have been issued by Canute at Winchester in the year 1016, but the authenticity of this document is doubted by Lord Coke; Just. iv. 820. There is, however, no doubt that this monarch issued the Constitutiones de Foresta, by which document he appointed four chiefs of the forest (primarii) who administered justice; under these were four mediceres who undertook the care of the venison and vert; and who in turn superintended two tithing-men whose duties were to care for the vert and venison by night and who, if slaves, became free on being appointed to this office. Complaints against the mediceres and the tithing-men were heard by the primarii and by them disposed of, and complaints against the primarii were laid before the king himself; Hallam, Anc. Laws and Inst. sec. 10. If a freeman used violence towards a primarius of the forest, he lost his freedom and his goods; if a villen, he lost his right hand; and for a repetition of the offence by either, he forfeited his life. Offences against the king were dealt with leniently compared with those against the venison, and there was also a difference in the penalties imposed for killing a royal beast and a beast of the forest; thus for killing the latter, a freeman was fined, while for the former he lost his liberty. A difference was also recognized according to the rank of the offender, as if a bishop, abbot, or baron killed a royal beast he was subject to a fine, at the pleasure of the king, while for the same offence a slave lost his life. Certain animals are enumerated in this document for the killing of which no penalty was attached, and the wild boar is especially mentioned as never having been held to be an animal of venison; id. sec. 27.

Under the Confessor these laws were not enforced with the rigidity of Canute, the penalties for trespass were moderate, and the administration of the forest law did not seem to be a subject of complaint from any class of people, but William the Conqueror, or soon altered this condition of affairs. The hunting of wild beasts of the forest being his chief pastime he immediately claimed absolute and exclusive right to all forests then existing, and allowed no one to enter without his license; he extended those forests existing by law to the whole towns and villages; and he devastated vast tracts in Hampshire and Yorkshire to form the new forest, "denuding the land of both God and man to make of it a home for wild beasts." Lappenburg, England, under the Anglo-Norman Kings 214. The Conqueror appointed new judges of the forests to supersede the former judges and keepers; he created the office of chief justice of the forest and the verderers subordinate to the chief justice, who could convict offenders and send them before the chief justice, but who had no power to punish such offenders. The verderers sat at Swanmote and a li seem to be the forest during the reign of William I. this court thrice a year, and to serve on inquests and juries when required. The agistatores, the forrestarii, and the regarders were also appointed by the Normans as officers of the forest, but without judicial powers. The highest penalty enforced for offences in the forest during the reign of William I. seems to have been the loss of a limb or the eyes of the offender, and this was enforced and fines were imposed for the most trivial offences; Sax. Chronicles; Comp. fol. 164.

These abuses were continued until about the year 1200, the most extensive afforestations having been made under Richard I. and John. In the 47th and 48th clauses of the great charter certain provisions are found relating to the forest, but although the belief that John issued a charter distinct from these clauses is very ancient, it is erroneous; the document given in Matthew Paris under the name, being the great charter of Henry III. with an altered salutation. Stubbs' Charters 888. In the great charter the heavy burden of attending the forest courts is remitted and this provision was conferred in the charta de foresta, and thus the exact analogy established by Henry II. between the courts of the shire and those of the forest was abolished. The charta de foresta disafforested the lands appropriated by Richard and John and all those seized by Henry II. which had operated to the injury of the land-owners and outside of the royal domain; it greatly mitigated the punishment for destroying game, and provided that for that offence no man should lose life or limb, and that his punishment shall be limited to a fine or imprisonment for a year and a day; the following curious provision occurs in cap. ii.: "Whosoever a robber, bishop, earl, or baron coming to us at our commandment, passing by our forest, it shall be lawful for him to take and kill one or two of our deer by view of our forester, if he be present; or else he shall cause him to blow a horn for him, that he see not to steal the deer, and likewise they shall do returning from us," and this clause is still unreppealed. By reason of "the cruel and insupportable hardships which those forest laws created for the subject," says Blackstone, "we find the immunities of the forest as warmly contended for by the courts from the time with as much difficulty, as those of Magna Charta itself"; 3 Com. 416.

After this charter was issued, the forest laws not being enforced fell gradually into desuetude, until

Charles I. attempted to revive, then in order to replenish his exchequer, and the forest court of justice set aside certain persons heavily for alleged encroachments on the ancient boundaries of the forest, although the right to such land was forfeited by several centuries of possession. This was one of the first grievances on which the long parliament acted, and since the passing of the act "certainty of forests," 16 Car. I. c. 16, whereby it was declared that all land should be held dissevered where no justice seat, augurment, or court of attachment had been held for sixty years next before the first year of the reign of Charles I., the laws of the forest have practically ceased, and by acts 14 and 15 Vict. c. 43, 18 and 19 Vict. c. 62, and 30 Vict. c. 32, many of the royal forests have been dissevered on the plea of public necessity. See Hallam, Hist. Eng. Const.; Stubbs' Charters; Indarwick, King's Peace; CHARTA DE FORESTA.

FORESTAGIUM. A tribute payable to the king's foresters. Cowel.

FORESTALL. To intercept or obstruct a passenger on the king's highway. Cowel; Blount. To beset the way of a tenant so as to prevent his coming on the premises. 3 Bla. Com. 170. To intercept a deer on his way to the forest before he can regain it. Cowel. See FORESTALLING THE MARKET.

FORESTALLER. One who commits the offence of forestalling. Used, also, to denote the crime itself; namely, the obstruction of the highway, or hindering a tenant from coming to his land. 3 Bla. Com. 170. Stopping a deer before he regains the forest. Cowel.

FORESTALLING THE MARKET. Buying victuals on their way to the market before they reach it, with the intent to sell again at a higher price. Cowel; Blount; 4 Bla. Com. 158. Every device or practice, by act, conspiracy, words, or news, to enhance the price of victuals or other provisions; Co. 3d Inst. 190; 1 Russ. Cri. 109; 4 Bla. Com. 158. See 13 Vinet, Abr. 490; 1 East 133; 3 M. & S. 67. At common law, as well as by stat. 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 14, this was an indictable offence against public trade, but since the stat. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 24, the practice of forestalling is no longer illegal. See ENGROSS.

In the United States forestalling the market takes the form of "corners" or of "trusts," which are attempts by one person or a conspiracy or combination of persons to monopolize an article of trade or commerce, or to control or regulate, or to restrict its manufacture or production in such a manner as to enhance the price; 78 Ind. 487; 68 N. Y. 538; A. & E. Encycy. See TRUST.

FORESTARIUS. A forester. An officer who takes care of the woods and forests. De forestario apponendo, a writ which lay to appoint a forester to prevent further commission of waste when a tenant in dower had committed waste. Bracton 316; Du Cange.

FORESTER. A sworn officer of the forest, appointed by the king's letters patent to walk the forest, watching both the vert and the venison, attaching and presenting all trespassers against them within their own bailiwick or walk. These letters patent were generally granted during good behavior; but sometimes they held the office in fee. Blount; Cowel.

FORETHOUGHT FELONY. In Scotch Law. Murder committed in consequence of a previous design. Erskine, b. iv. tit. 4, c. 50; Bell, Dict.

FORFANG. A taking beforehand. A taking provisions from any one in fairs or markets before the king's purveyors are served with necessities for his majesty. Blount; Cowel.

FORFEIT. To lose as the penalty of some misdeed or negligence. The word includes not merely the idea of losing, but also of having the property transferred to another without the consent of the owner and wrongdoer.

Lost by omission or negligence or misconduct. 48 Minn. 13.

This is the essential meaning of the word, whether it be that an offender is to forfeit a sum of money, or an estate is to be forfeited to a former owner for a breach of condition, or to the king for some crime. Cowel says that forfeiture is general and confiscation a particular forfeiture to the king's exchequer. The modern distinction, however, seems to refer rather to a difference between forfeiture as relating to acts of the owner and confiscation as relating to acts of the government; 1 Stor. 184; 18 Pet. 187; 11 Johns. 383. Confiscation is more generally used of an appropriation of an enemy's property; forfeiture, or the taking possession of property to which the owner, who may be a citizen, has lost title through violation of laws. See 1 Kent 67; 1 Stor. 134. A provision in an agreement, that for its breach the party shall "forfeit," a fixed sum, implies a penalty, not liquidated damages; 16 Abb. Pr. 378; 17 Barb. 360.

FORFEIT AND PAY. An agreement in a contract to forfeit and pay a specified sum in default of performance, is an agreement for liquidated damages; 37 Ark. 168; even where under the contract a bond is given as an earnest of good faith; id.

FORFEITABLE. Subject to forfeiture; as a franchise for misuser or non-user, or lands or property for crime.

Subject to the loss of property, right, or office, as a punishment for some illegal act or negligence. Worcester Dict.

FORFEITURE. A punishment annexed by law to some illegal act or negligence in the owner of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, whereby he loses all his interest therein, and they become vested in the party injured as a recompense for the wrong which he alone, or the public together with himself, hath sustained. 2 Bla. Com. 287. A sum of money to be paid by way of penalty for a crime. 21 Ala. N. S. 673; 10 Gratt. 700.

Forfeiture by alienation. By the English law, estates less than a fee may be forfeited to the party entitled to the residuary interest by a breach of duty in the owner of the particular estate; as if a tenant for his own life aliens by feoffments or fine for the life of another, or in tail, or in fee, or by recovery; there being estates, which either must or may last longer than his own, the creating them is not only beyond his power, but is a forfeiture of his own particular estate; 2 Bla. Com. 374; 1 Co. 14 b.

In this country such forfeitures are almost unknown, and the more just principle prevails that the conveyance by the tenant operates only on the interest which he possessed, and does not affect the remainderman or reversioner; 4 Kent 81, 434; 5 Ohio 30; 1 Pick. 318; 1 Rice 459; 2 Rawle 168; 1 Wash. Va. 381; 11 Conn. 533; 23 N. H. 500; 21 Me. 373. See, also, Stearn, Real Act. 11; 3 Sharw. Bla. Com. 121, n.; Wms. R. P. 25; 5 Dane, Abr. 6; 1 Washb. R. P. 92, 197.

Forfeiture for crimes. Under the constitution and laws of the United States, Const. art. 3, § 3; Act of April 30, 1790, § 24, forfeiture for crimes is nearly abolished. And when it occurs the state recovers only the title which the owner had; 4 Mass. 174. See, also, Dalr. Feuds, p. 145; Post. Cr. Law 95; 1 Washb. R. P. 92; Story, Const. 1206; 100 N. C. 240.

Forfeiture for treason. The constitution of the United States, art. 3, § 2, provides that no attainder of treason shall work forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted. The Confiscation Act provided that only the life estate of the convicted person can be condemned and sold; 9 Wall. 850; 18 id. 156. It was merely an exercise of the war power; 11 Wall. 804; and did not apply to the confiscation of enemies' property; 1 Woods 231.

Forfeiture by non-performance of conditions. An estate may be forfeited by a breach or non-performance of a condition annexed to the estate, either expressed in the deed at its original creation, or implied by law, from a principle of natural reason; 2 Bla. Com. 281; Littleton § 361; 1 Prest. Est. 478; Tud. Lead. Cas. 794; 5 Pick. 528; 2 N. H. 120; 5 S. & R. 875; 32 Me. 394; 18 Conn. 535; 12 S. & R. 180; 3 Wash. St. 424; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 245. Such forfeiture may be waived by acts of the person entitled to take advantage of the breach; 1 Conn. 79; 1 Johns. Cas. 126; 1 Washb. R. P. 454; 36 W. Va. 639. In order to authorize a claim to forfeiture of valuable property on account of violation of a condition, proceedings to enforce must be had at once; 17 Or. 140.

Equity will not lend its aid to enforce a forfeiture because of a breach of condition subsequent in a deed, although the aid is sought upon the special ground of removing a cloud on the title; 127 Ill. 101; nor will it concern itself to make up the loss of interest to one who refused the principle in the hope that he could enforce, upon purely technical grounds, a forfeiture of lands sold and all payments made thereon, under the terms of a harsh and unconscionable contract; 74 Fed. Rep. 52.

Forfeiture by waste. Waste is a cause of forfeiture. 3 Bla. Com. 288; Co. 2d Inst. 299; 1 Washb. R. P. 118.

Forfeiture of property and rights cannot be adjudged by legislative acts, and confiscation without a judicial hearing after due notice would be void as not being due process of law. Nor can a party by his misconduct so forfeit a right that it may be taken from him without judicial proceedings, in which the forfeiture shall be declared in due form; Cooley, Const. Law 450; 38 Miss. 494; 24 Ark. 161; 27 id. 28. Where no express power of removal is conferred upon the executive, he cannot declare an office forfeited for misbehavior; the forfeit must be declared by judicial proceedings; 8 B. Monr. 648; 36 N. J. L. 101.

Forfeiture of wages. A provision in a contract for service to the effect that the wages of an employee shall be forfeited for neglect or misconduct which brings damage to the company, should be strictly construed as against the company; 35 Ill. App. 481. Where, after being discharged, a railroad employee sues for wages, claiming to have been hired by the month, and this being admitted by the company, which sets up the defence that he was dismissed for cause, it is error to instruct the jury that they may find for the plaintiff if they believe from the evidence that he was hired by the month; 16 Mo. App. 522, reconciled in 20 Mo. App. 554. See WAGES; MASTER AND SERVANT.

Forfeiture of vessel. Rev. Stat. U. S. § 5283, provides for the forfeiture of every vessel which, within the limits of the United States, is fitted out and armed, or attempted to be so, to be employed in the service of any foreign prince, state, or people, to commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, or property of a prince, state, or people with which the United States are at peace. Held, that under this section no forfeiture can be claimed of a vessel which is only employed to transport arms and munitions of war to a vessel fitting out to pursue the forbidden warlike enterprises; 47 Fed. Rep. 84; 48 id. 99; 49 id. 648.

Forfeiture of charter. A private corporation may be dissolved by a forfeiture of its charter for the non-user or misuser of its franchises; 9 Cra. 43; 24 Pick. 52; 187 N. Y. 606. Accidental negligence or abuse of power will not warrant a forfeiture; there must be some plain abuse of its powers or neglect to exercise its franchises, and the acts of misuse or non-use must be wilful and repeated; 51 Miss. 602; 14 Am. L. Reg. 577; 17 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 128. Thus long-continued neglect on the part of a turnpike company to repair its road is cause of forfeiture; 8 R. I. 182, 521. So a bridge company is subject to forfeiture of its charter if it neglect for a long time to rebuild a bridge which has been carried away by a flood; 28 Wend. 254. Where a franchise has been granted by the legislature to construct a street railway within a certain time, with a condition that it will be forfeited if the provisions of the act are not complied with, a failure to lay the track within the time limited works a forfeiture of the right, without a suit by the state, and the franchise may be conferred upon any other person or persons; 45 Cal. 865. Where the legislature forbids the owning of lands by a corporation the state may, on a violation of the prohibition, declare a forfeiture of the franchise; 133 Pa. 691. A forfeiture must be judicially declared; 7 Cold. 420; 49 How. Fr. 20; 72 N. Y. 245; 180 id. 332. A forfeiture can be enforced by seire facias or a quo warranto only at the suit of the government, which created the corporation; 46 Md. 1; 26 Pa. 81; 46 N. J. Eq. 118. (As to the distinction between these proceedings, see 3 Term 199.) But not at the suit of an individual; 7 Pick. 844; 24 How. 278. The state may waive a cause of forfeiture; 9 Wend. 351; 73 Tex. 435. Equity has no jurisdiction in the matter; Moraw. Priv. Corp. 10, 40; 1 N. J. Eq. 389; 8 Humph. 253.

FORFEITURE OF A BOND. A failure to perform the condition on which the obligee was to be excused from the penalty in the bond. Courts of equity and of law in modern practice will relieve from the forfeiture of a bond; and, upon proper cause shown, criminal courts will, in general, relieve from the forfeiture of a recognizance to appear. See 3 Yeates 90; 2 Wash. C. C. 442; 2 Blackf. 104, 200; 1 Ill. 257.

FORFEITURE OF MARRIAGE. A penalty incurred by a ward in chivalry when he or she married contrary to the wishes of his or her guardian in chivalry.

The latter, who was the ward's lord, had an interest in controlling the marriage of his female wards, and he could exact a price for his consent; and at length it became customary to sell the marriage of wards of both sexes; 2 Bla. Com. 70.

When a male ward refused an equal match provided by his guardian, he was obliged, on coming of age, to pay him the value of the marriage,—that is, as much as he had been bona fide offered for it, or, if the guardian chose, as much as a jury would assess, taking into consideration all the real and personal property of the ward; and the guardian could claim this value although he might have made no tender of the marriage; Co. Litt. 82 a; Co. 2d Inst. 92; 3 Co. 126 b; 6 id. 70 b.

When a male ward between the age of fourteen and twenty-one refused to accept an offer of an equal match (one without disparagement), and during that period formed an alliance elsewhere without his guardian's permission, he incurred forfeiture of marriage,—that is, he became liable to pay double the value of the marriage. Co. Litt. 78 b, 82 b.

FORFEITURE OF SILK. In English Law. When the importation of silk was prohibited it was customary at each term of the Exchequer to proclaim a forfeiture of such as was suffered to lie in the docks.

FORFEITURES ABOLITION ACT. The same as the Felony Act of 1870, abolishing forfeitures for felony in England.

FORGAVEL. A small rent reserved in money; a quit-rent. Sometimes written forjagubum.

FORGE. To fabricate by false imitation; especially, in law, to make a false instrument in similitude of an instrument by which one person could be obligated to another for the purpose of fraud and deceit. 92 Cal. 563. See 42 Me. 302.

To forge is to do one of the following things with intent to defraud, namely, (1) to make a document purporting to be what it is not, or (2) to alter a document without authority in such a manner that if the alteration had been authorized it would have altered the effect of the document, or (3) to sign a document: (a) in the name of a person without his authority, whether such name is or is not the same as that of the person signing; (b) in the name of any fictitious person alleged to exist; (c) in a name represented as being the name of a different person from that of the person signing it, and intended to be mistaken for the name of the former; or (d) in the name of a person personated by the person signing the document, if the effect of the document depends upon the identity between the person signing the document, and the person whom he professes to be. R. & L. Dict.; Steph. Cr. Dig. 267 et seq.; 2 Russ. Cr. 618.

FORGERY. The falsely making or materially altering, with intent to defraud, any writing which, if genuine, might apparently be of legal efficacy or the foundation of a legal liability. 2 Bish. Cr. Law § 528; 29 Fla. 408.

The fraudulent making and alteration of a writing to the prejudice of another man's right. 4 Bla. Com. 247. The essence of forgery consists in making an instrument appear to be that which it is not; L. R. 1 C. C. R. 200.

Bishop, 3 Cr. Law § 523, n., has collected nine definitions of forgery, and justly remarks that the books abound in definitions. Coke says the term is "taken metaphorically from the smith, who beateth upon his anvil and forgeth what fashion and shape he will." Co. 8d Inst. 109.

A person may commit forgery by fraudulently making, over his own signature, a paper writing which, if genuine, would possess legal efficacy, and might operate to the prejudice of another's rights; 85 Tenn. 232. One may have authority to sign the name of another to an instrument for the payment of money in a stated amount, or for a legal purpose, and yet commit a forgery by signing for a larger amount, or for an illegal purpose with intent to defraud; 51 Ark. 88.

A clerk in the telegraph office who sent to a bookmaker a telegram offering to bet on a certain horse, which purported to be sent before the race, and to be signed by a person who had authorized him to telegraph bets in his name, but which was in fact sent after the clerk knew that the horse had won the race, was held guilty of forgery under a statute against procuring money by virtue of any forged or altered instrument. Lord Russell of Killowen, C. J., and Vaughan Williams, J., doubted as to the statute, but not that it was forgery at common law; [1898] 1 Q. B. 309.

The making of a whole written instrument in the name of another with a fraudulent intent is undoubtedly a sufficient making; although otherwise where one executes a promissory note as agent for a principal from whom he has no authority; 15 Hun 155; but a fraudulent insertion, alteration, or erasure, even of a letter, in any material part of the instrument, whereby a new operation is given to it, will amount to a forgery; 1 Stra. 18; 5 Strobb. 581; L. R. 1 C. C. R. 200; and this, although it be afterwards executed by a person ignorant of the deceit; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 855.

The fraudulent application of a true signature to a false instrument for which it was not intended, or vice versa, will also be a forgery; 11 Gratt. 822; 1 Add. 44. For example, it is forgery in an individual who is requested to draw a will for a sick person in a particular way, instead of doing so, to insert legacies of his own head, and then procure the signature of such sick person to be affixed to the paper without revealing to him the legacies thus fraudulently inserted; Noy 101; F. Moore 769, 780; Co. 8d Inst. 170; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 70, s. 2; 2 Russ. Cr. 818; Bacon, Abr. Forgery (A); but one was not held to be guilty of forgery, who in writing a promissory note for an illiterate person to execute, inserts therein an amount larger than directed; 89 Ga. 788.

It has been intimated by Lord Ellenborough that a party who makes a copy of a receipt and adds to such copy material words not in the original, and then offers it in evidence on the ground that the original has been lost, may be prosecuted for forgery; 5 Esp. 100.

It is a sufficient making where, in the writing, the party assumes the name and character of a person in existence; 2 Russ. Cr. 827. But the adoption of a false description and addition where a false name is not assumed and there is no person answering the description, is not a forgery; 1 Russ. & R. 405.

Making an instrument in a fictitious name, or the name of a non-existing person, is as much a forgery as making it in the name of an existing person; 2 Russ. Cr. 828; 32 Tex. Cr. R. 74; 90 Ga. 847; and although a man may make the instrument in his own name, if he represent it as the instrument of another of the same name, when in fact there is no such person, it will be a forgery in the name of a non-existing person; 2 Leach 775; 2 East, Pl.

Cr. 983; 7 Pet. 132; 5 City H. Rec. 87. See 52 Iowa 68. But the correctness of this decision has been doubted; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 884. One who, with intent to forge the check of "R. & M.," signs the name "A. E. R. & Co." thereto, believing it to be the true name of the firm, is not guilty of forgery; 90 Cal. 586.

Though, in general, a party cannot be guilty of forgery by a mere non-feasance, yet if in drawing a will he should fraudulently omit a legacy which he had been directed to insert, and by the omission of such bequest it would cause a material alteration in the limitation of a bequest to another, as, where the omission of a devise of an estate for life to one causes a devise of the same lands to another to pass a present estate which would otherwise have passed a remainder only, it would be a forgery; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 70, s. 6; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 856; 2 Russ. Cr. 320.

It may be observed that the offence of forgery may be complete without a publication of the forged instrument; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 855; 3 Chitty, Cr. Law 1088.

With regard to the thing forged, it may be observed that it has been held to be forgery at common law fraudulently to falsify or falsely make records and other matters of a public nature; 1 Rolle, Abr. 65, 68; a parish register; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 70; a letter in the name of a magistrate, or of the governor of a gaol directing the discharge of a prisoner; 6 C. & P. 129; Mood. 379; the making a false municipal certificate with intent to defraud is forgery, notwithstanding the city has no power to issue such certificates; 68 Mo. 150; the alteration of a document to prevent the discovery of an embezzlement; 11 Crim. L. Mag. 47.

With regard to private writings, forgery may be committed of any writing which, if genuine, would operate as the foundation of another man's liability or the evidence of his right; 8 Greenl. Ev. § 103; 2 Mass. 397; 12 S. & R. 237; 8 Yerg. 150; as, a check; 5 Leigh 707; an assignment of a legal claim; an indorsement of a promissory note; 11 Gratt. 822; 3 Ohio 229; writing the name of the payee falsely and fraudulently on the back of a treasury warrant payable to order; 37 Fed. Rep. 108; a receipt or acquittance; 15 Mass. 528; an acceptance of a bill of exchange, or an order for the delivery of goods; 8 C. & P. 629; 3 Cush. 150; 26 Tex. App. 176; 11 Crim. L. Mag. 245; 31 Tex. Cr. R. 587; or an order for money; 79 Ga. 844; a deposition to be used in court; 50 Me. 409; a private act of parliament; 4 How. St. Tr. 951; a copy of any instrument to be used in evidence in the place of a real or supposed original; 8 Yerg. 150; false entries in the books of a mercantile house, but not necessarily so in every case; 82 Penn. 529; 46 N. H. 266; a letter of recommendation of a person as a man of property and pecuniary responsibility; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 365; a false testimonial to character; Templ. & M. 207; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 492; Dearsl. 285; a railway; pass; 2 C. & K. 604; a railroad-ticket; 8 Gray 441; or fraudulently to testify or falsely to make a deed or will; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 70, § 10; a certified bill of costs; 85 Tenn. 232; or of a contract which, if genuine, would be void as against public policy; 100 Cal. 864. Forgery may be of a printed or engraved as well as of a written instrument; 8 Gray 441; 9 Pick. 312; 127 U. S. 457; but falsely to subscribe a person's name to a recommendation of a medicine is not forgery; 2 Pear. 851; nor to alter a lease by interlineations in order to conform it to the purpose of parties; 89 Pa. 432; nor is the private memorandum-book of a public officer, not required to be kept by law, the subject of forgery; 8 Col. 571; nor is the forging of his docket entries by a justice of the peace indictable, under a statute making forging of the record of a court of record an indictable offence; 1 Houst. Cr. Cas. 110; nor the changing the date of tax receipts which still show on their face that they were given for the taxes of the year previous; 66 Minn. 14; a forgery must be of some document or writing; therefore, the printing an artist's name in the corner of a picture, in order falsely to pass it off as an original picture by that artist, is not a forgery; 1 Deasari. & B. 461; Clark, Cr. L. 295.

The intent must be to defraud another; 83 Ia. 128; 83 Ala. 46; but it is not requisite that any one should have been injured; it is sufficient that the instrument forged might have proved prejudicial; 3 Gill & J. 230; 4 Wash. C. C. 726; 81 Tex. Cr. R. 51; it has been held that the jury ought to infer an intent to defraud the person who would have to pay the instrument, if it were genuine, although from the manner of executing the forgery, or from the person's ordinary caution, it would not be likely to impose upon him; and although the object was general to defraud whoever might take the instrument, and the intention of the defrauding in particular the person who would have to pay the instrument, if genuine, did not enter into the contemplation of the prisoner; Russ. & R. 291; 101 N. C. 770; 11 Crim. L. Mag. 231; 44 La. Anr. 962. See Russ. Cr. B. 4, c. 32, s. 8; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 833; 1 Leach 867; Roscoe, Cr. Ev. 400; Clark, Cr. L. 300.

Most, and perhaps all, of the states in the Union have passed laws making certain acts to be forgery with the result, upon the whole, of enlarging the meaning of the term, and the national legislature has also enacted several on this subject, which are here referred to; but these statutes do not take away the character of the offence as a misdemeanor at common law, but only provide additional punishment in the cases particularly enumerated in the statutes; 3 Cush. 150; 3 Gray 441. It has been held that the crime of uttering forged commercial paper is included in the common-law definition of the word "forgery" as used in a treaty, and that a prisoner charged with it should be surrendered, although under the law of the other treaty power that crime is known as "fraud" by means of forgery, and "forgery" is only falsification of public documents; 53 Fed. Rep. 878.

The act of offering for sale and selling a forged instrument is a sufficient representation as to its genuineness; 73 Ia. 128.

See, generally, Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, cc. 51, 70; 3 Chitty, Cr. Law 1022; 2 Russ. Cr. b. 4, c. 32; 2 Bish. Cr. Law c. 22; 2 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 398; Roscoe, Cr. Ev.; Starkie, Ev.; 1 Whart. Cr. L. c. 9; COUNTERFEIT.

FORGERY ACT, 1870. The stat. 33 & 34 Vict. c. 58, was passed for the punishment of forgers of stock certificates, and for extending to Scotland certain provisions of the Forgery Act of 1861; Moz. & W.

FORHERDA. In Old English Law. A headland, or foreland. Cowel.

FORI DISPUTATIONES. In Civil Law. Arguments in court. Disputations or arguments before a court. Eminent citizens and statesmen often debated in the forum, and their answers to questions put were gradually adopted by the courts and incorporated into the body of the Roman law under this name. 1 Kent 530; Vicat, Voc. Jur. verb. Disputatio.

FORINSECUM SERVITIUM. See INTRINSECUM SERVITIUM.

FORINSECUS (Lat.). FORINSIC. Outward; on the outside; without; foreign; belonging to another manor. Sitio forinsecus, the outward ridge or furrow. Servitium forinsecum, the payment of aid, scutage, and other extraordinary military services. Forinsecum manerium, the manor, or that part of it which lies outside the bars or town and is not included within the liberties of it. Cowel; Blount; Cunningham, Law Dict.; Jacob, Foreign Service; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 278.

FORIS (Lat.). Out at the doors, out of door; abroad; without. Harp. Lat. Dict.

FORISBANITUS. Banished. Mat. Par. 1245.

FORISFACTURE (Lat.). To forfeit. To lose on account of crime. It may be applied not only to estates, but to a variety of other things, in precisely the popular sense of the word forfeit. Spelman, Gloss.; Du Cange.

To confiscate. Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss. To commit an offence; to do a wrong. To do something beyond or outside of (foris) what is right (extra rationem). Du Cange. To do a thing against or without law. Co. Litt. 59 a.

To disclaim. Du Cange.

FORISFACTUM (Lat.). Forfeited. Bona forisfacta, forfeited goods; 1 Bla. Com. 299. A crime. Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss.

FORISFACTURA (Lat.). A crime or offence through which property is forfeited. Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 32.

A fine or punishment in money.

Forfeiture. The loss of property or life in consequence of crime. Spelman, Gloss.

Forisfactura plena. A forfeiture of all a man's property. Things which were forfeited. Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss.

FORISFACTUS (Lat.). A criminal. One who has forfeited his life by commission of a capital offence. Spelman, Gloss; Leg. Rep. c. 77; Du Cange. Si quispiam forisfactus poposcit regis misericordiam, etc. (if any criminal shall have asked pardon of the king, etc.). Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 18.

Forisfactus servus. A slave who has been a free man but has forfeited his freedom by crime. Leg. Athelstan, c. 3; Du Cange.

FORISFAMILIATED, FORISFAMILIATUS. In Old English Law. Portion off. A son was forisfamiliarized when he had a portion of his father's estate assigned to him during his father's life, in lieu of his share of the inheritance, when it was done at his request and he assented to the assignment. The word etymologically denotes put out of the family (foris familiam ponere, from which is forisfamiliare; Glanv. l. 7, c. 3) mancipiated. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. L. 110; Bract, fol. 64.

FORISFAMILIATION. The separation of a child from the father's family. Bell; Toml.

One who is no longer an heir of the parent was termed forisfamiliatus. Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss; Cowel. Similar in some degree to the modern practice of advancement.

FORISJUDICATIO (Lat.). In Old English Law. Forejudgment. A forejudgment. A judgment of court whereby a man is put out of possession of a thing. Co. Litt. 100 b; Cunningham, Law Dict.

FORISJUDICATUS (Lat.). Forejudged; sent from court; banished. Deprived of a thing by judgment of court. Bracton, 250 b; Co. Litt. 100 b; Du Cange.

FORISJURARE (Lat.). To forswear; to abjure; to abandon. Forisjurare parentilam. To remove oneself from parental authority. The person who did this lost his rights as heir. Du Cange; Leg. Hen. I. c. 88.

Provinciam forisjurare. To forswear the country. Spelman, Gloss; Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 6.

FORJUDGE. See FOREJUDGE.

FORJURER (L. Fr.). In Old English Law. To abjure; to forswear. Forjurer royale, to abjure the realm. Britt. cc. 1, 18.

FORLER-LAND. Land in the diocese of Hereford, which had a peculiar custom attached to it, but which has been long since disused, although the name is retained. Butl. Surv. 56.

"Some of the peculiar customs of Hereford are recently published, as that 'the reeve of the borough may have been directly accountable to the king,' while 'in most cases the king's farmer was the sheriff of the shire.' Maffi. Domesd. 209. So also, 'at Hereford the reeve's consent was necessary when a burgage was to be sold, and he took a third of the price. When a burgage died the king got his horse and arms (these Hereford burgesses were fighting men); if he had no horse, then ten shillings' or his land with the houses." Any one who was too poor to do his service might abandon his tenement to the reeve without having to pay for it. Such an entry as this seems to tell us that the services were no trivial return for the tenements;" 4d. 109.

FORM. In Practice. The model of an instrument or legal proceeding, containing the substance and the principal terms, to be used in accordance with the laws.

The legal order or method of legal proceedings or construction of legal instruments.

Form is usually put in contradistinction to substance. For example, by the operation of the statute of 27 Eliz. c. 5, s. 1, all merely formal defects in pleading, except in dilatory pleas, are aided on general demurrer. The difference between matter of form and matter of substance, in general, under this statute, as laid down by Lord Hobart, C. J., is that "that which the right doth sufficiently appear to the court is form;" but that any defect "by reason whereof the right appears not" is a defect in substance; Hob. 233. A distinction somewhat more definite is that if the matter pleaded be in itself insufficient, without reference to the manner of pleading it, the defect is substantial; but that if the fault is in the manner of alleging it, the defect is formal; Dougl. 683.

For example, the omission of a consideration in a declaration in assumpsit, or of the performance of a condition precedent, when such condition exists, of a conversion of property of the plaintiff in trover, of knowledge in the defendant, in an action for mischief done by his dog, of malice, in an action for malicious prosecution, and the like, are all defects in substance. On the other hand, duplicity, a negative pregnant, argumentative pleading, a special plea, amounting to the general issue, omission of a day, when time is immaterial, of a place, in transitory actions, and the like, are only faults in form; Bacon, Abr. Pleas, etc. (N. 6); Com. Pleas, Pl. c. 9, § 17, 19; 1 Bla. Com. 142.

At the same time that fastidious objections against trifling errors of form, arising from mere clerical mistakes, are not encouraged or sanctioned by the courts, it has been justly observed that "infinite mischief has been produced by the facility of the courts in overlooking matters of form: it encourages carelessness, and places ignorance too much upon a footing with knowledge amongst those who practice the drawing of pleadings;" 1 B. & P. 59; 2 Binn. 434. See MATTER OF FORM.

FORMA. Form; the prescribed or established form or method of legal proceedings; applied to obsolete actions "which are frequently mere establishments, Forma et figura iudicii," the form and shape of judicial action. 3 Bla. Com. 271.

A form prescribed by statute. According to Lord Coke, there are two manner of forms, verbal form, and legal form. The former stands upon the letters and syllables of the act; the latter stands upon the substance of the thing to be done, and upon the sense of the statute. Burrill; 10 Co. 100 a.

FORMA PAUPERIS. See IN FORMA PAUPERIS.

FORMALITIES. Customary behavior, dress, or ceremony; ceremonial. Cent. Dict. In England. Robes worn by the magistrates of a city or corporation, etc., on solemn occasions. Encyc. Lond.

Established orders or methods, rules of proceeding or expression. Opposed, to informalities. Anderson; 16 S. & R. 118.

FORMALITY. The conditions which must be observed in making contracts, and the words which the law gives to be used in order to render them valid; it also signifies the conditions which the law requires to make regular proceedings.

FORMATA. Canonical letters. Spelman.

FORMATA BREVIA. See BREVIA FORMATA.

FORMED ACTION. An action for which a form of words is provided which must be exactly followed. 10 Mod. 140.

FORMEDON. An ancient writ provided by stat. Westm. 2 (13 Edw. I.) c. 1, for him who hath right to lands or tenements by virtue of a gift in tail. Stearn, Real Act. 322; Andr. Steph. Pl. 66.

It is a writ in the nature of a writ of right, and is the highest remedy which a tenant in tail can have. Co. Litt. 816.

This writ lay for those interested in an estate-tail who were liable to be defeated of their right by a discontinuance of the estate-tail, who were not entitled to a writ of right absolute, since none but those who claimed in fee-simple were entitled to this; Fitzh. N. B. 253. It is called formedon because the plaintiff in it claimed per formam doni. It is of three sorts: in the remainder; in the reverter; in the descender; 2 Prest. Abstr. 843.

The writ was abolished in England by stat. 8 & 4 Will. IV. c. 27.

FORMEDON IN THE DESCENDER. A writ of formedon which lies where a gift is made in tail and the tenant in tail alienates the lands or is disseised of them and dies, for the heir in tail to recover them, against the actual tenant of the freehold; Fitzh. N. B. 211; Littleton § 598.

If the demandant claims the inheritance as an estate-tail which ought to come to him by descent, from some ancestor to whom it was first given, his remedy is by a writ of formedon in the descender; Stearn, Real Act. 822.

It must have been brought within twenty years from the death of the ancestor who was disseised; 21 Jac. I. c. 16; 3 Brod. & B. 217; 6 East 88; 4 Term 300; 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 193, n.

FORMEDON IN THE REMAINDER. A writ of formedon which lies where lands are given to one for life or in tail with remainder to another in fee or in tail, and he who had the particular estate dies without issue, and a stranger intrudes upon him in remainder and keeps him out of possession. Fitzh. N. B. 211; Stearn, Real Act. 828; Littleton § 597; 3 Bla. Com. 293.

FORMEDON IN THE REVERTER. A writ of formedon which lies where there is a gift in tail, and afterwards, by the death of the donee or his heirs without issue of his body, the reversion falls in upon the donor, his heirs or assigns.

In this case the demandant must suggest the gift, his own right as derived from the donor, and the failure of heirs of the donee; 3 Bla. Com. 298; Stearn, Real Act. 823; Fitzh. N. B. 212; Littleton § 597.

FORMELLA. A certain weight of more than seventy pounds, mentioned in stat. 51 Hen. III. Cowel.

FORMER JEOPARDY. For a plea of "former jeopardy" to avail, it must appear that in each prosecution, the accused, the sovereignty whose laws have been violated, and the offenses not only as to the act but also as to the crime, are identical. 154 Ky. 150, 156 S. W. 1058.

The statute giving an appeal to the Commonwealth in penal actions and indictments for misdemeanors which subject the defendant to a fine only, and authorizing a new trial after the reversal of an acquittal in the trial court, is not in conflict with the constitutional provision that no person shall, for the same offense, be twice put in jeopardy for his life or limb. 146 Ky. 109, 142 S. W. 202.

FORMER RECOVERY. A recovery in a former action. The term former adjudication is sometimes, though infrequently, used.

It is a general rule that in a real or personal action a judgment unreversed, whether it be by confession, verdict, or demurrer, is a perpetual bar, and may be pleaded to any new action of the same or a like nature, for the same cause; Bacon, Abr. Pleas (12, n. 2); 6 Co. 7; Hob. 4, 5; Vent. 70.

There are two exceptions to this general rule. First, in the case of mutual dealings between the parties, when the defendant omits to set off his counter-demand, he may recover in a cross action. Second, when the defendant in ejectment neglects to bring forward his title, he may avail himself of a new suit; 1 Johns. Cas. 492, 602, 510. It is evident that in these cases the cause of the second action is not the same as that of the first, and, therefore, a former recovery cannot be pleaded. In real actions, one is not a bar to an action of a higher nature; 6 Co. 7. See 12 Mass. 337; Res Judicata.

FORMER TRIAL. (Self-Incrimination.) Incriminating statements made by the defendant at former trials of the same criminal cause of action may be deemed voluntary and, if so, are competent. 2

Cham., Mod. L. Evid., 1995; 122 Mass. 455. The same rule obtains when the earlier case was a civil action and the later criminal. Id.; 33 Tex. Cr. 163. Speaking of the admissibility of former confessions made in the course of court proceedings the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts says, "It is immaterial when or where they were made." Id.; 122 Mass. 455. Should it happen that the original statement was clearly volunteered on a former trial by the present defendant, it is unquestionably competent against him on a subsequent trial. Id.; 35 So. 302.

FORMIDO PERICULI (Lat.). Fear of danger. 1 Kent, Com. 28.

FORMS OF ACTION. This term comprehends the various classes of personal action at common law, viz.: trespass, case, trover, detinue, replevin, covenant, debt, assumpsit, scire facias, and revivor, as well as the nearly obsolete actions of account and annuity, and the modern action of mandamus. They are now abolished in England by the Judicature Acts of 1878 and 1875, and in many of the states of the United States, where a uniform course of proceeding under codes of procedure has taken their place. But the principles regulating the distinctions between the common-law actions are still found applicable even where the technical forms are abolished.

FORMULA. In common-law practice, a set form of words used in judicial proceedings. In the civil law, an action. Calvin; Black.

These words are generally written, always consisting of the same parts, and expressed in precisely the same language, except where variation is necessary to accommodate it to a particular case. The writs, pleadings and records of the common law system of practice furnish the best examples of written formulae. Burrill.

In Civil Law. An action. Id.; Calv. Lex. See FORMULAE.

[FORMULAE] .....

In Roman Law. When the legis actiones were proved to be inconvenient, a mode of procedure called per formulas (i. e. by means of formulae) was gradually introduced, and eventually the legis actiones were abolished by the Lex Aebutia, B. C. 164, excepting in a very few exceptional matters. R. & L. Dict.

FORMULAE. In Roman Law. Directions sent by the magistrate to the judge for the dispositions of cases, with respect to which the legis actiones (established actions, or more accurately according to English legal idiom, forms of action) were inadequate. Sand. Just. Introd. lxviii.

The introduction of the formulae marked a distinct change in the Roman system of civil process, and they were in turn succeeded by an equally radical change. These periods have been designated as three great epochs. First, was the system of the legis actiones, defined as "certain hard, sharply defined forms which a rude civilization prescribed for all proceedings." These, as civilization advanced, were necessarily replaced by more convenient forms of action, and were finally practically suppressed. The new system of formula was a very flexible form of organizing the proceedings adopted by the praetors, by which they were "enabled to give a means enforcing every right which the more enlarged views of an advancing civilization pronounced to be founded on equity." The praetors (in the provinces, praefects) sat as magistrates. From them the directions were sent to the judge in formal shape for each case; and the different forms in which these directions were given were expressed by the formulae. They were binding on the judge, but no form was binding on the magistrate, who could avail himself "of any equitable doctrine, which a more refined jurisprudence or his own sense of what was right suggested to him," and so "vary the formula, so as to render substantial justice." "These formulae (which were preserved and collected), so flexible in their general character, yet couched in terms always precise and simple, furnish one of many admirable instances of the power of the Romans to express correctly the subtlest legal ideas; and it was by this machinery that the praetors principally introduced their great legal changes."

The formula ordinarily consisted of these three parts:

The demonstratio or statement of the fact or facts which the plaintiff alleges as the ground of his case.

The intentio, the really important part of the formula, a precise statement of the demand which the plaintiff made against (tendebat in) his adversary. It was necessary that it should exactly meet the law which would govern the facts alleged by the plaintiff if true.

The condemnatio, the direction to condemn or absolve according to the true circumstances of the case. In three actions, —to divide a family inheritance, or property held in common, or settle boundaries, the judge was required to adjudicate. This was termed the adjudicatio. In these actions, therefore, the parts of the formula would be four—demonstratio, intentio, adjudicatio, and condemnatio, in case, as might happen, the judge should order a payment in money by some of the parties to equalize the division; the condemnatio, under this system, being always pecuniary.

This system finally gave place to that which prevailed in the third period of the Roman system, "that of the extraordinaria iudicia, by which, under the later emperors, the supreme authority took the whole conduct of the proceeding into its own hands, and arrived at what seemed to it to be just, in as direct and speedy a manner as it found possible. See a clear and satisfactory statement of the Roman system of civil process during these three periods; Sand. Just. Introd. lxi. See also Mackeld. Rom. Law § 204.

FORMULARIES. A collection of the forms of proceedings among the Franks and other early European nations. Co. Litt. Butler's note, 77.

FORNAGIUM. The fee taken by a lord of his tenants, bound to bake in his common oven, for liberty to use their own. Cowel; Moz. & W.

FORNICATION. In Criminal Law. Unlawful carnal knowledge by an unmarried person of another, whether the latter be married or unmarried.

Fornication is distinguished from adultery by the fact that the guilty person is not married. Four cases of unlawful intercourse may arise: where both parties are married; where the man only is married; where the woman only is married; where neither is married. In the first case such intercourse must be adultery; in the second case the crime is fornication only on the part of the woman, but adultery on the part of the man; in the third case it is adultery in the woman, and fornication (by statute in some states, adultery) in the man; in the last case it is fornication only in both parties.

In some states it is indictable by statute; 6 Vt. 311; 2 Tayl. C. 185; 2 Gratt. 555; and where it is there may be a conviction for this offense on an indictment for adultery; 2 Dall. 124; 4 Ired. 231; 1 Bish. Crim. L. 795. In Pennsylvania it is a misdemeanor for which an indictment lies, and is also a constituent of incest, adultery, seduction under promise of marriage, and rape; 149 Pa. 38.

FORNIX (Lat. a vault or arch). A brothel, so-called because formerly situated in underground vaults. Fornication. Fornix et cetera. Fornication and the rest; fornication and bastardy (qq. v.).

FORNO. In Spanish Law. An oven. Las Partidas, pt. 8, t. 83. l. 18.

FORO. In Spanish Law. The place where tribunals hear and determine causes, —caerendarum litium locus. This word, according to Varo, is derived from ferendo, and is so called because all lawsuits have reference to things that are vendible, which presupposes the administration of justice to take place in the markets.

FOROS. In Spanish Law. Emphyteutic rents. Schm. C. L. 309.

FORPRISE. An exception; reservation; excepted; reserved. Anciently, a term of frequent use in leases and conveyances. Cowel; Blount.

In another sense, the word is taken for any exaction. Cunningham, Law Dict.

FORSCHER, or FORSCHET. A strip of land lying next to the highway. Cowel.

FORSES. Waterfalls. Cam. Brit.

FORSPAKER. An attorney or advocate. One who speaks for another. Blount.

FORSPECA, FORSPKECA. Prolocutor; paranympus. Anc. Inst. Eng.

FORSTAL. An intercepting or stopping in the highway. See FORESTALL.

Forstaller, forstall, forstallare, forstallment, forstaller, may all be found under FORESTALL, etc.

FORSWEAR. In Criminal Law. To swear to a falsehood.

This word has not the same meaning as perjury. It does not, ex vi termini, signify a false swearing before an officer or court having authority to administer an oath, on an issue. A man may be forsworn by making a false oath before an incompetent tribunal, as well as before a lawful court. Hence, to say that a man is forsworn will or will not be slander, as the circumstances show that the oath was or was not taken before a lawful authority: Heard, Lib. & S. §§ 16, 34; Cro. Car. 378; Bacon, Abr. Slander (B 3); Cro. Eliz. 609; 1 Johns. 505; 13 id. 48, 60; 12 Mass. 496; 1 Hayw. 116.

FORT. Something more than a mere military camp, post, or station; it implies a fortification or a place protected from attack by some such means as a moat, wall, or parapet. 12 Fed. Rep. 424.

FORTALICE, or FORTELACE. A fortress or place of strength which anciently did not pass without a special grant. 11 Hen. VII. c. 18. They were originally built for the defence of the country, either against foreign invasions, or civil commotions; and were anciently held to be inter regalia, corresponding with the Roman res publicae, such as navigable rivers, ports, ferries, and the like, but they now pass with the lands in every charter; Ersk. Pr. 185.

FORTALITUM. A fortalice (q. v.). Strictly, in old Scotch law, a fortified house or town, or one having a moat around it.

FORTAXED. Wrongly or extortionately taxed.

FORTHCOMING. In Scotch Law. The action by which an arrestment (attachment) of goods is made available to the creditor or holder.

The arrestee and common debtor are called up before the judge, to hear sentence given ordering the debt to be paid or the arrested goods to be given up to the creditor arresting. Bell, Dict.

FORTHCOMING BOND. A bond given for the security of the sheriff, conditioned to produce the property levied on when required. 2 Wash. Va. 169; 11 Gratt. 522; 61 Ga. 520; 87 id. 560.

The measure of damages for breach of a forthcoming bond would be the value of the property at the time the bond was given, provided that value did not exceed the amount of the execution, debt, interest, and costs; 91 Ga. 132. See BOND.

In attachment proceedings or in executions, a bond whereby the defendant may secure to himself possession of the property in question, pending the outcome of the litigation. It is conditioned for the delivery of the property in response to the judgment that may be obtained, or for the payment of the penalty of the bond. Known also as a delivery bond. 4 Elliott, Contracts, §§ 3528, 3529. Known as a claim property bond (q. v.) in replevin proceedings. Shinn, Replevin, § 419.1.

FORTHWITH. As soon as by reasonable exertion, confined to the object, it may be accomplished. This is the import of the term; it varies, of course, with every particular case; 4 Tyrwh. 887; Styles, Reg. 432; 75 Pa. 878. See 101 Ill. 631; 11 H. L. Cas. 337; 67 N. Y. 274; 58 Md. 201; 7 Ch. Div. 288; 9 Q. B. 684; 44 Ohio St. 487. When a defendant is ordered to plead forthwith, he must plead within twenty-four hours; Wharton. In other matters of practice, the word has come to have the same meaning; 2 Edw. 338. A demand for an account forthwith is not the same in substance and effect as a demand for an account within 15 days; 64 Vt. 309. Where a verdict was returned between noon and one p. m. on Saturday, while the justice was hearing other cases, an entry of judgment on the verdict on Monday was sufficient under a statute requiring it to be rendered "forthwith"; 56 Minn. 350. Where a chattel mortgage must "be forthwith deposited" to affect subsequent bona fide purchasers, the filing more than three months after execution was notice to purchasers who took title after the filing; 28 Tex. 338. A statute providing that an order to revive an action may be made forthwith, means at the first term after plaintiff's death; 22 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 484. When an insurance policy required notice of loss to be given forthwith, it was sufficient twelve days after the fire when no harm was caused by delay; 50 Kan. 453.

FORTIA (Lat.). A word of art, signifying the furnishing a weapon of force to do the fact, and by force whereof the fact was committed, and he that furnished it was not present when the act was done. Co. 2d Inst. 182.

The general meaning of the word is an unlawful force. Spelman, Gloss.; Du Cange. Fortia frisca. Fresh force (q. v.).

FORTILITY. In Old English Law. A fortified place; a castle; a bulwark. Cowel; 11 Hen. VII. c. 18.

FORTIN. A little fort; a field fort. Enc. Dict.

FORTIOR (Lat.). Stronger. A term applied in the law of evidence to that species of presumption, arising from facts shown in evidence, which is strong enough to shift the burden of proof to the opposite party. Burr. Cir. Ev. 64.

FORTIORI. See A FORTIORI.

FORTIS (Lat.). Strong. Fortis et sana, strong and sound; staunch and strong; as a vessel. Townsh. Pl. 227.

FORTLETT. A place or port of some strength; a little fort. Old. Nat. Brev. 45.

FORTRET. A little fort; a fort.

FORTUIT (Fr.). Accidental; casual; fortuitous. Cas fortuit, a fortuitous event. Fortuitum, accidentally; by chance.

FORTUITOUS. Depending on or happening by chance; casual; not designed; adventitious. In Civil Law. Resulting from unavoidable causes.

FORTUITOUS COLLISION. An accidental collision.

FORTUITOUS EVENT. In Civil Law. That which happens by a cause which cannot be resisted.

That which neither of the parties has occasioned or could prevent. Lois des Bdt. pt. 2, c. 2. An unforeseen event which cannot be prevented. Dict. de Jurisp. Cas fortuit.

There is a difference between a fortuitous event, or inevitable accident, and irresistible force. By the former, commonly called the act of God, is meant any accident produced by physical causes which are irresistible; such as a loss by lightning or storms, or by the perils of the seas, by inundations and earthquakes, or by sudden death or illness. By the latter is meant such an interposition of human agency as is, from its nature and power, absolutely uncontrollable. Of this nature are losses occasioned by the inroads of a hostile army, or by public enemies. Story, Bailm. § 23; Lois des Bdt. pt. 2, c. 2, § 1.

Fortuitous events are fortunate or unfortunate. The accident of finding a treasure is a fortuitous event of the first class. Lois des Bdt. pt. 2, c. 2, § 2.

Involuntary obligations may arise in consequence of fortuitous events. For example, when to save a vessel from shipwreck, it is necessary to throw goods overboard, the loss must be borne in common; there arises, in this case, between the owners of the vessel and of the goods remaining on board, an obligation to bear proportionately the loss which has been sustained. Lois des Bdt. pt. 2, c. 2, § 2. See ACT OF GOD.

FORTUNA (Lat.). Fortune; also treasure-trove. Jac.; Moz. & W.

FORTUNE-TELLER. One who pretends to be able to reveal future events; one who pretends to the knowledge of futurity.

It was a practice during the Middle Ages, and is still far from dying out, though laws for its suppression have been passed, and many fortune-tellers have been convicted and punished. Encyc. Dict.

An English statute provided that every person pretending or professing to tell fortunes should be deemed a rogue and a vagabond. It was held that no distinction could be drawn between professing to possess a power and pretending to exercise that power. 13 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed. 1163; 16 Cox C. C. 173, 18 Q. B. Div. 478. It was held that one who professed to possess a power to foretell future events and who offered his services to the public in that capacity by advertising in the newspapers was subject to prosecution as a disorderly person for pretending to tell fortunes. Id.; 109 Mich. 493.

FORTUNUM. In Old English Law. A tournament or fighting with spears, and an appeal to fortune therein.

FORTY-DAYS-COURT. The court of attachments (q. v.) in the forests.

FORUM. At Common Law. A place. A place of jurisdiction. The place where a remedy is sought. Jurisdiction. A court of justice.

Forum actus. The forum of the place where an act was done.

Forum conscientie. The conscience. Forum contentiosum. A court. 3 Bla. Com. 211.

Forum contractus. Place of making a contract. 2 Kent 463.

Forum domesticum. A domestic court. 1 W. Blackst. 82.

Forum domicilii. Place of domicile. 2 Kent 463.

Forum ecclesiasticum. An ecclesiastical court.

Forum ligeantie rei. The forum of the allegiance of the defendant.

Forum originis. The forum of birth.

Forum regium. The court of the king. Stat. Westm. 2, c. 43.

Forum rei. This expression is used alternatively for the forum of the defendant's domicile, in which case it is the genitive of reus, or the forum of the thing in controversy, when it is the genitive of res.

Forum rei gestæ. Place of transaction. 2 Kent 463.

Forum rei sitæ. The place where the thing is situated.

The tribunal which has authority to decide respecting something in dispute, located within its jurisdiction: therefore, if the matter in controversy is land or other immovable property, the judgment pronounced in the forum rei sitæ is held to be of universal obligation, as to all matters of right and title on which it professes to decide, in relation to such property. And the same principle applies to all other cases of proceedings in rem, where the subject is movable property, within the jurisdiction of the court pronouncing judgment. Story, Conf. Laws §§ 532, 545, 551, 591, 592; Kaines, Eq. 5, 8, c. 8, § 4; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 541.

Forum seculare. A secular court.

In Roman Law. The paved open space in cities, particularly in Rome, where were held the solemn business assemblies of the people, the markets, the exchange (whence cedere foro, to retire from 'change, equivalent to "to become bankrupt"), and where the magistrates sat to transact the business of their office. It corresponded to the agora of the Greeks. Dion. Hal. l. 3, p. 200. It came afterwards to mean any place where causes were tried, locus exercenda- rum litium. Isidor. l. 18, Orig. A court of justice.

The obligation and the right of a person to have his case decided by a particular court.

It is often synonymous with that signification of judicium which corresponds to our word court (which see), in the forum jurisdiction, forum interdicere, l. 1, § 3, D. 1, 12; C. 9, § 4, D. 48, 19; forum præscriptio, l. 7, pr. D. 2, 1; l. 1, C. 3, 24; forum rei accusator sequitur, l. 5, pr. C. 13. In this sense the forum of a person means both the obligation and the right of that person to have his case decided by a particular court. Id. Pand. 226. What court should have cognizance of the cause depends, in general, upon the person of the defendant, or upon the person of some one connected with the defendant.

Jurisdictiones dependunt upon the person of the defendant. By modern writers upon the Roman law, this sort of jurisdiction is distinguished into three of common right, forum commune, and that of special privilege, forum privilegium.

(A.) Forum commune. The jurisdiction of common right was either general, forum generale, or special, forum speciale.

(a.) Forum generale. General jurisdiction was of two kinds, the forum originis, which was that of the birthplace of the party, and the forum domicilii, that of his domicile. The forum originis was either commune or proprium. The former was that legal status which all free-born subjects of the empire, wherever residing, had at Rome when they were found there and had not the jus procurandi domum in any other place, or, if absent from his domicile of transferring to the forum domicilii a suit instituted against him in the place of his temporary sojourn. L. 2, § 3, 4, 5, D. 5, 1; l. 28, § 4, D. 4, 6; 6 Glück, Pand. 188. After the privilege of Roman citizenship was conferred by Caracalla upon all free-born subjects of the empire, the city of Rome was considered the common home of all communis omnium patria, and every citizen, no matter where his domicile, could, unless protected by special privilege, be sued at Rome while there present. Noodt, Com. ad Dig. 6, 1, p. 153; Hofacker, Pr. Jur. Civ. § 422. The forum originis proprium, or forum originis speciale, was the court of that place of which at the time of the party's birth his father was a citizen, though that might possibly be neither his own birthplace nor the actual domicile of his father. Except in particular places, as Delphi and Pontus, where the nativity of the mother conferred the privilege of citizenship upon her son, the birthplace of the father only was regarded. l. 1, § 2, D. 50, 1. The case of the nullius filius was also an exception. Such a person having no known father derived his forum originis from the birthplace of his mother. L. 9, D. 50, 1.

Adoption might confer a twofold citizenship, that of the natural and that of the adoptive father. l. 7, C. 8, 48; but the latter was lost by emancipation. l. 18, D. 50, 1. In general, the birthplace of the father alone fixed the forum originis of the son. Anaya, Com. ad Tit. Cod. de incolis, n. 21, seq. 99. The forum originis was unchangeable, and continued although the party had established his domicile in another place; consequently he could not be sued in the courts of that jurisdiction whenever he was there present. 6 Glück, Pand. p. 260.

Forum domicilii. The place of the domicile exercised the greatest influence over the rights of the party. (As to what constitutes domicile, see DOMICIL.) In general, one was subject to the law and courts of his domicile, unless specially privileged. L. 28, D. 50, 1. This legal status, forum domicilii, was universal, in the sense that all suits of whatever nature, real or personal, petitory or possessory, might be instituted in the courts of the defendant's domicile even when the thing in dispute was not situated in that place, and the defendant was not present at such place at the commencement of the suit; 6 Glück, Pand. 287 et seq. It seems, however, that as regarded real actions the forum domicilii was concurrent with the forum rei sitæ, id. 280, and, in general, was concurrent with special jurisdictions of all kinds; all suits, unless specially privileged, the law conferred exclusive cognizance upon a special jurisdiction, forum speciale. In cases of concurrence the plaintiff had his election of the jurisdiction.

In another sense the forum domicilii was personal, as it did not necessarily descend to the heir of the defendant. See Jurisdiction ex persona alterius, at the end of this article.

Forum speciale, particular jurisdiction. These were very numerous. The more important are: (1.) Forum continentis cauarum. Sometimes two or more actions or disputed questions are connected that they cannot advantageously be tried separately, although in strictness they belong to different jurisdictions. In such cases the modern civil law permits them to be determined in a single court, although such court would be incompetent in regard to a portion of the questions. This beneficial rule did not exist in the Roman law, though formerly supposed to be derived thence. See 11 Glück, Pand. § 750, and cases there cited. (2.) Forum contractus, the court having cognizance of the action on a contract. If the place of performance was ascertained, the court of that place had exclusive jurisdiction of actions founded thereon; 6 Glück, Pand. 306. If the place of performance was uncertain, the court of the place where the contract was made might have jurisdiction, provided the defendant at that place had the institution of the cause present at that place or had attachable property there. Id. 308.

(3.) Forum delicti, forum deprehensionis, is the jurisdiction of the person of a criminal, and may be the court of the place where the offence was committed, or that of the place where the crime was arrested. The latter jurisdiction, forum deprehensionis, extended at most only to the preliminary examination of the person arrested; and even this was abolished by Justinian, Nov. lxxix. c. 1, exxviii.

c. 5, on the ground that the examination as well as the punishment should take place on the spot where the crime was committed; 6 Glück, Pand. § 517.

(4.) Forum rei sitæ is the jurisdiction of the court of that place where is situated the thing which is the object of the action. Such court had jurisdiction over all actions affecting the possession of the thing, and over all petitory actions in rem against the possessor in that character, and all such actions in personam so far as they were brought for the recovery of the thing itself. But such court had no jurisdiction of purely personal actions. Id. § 519.

Forum arcei is a jurisdiction unknown to the Roman law, but of frequent occurrence in the modern civil law. It is that over persons or things detained by a judicial order, and corresponds in some degree to the attachment of our practice. Id. § 519. Forum gestæ administrationis, the jurisdiction over the accounts and administration of guardians, agents, and all persons appointed to manage the affairs of third parties. The court which appointed such administrator, or wherein the cause was pending in which such appointment was made, or within whose territorial limits the business of the administration was transacted, had exclusive jurisdiction over all suits arising out of his acts or brought for the purpose of compelling him to account, or brought by him to recover compensation for his outlays; L. 1, C. 3, 21; 6 Glück, Pand. § 521.

Privileged jurisdictions, forum privilegium. In general, the privileged jurisdiction of a person held in such rank as patronus, domiciliarius, and like that, did not supplant the particular jurisdictions above named save in certain exceptional cases. The privilege was general in its nature, and applied to all cases not specially excepted, but it only arose when the person possessing it was sued by another; he could not assert it against the plaintiff. The rule, actor sequitur forum rei, the plaintiff must resort to the jurisdiction of the defendant. It was in general limited to personal actions; all real actions brought against the defendant in the character of possessor or the thing in dispute followed the forum speciale. The privilege embraced the wife of the privileged person and his children so long as they were under his potestas. And lastly, when a forum privilegium purely personal conflicted with the forum speciale, the former must yield; 6 Glück, Pand. 339-341. To these rules some exceptions occur, which will be mentioned below.

Privileged persons were: 1. Personæ miserabiles, who were persons under the special protection of the law on account of some incapacity of age, sex, mind, or condition. These were entitled, either as plaintiffs or defendants, to carry their causes directly before the emperor, and, passing over the inferior courts, to demand a hearing before his supreme tribunal, whenever they had valid grounds for doubting the impartiality or fearing the procrastination of the inferior courts, or the direct influence of a powerful adversary; 6 Glück, Pand. § 522. On the other hand, if their adversary, on any pretext whatever, had himself passed by the inferior courts and applied directly to the supreme tribunal, they were not bound to appear there if this would be disadvantageous to them, but in order to avoid the expense and other inconveniences, might decline answering except before their forum domicilii. The personæ miserabiles thus privileged were minor orphans, widows, whether rich or poor, persons afflicted by chronic disease or other forms of illness (diuturno morbo fatigati et debiles), which included paralytics, epileptics, the deaf, the dumb, and the blind, etc., persons impoverished by calamity or otherwise distressed, and the poor when their adversary was rich and powerful, prosertim cum alieuius potentiam perhorrescant. This privilege was, however, not available, when both parties were personæ miserabiles; when it had been waived either expressly or tacitly; when the party had become personæ miserabiles since the institution of the action, except always the case of reasonable suspicion in regard to the impartiality of the judge; when the party had become personæ miserabiles through his own crime or fraud; when the cause was real, or belonged to the class of unconditionally privileged cases having an exclusive forum; and when the cause of action was a right acquired from a persona non miserabilis. 6 Glück, Pand. § 522.

Clerici, the clergy. The privilege of clerical persons to be implicated only in the episcopal courts commenced under the Christian emperors. Justinian enlarged the jurisdiction of these courts, not only by giving them exclusive cognizance of affairs and offences purely ecclesiastical, but also by constituting them the ordinary primary courts for the trial of suits brought by clergy even for the temporal causes of action. Nov. 83, Nov. 123, cap. 8, 21, 22, 23. The causes of action cognizable in the forum ecclesiasticum were—1. causæ ecclesiasticæ mere tales, purely ecclesiastical, i. e., those pertaining to doctrine, church services, and ceremonies, and rights of membership in relation to the synodical assemblies and church discipline; those relating to offices and dignities and to the election, ordination, translation, and deposition of pastors and other office-bearers of the church, and especially divorce; or, 2. causæ ecclesiasticæ mixtæ, mixed causes, i. e., disputes in regard to church lands, tithes, and other revenues, their management and disbursement, and legacies to pious uses, in regard to the boundaries of ecclesiastical jurisdictions, in burials and to consecrated places, as graveyards, convents, etc., and, lastly, in regard to offences against the canons of the church, as simony, etc. But the privilege here treated of was the personal privilege of the clergy when defendant in a suit to have the canonical court of the plaintiff, the rule actor sequitur forum rei prevailed. All persons employed in the church service in an official capacity, even though not in holy orders, were thus privileged. But the privilege did not embrace real actions, nor personal actions brought for the possession of a thing; these must be instituted in the forum rei sitæ. The juisdiction extended to all personal actions, criminal as well as civil; although in criminal actions the ecclesiastical courts had no authority to inflict corporal or capital punishment, being restricted to the canonical judgments of deprivation, degradation, excommunication, etc. 6 Glück, Pand. § 523. Forum militie. In the modern civil law the officers and students of the universities are privileged to be sued before the university courts. This species of privilege was unknown to the Roman law. See 6 Glück, Pand. § 524.

Militæ. Soldiers had special military courts as well as civil as criminal cases. In civil matters, however, the forum militare had preference only over the courts of the place where the soldier defendant was stationed; as he did not forfeit his domicile by absence on military duty, he might always be sued for debt in the ordinary forum domicilii, provided he had left there a procurator to transact his business for him, or had property there which might be proceeded against. L. 3, C. 7, 51; l. 6, eadem; l. 4, C. 7, 53. Besides this, the privilege of the forum militare did not extend to such soldiers as carried on a trade or profession in addition to their military service and were sued in a case growing out of such trade, although in other respects they were subject to the military tribunal. L. 7, C. 8, 13. If after an action had been commenced the defendant became a soldier, the privilege did not attach, but the suit must be concluded before the court which had acquired jurisdiction of it. The forum militare had cognizance of personal actions only. Actions arising out of real rights could be instituted only in the forum rei sitæ. In the Roman law, ordinary crimes of soldiers were cognizable in the forum delicti. The modern civil law is otherwise. 6 Glück, Pand. 418, 421.

There are many classes of persons who are privileged in respect to jurisdiction under the modern civil law who were not so privileged by the Roman law. Such are officers of the court of the sovereign, including ministers of state and councillors, ambassadors, noblemen, etc. These do not require extended notice.

Jurisdiction ex persona alterius. A person might be entitled to be sued in a particular court on account of the dependency upon the person of another. Such were—1. The Wife, who, if the marriage had been legally contracted, acquired the forum of her husband; l. 65, D. 5, 1; l. ult. D. 50, 1; l. 19, D. 2, 1; and retained it until her second marriage; l. 22, § 1, D. 50, or change of domicile; § 53, Voet. com. ad Pand. D. 5, 1, 2. Servants, who possessed the jurisdiction of their master as regarded the forum domicilii, and also the forum privilegium, so far at least as the privilege was that of the class to which such master belonged and was not purely personal. Glück, Pand. § 610 b. 3. The heirs, who in many cases retained the jurisdiction of his testator. When sued in the character of heir in respect to causes of action upon which suit had been commenced before the testator's death, he must submit to the forum which had acquired cognizance of the suit; L. 30, 34, D. 5, 1. When the cause of action accrued whether in such case he was bound to submit to special jurisdictions to which the testator would have been subjected, as the forum contractus or gestæ administrationis, especially if personally present or possessing property within such jurisdiction; L. 19, D. 5, 1. But it is even now disputed whether in such case he was bound to submit to the general jurisdiction, forum domicilii, or the privileged jurisdiction, forum privilegium, of his testator; though the weight of the authorities is on the side of the negative; Glück, Pand. § 560 b. If the cause of action arose after the death of the testator, as the case of the question of the testamentary partition of suits to recover a legacy or to enforce a testamentary trust, the heir must be pursued in his own jurisdiction, i. e., the forum domicilii or forum rei sitæ; 6 Glück, Pand. 232, and authorities there cited. And, a fortiori, if the action against the heir was not in that character, but merely in the capacity of possessor of the thing in dispute, the suit must be brought before the forum to which he was himself subject; id. p. 231.

FORUTH. A long slip of ground. Cowel.

FORWARDING MERCHANT. A person who receives and forwards goods, taking upon himself the expenses of transportation, for which he receives a compensation from the owners, but who has no concern in the vessels or wagons by which they are transported, and no interest in the freight.

Such a one is not deemed a common carrier, but a mere warehouseman or agent; 12 Johns. 232; 7 Cow. 497; see 15 Minn. 270; 2 Wheel. Abr. 142; nor is he an insurer; 27 Cal. 11. He is required to use only ordinary diligence in sending the property by responsible persons; 2 Cow. 593; 6 Allen 254; 64 N. Y. 800. See STORY, Bailm. § 502; Ang. Car. § 75; 2 Wend. 594; COMMON CARRIERS.

FOSSA (Lat.). In English Law. A ditch full of water, where formerly women who had committed a felony were drowned; the grave. Cowel. See FURCA.

FOSSAGE, FOSSAGIUM. In Old English Law. A composition paid in lieu of the duty of cleaning out and repairing the moat surrounding a fortified town. A duty or tax paid for that work.

FOSSATORIUM OPERATIO (Lat.). The service of laboring done by the inhabitants and adjoining tenants, for repair and maintenance of the ditches round a city or town. A contribution in lieu of such work, called fossagium, was sometimes paid. Kennett; Cowel.

FOSSATUM. A canal; a moat; a place inclosed by a ditch; a trench.

Also it is taken for the obligations of citizens to repair the city ditches. The work or services done by tenants, etc. for repairing and maintenance of ditches is called fossatorum operatio, and the contribution for it fossagium (q. v.). Jacob; Kennet's Gloss.

FOSSOLUM. A small ditch. Cowel.

FOSSWAY, or FOSSE. One of the four great roads of England built by the Romans; so called from the ditch on each side.

Trevisa describes it thus: "The first and greatest of the four weyes is called fosse, and stretches oute of the southe into the north, and begynneth from the corner of Cornewaile, and passeth forth by Devenshire by Somersete, and forth besides Tetbury, upon Cotteswold, besides Coventre, unto Leyster, and so forth, by wyldie pleynes towards Newerke, and endeth at Lincoln" (Polychron. l. i. c. xiv.). Wharton.

FOSTER-LAND. Land given for finding food for any person, as for monks in a monastery. Cowel.

FOSTER-LOAN (Sax.). A nuptial gift; the jointure for the maintenance of a wife. Toml.

FOSTER-SHIP. Forester-ship.

FOSTERING. An ancient custom in Ireland, in which persons put away their children to fosterers. Fostering was held to be a stronger alliance than blood, and the foster children participated in the fortunes of their foster fathers. Hallam's Const. Hist. ch. 18; Moz. & W.

FOSTERLEAN. The remuneration paid for the rearing or fostering of a child. The jointure of a wife. Jacob; Encyc. Dict.

FOUND. A person is said to be found within a state when actually present therein, but as applied to a corporation it is necessary that it is doing business in such state through an officer or agent or by statutory authority in such manner as to render it liable then to suit and to constructive or substituted service of process. See 55 Fed. Rep. 751; FOREIGN CORPORATION; SERVICE; NON EST INVENTUS.

If the legislature of a state requires a foreign corporation to consent to be "found" within its territory, for the purpose of the service of process in a suit, as a condition to doing business in the state, and the corporation does so consent, the fact that it is found gives the jurisdiction, notwithstanding the finding was procured by consent. 96 U. S. 377. For the purpose of securing business a corporation may consent to be "found" away from home, for the purposes of suit as to matters growing out of its transactions. Id.

"Find" and "found" said of a defendant as to whom a summons or other process has been issued, have a technical meaning, the equivalent of the Latin inventus, come upon, met. Anderson; 42 N. Y. Supr. Ct. 172.

Opposed, "not found"; non est inventus, he has not been found; abbreviated n. e. i. "Not found" is an abridged form of return which usage sanctions. It imports that the defendant was not found within the meaning of the precept, that is, after proper effort to find him in the due execution of the precept. Id.; 10 Bened. 95. See REASONS ON IS FOUND.

FOUND WITHIN THE DISTRICT.

In Jud. Code, § 50: Words confined to cases in which the action is brought in the district of the plaintiff's residence. 250 U. S. 313.

FOUNDATION. The establishment of a charity. That upon which a charity is founded and by which it is supported.

This word, in the English law, is taken in two senses, fundatio incipientis, and fundatio perficiens. As to its political capacity, an act of incorporation is metaphorically called its foundation; but as to its dotation, the first gift of revenues is called the foundation. 10 Co. 23 a.

FOUNDER. One who endows an institution. One who makes a gift of revenues to a corporation. 10 Co. 83; 1 Bla. Com. 481.

In England, the king is said to be the founder of all civil corporations; and where there is an act of incorporation, he is called the general founder, and he who endows is called the perficient founder. 1 Bla. Com. 481.

FOUNDERS' SHARES. In English Company Law. Shares issued to the founders of (or vendors to) a public company as a part of the consideration for the business, or concession, etc., taken over, and not forming a part of, the ordinary capital. As a rule, such shares only participate in profits after the payment of a fixed minimum dividend on paid-up capital. Encyc. Dict.

FOUNDERS' STOCK. See STOCK.

FOUNDEROSUS. Out of repair. Cro. Car. 366.

FOUNDLING. A new-born child abandoned by its parents, who are unknown. The settlement of such a child is in the place where found. Foundling hospitals are charitable institutions which exist in many countries for the care of such children. In England they are regulated by stat. 13 Geo. II. c. 29. See Int. Cyc. h. t.

FOUNDRY. Works for the casting of metals, without regard to whether they are cast for agricultural and mechanical, or other purposes. 44 La. Ann. 793.

FOUR (Fr.). An oven; kiln; bake-house. Four banal (banal of a manner; common), an oven owned by the proprietor of the estate, to which the tenants were obliged to bring their bread for baking. Also the proprietary right to maintain such an oven.

FOUR CORNERS. The four corners of an instrument means that which is contained on the face of it (without any aid from the knowledge of the circumstances under which it was made). This is said to be within its four corners, because every deed is still supposed to be written on one entire skin, and so to have but four corners. Wharton.

To look at the four corners of an instrument is to examine the whole of it, so as to construe it as a whole, without reference to any one part more than another. Burrill; 2 Smith's Lead. Cas. 295.

FOUR SEAS. The seas surrounding England. These were divided into the Western, including the Scotch and Irish; The Northern, or North Sea; The Eastern, being the German Ocean; The Southern, being the British Channel. Selden, Mare Clausum, lib. 2, c. 1.

Within the four seas means within the jurisdiction of England; 4 Co. 125; Co. 2d Inst. 252. See LIMITATION.

FOURCHER (Fr. to fork), or FOURCH. In English Law. A method of delaying an action formerly practised by defendants.

When an action was brought against two, who, being jointly concerned, were not bound to answer till both appeared, and they agreed not to appear both in one day, and the appearance of one excused the other's default, who had a day given him to appear with the other: the defaulter, on the day appointed, appeared; but the first then made default; in this manner they forked each other, and practised this for delay. See Co. 2d Inst. 250; Booth, Real Act. 16.

FOURIERISM. A social system invented by Charles Fourier, characterized by Mill as "the most skillfully combined and with the greatest foresight of objections, of all forms of socialism." Pol. Econ. II. 14, which see also Int. Cyc. for fuller accounts of the system, and Cent. Dict. and Encyc. Dict. for briefer ones.

FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

That amendment to the United States Constitution which provides that "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside. No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Brannon, XIV Am. 7. See EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS; CLASSIFICATION IN STATUTES.

FOURTH-CLASS MATTER. See MATTER.

FOUTGELD. See FOOTGELD.

FOWLS OF WARREN. Such fowls as are preserved under the game-laws in warrens. According to Manwood, these are partridges and pheasants. According to Coke, they are either campestris, as partridges, rails, and quails, sylvestres, as woodcocks and pheasants, or aquatiles, as mallards and herons. Co. Litt. 233.

FOX'S LIBEL ACT. An act passed in England in 1793, which provided that in prosecutions for libel, the jury might give a general verdict of guilty or not guilty upon the whole matter put at issue upon the indictment, and should not be required by the court to find the defendant guilty merely upon proof of the publication of the alleged libel, in the sense ascribed to it in the indictment.

FOY (L. Fr.). Faith; allegiance; fidelity.

FRACTION, FRACTIO. The act of breaking, or the state of being broken, especially by violence; a breaking or fracture. A fragment; a separated portion; a disconnected part. Cent. Dict.

FRACTION OF A DAY. A portion of a day. The dividing a day. Generally, the law does not allow the fraction of a day, and the day on which an act is done must therefore be either entirely included or excluded. 2 Bla. Com. 141; 25 Fla. 871; 11 Mass. 204; 64 Pa. 240; 20 Vt. 653; and, therefore, judgments entered on the same day are regarded as entered on the same time, and create liens equal in point of priority; 4 McLean 555; 8 W. & S. 804; but this is merely a legal fiction, which does not apply where it is necessary to distinguish between the two parts of a day; 3 Burr. 1844; 11 H. L. Cas. 411; and, therefore, it has been said that there is no such general rule of law; but that common sense and common justice sustain the propriety of considering fractions of a day whenever it will promote the purposes of substantial justice; 2 Stor. 571; 100 U. S. 689; 104 Id. 474; 37 Ill. 239; 8 La. Ann. 490; 60 Me. 88; 16 Ohio 111; thus, the bankrupt act of 1841 was repealed by the act of March 8, 1843, which was not signed by the president till the evening of that day; proceedings in bankruptcy begun on the morning of that day were held to have been begun before the passage of the act; id., tobacco stamped, sold, and removed in the morning of March 8, 1875, was not considered subject to an increased tax-rate imposed by the act of that date, which was not signed by the president until a later hour of that day; 97 U. S. 381; where a township voted aid bonds on the morning of an election day in Illinois, at which a constitutional provision was adopted forbidding the issuing of such bonds, the court found as a fact that the township vote was had before the adoption of the constitution, and, therefore, sustained the validity of the bonds; 104 U. S. 469. Although the law does not generally consider fractions of a day, yet when substantial justice requires it, courts may ascertain the precise time when a statute is approved or an act done; 147 U. S. 640. In 97 U. S. 170, the court held that the president's proclamation of June 18, 1865, removing restrictions upon trade, etc., took effect as of the beginning of that day and refused to consider the fraction of a day. In computing the time for the performance of official duties, each fraction of a day is to be considered as a full day; 12 Colo. 285. See FROM; FULL AGE; TIME; DAY.

FRACTITUM. Arable land. Toml.; Moz. & W.

FRACTURA NAVIUM. Breaking up of ships or wreck of shipping at sea. Very like naufraque (q. v.).

FRAIS (Fr.). Costs; charges; expenses.

FRAIS DE JUSTICE. Costs incurred incidentally to the action. See 1 Troploing, 135, n. 122; 4 Low. C. 77. Frais d'un procès. Costs of a suit.

FRAIS JUSQU'A BORD (Fr.). In French Commercial Law. Expenses up to the time that goods are actually shipped on board of a vessel, including such items as packing, portage, or cartage, commissions, etc. 16 Fed. Rep. 836. A shipment on which the seller pays the frais jusqu'a bord, would correspond to a sale of the goods "free on board" (q. v.).

Expenses to the board (vessel); free on board. See F. O. B.

FRANC. A French coin, of the value of about twenty cents.

FRANC ALEU. In French Law. An absolutely free inheritance. Allodial lands. Generally, however, the word denotes an inheritance free from seigniorial rights, though held subject to the sovereign. Dumoulin, Cout. de Par. § 1; Guyot, Rép. Univ. 3 Kent 496, n.; 8 Low. C. 95.

FRANC TENANCIER. In French Law. A freeholder.

FRANCHILANUS. A freeman. Chart. Hen. IV. A free tenant. Spel. Glos.

FRANCHISE. A special privilege conferred by government on individuals, and which does not belong to the citizens of the country generally by common right. Ang. & A. Corp. § 4; 4 Neb. 416, 420.

A certain privilege conferred by grant from government and vested in individuals. 8 Kent 458.

A royal privilege or branch of the king's prerogative subsisting in the hands of a subject. Finch i. 164; 2 Bla. Com. 37; 3 Cruise, Dig. 278; 13 Pet. 595; 36 W. Va. 802.

A very recent writer, who finds in the history of early English tenures a universality of oppressive services which literally made life a burden to the average land-holder, considers the first use of the terms "liberty" and "franchise" to be an expression of the relief of the possessor from some part of this burden. He says: "Lastly in our thirteenth century we learn that privileges and exceptional immunities are 'liberties' and 'franchises.' What is our definition of a liberty, a franchise? A portion of royal power in the hands of a subject. In Henry III.'s day we do not say that the Earl of Chester is a free man, more of a liber homo, than is the Earl of Gloucester, but we do say that he has more, greater, higher liberties." Matt. Domest. 48.

The right or privilege of being a corporation, and of doing such things, and such things only, as are authorized by the corporation's charter. 122 Ill. 298.

"The word franchise is generally used to designate a right or privilege conferred by law. What is called 'the franchise of forming a corporation,' is really but an exemption from the general rule of the common law prohibiting the formation of corporations. All persons in this state have now the right of forming corporate associations upon complying with the simple formalities prescribed by the statute. The right of forming a corporation, and of acting in a corporate capacity under the general incorporation laws, can be called a franchise only in the sense in which the right of forming a limited partnership, or of executing a conveyance of land by deed is a franchise. Horton, C. J., in 40 Kan. 93.

It is a privilege emanating from the sovereign power of the state, owing its existence to a grant or, as at common law, to prescription, which presupposes a grant, and vested in individuals or a body politic something not belonging to the citizen of common right. 142 Ill. 494.

Commenting on Blackstone's definition, Thompson says: "It has been well observed that, under our American systems of government and laws, this definition is not strictly correct; since our franchises spring from contracts between the sovereign power and private citizens, made upon a valuable consideration, for purposes of public benefit as well as of individual advantage." 4 Thomp. Corp. § 5885.

In a popular sense, the word seems to be synonymous with right or privilege; as, the elective franchise.

There are two franchises, distinct in their nature, and yet governed by substantially the same rules as to grant and exercise, which may be enjoyed by a corporation. One is the franchise of being or existing as a corporation, that is, possessing a unity and perpetuity of existence, though composed of an aggregate of changing members; the other is the exercise of rights, like the right of eminent domain or the partial appropriation of public property by exclusive use, as in ferries. Either of these franchises is a branch of sovereignty. 1 Bouv. Inst. 1090.

A franchise to be a corporation, however, is distinct from a franchise as a corporation to maintain and operate a railway; the latter may be mortgaged, without the former, and pass to a purchaser at a foreclosure sale; 112 U. S. 609.

The grant of letters patent for an invention is a franchise; (1891) 2 Q. B. 233; and so is a charter of incorporation from the state; 38 W. Va. 802.

To be a franchise, the right possessed must be such as cannot be exercised without the express permission of the sovereign power—a privilege or immunity of a public nature which cannot be legally exercised without legislative grant; 40 Minn. 213; 38 id. 386.

In a case already cited it is said that a franchise, or the right to be and act as an artificial body, is vested in the individuals who compose the corporation, and not in the corporation itself; 122 Ill. 298. "But this," it is said, "is an imperfect statement of the true conclusion,—which is, that a primary franchise, that is to say, the franchise of being a corporation, vests in the individuals who compose the corporation; while those secondary franchises which are vendible by the corporation, necessarily, and for that reason alone, must be deemed to vest in the corporation. However, judicial theory is so confused on the subject, that proceedings by information in the nature of a quo warranto, to vacate the franchises of corporations, are sometimes brought against the individuals who compose the corporation, and sometimes against the corporation itself." 4 Thomp. Corp. § 5837.

Franchises are only grantable by the sovereign power, and in the United States they are usually held by the corporations created for the purpose, and can be held only under legislative grant; 15 Pick. 243; 73 Ill. 541; 18 Pet. 519; 15 Johns. 358; and may be accompanied with such conditions as its legislature may judge most befitting to its interest and policy; 134 U. S. 594; 143 id. 305.

The state is presumed to grant corporate franchises in the public interest, and to intend that they shall be exercised through the proper officers and agencies of the corporation, and does not contemplate that corporate powers will be delegated to others. Any conduct which destroys their functions, or maims or cripples their separate activity, by taking away the right to freely and independently exercise the functions of their franchise, is contrary to a sound public policy; 71 Fed. Rep. 787.

The grant of a franchise by the legislature is a contract and cannot be resumed by the state or its benefits impaired or diminished without the consent of the parties; 4 Wheat. 519; 9 Wall. 51; 3 Kent Com. 458; it is within the protection of that clause of the constitution of the United States which forbids the states from impairing the obligation of contracts; 10 Wall. 511; 9 Yerg. 480; 30 Ark. 128, 893; 97 U. S. 454; but this does not apply to mere personal privileges to members of a corporation, such as the exemption of a servant of such body from militia duty, or serving on juries, etc.; 4 Lea 310; such an exemption was held in this case unconstitutional; contra, 88 Ala. 176, where such an exemption was held part of the franchise granted to the corporation; and it may become a vested right which cannot be taken away by subsequent legislation; 67 Mo. 637 (overruling 5 Mo. App. 220). See IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.

By the constitution or laws of many of the states, charters can only be granted subject to amendment or repeal. As to the power of the legislature in such cases, see 109 Mass. 103; 63 Me. 269; 41 Iowa 297; Beach, Pub. Cor. 63; 146 U. S. 258; but municipal franchises are entirely under the control of the legislature; Cooley, Const. Lim. 336; 10 How. 402; 94 U. S. 113; 128 id. 174.

The grant of a franchise is construed strictly and in case of doubt most favorably to the public; 130 U. S. 1; 11 Conn. 185; 80 Me. 544; 25 Cal. 283; 69 Tex. 306; 9 Ga. 475; 127 Ind. 389; and in the absence of doubt the obvious meaning of the words is to be followed; 34 Fed. Rep. 579; 79 Ala. 465; such a grant is not held to be exclusive unless from its nature a presumption arises that it was so intended; 11 Pet. 420; 2 Port. 296; 21 Vt. 590; 127 Ind. 369; 17 Conn. 40, 454; 6 Paige 554; nor is a proviso to be so interpreted as to defeat the grant; 87 Pa. 34; 27 id. 303; 46 id. 112.

Franchises are held subject to the exercise of the right of eminent domain, which see for a discussion of this branch of the subject. See also 2 Gray 1, 35; 4 id. 474; 23 Pick. 360; 66 Pa. 41; 5 Johns. Ch. 101; 13 How. 71; 105 U. S. 13; 148 id. 312.

They are also said to be liable for the debts of the owner; 2 Washb. R. P. 24; but it is the general rule that they cannot be levied upon and sold under execution without authority or statute; 34 La. Ann. 1225; 40 Mo. 140; 9 Sm. & M. 394; 10 Lea 488; though it may be otherwise provided by statute; 70 Pa. 355. See 111 N. C. 815; 104 Cal. 311. See also to levy on franchises, 4 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 138; 15 Am. Dec. 585.

As a general rule franchises cannot be sold or assigned without the consent of the legislature; Moraw. Priv. Corp. 930; 65 Pa. 278; 40 Me. 140; 27 N. J. Eq. 557. The primary franchise to be a corporation, and such others as involve the performance of public duties are inalienable; 10 Allen 449; 459; 11 id. 65; 32 N. H. 484; 56 Pa. 413; 46 Md. 1; 21 How. 441; 4 Biss. 35; 71 Tex. 274; 11 C. B. 755; 17 How. 30; 83 Va. 707; 84 id. 648; 101 U. S. 71.

The secondary franchises of a quasi-public corporation cannot be aliened without legislative authority; id. 130 id. 1; 139 id. 24; 6 H. L. Cas. 113; 1 McCrary 541; 3 Fed. Rep. 417, 423, 430. The same principles apply to a mortgage or lease of a franchise, see cases cited, and also, 24 N. J. Eq. 455; 115 Mass. 347; 101 U. S. 71; 8 Phila. 94. The power to sell includes the power to mortgage; 119 U. S. 191.

The franchises which pass by a judicial sale of a railroad and franchises are those which are essential to the operation of the corporation but do not include such special privileges as an exemption from taxation; 98 U. S. 217. A corporation having public duties cannot transfer a portion of them; 50 Ind. 85; but the attempt to divide the franchise only concerns the public and cannot be objected to by a rival company; 45 Cal. 395.

An irrigation company may make a valid conveyance of all its property and right of way: 40 Kan. 96; 38 Cal. 800. See, generally, as to the sale of franchises, 4 Thomp. Corp. ch. cxvii.; as to their constitutional protection see the IMPAIRING OF OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS: as to their control and regulation by the state, see POLICE POWER; and 13 Cent. L. J. 194; as to the regulation of tolls and charges, see RATES; and as to their taxation, see that title, and 17 L. R. A. 93; as to conflicting franchises, see 4 Am. L. Mag. 71.

The remedy for a non-user or misuser of a franchise by a corporation duly created and organized is by quo warranto or scire facias, which titles see. A court of equity will not in such case interfere or declare the franchise to be forfeited; 1 N. J. Eq. 369; 2 Johns. Ch. 371; but see 4 Thomp. Corp. § 4538. Where a franchise is asserted in a proceeding to claim a right under it, its existence may be denied by way of defence; 47 Ohio St. 1. But a franchise set up by a corporation in defence if it is in de facto possession of it cannot be disputed except by a person or corporation, who in the proceeding claims a better title; 64 Cal. 69. See also as to quo warranto for misuser, 30 Am. Dec. 48; and as to compulsory exercise of franchises, 15 L. R. A. 321.

See, generally, Thompson, Corporations, title 19; 18 Myer, Fed. Dec. 866; Foote & Everett, Incorporated Companies Operating under Municipal Franchises; FORFEITURE: DISSOLUTION.

Corporate. The right or privilege given by the State to two or more persons of being a corporation, that is, of doing business in a corporate capacity, and not the privilege or franchise which, when incorporated, the company may exercise. A right or privilege by which several individuals may unite themselves under a common name and act as a single person, with a succession of members, without dissolution or suspension of business and with a limited individual liability. The granting of such right or privilege rests entirely in the discretion of the State, and, of course, when granted, may be accompanied with such conditions as its legislature may judge most befitting to its interests and policy. 134 U. S. 599. See FRANCHISE.

Elective. The right or privilege of voting for public officers in an election; the right of suffrage. Stand. Dict.

Of a Railroad Corporation. Rights or privileges which are essential to the operations of the corporation, and without which its road and works would be of little value; such as the franchise to run cars, to take tolls, to appropriate earth and gravel for the bed of its road, or water for its engines, etc. They are positive rights and privileges, and may be conveyed to a purchaser of the road as part of the property of the company. Immunity from taxation is not one of them, and is personal, and incapable of transfer without express statutory direction. 93 U. S. 223.

FRANCHISE COURTS. One of the four main types of local courts distinguishable in England by the end of Edward I.'s reign. (See FEUDAL COURTS.) They were courts held by private persons by virtue of some franchise granted by the crown. The quo warranto enquiries of Edward I.'s reign resulted in laying down the principle that these franchises can exist only by virtue of royal grant or by prescription. 1 Holdsw. Hist. E. L. 3rd ed., § 4, 87 et seq. See FEUDAL COURTS; COMMUNAL COURTS; MANORIAL COURTS.

FRANCHISE TAX. A "franchise tax" is a property tax on tangible property and is not a privilege tax. 135 Ky. 324, 122 S. W. 164.

FRANCIA. France. Bract. fol. 427 q.

FRANCIGENA. A designation formerly given to aliens in England.

FRANCUS. Free; a freeman; a Frank. Spel. Glou.

Francus bancus. Free bench (q. v.).

Francus homo. A freeman.

Francus plegius. Frank pledge (q. v.)

Francus tenens. A freeholder. See ESTATE OF FREEHOLD.

FRANK. In Old English Law. Free. Usually employed in compounds, as frank-bank, free bench (q. v.).

To send letters and other mail matter free of postage. See FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Members of Parliament, peers, etc., had the privilege of franking their letters, which has been abolished since the introduction of the penny postage. Wharton; 3 & 4 Vict., c. 96.

Also a French gold coin, worth twenty sols, which is a livre, about 10½ d. English money. Tomlin.

FRANKALMOIGNE. A species of ancient tenure, still extant in England, whereby a religious corporation, aggregate or sole, holds its lands of the donor, in consideration of the religious services it performs.

The services rendered being divine, the tenants are not bound to take an oath of fealty to a superior lord. A tenant in frankalmoigne is not only exempt from all temporal service, but the lord of whom he holds is also bound to acquit him of every service and fruit of tenure which the lord paramount may demand of the land held by this tenure. The services to be performed are either spiritual, as prayers to God, or temporal, as the distribution of alms to the poor. Of this latter class is the office of the queen's almoner, which is usually bestowed upon the Archbishop of York, with the title of Lord High Almoner. The spiritual services which were due before the Reformation are described by Littleton § 135; since that time they have been regulated by the liturgy or Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England; Co. 2d Inst. 502; Co. Litt. 93, 494 a. Hargr. ed. note (b); 2 Bla. Com. 101.

In the United States, religious corporations hold land by the same tenure with which all other corporations and individuals hold. Our religious corporations are generally restricted to the holding of whatever quantity of land is required for the immediate purposes of their incorporation; sometimes, as in Pennsylvania, the maximum value of the lands is fixed by statute. Subject to this restriction, they have a fee-simple estate in their lands for the purpose of alienation, but only a determinable fee for the purpose of enjoyment. On a dissolution of the corporation, the fee will revert to the original grantor and his heirs; but such grantor will be forever excluded by an alienation in fee; and in that way the corporation may defeat the possibility of a reverter; 2 Kent 281; 2 Prest. Est. 60. And see 3 Binn. 626; 1 Watts 218; 3 Pick. 232; 12 Mass. 537; 8 Dana 114.

FRANK-CHASE. A liberty or right of free chase. Cowel.

FRANK-FEE. Lands not held in ancient demesne. Called "lands pleadable at common law." Reg. Orig. 12, 14; Fitzh. N. B. 161; Termes de la Ley.

That which a man holds to himself and his heirs and not by such service as is required in ancient demesne, according to the custom of the manor. The opposite of copyhold. Cowel. A fine had in the king's court might convert demesne-lands into frank-fee; 2 Bla. Com. 368.

FRANK-FERME. Lands or tenements where the nature of the fee is changed by feoffment from knight's service to yearly service and whence no homage but such as is contained in the feoffment may be demanded. Britton, c. 66, n. 8; Cowel; 2 Bla. Com. 80.

FRANK-FOLD. The right of the lord to fold his tenant's sheep for manuring the land. Termes de la Ley; Cowel; Keilw. 108. See FOLDAGE.

FRANK-LAW. An obsolete expression signifying the rights and privileges of a citizen, and seeming to correspond to our term "civil rights."

FRANK-MARRIAGE. A species of estate-tail where the donee had married one of kin (as daughter or cousin) to the donor and held the estate subject to the implied condition that the estate was to descend to the issue of such marriage. On birth of issue, as in other cases of estate-tail before the statute De donis, the birth of issue was regarded as a condition performed, and the estate thereupon became alienable by the donee; 1 Cruise, Dig. 71; 1 Washb. R. P. 87.

The estate is said to be in frank-marriage because given in consideration of marriage and free from services for three generations of descendants; Blount; Cowel. See, also, 2 Bla. Com. 115; 1 Steph. Com. 232.

FRANK-PLEDGE. A pledge or surety for freemen. Termes de la Ley.

The bond or pledge which the inhabitants of a tithing entered into for each one of their number that he should be forthcoming to answer every violation of law. Each boy, on reaching the age of fourteen, was obliged to find some such pledge, or be committed to prison; Blount; Cowel; 1 Bla. Com. 114.

FRANK-TENEMENT. A freehold. See LIBERUM TENEMENTUM.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE. The privilege of sending certain matter through the public mails without payment therefor.

It was first claimed by the house of commons in 1600, and was confirmed by statute in 1764. The establishment of the penny postage in 1840 caused the abolition of the custom in England. See 1 Bla. Com. 323; 2 Steph. Com. 570, n.

It was formerly enjoyed by various officers of the federal government, including members of both houses of congress, theoretically for the public good.

By the act of January 31, 1873, the franking privilege was abolished from and after July 1, 1873, and the act of March 3, 1873, repealed all laws permitting the transmission by mail of any free matter whatever. The act of March 3, 1875, s. 5, permits members of congress to send free public documents and acts; a qualified exercise of the privilege has been extended to certain officials, where public convenience seemed to require it. By the act of March 3, 1877 (10 Stat. L. 385), it is made lawful to transmit through the mail free of postage, any letters, packages, or other matters relating exclusively to the business of the Government of the United States, provided that every such letter or package bears over the words "Official Business," an endorsement showing the name of the department or bureau from whence transmitted. This provision was extended by the act of March 3, 1879 (20 Stat. L. 602), to all officers of the government and made applicable to all official mail matter. By the act of January 12, 1905 (33 Stat. L. 622), members of congress are entitled to send through the mails free, under their frank, any mail matter to any government official or to any person, correspondence not exceeding one ounce in weight, upon official or departmental business. They may also frank the congressional record or any part thereof. U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 70.

FRANKLEYN (spelled, also, Frankling and Franklin). A freeman; a freeholder; a gentleman. Blount; Cowel.

FRASSETUM. A wood or wood ground where ash trees grow. Co. Litt. 4 b.

FRATER (Lat.). Brother.

Frater consanguineus. A brother born from the same father, though the mother may be different.

Frater nutritivus. A bastard brother.

Frater uterinus. A brother who has the same mother but not the same father.

Blount; Vicat, Voc. Jur.; 2 Bla. Com. 232.

Fratres conjurati. Sworn brothers or companions for the defence of their sovereign or for other purposes. Hoved. 445.

Fratres poes. Certain friars who were accustomed to wear white and black garments. Walsingham 124. See BROTHER.

FRATERIA. A fraternity, brotherhood, or society of religious persons, who were mutually bound to pray for the good health and life, etc., of their living brethren, and the souls of those that were dead. Cowel.

FRATERNIA. A fraternity or brotherhood.

FRATERNITY. A body of men associated for business, pleasure, or social intercourse, by some common tie, either natural, as of the like business, interest or character.

or formal, as for religious or social purposes. "Some people of a place united together, in respect of a mystery and business, into a company." 1 Salk. 193. See COLLEGE FRATERNITIES. See LITERARY OR SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTION.

FRATRIAGE. A younger brother's inheritance.

FRATRICIDE. One who has killed a brother or sister; also the killing of a brother or sister. Black, L. Dict.

FRAUD. An endeavor to alter rights, by deception touching motives, or by circumvention not touching motives. Bigelow, Fraud 6.

Fraud is sometimes used as a term synonymous with covin, collusion, and deceit, but improperly so. Covin is a secret contrivance between two or more persons to defraud and prejudice another of his rights. Collusion is an agreement between two or more persons to defraud another under the forms of law, or to accomplish an illegal purpose. Deceit is a fraudulent contrivance by words or acts to deceive a third person, who, relying thereupon, without carelessness or neglect of his own, sustains damages thereby. Co. Litt. 357 b; Bacon, Abr. Fraud.

Actual or positive fraud includes cases of the intentional and successful employment of any unerring, deception, or artifice, used to circumvent, cheat, or deceive another. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 186.

For instance, the misrepresentation by word or deed of material facts, by which one exercising reasonable discretion and confidence is misled to his injury, whether the misrepresentation was known to be false, or only not known to be true, or even if made altogether innocently; the suppression of material facts which one party is legally or equitably bound to disclose to another; all cases of unconscientious advantage in bargains obtained by imposition, circumvention, surprise, and undue influence over persons in general, and especially over those who are, by reason of age, infirmity, idiocy, lunacy, drunkenness, coverture, or other incapacity, unable to take due care of and protect their own rights and interests; bargains of such an unconscientious nature and of such gross inequality as naturally lead to the presumption of fraud, imposition, or undue influence, when the decree of the court can place the parties in statu quo; cases of surprise and sudden action, without due deliberation, of which one party takes advantage; cases of the fraudulent suppression or destruction of deeds and other instruments, in violation of, or injury to, the rights of others; fraudulent awards with intent to do injustice; fraudulent and illusory appointments and revocations under powers; fraudulent prevention of acts to be done for the benefit of others under false statements or false promises; frauds in relation to trusts of a secret or special nature; frauds in verdicts, judgments, decrees, and other judicial proceedings; frauds in the confusion of boundaries of estates and matters of partition and dower; frauds in the administration of charities; and frauds upon creditors and other persons standing upon a like equity, are cases of actual fraud. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. c. 6.

Legal or constructive fraud includes such contracts or acts as, though not originating in any actual evil design or contrivance to perpetrate a fraud, yet by their tendency to deceive or mislead others, or to violate private or public confidence, are prohibited by law.

Thus, for instance, contracts against some general public policy or fixed artificial policy of the law; cases arising from some peculiar confidential or fiduciary relation between the parties, where advantage is taken of that relation by the person in whom the trust or confidence is reposed, or by third persons; agreements and other acts of parties which operate virtually to delay, defraud, and deceive creditors; purchases of property, with full notice of the legal or equitable title of other persons to the same property (the purchaser becoming, by construction, particeps criminis with the fraudulent grantor); and voluntary conveyances of real estate, as affecting the title of subsequent purchasers; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. c. 7. See Bisph. Eq. 205.

According to the civilians, positive fraud consists in doing one's self, or causing another to do, such things as induce the opposite party into error, or retain him there. The intention to deceive, which is the characteristic of fraud, is here present. Fraud is also divided into that which has induced the contract, dolus dans causam contractui, and incidental or accidental fraud. The former is that which has been the cause or determining motive of the contract, that without which the party defrauded would not have contracted, when the artifices practised by one of the parties have been such that it is evident that without them the other would not have contracted. Incidental or accidental fraud is that by which a person, otherwise determined to contract, is deceived on some accessories or incidents of the contract,—for example, as to the quality of the object of the contract, or its price,—so that he has made a bad bargain. Accidental fraud does not, according to the civilians, avoid the contract, but simply subjects the party to damages. It is otherwise where the fraud has been the determining cause of the contract, qui causam dedit contractui: in that case the contract is void. Toullier, Dr. Civ. Fr. liv. 8, t. 3, c. 2, n. § 5, n. 86, et seq. See, also, 1 Malleville, Analyse de la Discussion du Code Civil, pp. 15, 16.

What constitutes fraud. 1. It must be such an appropriation as is not permitted by law. 2. It must be with knowledge that the property is another's, and with design to deprive him of it. 3. It is not in itself a crime, for want of a criminal intent; though it may become such in cases provided by law. Livermore, Penal Law 729; See Poll. Contr. (6th ed.) 534, et seq.

Fraud, in its ordinary application to cases of contracts, includes any trick or artifice employed by one person to induce another to fall into or to detain him in an error, so that he may make an agreement contrary to his interest; and it may consist in misrepresenting or concealing material facts, and may be effected by words or by actions. See 148 U. S. 79.

Where a party intentionally or by design misrepresents a material fact or produces a false impression, in order to mislead another, or to obtain an undue advantage of him, there is a positive fraud in the fullest sense of the term; 85 Tenn. 189. It must relate to facts then existing or which had previously existed; 11 Colo. 15; 127 Ill. 187. If a person take upon himself to state as true that of which he is wholly ignorant, he will, if it be false, incur the same legal responsibility as if he had made the statements with knowledge of its falsity; 125 Pa. 52; 147 Mass. 408; 71 Wis. 196; 73 Id. 89; 75 Mich. 188; 78 Iowa 749.

While, on the one hand, the courts have aimed to repress the practice of fraud, on the other, they have required that before relieving a party from a contract on the ground of fraud, it should be made to appear that on entering into such contract he exercised a due degree of caution. Vigilantibus, non dormientibus, subveniunt leges. A misrepresentation as to a fact the truth or falsehood of which the other party has an opportunity of ascertaining, or the concealment of a matter which a person of ordinary sense, vigilance, or skill might discover, does not in law constitute fraud. See 130 U. S. 648. Misrepresentation as to the legal effect of an agreement does not avoid it as against a party whom such misrepresentation has induced to enter into it,—every man being presumed to know the legal effect of an instrument which he signs or of an act which he performs. Ans. Contr. 154. But see 69 Tex. 608.

An intention to violate entertained at the time of entering into a contract, but not afterward carried into effect, does not vitiate the contract; per Tindal, C. J., 2

Scott 588; 4 B. & C. 506; per Parke, B., 4 M. & W. 115, 122; but making a promise as an inducement to a contract, with no intention of performing it, constitutes a fraud for which the contract may be rescinded; 78 Cal. 126; 40 Minn. 476; but see 42 Ill. App. 548. When one person misrepresents or conceals a material fact which is peculiarly within his own knowledge, or if it is also within the reach of the other party, is a device to induce him to refrain from inquiry, and it is shown that the concealment or other deception was practised with respect to the particular transaction, such transaction will be void on the ground of fraud; 6 Cl. & F. 232; Comyn, Contr. 88; per Tindal, C. J., 8 M. & G. 446, 450. See 85 Ill. 304; 32 N. J. Eq. 372; 12 Ves. 78. And even the concealment of a matter which may disable a party from performing the contract is a fraud; 9 B. & C. 387; per Little, J.

Equity doctrine of fraud. It is sometimes inaccurately said that such and such transactions amount to fraud in equity, though not in law; according to the popular notion that the law allows or overlooks certain kinds of fraud which the more conscientious rules of equity condemn and punish. But, properly speaking, fraud in all its shapes is as odious in law as in equity. The difference is that, as the law courts are constituted, and as it has been found in centuries of experience that it is convenient they should be constituted, they cannot deal with fraud otherwise than to punish it by the infliction of damages. All those manifold varieties of fraud against which specific relief, of a preventive or remedial sort, is required for the purposes of substantial justice, are the subjects of equity and not of law jurisdiction.

What constitutes a case of fraud in the view of courts of equity, it would be difficult to specify. It is, indeed, part of the equity doctrine of fraud not to define it, not to lay down any rule as to the nature of it, lest the craft of men should find ways of committing fraud which might escape the limits of such a rule or definition. "The court very wisely hath never laid down any general rule beyond which it will not go, lest other means for avoiding the equity of the court should be found out." Per Hardwicke, C., in 3 Atk. 278. It includes all acts, omissions, or concealments which involve a breach of legal or equitable duty, trust or confidence justly reposed, and are injurious to another, or by which an undue and unconscientious advantage is taken of another. "It may be stated as a general rule that fraud consists in anything which is calculated to deceive, whether it be a single act or combination of circumstances, whether it be by suppression of the truth or suggestion of what is false; whether it be by direct falsehood, or by innuendo, by speech or by silence, by word of mouth or by a look or a gesture. Fraud of this kind may be defined to be any artifice by which a person is deceived to his disadvantage." Bisph. Eq. § 206.

It is said by Lord Hardwicke, 2 Ves. Ch. 155, that in equity fraud may be presumed from circumstances, but in law it must be proved. His meaning is, unquestionably, no more than this: that courts of equity will grant relief upon the ground of fraud established by a degree of presumptive evidence which courts of law would not deem sufficient proof for their purposes; that a higher degree, not a different kind, of proof may be required by courts of law to make out what they will act upon as fraud. Both tribunals accept presumptive or circumstantial proof, if of sufficient force. Circumstances of mere suspicion, leading to no certain results, will not, in either, be held sufficient to establish fraud.

The equity doctrine of fraud extends, for certain purposes, to the violation of that class of so-called imperfect obligations which are binding on conscience, but which human laws do not and cannot ordinarily undertake to enforce: as in a large variety of cases of contracts which courts of equity do not set aside, but at the same time refuse to lend their aid to enforce; 2 Kent 89; 1

Johns. Ch. 630; 1 Ball & B. 250. The proposition that "fraud must be proved and not assumed," is to be understood as affirming that a contract, honest and lawful on its face, must be treated as such until it is shown to be otherwise by evidence, either positive or circumstantial. Fraud may be inferred from facts calculated to establish it. Per Black, C. J., in 22 Pa. 179; 148 id. 334; 59 Fed. Rep. 70.

The following classification of frauds as a head of equity jurisdiction is given by Lord Hardwicke, J., in Chesterfield v. Janssen, 2 Ves. Ch. 135; 1 Atk. 301; 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 438.

1. Fraud, or dolus malus, may be actual, arising from facts and circumstances of imposition. 2. It may be apparent from the intrinsic nature and subject of the bargain itself, such as no man in his senses and not under delusion would make, on the one hand, and no honest or fair man would accept, on the other. 3. It may be inferred from the circumstances and condition of the parties: for it is as much against conscience to take advantage of a man's weakness or necessity as of his ignorance. 4. It may be collected from the nature and circumstances of the transaction, as being an imposition on third persons.

Effect of. Fraud, both at law and in equity, when sufficiently proved and ascertained, avoids a contract ab initio, whether the fraud be intended to operate against one of the contracting parties, or against third parties, or against the public; Ans. Contr. 162; 1 W. Blackst. 465; Dougl. 450; 3 Burr. 1909; 3 V. & B. 42; 1 Sch. & L. 209; Domat, Lois Civ. p. 1, l. 4, t. 6, s. 3, n. 2; see 49 Conn. 98; but the injured party may elect to allow the transaction to stand; L. R. 2 H. L. 246; 49 N. Y. 626; 7 Bush 63.

The fraud of an agent by a misrepresentation which is embodied in the contract to which his agency relates, avoids the contract. But the party committing the fraud cannot in any case himself avoid the contract on the ground of the fraud; Chitty, Contr. 590, and cases cited. The party injured may lose the right to avoid the contract by laches; 47 N. H. 208; 21 Wis. 88; Biph. Eq. § 202; 130 Mass. 50; 55 N. H. 508; 78 N. Y. 159; 87 Ill. 450. But no delay will constitute laches except that occurring after the discovery of the fraud; 11 Cl. & F. 714; 4 How. 561; 23 Iowa 487; 43 id. 556; 35 Ala. 560; 80 Minn. 44. The injured party must repudiate the transaction in toto, if at all; he may not adopt it in part and repudiate it in part; 12 How. 51; 25 Beav. 564. See 2 Phil. 496.

As to frauds in contracts and dealings, the common law subjects the wrong-doer, in several instances, to an action on the case, such as actions for fraud and deceit in contracts on an express or implied warranty of title or soundness, etc. But fraud gives no action in any case without damage; 3 Term 56; and in matters of contract it is merely a defence; it cannot in any case constitute a new contract; 7 Ves. 211; 2 Miles 229. It is essentially ad hominem; 4 Term 337.

A person cannot recover for fraudulent representations where he did not rely upon them, but relied upon information from other sources and upon his own judgment; 118 Ind. 565; 39 Kan. 752; 76 Iowa 507; 84 Ala. 95; 23 Neb. 817; 135 U. S. 609. Fraud must be clearly proved and it is proper so to instruct the jury; 148 Pa. 234. There is no error in charging that fraud is never presumed, and must be shown by satisfactory proof; 59 Fed. Rep. 70.

In Criminal Law. Without the express provision of any statute, all deceitful practices in defrauding or endeavoring to defraud another of his known right, by means of some artful device, contrary to the plain rules of common honesty, are condemned by the common law, and punishable according to the heinousness of the offence; Co. Litt. 8 b; Dy. 295; Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 71.

In considering fraud in its criminal aspect, it is often difficult to determine whether facts in evidence constitute a fraud, or amount to a felony. It seems now to be agreed that if the property obtained, whether by means of a false token or a false pretence, be parted with absolutely by the owner, it is a fraud; but if the possession only be parted with, and that possession be obtained by fraud, it will be felony; Bacon, Abr. Fraud; 2 Leach 1060; 2 East, Pl. Cr. c. 673.

Of those gross frauds or cheats which, as being "levelled against the public justice of the kingdom," are punishable by indictment or information at the common law; 2 East, Pl. Cr. c. 18, § 4, p. 821; the following are examples:—uttering a fictitious bank bill; 2 Mass. 77; selling unwholesome provisions; 4 Bla. Com. 163; mala praxis of a physician; 1 Ld. Raym. 213; rendering false accounts, and other frauds, by persons in official situations; Rex v. Benbridge, cited 2 East 136; 5 Mod. 179; 2 Campb. 269; 3 Chitty, Cr. Law 666; fabrication of news tending to the public injury; Stark. Lib. 546; Hale, Summ. 132; and per Scroggs, C. J., Rex v. Harris, Guildhall, 1680; cheats by means of false weights and measures; 2 East, Pl. Cr. c. 18, § 9, p. 820; and generally, the fraudulent obtaining the property of another by any deceitful or illegal practice or token (short of felony) which affects or may affect the public; 2 East, Pl. Cr. c. 18, § 2, p. 818; as with the common cases of obtaining property by false pretences. See DECEIT; MISREPRESENTATION. See "DE FRAUD" THE UNITED STATES. See INFLUENCE.

FRAUD ORDER (Postal Service). An order from the central authority to a local official, prohibiting the delivery of letters to a firm or individual suspected of making an illegal use of the mails. Stand. Dict.

FRAUDARE. In Civil Law. To cheat; defraud; deceive.

FRAUDS, STATUTE OF. The name commonly given to the statute 29 Car. II. c. 8, entitled "An Act for the Prevention of Frauds and Perjuries."

The multifarious provisions of this celebrated statute appear to be distributed under the following heads. 1. The creation and transfer of estates in land, both legal and equitable, such as at common law could be effected by parol, i. e. without deed. 2. Certain cases of contracts which at common law could be validly made by oral agreement. 3. Additional solemnities in cases of wills. 4. New liabilities imposed in respect of real estate held in trust. 5. The disposition of estates pur autre vie. 6. The entry and effect of judgments and executions. The first and second heads, however, comprise all that in the common professional use of the term is meant by the Statute of Frauds.

And they present this important feature, characterizing and distinguishing all the minor provisions which they both contain, i. e. that whereas prior to their enactment the law recognized only two great classes of contracts, conveyances, etc.—those which were by deed and those which were by parol, including under the latter term alike what was written and what was oral,—these provisions introduced into the law a distinction between written parol and oral parol transactions, and rendered a writing necessary for the valid performance of the matters to which they relate. Those matters are the following:—conveyances, leases, and surrenders of interests in lands; declarations of trusts of interest in lands; special promises by executors or administrators to answer damages out of their own estate; special promises to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another; agreements made upon consideration of marriage; contracts for the sale of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them; agreements not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof; contracts for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise for the price of ten pounds sterling or upwards. All these matters must be, by the statute, put in writing, signed by the party to be charged, or his attorney. It has been a question whether a promise to accept a bill of exchange is within the statute, and in some jurisdictions it is required by statute to be in writing. See ACCEPTANCE. It has been recently held in England that, apart from the special statute, it need not be in writing and is not within the statute of frauds; [1894] 2 Q. B. 885; 91 U. S. 406; 142 id. 116; 34 Fed. Rep. 866; 9 Wash. 659.

As to contracts of indemnity to a third person see INDEMNITY; 42 Am. St. Rep. 186-94; as to contracts to be performed within a year see 164 U. S. 418.

In regard to contracts for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise, the payment of earnest-money, or the acceptance and receipt of part of the goods, etc., dispenses with the written memorandum. See EARNEST; SALE.

The substance of the statute, as regards the provisions above referred to, has been re-enacted in almost all the states of the Union; and in many of them, other points coming within the same general policy, but not embodied in the original English statute, have been made the subject of more recent enactments: as, for instance, the requirement of writing to hold a party upon a representation as to the character, credit, etc., of a third person, which was provided in England by 9 Geo. IV. cap. 14, § 6, commonly called Lord Tenterden's Act. The legislation of the different states on these matters will be found collected in the Appendix to Browne on the Statute of Frauds.

See THROOP, Val. of Verb. Agr.; Reed; Wood, Stat. Frauds. For sufficiency of memorandum required by the statute, see 34 Cent. L. J. 6. As to the various subjects affected by the statute of frauds see the several titles, and for reference to authorities on the different branches of the subject, see the classified list in the St. Louis Law Library Catalogue.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE.

A conveyance, the object, tendency, or effect of which is to defraud another, or the intent of which is to avoid some duty or debt due by or incumbent on the party making it. 2 Kent 440; 4 id. 462; and if fraudulent as to any provision therein, is void in toto as against creditors; 29 W. Va. 203.

Fraudulent conveyances received early attention; and the statutes of 13 Eliz. c. 5, and 27 Eliz. c. 4, made perpetual by 29 Eliz. c. 18, declared all conveyances made with intent to defraud creditors, etc., to be void. By a liberal construction, it has become the settled English law that a voluntary conveyance shall be deemed fraudulent against a subsequent purchaser even with notice; 9 East 59; 2 Bla. Com. 296; Roberts, Fraud. Contr. 2, 8.

Voluntary conveyances are not so construed in the United States, however, where the subsequent purchaser has notice, especially if there be a good consideration; Wait, Fraud. Convey. 97; 2 Gray 447.

These statutes have been generally adopted in the United States as the foundation of all the state statutes upon this subject; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 33; 4 Kent 462.

The mere fact of indebtedness alone will not render a voluntary conveyance void, if the grantor has property amply sufficient remaining to pay his creditor; 71 Tex. 592; 22 Neb. 172.

A voluntary gift for charitable purposes is not to be treated as "covinous," within the meaning of 27 Eliz. c. 4, and is not avoided by a subsequent conveyance for value; [1892] App. Cas. 419.

When a mortgage is given to one person for the purpose of securing debts due to himself and others, with intent on the part of the mortgagor to defraud other creditors, it is valid as to an innocent beneficiary whose debt is an honest one, although the mortgagee himself is a party to the fraud; 6 U. S. App. 510.

Voluntary conveyances by a debtor who is financially embarrassed are prima facie fraudulent as to existing creditors, and where a conveyance is made mala fide, and the fraud is participated in by both parties thereto, it cannot be upheld in derogation of the claims of creditors; existing or subsequent; 39 Minn. 527; 50 Ark. 42; 36 Fed. Rep. 29.

But although such conveyance is void as regards purchasers and creditors, it is valid as between the parties; 5 Binn. 109; 3 W. & S. 255; 4 Ired. 102; 20 Pick. 247, 354; 1 Ohio 469; 2 South. 738; 2 Hill, S. C. 488; 7 Johns. 161; 1 W. Bl. 262; 77 Iowa 203. An offence within the 13 Eliz. c. 5, § 3, is also indictable; 6 Cox, Cr. Cas. 31.

This subject is fully treated in a note to Twyne's case, 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. (continued in 18 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 137), and in Bump; May, Fraud. Conv. See BADGES OF FRAUD.

FRAUS (Lat.). Fraud. The term of the civil law was, however, dolus (q. v.). It has been said that fraus was distinguished from dolus and had a more extended meaning. Calv. Lex.

Calvin derives fraus from ferre, to bear, to bear away or take away, its object usually being to take away another's right of property. Burrill; Calv. Lex. See PIA FRAUS.

FRAUS DANS LOCUM CONTRACTUI. A misrepresentation or concealment of some fact that is material to the contract, and had the truth regarding which been known the contract would not have been made as made, is called a "fraud dans locum contractui," i. e. a fraud occasioning the contract, or giving place or occasion for the contract.

FRAUS LEGIS (Lat.). Fraud of law. In Civil Law. The institution of legal proceedings for a fraudulent purpose. See IN FRAUDUM LEGIS.

FRAXINETUM. In Old English Law. A wood of ashes; a place where ashes grow. Co. Litt. 4 b; Shep. Touchst. 95.

FRAY. See AFFRAY.

FRECTUM. Freight. Quoad frectum navium suarum, as to the freight of his vessels. Blount.

FREDSTOLE. Freedstole. The seat of peace, a name given to a seat or chair near the altar, to which all fled who sought to obtain the privilege of sanctuary. Encyc. Dict. A sanctuary. Gib. Cod.

FREDUM. A fine paid for obtaining pardon when the peace had been broken. Spelman, Gloss.; Blount. A sum paid the magistrate for protection against the right of revenge. 1 Robertson, Charles V., App. note xxiii.

Freda was a Frankish term answering to the Saxon "wites." Mail. Domed. 278.

FREDWIT, or FREDWITE. A liberty to hold courts and take up the fines for beating and wounding. Cowel; Cunningham, Law Dict.

To be free from fines.

FREE. Not bound to servitude. At liberty to act as one pleases. This word is put in opposition to slave. U. S. Const. art. 1, § 2. Used in distinction from being bound as an apprentice.

The Declaration of Independence asserts that all men are born free; and in this sense the term is usually supposed to mean all mankind; though this seems to be doubted in 19 How. 393.

Certain: as, free services. These were also more honorable.

Confined to the person possessing, instead of being held in common: as, free fishery.

FREE ALMS. See FRANK-ALMOIGNE.

FREE BENCH. Copyhold lands which the wife has for dower after the decease of her husband. Kitch. 102; Bracton, lib. 4, tr. 6, cap. 13, num. 2; Fitzh. N. B. 150; Plowd. 411.

Dower in copyhold lands. 2 Bla. Com. 129. The quantity varies in different sections of England; Co. Litt. 110 b; L. R. 10 Eq. 592; incontinency was a cause of forfeiture, except on the performance of a ridiculous ceremony; Cowel; Blount.

FREE BORD. An allowance of land outside the fence which may be claimed by the owner. An allowance, in some places, two and a half feet wide outside the boundary or enclosure. Blount; Cowel.

FREEBOROUGH MEN. Such great men as did not engage like the frank-pledge men for their decennier. Jac. L. Dict.

FREE CHAPEL. A chapel founded by the king and exempted from the jurisdiction of the ordinary. It may be one founded or endowed by a private person under a grant from the king; Cowel Termes de la Ley.

FREE COURSE. Having the wind from a favorable quarter. To prevent collision of vessels, it is the duty of the vessel having the wind free to give way to a vessel beating up to windward and tacking; 3 Hagg. Adm. 215. At sea, such vessel meeting another close-hauled must give way, if necessary to prevent the danger of collision; 3 C. & F. 528. See 2 W. Rob. 225; 2 Dods. 87; MARITIME LAW.

FREE ENTRY, INGRESS AND EGRESS. The right to go upon land from time to time as required to assert any right, as to take emblements.

FREE FISHERY. See FISHERY.

FREE FOLD. See FOLDAGE; FRANK-FOLD.

FREE ON BOARD. A phrase applied to the sale of goods which denotes that the seller has contracted for their delivery on the vessel, cars, etc., without cost to the buyer for packing, portage, cartage, and the like. See FRAIS JUSQU'A BORD; F. O. B.

In such a contract the seller is under no obligation to act until the buyer names the ship to which the delivery is to be made 117 Pa. 508; Abb. f. o. b.

FREE MINER. In the district of Hundred of St. Briavel's, in England, any male person born and abiding in the district, of the age of twenty-one, who has worked a year and a day in a coal or iron mine, or in a stone quarry within the hundred. See GALE; GAVELLER.

FREE PLEDGE. See FRANKPLEDGE.

FREE SERVICES. Such as it was not unbecoming the character of a soldier or freeman to perform: as, to serve under his lord in the wars, to pay a sum of money, and the like. 2 Bla. Com. 62; 1 Washb. R. P. 25.

FREE SHIPS. Neutral ships. "Free ships make free goods" is a phrase often used in treaties to denote that the goods on board neutral ships shall be free from confiscation even though belonging to an enemy; Wheat. Int. L. 507; 1 Kent 126. The doctrine is recognized, except as to goods contraband of war, in the Declaration of Paris (1856), q. v., and the controversy over it has been brought to a close as regards all maritime nations but the United States. This declaration, while a great step in favor of neutrals, does not free neutral commerce from the belligerent right of search for the purpose of ascertaining the true character of a ship sailing under a neutral flag, and for contraband goods. Pomeroy, Int. L. 220. While the United States are not a party to the declaration of Paris; yet, during the civil war, its second and third articles, relating to this subject, were adhered to by both parties; Wheat. Int. L. 475 a. See 3 Phill. Int. L. 8d ed. 238; Up-ton, Mar. Warfare 186; Wheat. Int. L. 581; FLAG, for a full discussion; NEUTRALITY; DECLARATION OF PARIS.

FREE SOCAGE. Tenure in free socage is a tenure by certain and honorable services which yet are not military. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 52; Dalrymple, Feuds, c. 2, § 1; 1 Washb. R. P. 25; called, also, free and common socage. See SOCAGE.

FREE SOCMEN. Tenants in free socage. 2 Bla. Com. 79.

FREE TENURE. Freehold tenure.

Freehold; the opposite of the ancient villenage, and modern copyhold. Burrill; 2 Bl. Com. 89, 90.

FREE WARREN. A franchise for the preserving and custody of beasts and fowls of warren. 2 Bla. Com. 39, 417; Co. Litt. 233. This franchise gave the grantee sole right of killing, so far as his warren extended, on condition of excluding other persons. 2 Bla. Com. 39.

FREEDMAN. In Roman Law. A person who had been released from a state of servitude. See LIBERTINE.

The term is frequently applied to the emancipated slaves in the southern states. By the fourteenth amendment of the constitution, citizenship was conferred upon them; Cooley, Const. Lim. 361. See 16 Wall. 36; 93 U. S. 542. The fifteenth amendment protects the elective franchise of freedmen and others of African descent; and this was the object of its adoption; Cooley, Const. Lim. 752.

FREEDOM. The condition of one to whom the law attributes the single individual right of personal liberty, limited only, in the domestic relations, by powers of control which are associated with duties of protection. See MARRIED WOMEN; PARENT AND CHILD; GUARDIAN AND WARD; MASTER AND APPRENTICE.

This right becomes subject to judicial determination when the law requires the public custody of the person as the means of vindicating the rights of others. The security of the liberty of the individual and of the rights of others is graduated by the intrinsic equity of the law, in purpose and application. The means of protecting this liberty of the individual without hazarding the freedom of others must be sought in the provisions of the remedial and penal law.

Independently of forfeiture of personal liberty under such laws and of its limitations in the domestic relations, freedom, in this sense, is a status which is invariable under all legal systems. It is the subject of judicial determination when a condition incompatible with the possession of personal liberty is alleged against one who claims freedom as his status. A community wherein law should be recognized, and wherein nevertheless this status should not be enjoyed by any private person, is inconceivable; and, wherever its possession is thus controverted, the judicial question arises of the personal extent of the law which attributes liberty to free persons. The law may attribute it to every natural person, and thereby preclude the recognition of any condition inconsistent with its possession. This universal extent of the law of free condition will operate in the international as well as in the internal private law of the state. In most European countries the right of one, under the law of a foreign country, to control the person of another who by such law had been his slave or bondman is not recognized under that international rule for the allowance of the effect of a foreign law which is called comity, because the law of those countries attributes personal liberty as a right to every natural person. 1 Hurd, Law of Freedom §§ 116, 300.

In other countries the power of the master under a foreign law is recognized in specified cases by a statute or treaty, while an otherwise universal attribution of personal liberty precludes every other recognition of a condition of bondage. On this principle, in some of the United States, an obligation to render personal service or labor, and the corresponding right of the person to whom it is due, existing under the law of other states, were not enforced except in cases of claim within art. 4, sec. 2, ¶ 3 of the constitution of the United States; 18 Pick. 193; 20 N. Y. 562.

Legal rights are the effects of civil society. No legal condition is the reservation of a state of nature anterior to civil society. Freedom, as here understood, is the effect of law, not a pre-existing natural element. It is, therefore, not necessarily attributed to all persons within any one jurisdiction. But personal liberty, even though not attributed universally, may be juridically regarded as a right accordant with the nature of man in society; and the effect of this doctrine will appear in a legal presumption in favor of free condition, which will throw the burden of proof always on him who denies it. This presumption obtained in the law of Rome (XII Tab. T. vi. 5; Dig. lib. 40 tit. 5, l. 53; lib. 43. tit. 29, s. 8, l. 9; lib. 50, tit. 17, l. 20, 22) even when slavery was derived from the ius gentium, or that law which was found to be received by the general reason of mankind; 1 Hurd, Law of Freedom § 157.

In English law, this presumption in favor of liberty has always been recognized, not only in the penal and remedial law, but in applying the law of condition, at a time when involuntary servitude was lawful; Fortesque, cc. 42, 47; Co. Litt. fol. 124 b; Wood, Inst. c. 1, § 5. In the slave-holding states of the Union, a presumption against the freedom of persons of negro descent arose or was declared by statute; Cooper, Justin. 485; 1 Dev. 386; 8 Ga. 157; 5 Halst. N. J. 275. In interpreting manumission clauses in wills, the rule differed in the states according to their prevailing policy; Cobb, Slav. 298.

The condition of a private person who is legally secured in the enjoyment of those rights of action, in social relations, which might be equally enjoyed by all private persons.

The condition of one who may exercise his natural powers as he wills is not known in jurisprudence, except as the characteristic of those who hold the supreme power of the state. The freedom which one may have by his individual strength resembles this power in kind, and is no part of legal freedom. The legal right of one person involves correlative obligations on others. All persons must be restricted by those obligations which are essential to the freedom of others; 2 Harr. Cond. La. 208; but these are not inconsistent with the possession of rights which may be enjoyed equally by all. Such obligations constitute a condition opposed to freedom only as things which mutually suppose and require each other. Where the law imposes obligations incompatible with the possession of such rights as might be equally enjoyed by all, a condition arises which is contrary to freedom, see BONDAGE, and the condition of those who hold the rights correlative to such obligations becomes superior to freedom, as above defined, or is merged in the superiority of a class or caste. The rights and obligations of all cannot be alike; men must stand towards each other in unlike relations, since the actions of all cannot be the same. In the possession of relative rights they must be unequal. But individual (absolute) rights, which exist in relations towards the community in general, and capacity for relative rights in domestic relations, may be attributed to all in the same circumstances of natural condition. It is in the possession of these rights and this capacity that this freedom exists. As thus defined, it comprehends freedom in the narrower sense, as the greater includes the less; and when attributed to all who enjoy freedom in the narrower sense, as at the present day in the greater part of Europe and formerly in the free states of the Union, the latter is not distinguished as a distinct condition. But some who enjoy personal liberty might yet be so restricted in the acquisition and use of property, so unprotected in person and limited in the exercise of relative rights, that their condition would be freedom in the narrower sense only. During the middle ages, in Europe, it was possible to discriminate the existing free conditions as thus different; and the restrictions formerly imposed on free colored persons in the slaveholding states of the Union created a similar distinction between their freedom and that which, in all the states, was attributed to all persons of white race.

Freedom, in either sense, is a condition which may exist anywhere, under the civil power; but its permanency will depend on the guarantees by which it is defended. These are of infinite variety. In connection with a high degree of guarantee against irresponsible sovereign power, freedom, in the larger sense above described, may be called civil freedom, from the fact that such guarantee becomes the public law of the state. Such freedom acquires specific character from the particular law of some one country, and becomes the topic of legal science in the juridical application of the guarantees by which the several rights incident to it are maintained. This constitutes a large portion of the jurisprudence of modern states, and embraces, particularly in England and America, the public or constitutional law. The bills of rights in American constitutions, with their great original, Magna Charta, are the written evidences of the most fundamental of these guarantees. The provisions of the constitution of the United States which have this character operate against powers held by the national government, but not against those reserved to the states; 7 Pet. 243; Sedg. Const. 597. It has been judicially declared that a person "held to service or labor in one state under the laws thereof escaping into another" is not protected by any of these provisions, but may be delivered up, by national authority, to a claimant, for removal from the state in which he is found, in any method congress may direct, and that any one claimed as such fugitive may be seized and removed from such state by private claimant, without regard either to the laws of such state or the acts of congress; 13 Pet. 597.

The other guarantees of freedom in either sense are considered under the titles EVIDENCE; ARREST; BAIL; TRIAL; HABEAS CORPUS; HOMINE; REPLEGIANDO.

Irresponsible superiority, whether of one or of many, is necessarily antagonistic to freedom in others. Yet freedom rests on law, and law on the supreme power of some state. The possession of this power involves a liberty of action; but its possession by a body of persons, each one of whom must submit to the will of the majority, is not in itself a guarantee of the freedom of any one individual among them. Still, the more equally this power is distributed among those who are thus individually subject, the more their individual liberty of action in the exercise of this power approximates to a legal right,—though one beyond any incident to civil freedom as above defined,—and its possession may be said to constitute political freedom, so far as that may be ascribed to private persons which is more properly ascribed to communities. In proportion as this right is extended to the individual members of a community, it becomes a guarantee of civil freedom, by making a delegation of the power of the whole body to a representative government possible and even necessary, which government may be limited in its action by customary or written law. Thus, the political liberties of private persons and their civil freedom become intimately connected; though political and civil freedom are not necessarily coexistent. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 6, n. 127, n.

Political freedom is to be studied in the public law of constitutional states, and in England and America, particularly in those provisions in the bills of rights which affect the subject more in his relations towards the government than in his relations towards other private persons. See LIBERTY. The terms freedom and liberty are words differing in origin (German and Latin); but they are, in use, too nearly synonymous to be distinguished in legal definition. See LIBERTY; Lieber, Civ. Lib. etc. 87, n.

FREEDOM OF THE CITY. In English Law. Immunity from county jurisdiction, and the privilege of corporate taxation and self-government held under a charter from the crown. This freedom is enjoyed of right, subject to the provision of the charter, and is often conferred as an honor on princes and other distinguished individuals. The freedom of a city carries the parliamentary franchise. Encyc. Dict. The rights and privileges possessed by the burgesses or freemen of a municipal corporation under the old English law; now of little importance, and conferred chiefly as a mark of honor. See 11 Chic. L. J. (U. S.) 857.

The phrase has no place in American law, and as frequently used in addresses of welcome made to organizations visiting an American city, particularly by mayors, has no meaning whatever except as an expression of good will.

FREEDOM OF CONTRACT. See LIBERTY OF CONTRACT.

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS. See LIBERTY OF THE PRESS.

FREEDOM OF SPEECH. See LIBERTY OF SPEECH.

FREEHOLD. See ESTATE OF FREEHOLD.

FREEHOLD ESTATE. One who is merely holding as agent has no "freehold estate" within a statute which provides that land shall be assessed against the owner of the first freehold estate. 151 Ky. 488, 152 S. W. 571.

FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETIES. Societies in England designed for the purpose of enabling mechanics, artisans, and other working-men to purchase at the least possible price a piece of freehold land of a sufficient yearly value to entitle the owner to the elective franchise for the county in which the land is situated. Wharton.

Only in form within the scope of the Building Societies Acts. In a society of this kind "subscriptions are received from the members in the way generally adopted by building societies, and, with the funds thus acquired, an estate is purchased in some eligible situation. The property is then laid out in lots of a size suited to the wants of the members; roads are made, and other improvements effected, the cost of which, and of the conveyance to the society, is added to the amount of the purchase-money. The total sum thus expended upon the whole estate is then equitably apportioned amongst the several lots, and determines their price. The members are thus enabled to obtain a small quantity of land at wholesale price." (Dav. B. Soc. 63.) As a building society formed under the Building Societies Acts cannot legally hold land, except as security for advances such an arrangement as the one above described is in reality ultra vires, and has to be effected through the medium of trustees, on whose honor the members must rely. This kind of society was invented principally to give the working classes votes in the days when the franchise was higher than it is now. R. & L. Dict.; Second Rep. of Com. 16.

FREEHOLD IN LAW. A freehold which has descended to a man, upon which he may enter at pleasure, but which he has not entered on. Termes de la Ley.

FREEHOLDER. The owner of a freehold estate. Such a man must have been anciently a freeman; and the gift to any man by his lord of an estate to him and his heirs made the tenant a freeman, if he had not been so before. See 1 Washb. R. P. 29, 45. One who owns land in fee, or for life, or for some indeterminate period. The estate may be equitable or legal. 75 N. C. 18.

FREEMAN. One who is not a slave. One born free or made so.

In Old English Law. A freeholder, as distinguished from a villein.

An inhabitant of a city. Stat. 1 Hen. VI. c. 11, § 8 Steph. Com. 106; Cunningham. Law Dict.

(Liber homo, q. v.) In the distinction of a freeman from a vassal under the feudal policy, liber homo was commonly opposed to vassus or vassallus; the former denoted an allodial proprietor, the latter, one who held of a superior. Tomlin.

The title of a freeman is also given to any one admitted to the freedom of a corporate town, or of any other corporate body, consisting, among other members, of those called freemen. Id.

FREEMAN'S ROLL. A list of persons admitted as burgesses or freemen for the purposes of the rights reserved by the Municipal Corporation Act. 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 76. Distinguishing from the Burgess Roll; 3 Steph. Com. 197. The term was used, in early colonial history, of some of the American colonies.

FREIGHT. In Maritime Law. The sum agreed on for the hire of a ship, entirely or in part, for the carriage of goods from one port to another. 13 East 300. All rewards or compensation paid for the use of ships. 1 Pet. Adm. 206; 2 Boulay-Paty, t. 8, s. 1; 2 B. & P. 321; 4 Dall. 459; 2 Johns. 346; 3 Pardessus, n. 705; Chitty, Com. L. 407. The price to be paid for the actual transportation of goods by sea from one place to another. 154 Pa. 242.

The amount of freight is usually fixed by the agreement of the parties; and if there is no agreement, the amount is to be ascertained by the usage of the trade and the circumstances and reason of the case; 3 Kent 173. Pothier is of opinion that when the parties agree as to the conveyance of the goods, without fixing a price, the master is entitled to freight at the price usually paid for merchandise of a like quality at the time and place of shipment, and if the prices vary he is to pay the mean price; Pothier, Charte-Part. n. 6. But there is a case which authorizes the master to require the highest price: namely, when goods are put on board without his knowledge; id. n. 9. When the merchant hires the whole ship for the entire voyage, he must pay the freight though he does not fully load the ship; Chitty, Com. L. 407; 24 Wend. 804; he is, of course, only bound to pay in proportion to the goods he puts on board, when he does not agree to provide a full cargo. If the merchant agrees to furnish a return cargo, and he furnishes none, and lets the ship return in ballast, he must make compensation to the amount of the agreed freight; Roccus, notes 72-75; 1 Pet. Adm. 207; 10 East 530; 2 Vern. 210. See L. R. 6 Q. B. 528; 15 East 264; DEAD FREIGHT.

The general rule is that the delivery of the goods at the place of destination, in fulfillment of the agreement of the charter-party or bill of lading, is required, to entitle the master or owner of the vessel to freight; 2 Johns. 327; 3 id. 321; 142 N. Y. 90; 5 Harring. 293; 21 How. 527. But to this rule there are several exceptions.

When a cargo consists of live stock, and some of the animals die in the course of the voyage, without any fault or negligence of the master or crew, and there is no express agreement respecting the payment of freight, it is, in general, to be paid for all that were put on board; but when the contract is to pay for the transportation of them, then no freight is due for those which die on the voyage; Molloy, b. 2, c. 4, s. 8; Dig. 14, 2, 10; Abbott, Shipp., 13th ed. 534. See 87 Fed. Rep. 268.

An interruption of the regular course of the voyage, happening without the fault of the owner, does not deprive him of his freight if the ship afterwards proceeds with the cargo to the place of destination, as in the case of capture and recapture; 3 C. Rob. 101; 3 Kent 223; but where a voyage is broken up by reason of the inexcusable delay of the ship, resulting in damage to the shippers, he need not pay the freight; 30 Fed. Rep. 44. In case of the blockade of, or the interdiction of, commerce with the port to which the cargo is destined, and the return of the goods to the owner, no freight will be due; 2 Johns. 336; 10 East 526; but see 4 Dall. 455.

A shipowner who is prevented from performing the voyage by a wrongful act of the charterer is prima facie entitled to the freight that he would have earned, less what it would have cost him to earn it; 128 U. S. 474.

When the ship is forced into a port short of her destination, and cannot finish the voyage, if the owner of the goods will not allow the master a reasonable time to repair, or to proceed in another ship, the master will be entitled to the whole freight; and if, after giving his consent, the master refuses to go on, he is not entitled to freight. See DEVIATION.

When the merchant accepts of the goods at an intermediate port, it is the general rule of marine law that freight is to be paid according to the proportion of the voyage performed; and the law will imply such contract; 2 McLean 423; 2 Johns. 323. The acceptance must be voluntary, and not one forced upon the owner by any illegal or violent proceedings, as from it the law implies a contract that freight pro rata parte itineris shall be accepted and paid; 2 Burr. 683; 7 Term 381; 2 S. & R. 229; 7 Cra. 358; 6 Cow. 504; 3 Kent 182; Com. Dig. Merchant (E 3), note, pl. 43, and the cases there cited. See 61 Fed. Rep. 390.

But if the master refuse to repair his vessel and send on the goods, or to procure other vessels for that purpose and the owner of the goods then receives them, such acceptance will not be such a voluntary one as to make him liable for freight pro rata; 6 Cow. 504; 16 Am. Dec. 443; 2 Bosw. 195; and where the port designated in the charter-party was unsafe, the master was held justified in discharging part of his cargo at another port in order to be able to proceed with the rest to the point designated; [1896] 1 Q. B. 586; L. R. 6 P. D. 68.

When the ship has performed the whole voyage, and has brought only a part of her cargo to the place of destination, there is a difference between a general ship and a ship chartered for a specific sum for the whole voyage. In the former case, the freight is to be paid for the goods which may be delivered at their place of destination; in the latter, it has been questioned whether the freight could be apportioned; and it seems that in such case a partial performance is not sufficient, and that a special payment cannot be claimed except in special cases; 1 Johns. 24; 1 Bulstr. 167; 7 Term 381; 2 Campb. 468. These are some of the exceptions to the general rule called for by principles of equity, that a partial performance is not sufficient, and that a partial payment or ratable freight cannot be claimed.

If goods are laden on board, the shipper is not entitled to their return and to have them reloaded without paying the expenses of unloading and the whole freight and surrendering the bill of lading or indemnifying the master against any loss or damage he may sustain by reason of the non-delivery of the bill; 6 Duer, N. Y. 194; 8 N. Y. 529. In general, the master has a lien on the goods, and need not part with them until the freight is paid; 21 How. 527; and when the regulations of the revenue require them to be landed in a public warehouse, the master may enter them in his own name and preserve the lien; Abb. Shipp. pt. 3, ch. 8, § 17. His right to retain the goods may, however, be waived either by an express agreement at the time of making the original contract, or by his subsequent agreement or consent. The refusal of a master to deliver a cargo until security is furnished for the freight gives no right of action to the charterer, as the cargo is subject to a lien for freight; 48 Fed. Rep. 591. See LIEN; MARITIME LIEN; AVERAGE.

If freight be paid in advance and the goods are not conveyed and delivered according to the contract, it can, in all cases in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, be recovered back by the shipper; t. Sandif. 578.

The captor of an enemy's vessel is entitled to freight from the owner of the goods if he perform the voyage and carries the goods to the port of original destination; 1 Kent 181; but in such cases the doctrine of freight pro rata is entirely rejected; 4 Rob. Rep. 278; 5 id. 67; 6 id. 269.

Other common carriers and railroads. In this connection the term is sometimes used as synonymous with merchandise.

As to the regulation of rates for carrying freight by statute, see IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS; RATES; INTER-STATE COMMERCE. As to discrimination in the charges, see DISCRIMINATION.

FREIGHTER. He to whom a ship or vessel has been hired, and who loads her under his contract. He who loads a general ship. 3 Kent 173; 3 Pardessus, n. 704.

The freighter is entitled to the enjoyment of the vessel according to contract, and the vessel hired is the only one that he is bound to take; there can, therefore, be no substitution without his consent. When the vessel has been chartered only in part, the freighter is only entitled to the space he has contracted for; and in case of his occupying more room or putting on board a greater weight, he must pay freight on the principles mentioned under the article of FREIGHT.

The freighter hiring a vessel is required to use the vessel agreeably to the provisions of the charter-party, or, in the absence of any such provisions, according to the usages of trade; he cannot load the vessel with merchandise which would render it liable to condemnation for violating the laws of a foreign state; 3 Johns. 105. He is also required to return the vessel as soon as the time for which he chartered her has expired, and to pay the freight.

FRENCH POOL. "French pool," also called "Paris Mutual," is described to be a small machine, containing the name of each horse to be run in a particular race written or printed on the side, and printed numbers placed on the inside of the machine, which could be seen through holes in it. It is used by the owner or person operating it, and by those engaged in betting on horse racing in this way. The owner or operator sells the tickets for five dollars each; they bear numbers corresponding with the number given the horse on the machines, and by turning a crank or screw attached to the machine the betters are shown at once the number of tickets sold on each horse as each of said tickets is sold, so as to enable him to bet more intelligently and safely, and lessen the chances of disaster to himself. After the race is over, the machine is examined to see how many tickets have been sold, and those persons holding tickets on the winning horse get the amount of all the money received by the operator for all the tickets sold by him on all the horses that have run in the particular race, less five per cent commission on the pool, which the operator of the machine retains for his services. 79 Ky. 619; 92 Ky. 573, 18 S. W. 454.

FRENCH SPOILIATION CLAIMS

On January 20, 1855 (23 Stat. L. 288), the congress of the United States, authorized all citizens of the United States or their legal representatives, to present to the court of claims valid claims which they had against France for spoiliations of property on the high seas prior to 1801. These spoiliations were committed by French war vessels and privateers in pursuance of governmental orders, inspired by alleged violations of the treaty of 1778 by the United States, and extended from about 1790 to 1801. The United States authorized retaliatory measures in 1798, and according to their supreme court, war existed between the two countries. Napoleon having succeeded to the Directory, made a treaty with the United States by which the respective pretensions of the two nations were abandoned. The claimants insisted that this proceeding was a trading off of their claims against France for a national consideration, and that their own government became liable therefor, and the court of claims has so advised congress. See NEXT or KIN.

Claims for indemnity upon the French Government, for losses of citizens of the United States or their legal representatives, arising from illegal captures, seizures, etc., of vessels or cargoes prior to the treaty of 1800 between France and the United States. Jurisdiction was given, by an act of 1885, to the Court of Claims to inquire into the matter of each claim which might be presented to it and to report to Congress its opinion of the validity and the amount of the claim with a statement as to its ownership. After the court had reported a French Spoliation case it remained with Congress to determine, first, the measure of the indemnity which the United States should give; and, second, the persons who were equitably entitled to participate therein. 190 U. S. 361, 362.

FRENDELSMAN (Sax.). An outlaw. So called because of his outlawry he was denied all help of friends after certain days. Cowel; Blount.

FRENDWITE. A fine exacted from him who harbored an outlawed friend. Cowel; Cunningham. A quittance for for, jang (exemption from the penalty of taking provisions before the king's purveyors had taken enough for the king's necessities). Cowel.

FREBORGH. A free-surety or free-pledge. Spelman, Gloss. See FRANK-PLEDGE.

FREOLING. See FRILINGI.

FREQUENT. To visit often; to resort to often or habitually. 109 Ind. 175.

A single visit to a place, or once passing through a street, cannot be said to be a "frequenting" that place or street. Anderson. May be used in contradistinction to "found," which applies to the case of a person apprehended in a building or inclosed ground, where the necessary inference would be that the purpose was unlawful, in which case it would be enough to show that the party was in the place only once. Id.; 14 Q. B. D. 98. What amounts to frequenting a street must depend upon circumstances. Id.; 101-2.

FRERE. A brother. Britt. c. 75.

FRESH DISSEISIN. Such disseisin as a man may seek to defeat of himself, and by his own power, without the help of the king or judges. There was no limit set to the time within which this might be done. It is set in one case as a disseisin committed within fifteen days. Bracton, lib. 4, cap. 5. In another case it was held a fresh disseisin when committed within a year. Britton, cap. 32, 48, 65; Cowel.

FRESH FINE. A fine levied within a year. Stat. Westm. 2 (13 Edw. 1.), cap. 45; Cowel.

FRESH FORCE. Force done within forty days. Fitzh. N. B. 7; Old N. B. 4. The heir or reversioner in a case of disseisin by fresh force was allowed a remedy in chancery by bill before the mayor. Cowel.

FRESH SUIT. Where a man robbed follows the robber with all diligence, apprehends and convicts him of felony by verdict, even if it requires a year, it is called fresh suit, and the party shall have his goods again. The same term was applied to other cases; Cowel; 1 Bla. Com. 297.

FRESHET. A flood or overflowing of a river by means of rains or melted snow; an inundation. 8 Phila. 42.

FRETUM. Freight. Mox. & W.

FRETUM. A strait. Fretum Brittanicum, the strait between Dover and Calais.

FRIAR. A member of an order of religious persons, of whom there were four principal branches: 1. Minors. Grey Friars, or Franciscans. 2. Augustines. 3. Dominicans, or Black Friars. 4. White Friars, or Carmelites. Cowel; Whart.; Mox. & W.

FRIUSCULUM. In Civil Law. A slight dissension between husband and wife, which produced a momentary separation, without any intention to dissolve the marriage,—in which it differed from a divorce. Pothier, Pand. lib. 50, s. 106; Vicat, Voc. Jur. This amounted to a separation in our law. See SEPARATION.

FRIDBORG, FRITHBORG. Frank-pledge. Cowel. Security for the peace. Spelman, Gloss.

FRIDEBURGUS (Sax.). A kind of frank-pledge whereby the principal men were bound for themselves and servants. Fleta, lib. 1, cap. 47. Cowel says it is the same with frank-pledge.

FRIDSTOL. See FREDSTOLE.

FRIEND OF THE COURT. See AMICUS CURIAE.

FRIENDLESS MAN. An outlaw. Cowel.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES. Associations for the purpose of affording relief to the members and their families in case of sickness or death. They are governed by numerous acts of parliament, and were first authorized in 1793.

FRIENDLY SUIT. A suit brought by a creditor in chancery against an executor or administrator, being really a suit by the executor or administrator, in the name of a creditor against himself, in order to compel the creditors to take an equal distribution of the assets. 2 Wms. Ex. 1915. See AMICABLE ACTION; CASE STATED.

A suit brought between parties by mutual arrangement in order to obtain a decision upon some point in which both are interested. Byrne.

Also, any suit instituted by agreement between the parties to obtain the opinion of the court upon some doubtful question in which they are interested, such as actions for construction of wills, partition suits, etc. R. & L. Dict.

FRIGHT. An ordinary witness not an expert may testify that a horse appeared to be frightened; 117 Mass. 122. Although this was a dictum, it was followed in the court of another state which held that such witness might testify that horses were frightened by water being thrown upon them; 60 Ia. 429.

FRIGIDITY. Impotence.

FRILING, or FREOLING. A free-man born. Jac. L. Dict.; Spel. Gloss.

(Anglo-Sax. fre, free, and ling, offspring.) Persons of free descent; the middle class of persons among the Saxons. Burrill; Spelman.

FRIPPER, FRIPPERER. One who scours and dresses up old clothes to sell again. Mox. & W.

FRISCUS. Fresh uncultivated ground. Mon. Angl. tit. 2, p. 56. Fresh, not salt. Reg. Orig. 97. Recent or new.

FRITH. See FATTH.

FRITHBOTE. A satisfaction or fine for a breach of the peace. See FREDUM.

FRITHBREACH. The breaking of the peace. Cowel.

FRITHGAR. The year of jubilee or of meeting for peace and friendship. Jac. L. Dict.

FRITHGILDA. A guild hall. A company or fraternity for the maintenance of peace and security; a fine for breach of the peace. Jac. L. Dict.

FRITHMAN. A member of a company or fraternity. Blount.

FRITHSOCNE. Surety of defence. Jurisdiction of the peace. The franchise of preserving the peace. Cowel; Spelman, Gloss.

FRITHSOEN, or FRITHSTOL. Asylum; sanctuary. See FREDSTOLE.

FRITHSOKE, or FRITHSOKEN. The right of liberty of having a view; frank-pledge. Fleta. See FRITHSOCNE, which seems to be interchangeable. Cowel; Cun. L. Dict.

FRITHSPLOT, or FRITHGEARD. A spot or plot of land, encircling some stone, tree, or well, considered sacred, and, therefore, affording sanctuary to criminals. Whart.

FRIVOLOUS. An answer or plea is frivolous which controverts no material allegation in the complaint, and which is manifestly insufficient. Under the English common-law amendment act, and by the codes of some of the states, the court is authorized to strike out such a plea, so that the plaintiff can obtain judgment without awaiting the regular call of the cause; 1 Abb. Pr. 41; 8 id. 148; 3 Sandf. 732. See 1 Misc. Rep. 463; 74 Hun 639; 53 Minn. 98; 51 Wis. 430.

An answer cannot be stricken out on the ground that it is frivolous, where an extended argument or illustration is required to demonstrate its frailty; 67 Hun 648; 74 id. 527. A pleading interposed for delay is frivolous, but a pleading is not frivolous because vague; 7 Wis. 383; 16 How. Pr. 135; 2 N. Dak. 72.

Frivolous is not synonymous with irrelevant; 5 Abb. Pr. N. S. 338, 343; 53 Barb. 650.

FRODMORTEL, or FREOMORTEL. An immunity for committing manslaughter. Mon. Angl. t. 1. 173.

FROM. The legal effect of this word has been a fruitful subject of judicial discussion resulting in a great diversity of construction of the word as used with respect to both time and place. Many attempts have been made to lay down a general rule to determine whether it was to be treated as inclusive or exclusive of a terminus a quo, whether of time or place. Very long ago a critical writer, after reviewing the cases up to that date, undertook to formulate such a rule thus: From, as well in strict grammatical sense, as in the ordinary import thereof, when referring to a certain point as a terminus a quo, always excludes that point; though in vulgar acceptance it was capable of being taken indifferently, either inclusively or exclusively, yet in law it has obtained a certain fixed import and is always taken as exclusive of the terminus a quo. Powell, Powers 449. This conclusion states a rule applied in the majority of cases, and it was said that the prepositions "from," "until," "between," generally exclude the time to which they relate, but the general rule will yield to the intent of parties; 120 Mass. 94. But the rule has not been unvarying, and many courts have not hesitated to follow the views of Lord Mansfield, in Cowp. 714 (overruling his own decision of three years before, id. 189), that it is either exclusive or inclusive according to context and subject-matter, and the court will construe it to effectuate the intent of parties and not to destroy it.

As to time, after an examination of authorities, Washington, J., laid down what he considered the settled principles to be deduced from them: (1) When time is computed from an act done, the day of its performance is included; (2) when the words are from the date, if a present interest is to commence, the day is included, if it is a terminus from which to impute time the day is excluded; 4 Wash. C. C. 240; in which the latter principle was applied to a lease, as it was also in Lord Raym. 84; and to a bond; 15 S. & R. 135; and the first proposition has been laid down with reference to the words "from and after the passage of this act;" 9 Cra. 104; 1 Paine 261; 1 Gall. 348; contra, 1 Nott. & McC. 503. See 3 Cra. 890. From is generally held a word of exclusion; 9 Wend. 845; Anth. 243; 83 Me. 67; 18 id. 106; 13 R. I. 819; 1 Pick. 485; 7 Allen 487. But a promise made November 1st, 1811, and sued November 1st, 1817, was held barred by statute of limitation; 15 Mass. 108; Hobart 130. In many cases it is held to be either exclusive or inclusive according to the intention of the parties; 2 Barb. 9; 1 Hayw. N. C. 114; 2 Pars. Cont. 176. Where an act was to be done in a given number of days from the time of the contract, the day on which the contract was made was included; 21 Ind. 194; but if the contract merely says in so many days it means so many days from the day of date, and that is excluded; 9 N. H. 804. A fire policy from one given date to another includes the last day, whether the first is included was not decided; L. R. 5 Exch. 296. In most cases when something is required to be done in a given time from the day on which an event has happened, that day is excluded, as in case of proving claims against the estate of a decedent or insolvent; 10 Conn. 878; enrolling deeds, after execution; 5 Tenn. 288; appeal from arbitrators, afterward; 8 S. & R. 496; 1 id. 411; issuing a scire facias to revive a judgment, after entry; 6 W. & S. 327; the time an execution runs, after its date; 6 Cow. 639; redemption from execution sale; id. 618; allowing appeal from a justice; 2 Cow. 603. The principle is thus well expressed. When time is to be computed from a particular day or a particular event, as when an act is to be performed within a specified period from or after a day named, that day is excluded and the last day included; 2 Wall. 177; 3 Denio 16. But it was held that in considering the question of barring a writ of error, the day of the decree is included; 18 B. Mon. 460.

From the expiration of a policy means from the expiration of the time from which the policy was effected and not the time at which the risk is terminated by alienation; 2 Mass. 818. Six months from testator's death allowed a legatee to give security not to marry, are exclusive of that day; 15 Ves. 248. Where an annuity is given, and from and after the payment thereof and subject thereto, the principal over, the gift over is subject to make up deficiency of income; aliter if the gift over were from and after the annuitant's death, merely; L. R. 2 Ch. App. 644, reversing L. R. 4 Eq. 58. From time to time, as applied to the payment of expenses or damages caused by building a railroad; L. R. 5 Ex. 6; or the appointment, by a married woman, of rents and profits; 1 Ves. Jr. 189 and note; 8 Bro. C. C. 340; 12 Ves. 501, do not require periodical payments or appointments, nor restrain the party from a sweeping discharge or disposition of the whole subject-matter at once. From time to time is not sufficient in a bail bond which under the statute should stipulate for appearance from term to term; 25 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1072. From day to day, in reference to adjournments, usually means to the next day but, under a statute authorizing the adjournment of a sale from day to day, a sale is good if made by adjournment to a day, certain, which did not immediately succeed the first; 4 Watts. 363. From henceforth in a lease means from the delivery; 5 Co. 1; so also does one from March 25th last past (the execution being March 25th); 4 B. & C. 272; or one from an impossible date (as February 30th), or no date, but if it has a sensible date, the word date in other parts of it means date, not delivery; 4 B. & C. 906. Where authority is given to commissioners to build a bridge and then and from thenceforth, the county to be liable, means only after the bridge is built; 16 East 305.

Whenever they are used with respect to places it is said that "from," "to," and "at" are taken inclusively according to the subject-matter; 81 U. S. 843 (fixing the terminus of a railroad in an act of congress). From an object to an object in a deed excludes the terminus referred to; 52 Me. 262; 84 id. 459. From place to place means from one place in a town to another in the same town; 7 Mass. 188; 11 Gray 81. From a street means from any part of it according to circumstances; 74 Pa. 250. From a town is not always and indeed is seldom exclusive of the place named; it generally means from some indefinite place within that town; 8 Cra. C. C. 590, 600. Authority in a railroad charter to construct a railroad from a city to another point gives power to construct the road from any point within the city; 53 Ga. 244; 99 Pa. 155; 3 Head 596; contra 8 Rich. L. 177. And see 10 Johns 598, where in a similar case "to" was construed "into;" and 6 Paige 554 where, "at or near" was held equivalent to "within." But from a town to another in an indictment for transportation of liquor does not charge it as done within the town; 84 Me. 458. To construe reasonably the expression a road from a village to a creek within the same village, in a statute, requires that it be taken inclusively; 7 Barb. 416. Sailing from a port means out of it; 2 Mass. 129.

Descent from a parent cannot be construed to mean through a parent, it must be immediate, from the person designated; 3 Pet. 58, 66; 4 Ind. 51; but the words from the part of the father include a descent, either immediately from the father or from any person in the line of the father; 1 S. & R. 223.

The words to be paid for in from six to eight weeks have no definite meaning and it was properly left to the jury to say if the suit was brought prematurely; L. R. 9 C. P. 20. From the loading in a marine policy ordinarily means that the risk is covered after the goods are on board, but this meaning may be qualified by any words in the policy indicating a different intention; 16 East 240; L. R. 7 Q. B. 580, 703. A contract to deliver from one to three thousand bushels gives the seller an option to deliver any quantity he chooses within the limits named; 4 Me. 497. Appraisers living from one to one and a half miles away, in a fairly well settled community, are prima facie from the neighborhood; 23 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 638.

From and After. An act authorizing contracts for the payment of interest at 10 per centum provided: "This Act shall take effect and be in force from and after the first day of September, 1871." The words "from" and "after" are used in direct connection, and they fix the day named as a positive period of time after which the rule of action prescribed by the Act is to prevail. 12 Bush (Ky.) 403.

From His Appointment. The words "from his appointment" merely designate the beginning of the term of the first incumbent, and where an incumbent was re-appointed from term to term, the time being permitted to lap over the expiration of the term, each re-appointment was for the unexpired term, and where a four-year term ended in January and an appointment was made in December of the previous year the appointee was entitled to hold only until such later date. 138 Ky. 314, 127 S. W. 1010.

FRONT. Ordinarily, as applied to a lot or tract of land, that part of it which abuts on, or gives access from, it to a highway whether natural or artificial. But sometimes as in a covenant to keep up sidewalks, the front of a corner lot may mean the side; 81 Ia. 89.

When the contract of sale calls for a store fifty-six feet front and rear and the deed describes the lot as nineteen feet wide, there being visible monuments, —side walls,—the later control and front and rear will be taken as the depth of the lot, though the natural meaning would be the width; 10 Paige 886.

A covenant not to open or put out a door to the front of the street means a door giving access to the street and not close upon it, and the covenant is broken if the door be eight feet back of the actual front; Dowl. & Ry. 556, 563.

The words front to the river (in French and Spanish deeds, face au fleuve, or frente al rio), used in describing part of a plantation, prima facie designate a riparian estate, unless, taken in such sense, they have an incongruous or absurd result; 6 Mart. La. 19, 224, in which the meaning of this expression was learnedly and elaborately defined. It is otherwise as to a sale of part of a tract when at the time of sale the vendor owned another part between that sold and the river; in the last case the words are descriptive of the situation of the property; 8 Mart. La. 572.

And the words front of the levee (frente a la levee) when there was land outside of the levee susceptible of ownership does not signify a boundary on the river; 9 Mart. La. 656, 719.

It was held that land which had a five foot strip between it and the street was not liable for street improvements under a charter providing that land taxable for street improvements must front on the street. 14 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 558; 50 Mo. App. 367.

A corner lot has two fronts, at an angle with each other. A covenant, in a lease of a lot upon the corner of two streets, to "keep up the sidewalks in front of the same" is not confined to the main front, but includes the sidewalk on the side street. Id.; 31 Iowa 89. But it has been held that the real front of a corner lot is determined by the architectural construction of the main buildings, their use and occupancy, and not by the entrance into subordinate or out-buildings. Id.; 3 Ohio Dec. 667. Front to the river is a phrase which makes the river a boundary. Id.; 6 Mart. (La.) 224.

FRONT OF AN ACRE. An expression which "has no proper application to a line, and has not a natural or generally acknowledged and received sense. It is too vague to determine the length of the front line of a lot as a basis for a decree for specific performance;" 3 Del. Ch. 466.

FRONT FOOT. As used in an act providing that property shall be assessed in proportion to the "front foot" has been held synonymous with "abutting foot." 181 Mo. 19.

A foot on the highway, street, or water front. When applied to lots means a foot front and the entire depth of that foot as distinguished from square foot. English.

FRONTAGE, FRONTAGER. In English Law. A frontager is a person owning or occupying land which abuts on a highway, river, sea-shore, or the like. The term is generally used with reference to the liability of frontagers on streets to contribute towards the expense of paving, draining, or other works on the highway carried out by a local authority, in proportion to the frontage of their respective tenements. Public Health Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. There is no liability at common law binding a frontager on the sea to maintain a sea-wall on his land; 1 Q. B. D. 225. Such an owner has an easement of access, as it is called, to a highway or water on which his land fronts or abuts, which is a right distinct from the right of the public to pass over or navigate upon it; but it does not warrant an action by the frontager for obstruction to navigation without proof of special damage; L. R. 5 App. Cas. 84.

The corresponding American term is abutter (q. v.)

FROST-A-THING, THE. See GULA THING, THE.

FROZEN SNAKE. A term used to impute ingratitude and held libellous, the court taking judicial notice of its meaning without an innuendo. 12 Ad. & El. 624.

FRUCTUARIUS (Lat.). One entitled to the use of profits, fruits, and yearly increase of a thing. A lessee; a fermor. Bracton, 241; Vicat, Voc. Jur. Sometimes, as applied to a slave, he of whom any one has the usufruct. Vicat, Voc. Jur.

FRUCTUS (Lat.). The right of using the increase of fruits: equivalent to usufruct.

That which results or springs from a thing: as, rents, interest, freight from a ship, etc.

All the natural return, increase, or addition which is added by nature or by the skill of man, including all the organic products of things. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; 1 Mac-kelvey, Civil Law § 154.

FRUCTUS CIVILES (Lat. civil fruits). All revenues and recompenses which, though not fruits properly speaking, are recognized as such by the law. 1 Kauffmann, Mackeld. § 154; Calvinus, Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

FRUCTUS INDUSTRIALES (Lat.). These products which are obtained by the labor and cultivation of the occupant: as, corn or peaches; 1 Kauffmann, Mackeld. § 154, n.; 40 Md. 212; 118 Mass. 325. Emblements are such in the common law; 3 Steph. Com. 258; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

Fruits and vegetables produced by cultivation, as distinguished from the products of perennials: such as trees, bushes, etc., which are fructus naturales. 49 Minn. 412.

FRUCTUS LEGIS. The fruit of the law i. e. execution.

FRUCTUS NATURALES (Lat.). Those products which are produced by the powers of nature alone: as wool, metals, milk, the young of animals, and the fruit of trees and other perennial plants. 1 Kauffmann, Mackeld. § 154; Calvinus, Lex. See FRUCTUS INDUSTRIALES.

FRUCTUS PENDENTES (Lat.). The fruits united with the thing which produces them. These form a part of the principal thing; 1 Kauffmann, Mackeld. § 154. Sometimes called fructus stantes, standing fruits.

FRUCTUS REI ALIENAE. Fruits taken from another's estate; the fruits of another's property.

FRUCTUS SEPARATI. In Civil Law. Separate fruits, the fruits of a thing when they are separated from it. Dig. 7, 4, 13.

FRUGES (Lat.). Anything produced from vines, underwood, chalk-pits, stone-quarries. Dig. 50, 16, 77.

Grains and leguminous vegetables. In a more restricted sense, an esculent growing in pods. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.

FRUIT. The produce of a tree or plant which contains the seed or is used for food.

This term, in legal acceptance, is not confined to the produce of those trees which, in popular language, are called fruit trees, but applies also to the produce of oak, elm, and walnut trees. It denotes the produce not only of orchard, but of timber trees. 5 B. & C. 847.

FRUITS OF CRIME. In the Law of Evidence. Material objects acquired by means and in consequence of the commission of crime, and sometimes the subject-matter of the crime. Burr. Circ. Ev. 445; Benth. Jud. Ev. 31.

FRUIT FALLEN. The produce of any possession detached therefrom, and capable of being enjoyed by itself. Thus a next presentation, when a vacancy has occurred, is a fruit fallen from the advowson. Whart.

FRUMENTUM. In Civil Law. Grain. That which grows in an ear. Dig. 50.

FRUMGYLD. The first payment made to the kindred of a slain person in recompense for his murder. Blount; Termes de la Ley; Leg. Edmundi, cap. ult.

FRUMSTOLL (Sax.). A chief seat or mansion-house. Cowel. An original or paternal dwelling. Anct. Inst. Eng.

FRUSCA TERRA. In Old Records. Uncultivated and desert ground. 2 Mon. Angl. 327; Cowel.

FRUSSURA. Plowing; a breaking. Cowel.

FRUSTRUM TERRÆ. A piece or parcel of land lying by itself. Co. Litt. 5 b.

FRUTECTUM, FRUTETUM, or FRUTICETUM. A place where shrubs or herbs grow. Jac.; Blount; Spel. Glos.

FRUTOS. In Spanish Law. Fruits; products; profits; grains. White, New Recop. b. 1, tit. 7, c. 8, § 2.

FRYTH, FYNMITH. In English Law. The affording harbor and entertainment to any one. Anct. Inst. Eng.

FRYTHE (Sax.). In Old English Law. A plain between woods. Co. Litt. 5b. An arm of the sea, or a strait between two lands. Cowel.

A wood, from frid, pax; for the English Saxons held woods to be sacred, and therefore made them sanctuaries. Tomlin. Also, a plain between woods, or a lawn. Id.; Co. Litt. 5. Camden in his Britannia used it for an arm of the sea, or a strait, between two lands, from the word frutum, Id.

FUAGE, FOCAGE. Hearth-money. A tax laid upon each fireplace or hearth. 1 Bla. Com. 824; Spelman, Glos. An imposition of a shilling for every hearth, levied by Edward III. in the dukedom of Aquitaine.

FUDGE. When a libellous statement was copied from a prior publication and published with the word fudge prefixed thereto, it was left to the jury to say whether the word was added to vindicate the character of the plaintiff, or merely to create an argument in favor of the publisher in case of an action; 6 C. & P. 245.

FUEL. See SmoKE.

FUEL & GAS. See Gas.

FUER. To fly; which may be by bodily flight, or by non-appearance when summoned to appear in a court of justice, which is flight in the interpretation of the law. Cowel; Toml.; Whart.

The flight is of two kinds: (1) fuere in fait, or in facto, where a person does apparently and corporally flee; (2) fuere in ley, or in lege, when, being called to court, one does not appear, according to legal interpretation he flees. Wharton.

FUEBO. In Spanish Law. Compilations or general codes of law.

The usages and customs which, in the course of time, had acquired the force of unwritten law.

Letters of privilege and exemption from payment of certain taxes, etc.

Charters granted to cities or towns on condition of their paying certain dues to the owner of the land of which they had enjoyment.

Acts of donation granted by some lord or proprietor in favor of individuals, churches, or monasteries.

Ordinances passed by magistrates in relation to the dues, fines, etc., payable by the members of a community.

Letters emanating from the king or some superior lord, containing the ordinances and laws for the government of cities and towns, etc.

This term has many and very various meanings, as is shown above, and is sometimes used in other significations beside those here given. See, also, Schmidt, Span. Law 64; Escriche, Dict. Razz. Fuero.

Fuero Viejo. A compilation of Spanish law, published about A. D. 992. R. & L. Dict.

FUEBO DE CASTILLA. In Spanish Law. The body of laws and customs which formerly governed the Castilians.

FUEBO DE CORREOS Y CAMINOS. In Spanish Law. A special tribunal taking cognizance of all matters relating to the post-office and roads.

FUEBO DE GUERRA. In Spanish Law. A special tribunal taking cognizance of all matters in relation to persons serving in the army.

FUEBO JUZGO. In Spanish Law. The code of laws established by the Visigoths for the government of Spain, many of whose provisions are still in force. See the analysis of this work in Schmidt's Span. Law 80.

FUEBO DE MARINA (called, also, Jurisdiccion de Marina). In Spanish Law. A special tribunal taking cognizance of all matters relating to the navy and to the persons employed therein.

FUEBO MUNICIPAL. In Spanish Law. The body of laws granted to a city or town for its government and the administration of justice.

FUEBO REAL. In Spanish Law. A code of laws promulgated by Alonso el Sabio in 1255, and intended as an introduction to the larger and more comprehensive code called Las Siete Partidas, published eight years afterwards. For an analysis of this code, see Schmidt, Span. Law 67.

FUEBO VIEJO. The title of a compilation of Spanish Law, published about A. D. 992. Schm. Civil Law, introd. 65.

FUGA CATALORUM. In Old English Law. A drove of cattle. Fleta; Blount.

FUGACIA. A chase. Cowel; Blount.

FUGAM FREIT (Lat. he fled). In Old English Law. A phrase in an inquisition, signifying that a person fled for treason or felony. The effect of this is to make the party forfeit his goods absolutely, and the profits of his lands until he has been pardoned or acquitted.

FUGATIO. A privilege to hunt. Wharton; Blount.

FUGATOR. In English Law. A privilege to hunt. Blount.

A driver. Fugatores carrucarum, drivers of wagons. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 78.

FUGATOES CARRUCARUM. Wagons, who drive oxen without beating or goading. Wharton; Fleta, 1, 2, c. 78.

FUGITATE. In Scotch Practice. To outlaw by the sentence of a court; to outlaw for non-appearance in a criminal case. 2 Allison Prac. 850. See next title.

FUGITATION. In Scotch Law. A declaration that a criminal who does not appear on the day to which he is cited is a fugitive, in consequence of which he is subject to single escheat: Ersk. Prin. 591 (i. e. forfeiture all moveables to the crown; id. 155); and he may also be denounced a rebel; id.

FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE. One who, having committed a crime, flees from the jurisdiction within which it was committed, to escape punishment.

As one state cannot pursue those who violate its laws into the territories of another, and as it concerns all that those guilty of the more atrocious crimes should not go unpunished, the practice prevails among the more enlightened nations of mutually surrendering such fugitives to the justice of the injured state. This practice is founded on national comity and convenience, or on express compact. The United States recognize the obligation only when it is created by express agreement. They have contracted the obligation with many foreign states by treaty, and with one another by their federal constitution and laws. See EXTRADITION.

Surrender under Treaties. The treaties enumerate the crimes for which persons may be surrendered, and in some other particulars limit their own application. They also contain some provisions relating to the mode of procedure; but, as it was doubted whether such stipulations had the force of law; Park. Cr. Cas. 108; congress passed the act of August 12, 1848, entitled "An act for giving effect to certain treaty stipulations between this and foreign governments for the apprehension and delivery up of certain offenders." 9 Stat. L. 802. This has since been amended; and the statutes on the subject are found in U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5370-5380.

These acts embody those provisions contained in the treaties relating to the procedure, and contain others designed to facilitate the execution of the duty assumed by treaty.

The following are the leading provisions of the law relating to the practice: 1. A complaint made under oath or affirmation charging the person to be arrested with the commission of one of the enumerated crimes. 2. A warrant for the apprehension of the person charged may be issued by any of the justices of the supreme court or judges of the several circuit or district courts of the United States, or the judge of a court of record of general jurisdiction of any state, or the commissioners authorized so to do by any of the courts of the United States. 3. The person arrested is to be brought before the officer issuing the warrant, to the end that the evidence of criminality may be considered. 4. Copies of the depositions upon which an original warrant in the country demanding the fugitive may have been granted, certified under the hand of the person issuing such warrant, and attested upon the oath of the party producing them to be true copies of the original depositions, may be received in evidence of the criminality of the person apprehended. 5. The degree of evidence must be such as, according to the laws of the place where the person arrested shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime or offence had there been committed. 6. If the evidence is deemed sufficient, the officer hearing it must certify the same, together with a copy of all the testimony taken before him, to the secretary of state, and commit the prisoner to the proper gaol until the surrender be made, which must be within two calendar months. 7. The secretary of state, on the proper demand being made by the foreign government, orders, under his hand and seal of office, in the name and by authority of the president, the person so committed to be delivered to such person as may be authorized, in the name and on behalf of such foreign government, to receive him. 8. The demand must be made by and upon those officers who represent the sovereign power of their states. 7 Op. Attys. Gen. 6; 8 id. 521. By act of Aug. 3, 1882 it is directed that all extradition cases under treaties shall be heard publicly; U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 371.

The convenient and usual method of action is for some police officer or other special agent, after obtaining the proper papers in his own country, to repair to the foreign country, carry the case through with the aid of his minister, receive the fugitive, and conduct him back to the country having jurisdiction of the crime; 8 Op. Attys. Gen. 521.

In all the treaties the parties stipulate upon mutual requisitions, etc., to deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with crime, "shall seek an asylum or shall be found in the territories of the other." The terms of this stipulation embrace cases of absence without flight, as well as those of actual flight; 8 Op. Attys. Gen. 306. The treaties of the United States do not guarantee a fugitive an asylum in any foreign country. So far as they regulate the right of asylum at all, they limit it; 119 U. S. 700. See as to the right of asylum, 6 Law Mag. & Rev. 4th, 262. After the arrest, and until the surrender, it is the duty of the United States to provide a suitable place of confinement and safely keep the prisoner; 9 Op. Attys. Gen. 390. If, however, the prisoner escapes, he may be retaken in the same manner as any person accused of any crime against the laws in force in that part of the United States to which he shall so escape may be retaken on an escape; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5272.

It is provided in all the treaties that the expense of the apprehension and delivery shall be borne and defrayed by the party making the requisition. The substance of the various treaties is set forth under EXTRADITION.

Inter-State Rendition. In art. iv. sec. 2, of the constitution, it is provided that "A person charged in any state with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another state, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the state from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the state having jurisdiction of the crime."

The act of congress of February 12, 1793, 1 Stat. L. 303, prescribes the mode of procedure, and requires, on demand of the executive authority of a state and production of a copy of an indictment found or an affidavit made before a magistrate charging the person demanded with treason, felony, or other crime, certified as authentic by the governor or chief magistrate of the state from whence the person so charged fled, that the executive authority of the state or territory to which such person shall have fled shall cause the person charged to be arrested and secured, and notice of the arrest to be given to the executive authority making such demand, or to the agent of such authority appointed to receive the fugitive, and cause the fugitive to be delivered to such agent when he shall appear; but if such agent do not appear within six months, the prisoner shall be discharged. It further provides that if any person shall by force set at liberty or rescue the fugitive from such agent while transporting the fugitive to the state or territory from which he fled, the person so offending shall, on conviction, be fined not exceeding five hundred dollars and be imprisoned not exceeding one year, and that all costs or expenses incurred in the apprehending, securing, and transmitting such fugitive shall be paid by the state or territory making the demand. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5278-9.

In the execution of the obligation imposed by the constitution, the following points deserve attention:—

The crime, other than treason or felony, for which a person may be surrendered. Some difference of opinion has prevailed on this subject, owing to some diversity of the criminal laws of the several states; but the better opinion appears to be that the terms of the constitution extend to all acts which by the laws of the state where committed are made criminal; 6 Pa. L. J. 412; 1 Kent 42, n.; 9 Wend. 212; 13 Ga. 97; 8 Zab. 311; 24 How. 107; 56 N. Y. 187. The word "crime" embraces every species of indictable offence; 24 How. 99; including an act not criminal at the time the constitution was adopted but made so afterwards; 37 N. J. 147; 50 N. Y. 192; and an act which is criminal under the law of the state from which the accused has fled, but is not so under the law of the state into which he has fled; 24 How. 103. It has been held that the offence must be a crime; a prosecution under bastardy proceedings will not support an application for extradition; 25 Alb. L. J. 108 (Michigan).

The accusation must be in the form of an affidavit or indictment found and duly authenticated. If by affidavit, it should be sufficiently full, and explicit to justify arrest and commitment for hearing; 6 Pa. L. J. 412; 8 McLean 121; 1 Sandf. 701; 8 Zab. 811; 116 Mo. 505; 53 Wis. 699. The demand must be made by the governor of the state; 9 Gray 262.

The accused must have fled from the state in which the crime was committed; and of this the executive authority of the state upon which the demand is made should be reasonably satisfied. This is sometimes done by affidavit. The governor upon whom the demand is made acts judicially, so far as to see whether the case is a proper one; 81 Vt. 279; but he cannot look behind the indictment in which the crime is charged; 33 N. J. 145; 16 Wall. 300. The duty to surrender the fugitive is obligatory; 24 How. 103; 16 Wall. 370; 32 N. J. 145. But in the case of a conflict of jurisdiction between the two states the surrender may be postponed; 16 Wall. 366; 51 How. Pr. 422. As to executive discretion, see 18 Am. L. Rev. 181.

In the absence of direct evidence on the question of flight, if it appear from the indictment or affidavit produced that the crime charged is atrocious in its nature, was recently committed, and the prosecution promptly instituted, the unexplained presence of the accused in another state immediately after the commission of the crime ought perhaps to be regarded as prima facie evidence of flight, sufficient, at least, to warrant an order of arrest. The order of surrender is not required, by the act of congress, to be made at the same time with the order of arrest, and time, therefore, can be taken, in doubtful cases, after the accused is arrested and secured, to hear proofs to establish or rebut such prima facie evidence; 6 Am. Jur. 226; 7 Bost. Law Rep. 386. Where an officer of a bank, the business of which is under his control, goes to another state and allows the bank, while to his knowledge in an insolvent condition, to receive a deposit, in violation of the state law, he is guilty of the offence, though not in the state at the time of the deposit or afterwards, and is a fugitive from the justice of that state; 49 Fed. Rep. 833.

Under a statute providing interstate extradition, a person is a fugitive from justice when he has committed a crime within a state, and withdrawn from the jurisdiction of its courts without waiting to abide the consequences, and it matters not that some other cause than a desire to flee induced such withdrawal; 14 U. S. App. 87.

One who sets in motion the agencies for the commission of a crime, but departs from the state before the offence is consummated, is a fugitive from justice within the meaning of the statute relating to extradition; 49 Fed. Rep. 833.

In order to constitute "fleeing from justice," under R. S. sec. 1045, it is not necessary that there should be an intent to avoid the justice of the United States. It is sufficient that there is an intent to avoid the justice of the state having jurisdiction over the same territory and the same act. It is sufficient that there is a flight with the intention to avoid prosecution whether one has been begun or not; 160 U. S. 123.

The accused person may be arrested to await a demand; 49 Cal. 436; but he cannot be surrendered before a formal demand is made; 17 B. Monr. 677. But if he be so surrendered and returned to the state from which the requisition came, this is not a ground of discharge then; 16 Pa. 39.

The surrender of the accused must be made to an agent of the executive authority of the demanding state, duly appointed to receive the fugitive.

The proceedings of the executive authorities are subject to be reviewed on habeas corpus by the judicial power, and if found void the prisoner may be discharged; 8 McLean 121; 8 Zab. 311; 9 Tex. 635; 49 Cal. 434; 106 Mass. 223; 56 N. Y. 182; 49 Fed. Rep. 833. But the courts have no jurisdiction to compel the executive to comply with a requisition; 24 How. 66; 5 Cal. 237. Nor have the federal courts such jurisdiction; 24 How. 66. Nor will the court on habeas corpus try the validity of the indictment under which he is charged; 32 Tex. Cr. R. 301.

As to the trial of an offender for a different offence than that for which he was surrendered, or when his surrender was improperly obtained, see EXTRADITION. See JUSTICE, FLEEING FROM.

FUGITIVE'S GOODS. Under the old English Law, where a man fled for felony, and escaped, his own goods were not forfeited as bona fugitivorum until it was found by proceedings of record (e. g. before the coroner in the case of death) that he fled for the felony. Foxley's Case, 5 Co. 109 a. See FUGAM EXCIT; WAIFS.

FUGITIVE SLAVE. One who, held in bondage, flees from his master's power.

Prior to the adoption of the constitution of the United States, the duty of surrendering slaves fleeing beyond the jurisdiction of the state or colony where they were held to service was not regarded as a perfect obligation, though, on the ground of inter-state comity, they were frequently surrendered to the master. Instances of such surrender or permission to reclaim occur in the history of the colonies as early as 1636; Hurd, Hab. Corp. 268. As slavery disappeared in some states, the difficulty of receiving in them slaves fleeing from those where it remained was greatly increased, and on some occasions reclamations became quite impracticable. The subject engaged the attention of the convention of 1787; and, at the instance of members from slaveholding states, a provision was inserted in the constitution for the surrender of such persons escaping from the state where they owed service, into another, which provision was considered a valuable accession to the security of that species of property. 4 Elliott, Debates 485, 486; 5 id. 178, 288.

This provision is contained in art. iv. sec. 2 of the constitution, and is as follows:—

"No person held to service or labor in one state, under the laws thereof, escaping to another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

Congress, conceiving it to be the duty of the federal government to provide by law, with adequate sanctions, for the execution of the duty thus enjoined by the constitution, by the act of February 12, 1793, and again by the amendatory and supplementary act of September 18, 1850, regulated the mode of arrest, trial, and surrender of such fugitives. Some of the states have, also, at times passed acts relating to the subject; but it has been decided by the supreme court of the United States that the power of legislation in the matter was vested exclusively in congress, and that all state legislation inconsistent with the federal act was unconstitutional and void. 16 Pet. 606; 11 Ill. 332.

These acts of congress were held to be constitutional and valid in all their provisions; 10 Pet. 608; 5 S. & R. 62; 9 Johns. 67; 2 Paine 348; 7 Cush. 288; 6 McLean 335; 21 How. 400.

The 3d and 4th sections of act of 1793, 1 Stat. L. 308, authorized the arrest of a slave by the owner, his agent or attorney, and on proof before a United States judge or a magistrate, a certificate of ownership should be given, and would be a warrant for removal. Under the act of 1850, 9 Stat. L. 462, the marshals of the United States were required to arrest such slaves.

The act of 1850, and the 3d and 4th sections of the act of 1793 were repealed by the act of June 26, 1864, 13 Stat. at 363. Some decisions as to the question of the interference between the acts of 1793 and 1850, see 5 McLean 469; 13 How. 400.

In the practical application of the provisions of the acts of 1793 and 1850 for the reclamation of fugitive slaves, it was held that the owner was clothed with authority in every state of the Union to seize and recapture his slave wherever he could do so without any breach of the peace or illegal violence; 10 Pet. 608; that he might arrest him on Sunday, in the night-time, or in the house of another if no breach of the peace was committed; Baldwin, 577; that if the arrest was by agent of the owner, he must be authorized by written power of attorney executed and authenticated as required by the act; 6 McLean 299; and if his authority was demanded it should be shown; 5 McLean 681; but he was not required to exhibit it to every one who might mingle in the crowd which obstructed him; 4 McLean 408; that, if resisted by force in making the arrest, the owner might use sufficient force to overcome the unlawful resistance offered without being guilty of the offence of riot; 3 Am. Bl. J. 284; 7 Pa. L. J. 115; Baldwin, 577; that whilst the examination was pending before the magistrate who had jurisdiction of the case, the person arrested was in custody of the law, and might be imprisoned for safekeeping; 2 Paine 348; 4 Wash. C. C. 48; 6 McLean 265; that the act of Sept. 18, 1850, did not operate as a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus; 5 Op. Attys. Genl. 254; but that that writ could not be used by state officers to defeat the jurisdiction acquired by the federal authorities in such cases; 7 Cush. 283; 5 McLean 265; 1 Blatch. 638; 21 How. 400.

The provisions of the constitution and laws above cited were held to extend only to cases where persons held to service or labor in one state or territory by the laws thereof escaped into another. Hence, if the owner voluntarily took his slave into another state or territory, and the slave left him there or refused to return, he could not institute proceedings under those laws for his recovery; 4 Wash. C. C. 399; 10 Pa. 517; 10 How. 62. And children, born in a state where slavery prevailed, of a negro woman who was a fugitive slave, were not fugitive slaves or slaves who had escaped from service in another state, within the meaning of the constitution and acts of congress; 22 Ala. 7, a 165.

Since the adoption of the thirteenth amendment of the U. S. constitution, the above is entirely obsolete and possesses no more than an historical interest.

FULL. Complete; entire; detailed.

FULL AGE. The age of twenty-one, by common law, of both males and females, and of twenty-five by the civil law. Litt. § 259; 1 Bla. Com. 463; Vicat, Voo. Jur. Full age is completed on the day preceding the anniversary of birth; Salk. 44, 625; 2 Ld. Raym. 1096; 2 Kent 268; 8 Harr. Del. 637; 4 Dana 597. See FRACTION OF A DAY.

This period is arbitrary, and is fixed by statute. In the United States the common-law period has been generally adopted. In Arkansas, California, Colorado, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Maryland, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, North Dakota, Ohio, South Dakota, Vermont, and Washington, however, a woman is of full age at eighteen. 2 Kent 268. In Louisiana and Texas, the common-law rule, and not that of the civil law, prevails; 7 Tex. 503. See AGE.

FULL ANSWER. One which meets all the legal requirements.

One which is ample and sufficient. An extensive a term as though "complete" had been super-added. Burrill; Ligon, J. 22 Ala. R. 817.

FULL BLOOD. Whole blood; generally used to denote brothers and sisters who descend from the same father and mother.

FULL CONFIDENCE. Under a bequest to the wife of testator "absolutely, with full power for her to dispose of the same as she may think fit for the benefit of my family, having full confidence that she will do so," the words full confidence do not constitute a trust, but are merely an expression of the testator's wishes and belief, as distinguished from a direction amounting to an obligation; 8 Ch. D. 540.

FULL COURT. A court in banc with all the judges on the bench who are qualified to sit. It is not unusual for counsel in a case of great public importance, in the absence of one or more of the judges, to ask for a postponement of a trial or argument in order that the cause may be heard and determined by a full court and not by a mere quorum. The granting of such an application is not a matter of right, but, in a case which appears to the court to justify it, the course proposed will generally be taken. Such applications are not unusual in the United States Supreme Court, in cases involving grave constitutional questions, and in the state courts in cases involving the life of a party or some grave public question. Sometimes where a case has been decided by a majority of a quorum, but a minority of the whole number of judges, a motion for a rehearing by the full court is allowed.

Formerly in England the expression was used when other judges sat with the judge who regularly held the court. Thus the Full Court of Appeal in Chancery consisted of the Lord Chancellor and Lords Justices sitting together. The Full Court in Divorce and Matrimonial Causes consisted of the Judge Ordinary and at least two other members of the court. These arrangements are, nominally at least, superseded under the Judicature Acts.

FULL DEFENCE. See DEFENCE.

FULL FAITH AND CREDIT. A phrase used in the constitution of the United States, which provides that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state. See FOREIGN JUDGMENTS.

Acceptance of as Legal. English. Also, the records and judicial proceedings of the courts of any State shall have such faith and credit given to them, in every court within the United States, as they have by law or usage in the courts of the State from which they are taken. Anderson; Act 24 May, 1790, c. 11.

FULL FORCE. An averment in a plea, that it continued in "full force," imports only, that it had not been reversed. 5 J. J. Mar. (Ky.) 38.

FULL LIFE. Life in fact and in law.

FULL-PAID STOCK. See STOCK.

FULL POWERS. The full powers in all matters of equity which are secured to it by the provision for its establishment were intended to embrace such subjects of jurisdiction as the chancery court has possessed by immemorial usage or particular legislative enactments. 14 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed. 582; 4 How. (Miss.) 175.

All matters requiring legislation are necessarily embraced by the expression "full legislative powers." Full legislative powers mean ample, complete, perfect powers, not wanting in any essential quality; otherwise they would be limited, and not full powers. Id.; 44 Ala. 537.

FULL PROOF. In Civil Law. Proof of two witnesses, or a public instrument. Halifax, Civil Law b. 8, c. 9, nn. 25, 20; 3 Bla. Com. 370.

Evidence which satisfies the minds of the jury of the truth of the fact in dispute, to the entire exclusion of every reasonable doubt. 38 N. J. L. 450. See PLENA PROBATIO.

FULL RIGHT. The union of a good title with actual possession.

FULL SUPPLY. In a contract to furnish ice, and, in case of inability "to lay up a full supply," to be bound only to deliver such proportion "as the quantity of ice laid up to be the full supply," the words full supply had reference to the capacity of the ice-houses, and the contracting party was only bound to use reasonable and practicable means according to the usage of trade. 60 N. Y. 45, 52.

FULL WAGES. The seventh article of the Laws of Oleron provides: That if a mariner be taken sick on the voyage, he ought to be put on shore, and care should be taken of him at the expense of the ship; when the vessel is ready to sail, she is not to wait for him; but, still he is to be entitled to his full wages if he recover; and if he does not, his wife, or next of kin, is to have them; deducting only such charges as the master has been at for him. The phrase full wages means the same wages which he would have been entitled to had he lived and served out the whole voyage of the vessel. 1 Wash. C. C. 414; 2 H. Bla. 606, note.

Wages up to the end of a period of contract. Wages for a full day, week or month, or period engaged for, as the case may be. The full amount usually paid for the particular work done, as distinguished from reduced wages. English.

FULLER'S RENTS. See PRIVILEGED PLACES.

FULLUM AQUÆ. A stream, or stream of water. Blount.

FUMAGE, FUAGE, or FOUAGE. (vulgarly called smoke-far-things.) A tax paid to the sovereign for every house that had a chimney. It is probable that the hearth money, imposed by 13 & 14 Car. II., c. 10, originated thus. This hearth-money (q. v.) was declared a great oppression, and abolished by 1 W. & M., st. 1, c. 10; but a tax was afterwards laid upon all houses, except cottages, and upon all windows by 7 Wm. III., c. 18. Wharton. Also, dung for soil, or manuring of land with dung. Jacobs. See WINDOW TAX; INHABITED HOUSE DUTY.

FUNCTION. The occupation of an office; by the performance of its duties, the officer is said to fill his function. Dig. 82. 65. 1.

FUNCTIONARY. One who is in office or in some public employment.

FUNCTUS OFFICIO (Lat.). A term applied to something which once has had life and power, but which has become of no virtue whatsoever.

For example, a warrant of attorney on which a judgment has been entered is functus officio, and a second judgment cannot be entered by virtue of its authority. When arbitrators cannot agree and choose an umpire, they are said to be functi officio. Wats. Arb. 94. If a bill of exchange be sent to the drawee, and he passes it to the credit of the holder, it is functus officio, and cannot be further negotiated; 5 Pick. 85. When an agent has completed the business with which he was intrusted, his agency is functus officio.

FUND. "Merely a name for a collection or an appropriation of money. It may be nothing but a designation of one branch of the accounts of the state; or of a certain amount of money, when collected to be applied to a particular purpose. It may have no property and represent no investments; and what are called its revenues may include all the moneys appropriated or directed to be paid to it, or for its benefit, or that of the objects it represents." 34 Barb. 135. See 24 N. J. Eq. 858; 7 H. L. Cas. 273; 69 Ia. 278.

A deposit of resources; stock or capital; money invested for a specific object; revenue: as, the fund of a bank, or of a trust. Anderson. While the restricted meaning of "funds" is cash on hand, the broader meaning includes property of every kind, when such property is specially contemplated as something to be used or applied in the payment of debts. Thus, for example, as employed in a statute, may comprehend all the resources of a corporation. Anderson; 69 Iowa, 280.

FUNDAMENTAL. This word is applied to those laws which are the foundation of society. Those laws by which the exercise of power is restrained and regulated are fundamental. The constitution of the United States is the fundamental law of the land. See Wolffius, Inst. Nat. § 984.

FUNDAMUS. We found. One of the words by which a corporation may be created in England. 1 Bl. Comm. 473; 3 Steph. Comm. 173.

(Lat. from fundo, to found or establish.) We establish. One of the words used by the King of England by which he performed the creation of a corporation, in those times when his consent was necessary to the establishment of a corporation. 1 Bl. Com. 473. Other corpus words were creamus, erigimus, incorporamus. Id.

FUNDATIO (Lat.). A founding.

FUNDATOR. A founder (3. v.)

Fundator incipiens: The incipient founder of a corporation; the king or state by whom it is incorporated.

Fundator perficiens: The perficient founder, the donor or endower of the institution with funds. Burrill; 2 Kent's Com. 303.

In Old English Law. A founder; a caster or melter of metals. Id.; Fleta, lib 1, c. 20, § 132.

FUNDIPATRIMONIALES. Lands of inheritance.

FUNDI PUBLICI. Public lands.

FUNDING SYSTEM. The practice of borrowing money to defray the expenses of government.

In the early history of the system it was usual to set apart the revenue from some particular tax as a fund to the principal and interest of the loan. The earliest record of the funding system is found in the history of Venice. In the year 1171, during a war between the republic and the Byzantine emperor Manuel Comnenas, a Venetian fleet ravaged the eastern coasts, but, being detained by negotiations at Chios, suffered severely from the plague. The remnant of the expedition, returning, took with it the frightful pestilence, which ravaged Venice and produced a popular commotion in which the doge was killed. To carry on the war, the new doge, Sebastian Giani, ordered a forced loan. Every citizen was obliged to contribute one-hundredth of his property, and he was to be paid by the state five per cent. interest, the revenues being mortgaged to secure the faithful performance of the contract. To manage the business, commissioners were appointed, called the Chamber of Loans, which after the lapse of centuries grew into the Bank of Venice. Florence and other Italian republics practised the system; and it afterwards became general in Europe. Its object is to provide large sums of money for the immediate exigencies of the state, which it would be impossible to raise by direct taxation.

In England the funding system was inaugurated in the reign of William III. The Bank of England, like the Bank of Venice and the Bank of St. George at Genoa, grew out of it. In order to make it easy to procure money to carry on the war with France, the government proposed to raise a loan, for which, as usual, certain revenues were to be set aside, and the subscribers were to be made a corporation, with exclusive banking privileges. The loan was rapidly subscribed for, and the Bank of England was the corporation which it brought into existence. It was formerly the practice in England to borrow money for fixed periods; and these loans were called terminable annuities. Of late years, however, the practice is different,—loans being payable only at the option of the government; these are termed interminable annuities. The rate of interest on the earlier loans was generally fixed at three and a half per cent. and sold at such a rate below par as to conform to the state of the money-market. It is estimated that two-fifths of the entire debt of England consists of this excess over the amount of money actually received for it. The object of such a plan was to promote speculation and attract capitalists; and it is still pursued in France.

Afterwards, however, the government receded from this policy, and, by borrowing at high rates, were enabled, when the rate of interest declined, by offering to pay off the loan, to reduce the interest materially. The national debt of England consists of many different loans, all of which are included in the term funds. Of these, the largest in amount and importance are the "three per cent. consolidated annuities," or consols, as they are commonly called. They originated in 1751, when an act was passed consolidating several separate three per cent. loans into one general stock, the dividends of which are payable on the 5th of January and 5th of July at the Bank of England. The bank being the fiscal agent of the government, pays the interest on most of the funds, and also keeps the transfer-books. When stock is sold, it is transferred on the books at the bank to the new purchaser, and the interest is paid to those parties in whose names the stock is registered, at the closing of the books a short time previous to the dividend-day. Stock is bought and sold at the stock exchange generally through brokers. Time sales, when the seller is not the actual possessor of the stock, are illegal, but common. They are usually made deliverable on certain fixed days, called accounting-days; and such transactions are called "for account," to distinguish them from the ordinary sales and purchases for cash. Stock-jobbers are persons who act as middlemen between sellers and purchasers. They usually fix a price at which they will sell and buy, so that sellers and purchasers can always find a market for stock, or can purchase it in such quantities as they may desire, without delay or inconvenience.

In America the funding system has been fully developed. The general government, as well as those of all the states, have found it necessary to anticipate their revenue for the promotion of public works and other purposes. The many magnificent works of internal improvement which have added so much to the wealth of the country were mainly constructed with money borrowed by the states. The canals of New York, and many railroads in the western states, owe their existence to the system.

The funding system enables the government to raise money in exigencies, and to spread over many years the taxation which would press too severely on one. It affords a ready method of investing money on good security, and it tends to identify the interest of the state and the people. But it is open to many objections,—the principal of which is that it induces statesmen to countenance expensive and oftentimes questionable projects who would not dare to carry out their plans were they forced to provide the means from direct taxation. McCulloch, Dict. of Comm.; Sewall, Banking.

FUNDITORES. Pioneers. Jac. L. Dict.

FUNDS. Cash on hand: as, A B is in funds to pay my bill on him. Stocks: as, A B has one thousand dollars in the funds.

By public funds is understood the taxes, customs, etc., appropriated by the government for the discharge of its obligations.

In England "The Funds" are synonymous with "Government Funds," or "Public Funds;" 7 H. L. C. 280; and generally mean funded securities guaranteed by the English government; 27 L. J. Ch. 448; but do not include foreign bonds guaranteed by England; 2 Coll. 324; nor bank stock; 7 H. L. C. 278. See IN CURRENT FUNDS. See GENERAL FUND. See RESERVED FUNDS.

FUNDUS (Lat.). Land. A portion of territory belonging to a person. A farm. Lands, including houses; 4 Co. 87; Co. Litt. 5 a; 3 Bla. Com. 209.

FUNERAL. The word "funeral" means "obsequies," a rite or ceremony pertaining to a burial. 43 S. W. 469.

A "funeral" is a disposition of the deceased when the obsequies are attended by his family or friends or acquaintances, and by the conditions usually incident to a burial of the dead. 154 Ky. 461, 157 S. W. 922.

In some localities "funerals" are not infrequently attended by invitation. Some are strictly private; while others are open to the public. These are matters which address themselves to the discretion and will of those in interest—the relatives and friends of the deceased. It is usual in this and other civilized communities to have the interment accompanied with some character of religious ceremony; but, there is no law imposing upon those having in charge the burial of the dead, such duty. The customs of the country vary so much on the question of ceremonies used in the interment of the dead that if it were not violative of that provision of the Constitution guaranteeing to every man the right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, it would be utterly impracticable to prescribe a form that would be acceptable to the people generally. 149 Ky. 503, 149 S. W. 871. See FIRST-CLASS.

FUNERAL EXPENSES. Money expended in procuring the interment of a corpse.

The person who orders the funeral is responsible personally for the expenses, and if the estate of the deceased should be insolvent, he must lose the amount. But if there are assets sufficient to pay these expenses, the executor or administrator is bound, upon an implied assumpsit, to pay them; 1 Campb. 298; Holt 309; 1 Hawks 334; 13 Viner, Abr. 668. See 7 Misc. Rep. 237.

Frequent questions arise as to the amount which is to be allowed to the executor or administrator for such expenses. It is exceedingly difficult to gather any certain rule from the numerous cases which have been decided upon this subject. Courts have taken into consideration the circumstances of each case, the rank in life of the decedent, whether his estate was insolvent or not, and when the executors have acted with common prudence or in obedience to the will, their expenses have been allowed. In a case where the testator directed that his remains should be buried at a church thirty miles distant from the place of his death, the sum of sixty pounds sterling was allowed; 3 Atk. 119. In another case, under peculiar circumstances, six hundred pounds were allowed; Chanc. Prec. 29. In a case in Pennsylvania, where the intestate left a considerable estate, and no children, $258.75 was allowed, the greater part of which had been expended in erecting a tombstone over a vault in which the body was interred; 14 S. & R. 64; a sum of $127 for burial expenses is not unreasonable where deceased left an estate worth $800; 07 Hun 617. The expense of raising a monument comes under the head of funeral expenses; 76 Cal. 569; 14 Hun 206; 3 Misc. Rep. 170.

Funeral expenses usually have priority in the order of payment of debts.

A husband is liable for the funeral expenses of his wife; 1 H. Bla. 90; 12 C. B. n. s. 844; 98 Mass. 538; and the liability is imposed by law quasi ex contractu; Tiff.

PERS. & DOM. REL. 138. In some cases it is held that when he has paid them the husband is not entitled to reimbursement out of the wife's separate estate; 63 Ala. 89; 53 Conn. 436; 100 Cal. 843; contra, 53 Ch. Div. 573; 6 Madd. 90; 14 Hun 563; 44 Ohio 58. 184. where the wife's executor paid them. The rule is not affected by the fact that the wife was separated by her fault from the husband; 43 Ill. App. 39; or that she bequeathed money to another person who assisted in managing the funeral; 41 Mich. 590. See 3 Wms. Exor. 166, n.; 3 id. 275, n.; 2 Bla. Com. 508; Godolph. p. 2; 3 Atk. 249; Bacon, Abr. Executors, etc. (L 4); Viner, Abr. Funeral Expenses.

See, generally, 27 Am. St. Rep. 732; 33 N. J. Eq. 524-9; DEAD BODY.

FUNGIBLE. A term applicable to things that are consumed by the use, as wine, oil, etc., the loan of which is subject to certain rules, and governed by the contract called mutuum. See Schmidt, Civ. Law of Spain and Mexico 145; Story, Bailm.

FUNGIBLES RES. Fungible things. A term applied in the civil law to things of such a nature as that they could be replaced by equal quantities and qualities, because mutuo rice funguntur, they replace and represent each other; thus, a bushel of wheat. A particular horse would not be fungibles res. R. & L. Dict.; Sand. Just. (5th ed.) 322. Things of a kind, as distinguished from specific things. English.

FUR (Lat.). A thief. One who stole without using force, as distinguished from a robber. See FURTUM.

FUR. Skins valuable chiefly on account of the fur. Skins is a term appropriated to those valuable chiefly for the skin. The word hides is inapplicable to fur skins. 7 Cow. 202, 214.

Where a policy was on a cargo of fur, evidence was received to show that among dealers in such articles the word fur included bearskins, deerskins, etc., and that they were not included in the terms "skins" and "hides." 14 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 556; 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 202. Evidence was admitted in 7 Cowen, 202, showing that, by the usage of the trade, skins valuable chiefly on account of the fur were called fur, while skins was a term appropriated to those which were valuable chiefly for the skin, by which was understood the skin with the hair removed. 152 U. S. 585.

FUR MANIFESTUS (Lat.). In the Civil Law. A manifest thief. A thief who is taken in the very act of stealing.

FURANDI ANIMUS. An intention of stealing.

FURCA. A fork. A gallows or gibbet. Bract. fol. 56.

FURCA ET FLAGELLUM (Lat.) gallows and whip. The meanest of servile tenures, where the bondman was at the disposal of the lord for life and limb. Cowel.

FURCA ET FOSSA (Lat.) gallows and pit. A jurisdiction of punishing felons,—the men by hanging, the women by drowning. Skene; Spelman, Gloss.; Cowel.

FURIAN LAW, THE. See LEX FURIA.

FURIGELDUM. A mulct paid for theft. Jac. L. Dict.

FURIOSITY. Madness by which the judgment is prevented from being applied to the ordinary purposes of life. Bell. It is distinguished from fatuity or idiocy. Toml.

FURIOSUS (Lat.). An insane man; a madman; a lunatic.

In general, such a man can make no contract, because he has no capacity or will; Furius nullum negotium genere potest, quia non intelligit quod agit. Inst. 8. 20. 8. Indeed, he is considered so incapable of exercising a will, that the law treats him as if he were absent; Furius nulla voluntas est. Furius absentis loco est. Dig. 1, ult. 40, 134, 1. See INSANE; NON COMPOS MENTIS.

FURLINGUS (Lat.). A furlong, or a furrow one-eighth part of a mile long. Co. Litt. 5 b.

FURLONG. A measure of length, being forty poles, or one-eighth of a mile.

FURLOUGH. A permission given in the army and navy to an officer or private to absent himself for a limited time.

FURNAGE (from furnus, an oven). A sum of money paid to the lord by the tenants, who were bound by their tenure to bake at the lord's oven, for the privilege of baking elsewhere. The word is also used to signify the gain or profit taken and received for baking.

FURNISH. To supply. 248 U. S. 45. Distinguished from "invent" which means to create. Id.

FURNITURE. Personal chattels in the use of a family.

"The word relates, ordinarily, to movable personal chattels. It is very general, both in meaning and application; and its meaning changes, so as to take the color of, or be in accord with, the subject to which it is applied. Thus, we hear of the furniture of a parlor, of a bed-chamber, of a kitchen, of shops of various kinds, of a ship, of a horse, of a plantation, etc. The articles, utensils, implements, used in these various connections, as also those used in a drug or other store, as the furniture thereof, differ in kind according to the purpose which they are intended to subserve; yet being put and employed in their several places as the equipment thereof, for ornament, or to promote comfort, or to facilitate the business therein done, and being kept, or intended to be kept, for those or some one of those purposes, they pertain to such places respectively, and collectively constitute the furniture thereof; 63 Ala. 410.

"The expression household furniture must be understood to mean those vessels, utensils, or goods, which, not becoming fixtures, are designed in the manufacture originally and chiefly for use in the family, as instruments of the household and for conducting and managing household affairs. Neither of these articles would seem to hold such a place in the domestic economy. The trunk, though perhaps often made to some extent to take the place of the chest of drawers, the bureau or the wardrobe, is nevertheless in its construction designed for and adapted to the use of the traveller as such, rather than the householder. By the cabinet box we understand an article designed, in material and workmanship, rather for ornament than use, intended for keeping jewelry and other small articles of value; thus ministering to the taste of the owner rather than the necessities or convenience of the household; 33 N. H. 345. Accordingly a trunk and cabinet box were held not to be furniture."

It is held that by the term household furniture in a will, all personal chattels will pass which may contribute to the use or convenience of the householder or the ornament of the house: as, plate, linen, china (both useful and ornamental), and pictures; 1 Johns. Ch. 829, 888; 1 S. & 8. 189; 2 Will. Ex. 732; Jarm. Wills 719, n.; 8 Ves. 812; 24 Or. 2; 8 Ves. 811; 41 N. J. Eq. 98; bronzes, statuary, and pictures; 124 Mass. 221; 41 N. J. Eq. 98; but a watch will not; 83 Me. 535; nor will books; 8 Ves. 811; or furniture of a school-room in a boarding school kept by a teacher; 60 Pa. 220; or silver plate used in a hotel; 1 Rob. 21. A sewing machine and piano were held exempt from attachment as "household furniture"; 18 R. I. 20; but a doubt was expressed as to the piano, and as to that it was held contra in 30 Vt. 224; 18 Wis. 163.

FURNITURE OF A SHIP. This term includes everything with which a ship requires to be furnished or equipped to make her seaworthy; it comprehends all articles furnished by ship-chandlers, which are almost innumerable. 1 Wall. Jr. 369.

FURNIVAL'S INN. A place in Holborn which was formerly an inn of Chancery. 1 Steph. Com. 19, n. See INNS or COURT.

FURST AND FONDUNG. Time to advise or take counsel. Jac. L. Dict.

FURTA. A right or privilege derived from the king as supreme lord of a state to try, condemn, and execute thieves and felons within certain bounds or districts of an honour, manor, etc. Cowell seems to be doubtful whether this word should not read furca, which means directly a gallows. Cowel; Holthouse, L. Dict.

FURTHER ADVANCE. A second or subsequent loan of money to a mortgagee by a mortgagee, either upon the same security as the original loan was advanced upon, or an additional security. Equity considers the arrears of interest on mortgage security converted into principal, by agreement between the parties, as a further advance. Whart.

FURTHER ASSURANCE. See COVENANT FOR FURTHER ASSURANCE.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION. It frequently happens that a decree in Chancery directs accounts and inquiries to be taken before the chief clerk. The hearing of any question arising out of such inquiries is called a hearing on further consideration. Hunt. Eq. Rules Sup. Ct. xl. 10.

FURTHER DIRECTIONS. When accounts in Chancery were taken before Masters, a hearing after a master had made his report in pursuance of the directions of the decree was called a hearing on further directions. This stage of suit is now called a hearing on further consideration. Hunt. Eq. See 2 Dan. Ch. Pr., 6th ed. 1233, n.

FURTHER HEARING. In Practice. Hearing at another time.

Prisoners are frequently committed for further hearing, either when there is not sufficient evidence for a final commitment, or because the magistrate has not time, at the moment, to hear the whole of the evidence. The magistrate is required by law, and by every principle of humanity, to hear the prisoner as soon as possible after a commitment for further hearing; and if he neglects to do so within a reasonable time, he becomes a trespasser; 10 B. & C. 28; 5 M. & R. 53. Fifteen days was held an unreasonable time, unless under special circumstances; 4 C. & P. 134; 6 S. & R. 427.

In Massachusetts, magistrates may, by statute, adjourn the case for ten days; Gen. Stat. c. 170, § 17. It is the practice in England to commit for three days, and then from three days to three days; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 74.

FURTHER MAINTENANCE OF ACTION, PLEA TO. A plea grounded upon some fact or facts which have arisen since the commencement of the suit, and which the defendant puts forward for the purpose of showing that the plaintiff should not further maintain his action. Brown.

FURTI, ACTIO. See RES ADIBATAE.

FURTIVE. In Old English Law. Stealthily; by stealth. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 88, 8.

FURTUM (Lat.). Theft. The fraudulent appropriation to one's self of the property of another, with an intention to commit theft, without the consent of the owner. Fleta, l. 1, c. 36; Bract. 150; Co. 3d Inst. 107.

The thing which has been stolen. Bract. 151.

FURTUM CONCEPTUM (Lat.). The theft which was disclosed when, upon searching any one in the presence of witnesses in due form, the thing stolen is found. Detected theft is, perhaps, the nearest concise translation of the phrase, though not quite exact. Vicat, Voc. Jur.

FURTUM GRAVE (Lat.). Aggravated theft. Formerly, there were three classes of this theft: first, by landed men; second, by a trustee or one holding property under a trust; third, theft of the majora animalia (larger animals), including children. Bell, Dict.

FURTUM MANIFESTUM (Lat.). Open theft. Theft where a thief is caught with the property in his possession. Bract. 150 b.

FURTUM OBLATUM (Lat.). The theft committed when stolen property is offered any one and found upon him. The crime of receiving stolen property. Calvinus, Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

FUSTIGATIO. In English Law. A beating with sticks or club; one of the ancient kinds of punishment of malefactors. Bract. fol. 104 b, lib. 3, tr. 1, c. 6.

FUSTIS. In Old English Law. A staff used in making livery of seisin. Bract. fol. 40.

FUTHWITE, or FITHWITE. A fine for fighting or breaking the peace. Cowel; Cun. L. Dict.

FUTURE ACQUIRED PROPERTY. Mortgages, especially of railroad companies, are frequently made in terms to cover after acquired property; such as rolling stock, etc. Such mortgages are valid; 64 Pa. 366; 32 N. H. 484; 95 U. S. 10; L. R. 16 Eq. 383. This may include future net earnings; 15 Ia. 284; the proceeds to be received from the sale of surplus lands; L. R. 2 Ch. 201; a ditch or flume in process of construction, which was held to cover all improvements and fixtures thereafter to be put on the line thereof; 26 Cal. 620; rolling stock, etc.; 64 Pa. 366; 49 Barb. 441. Future calls of assessments on stock cannot be mortgaged; L. R. 10 Eq. 681; but it has been held that calls already made could be; id.

By statutes in most of the states a will speaks as of the death of the testator and ordinarily passes property acquired after its date. See EXPECTANCY; MORTGAGE.

FUTURE ADVANCES. See MORTGAGE.

FUTURE DEBT. In Scotch Law. A debt which is created, but which will not become due till a future day. 1 Bell, Com. 315.

FUTURE ESTATE. An estate which is to commence in possession in the future

(in futuro). It includes remainders, reversions, and estates limited to commence in futuro without a particular estate to support them, which last are not good at common law except in the case of terms for years. See 2 Bla. Com. 165. In New York law it has been defined "an estate limited to commence in possession at a future day, either without the intervention of a precedent estate, or on the determination by lapse of time, or otherwise, of a precedent estate created at the same time," thus excluding reversions, which cannot be said to be created at the same time, because they are a remnant of the original estate remaining in the grantor; 11 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 3d ed. 9, § 10. See, also, How. St. Mich. § 5526; Gen. St. Minn. 1878, c. 45, § 10; 89 Mich. 428; 53 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 920.

FUTURE INCREASE. The devise of a slave and her "future increase" cannot of itself, embrace increase which has accrued prior to the date of the will. 7 J. M. Mar. (Ky.) 412.

FUTURE SUFFERING. "Future suffering" and permanent impairment of earning power are not synonymous terms. The plaintiff at the date of the trial may be in such condition that future suffering is reasonably to be expected, although his injuries may not be such as to permanently impair his power to earn money. 163 Ky. 167, 173 S. W. 757.

FUTURE USES. See CONTINGENT USES.

FUTURES. This term has grown out of those purely speculative transactions, in which there is a nominal contract of sale for future delivery, but where in fact none is ever intended or executed. The nominal seller does not have or expect to have the stock or merchandise he purports to sell, nor does the nominal buyer expect to receive it or pay the price. Instead of that, a percentage or "margin" is paid, which is increased or diminished as the market rates go up or down and accounted for to the buyer. This is simple speculation and gambling; mere wagering on prices within a given time. 14 R. I. 138.

Anything bought or sold upon a contract of future delivery. English. The expression "dealing in futures" has grown out of those purely speculative transactions in which there is a nominal contract of sale for future delivery, but where in fact none is ever intended or executed.

The nominal seller does not have or expect to have the stock or merchandise he purports to sell, nor does the nominal buyer expect to receive it or to pay the price. Instead, a percentage or "margin" is paid, which is increased or diminished as the market rates go up or down, and accounted for to the buyer. This is simply speculation and gambling; mere wagering on prices within a given time. Anderson; 14 R. I. 138. See SPECULATION; WAGER.

FUTURI (Lat.). Those who are to be. Part of the commencement of old deeds. "Sciant presentes et futuri, quod ego, talis, dedi et concessi," etc. (Let all men now living and to come know that I, A B, have, etc.). Bract. 34 b.

FUZ, or FUST. A Celtic word, meaning a wood or forest.

FYGTWITE. One of the fines incurred for homicide. See FIGHTWITE.

FYKE. A bow-net for catching fish. Pub. St. Mass. 1832, p. 129.

FYLE. In Scotch Law. To defile; to declare foul or defiled. Hence to find a prisoner guilty.

FYLIT. In Scotch Practice. Fyled; found guilty. See FYLE.

FYNDRINGA (Sax.). An offence or trespass for which the fine or compensation was reserved to the king's pleasure. Leges Hen. I. c. 10. Its nature is not known. Spelman reads fynderinga, and interprets it treasure trove; but Cowel reads fyrtieringa, and interprets it a joining of the king's fird or host, a neglect to do which was punished by a fine called firdnite. See Cowel; Spelman, Gloss. Du Cange agrees with Cowel.

FYRD, or FYRDUNG. The military array or land force of the whole country. Contribution to the fyrd was one of the imposts forming the trinoda necessitas. Whart.

FYRDWITE. A fine for neglect of military duty. If the lord did not respond to the king's call for the quota of milites which he was required to send, he must pay the fine for each man short. The man was bound to the lord, not to the king. Maitl. Domesd. 159, 161. See FYRTWITE.

FYRTWITE, or FRIDWITE. A mulct paid by one who deserted the army. Cowel; Cun. L. Dict. Doubtless these words and Fyrdwite (q. v.) were different forms of the same thing.

G The seventh letter of the alphabet. In Law French it is often used at the beginning of words for the English W, as in gage for wage, garranty for warranty, gast for waist.

GABEL (Lat. vectigal). A tax, imposition, or duty. This word is said to have the same signification that gabelle formerly had in France. Cunningham, Dict. But this seems to be an error; for gabelle signified in that country, previous to its revolution, a duty upon salt. Merlin, Rép. Coke says that gabai or gavel, gabum, gabellum, gabellum, gabellatum, and gabellatum, signify a rent, duty, or service yielded or done to the king or any other lord. Co. Litt. 148 a. See GAVEL.

GABELLA. A tax or duty on personalty. Cowel; Spel. Gloss. See GABEL.

GABLATOIRES. Those who paid gabai (q. v.). Cowel.

GABULUM (spelled, also, gabulum or gabula). The gable-end of a building. Kennet, Paroch. Antiq. p. 201; Cowel. A tax. Du Cange.

GABULUS DENARIORUM. Money rent. Seld. Tit. 331.

GADSDEN PURCHASE. A purchase of land from Mexico for ten million dollars, made by the United States through the Gadsden Treaty, 1853-54. Acquired its name from the man who effected the treaty, James Gadsden, who was at that time ambassador to Mexico. 5 Vol. Holst. Const. Hist. U. S. p. 6-9.

The land purchased lies mainly within what is now Arizona and New Mexico Stand. Dict.

GADSDEN TREATY. See GADSDEN PURCHASE.

GAFOL (spelled, also, gabella, gavel), Rent; tax; interest of money.

Gafol gild. Payment of such rent, etc. Gafol land was land liable to tribute or tax; Cowel; or land rented; Saxton Dict. See Taylor, Hist. of Gavelkind pp. 26, 1021; Anc. Laws & Inst. of Eng. Gloss.; Maitl. Domest. 44.

GAGE, GAGER (Law Lat. vadium). Personal property placed by a debtor in possession of his creditor as a security for the payment of his debt; a pawn or pledge (q. v.). Granv. lib. 10, c. 6; Britton c. 27. To pledge; to wage. Webster, Dict.

Gager is used both as noun and verb: e. g. gager del ley, wager of law; Jacobs; gager ley, to wage law; Britton c. 27; gager de lieverance, to put in sureties to deliver cattle distrained; Termes de la Ley; Kitchen fol. 145; Fitch. N. B. fol. 67, 74.

Estates in gage are those held in vadio or pledge; vivum vadium is a viage or living pledge; a mortgage is mortuum vadium, a dead-gage or pledge; for, whatsoever profit it yields, it redeems not itself, unless the whole amount secured is paid at the appointed time. Cowel.

GAGER DE DELIVERANCE. One who had distrained and was sued, but had delivered the cattle distrained, was obliged not only to avow the distress but also to furnish pledge or surety to deliver them, or, as it was called, gager deliverance, literally, to deposit or undertake for the discharge. See Fitch. N. B. 67; Kelham, Dict.

GAGER DEL LEY. Wager of law (q. v.).

GAGGING ACTS. See SIX ACTS, Tnx.

GAINAGE. Wainage, or the draught-oxen, horses, wain, plough, and furniture for carrying on the work of tillage. Also, the land tilled itself, or the profit arising from it. Old. N. B. fol. 117.

GAINER. To obtain by husbandry. Gainure. Tillage. Guinery. Tillage or the profit therefrom or from the beasts used in it. Gainé, gaignent (que), who plough or till. Kelham; Stat. Westm. 1. cc. 18, 17.

GAINERY. Tillage, or the profit arising from it, or the beasts employed therein. Jacob. See GAINAGE; GAINER.

GAINOR. One who occupies or cultivates arable land; a sokeman (q. v.). Old N. B. 12.

GAJUM. A thick wood. Spel. Gloss.

GALE. The payment of a rent or annuity. GABEL.

A contraction of gavel (q. v.). The right to open and work a mine within the Hundred of St. Briavel's, or a stone quarry within the open lands of the Forest of Dean, a right granted only to the free miners (q. v.) of the district who in turn may sell, devise or dispose of this right to any persons whomsoever. The right is a license or interest in the nature of real estate, conditional on the due payment of rent and observance of the obligations imposed on the galee. The galee pays the Crown a rent known as a galeage rent, royalty or some similar name, proportionate to the quantity of minerals got from the mine or quarry. Byrne. See GAVELLER.

GALEA, GALEE, GALOIE, or GALETS. A galley, galleys. Spel. Gloss.; Kelham.

GALEAGE RENT. See GALE; GAVELLER.

GALEE. A person holding a gale. Byrne. See GALE; GAVELLER.

GALENES. In Old Scotch Law. A kind of compensation for slaughter. Bell, Dict.

GALLON. A liquid measure, containing two hundred and thirty-one cubic inches, or four quarts. The imperial gallon contains about 277 and the ale gallon 282 cubic inches.

GALLOWES. An erection on which to hang criminals condemned to death. In the thirteenth century there was in certain cases power given to him who caught a thief with stolen goods upon him, to hang him, and it is said that "the manorial gallowes was a common object of the country." 1 Poll. & Maitl. 564. See INFANGENTHEF; UTFANGENTHEF.

GAMACTA. A stroke or blow. Spel. Gloss.

GAMALIS. A child born in lawful wedlock; also one born to betrothed but unmarried parents. Spel. Gloss.

GAMBLE. To engage in unlawful play. To play games for stakes or bet in them. It is the most apt word in the language to express these ideas; 2 Yerg. 472; a gambler is one who follows or practices games of chance or skill with the expectation and purpose of thereby winning money or other property. Per Ames, J., 118 Mass. 198. A common gambler is one who furnishes facilities for gambling, or keeps or exhibits a gambling table, establishment, device, or apparatus. 1 Dak. 291, citing cases. A gambling policy is a life-insurance policy taken out by one who has no insurable interest in the life of the assured. See IN-

SURABLE INTEREST. A gambling device is any contrivance or apparatus by which it is determined who is the winner or loser in a chance or contest on which money or value is staked or risked. See 2 Whart. Cr. L. § 1485; 27 Ark. 362; 49 Minn. 448; 1 Kan. 474; 46 Mo. 375; 1 Cra. C. C. 585; 17 Tex. 191; GAMING; WAGER.

GAMBLING. Synonymous, in a criminal sense, with gaming (q. v.). 14 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed. 666.

GAMBLING CONTRACTS. See WAGER.

GAMBLING DEVICE. An invention or contrivance to determine the question as to who wins or who loses his money on a contest of chance. 53 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 42.

GAMBLING HOUSE. See COMMON GAMBLING HOUSE.

GAME. Birds and beasts of a wild nature, obtained by fowling and hunting. Bacon. Abr. See 11 Metc. 79.

As applied to animals it is to be understood in its ordinary sense, in the absence of statutory definition; 15 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 458.

GAME LAWS. Laws regulating the killing or taking of birds, and beasts, as game. The English game laws are founded on the idea of restricting the right of taking game to certain privileged classes, generally landholders, and are said to be directly descended from the old forest laws. The doctrine as laid down by Blackstone that the sole right of hunting and killing game was at common law vested in the crown has been controverted by Prof. Christian who clearly demonstrated that the owner of the soil, or the lessee or occupier, if no reservation was made in the lease, possessed the exclusive right to such game restriction. In 1831 the English law was so modified as to enable any one to obtain a certificate or license to kill game, on payment of a fee. An account of present game laws of England will be found in Appleton's New Am. Cyc. vol. viii.; Eng. Cyc., Arts. & Sc. Div. and Int. Cyc. A. t.

The laws relating to game in the United States are generally, if not universally, framed with reference to protecting the animals from indiscriminate and unreasonable havoc, leaving all persons free to take game under certain restrictions as to the season of the year and the means of capture. The details of these regulations must be sought in the statutes of the several states.

As the most effective means of enforcing such statutes, most of them prohibit all persons, including licensed dealers, under penalty, from buying or selling or even having in possession or control any game purchased within a certain period after the commencement of the close season. The enforcement of these penalties has been fruitful of much litigation.

A statute forbidding any one to kill, sell, or have in possession woodcock, etc., between specified days has been held not to apply to such lawfully taken in another state; 128 Mass. 410; 51 Ohio St. 209 (followed in 59 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 1099); 139 Pa. 296; contra as to game unlawfully taken in another state; 35 Am. Rep. 390, note; 19 Kan. 127; L. R. 2 C. F. Div. 653; 71 Mich. 325; it has been held not to be an offence to expose live birds for sale under a statute prohibiting the killing or having possession of certain birds after the same are killed; 184 N. Y. 398, reversing 12 N. Y. St. 24; and the mere possession of game during the closed season does not constitute an offence if it were killed during the open season; 88 Me. 385; but a statute which forbids the sale or having in possession for the purpose of sale, of such game during the close season, is constitutional and a valid exercise of the police power, even if it were killed out of the state; 68 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 227; 103 Cal. 476; 88 Minn. 893; 51 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 306; 51 Ohio St. 209; or killed within the lawful time; 60 N. Y. 10; 85 U. S. 465. The police power residing in the state authorizes it to forbid the killing of game within the state with the intention of procuring its transportation beyond the state limits, and such a prohibition is constitutional; 61 Conn. 144; s. c. 161 U. S. 516, Field & Harlan, JJ., dissenting; nor is such prohibition in violation of the interstate commerce clause of the constitution; 56 Ark. 287; but such an act is unconstitutional when applied to imported game sold in the original packages; 103 Cal. 476. See also as to the keeping of game in cold storage; 7 Mo. App. 524; and the catching of trout artificially propagated; 160 Mass. 157.

See, generally, Austin, Farm and Game Law; 28 Weekly Law Bul. 325; 80 Law Mag. & Rev. 177; 7 Crim. L. Mag. 227; and as to validity, 81 Cent. L. J. 273.

GAMING. A contract between two or more persons by which they agree to play by certain rules at cards, dice, or other contrivance, and that one shall be the loser and the other the winner. Gaming is not an offence eo nomine; 25 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 423.

When considered in itself, and without regard to the end proposed by the players, there is nothing in it contrary to natural equity, and the contract will be considered as a reciprocal gift, which the parties make of the thing played for, under certain conditions.

There are some games which depend altogether upon skill, others which depend upon chance, and others which are of a mixed nature. Billiards is an example of the first; lottery, of the second; and backgammon, of the last. See 8 Ired. 271. The decisions as to what constitutes gaming have not been altogether uniform; but under the statutes making it a penal offence, it may be defined as a staking on chance where chance is the controlling factor; that betting on a horse race is so, see 18 Me. 887; 23 Ill. 493; 8 Blackf. 332; 9 Ind. 35; 4 Mo. 536; 51 Ill. 478; contra, 28 Ark. 726; 81 Mo. 85; 8 Gratt. 593; that a billiard table is a gaming table; 28 How. Pr. 247; 39 Iowa 42; contra, 15 Ind. 474; 34 Miss. 606. Baseball is a game of skill within the criminal offence to bet on such a game; 58 Ark. 79. The following are additional examples of illegal gaming: cock fighting and betting thereon; 8 Meto. 323; 1 Hump. 496; the game of "equality"; 1 Cra. 635; a "gift enterprise"; 5 Sneed 507; 3 Heisk. 488; "keno"; 48 Ala. 123; 7 La. An. 651; "loto"; 1 Mo. 723; betting on "pool"; 89 Mo. 420; a ten-pin alley; 29 Ala. 33; contra, 16 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 169. See 32 N. J. L. 138; stock-clock; 49 Minn. 443; crap; 88 Tex. Cr. R. 187; throwing dice or playing any game of hazard, to determine who shall pay for liquor or other article bought; 14 Gray 26, 380; or throwing dice for money; 91 Ga. 153; one who keeps tables on which "poker" is played, but is not directly interested in the game, is not guilty of gaming under the Virginia code; 32 Gratt. 694; merely betting at "faro" is not carrying on the game; 58 Cal. 246; the law against any game cannot be evaded by changing the name of the game; 17 Tex. 191; athletic contests, when not conducted brutally, even when played for a stake, have been held lawful; 3 Whar. Cr. L. § 1463; betting upon a foot race is gaming within the meaning of a statute; 149 Mass. 124; pin pool has been held not to be a gambling game; 43 La. Ann. 1078.

In general, at common law, all games are lawful, unless some fraud has been practised or such games are contrary to public policy. Each of the parties to the contract must have a right to the money or thing played for. He must have given his full and free consent, and not have been entrapped by fraud. There must be equality in the play. The play must be conducted fairly. But, even when all these rules have been observed, the courts will not countenance gaming by giving too easy a remedy for the recovery of money won at play; Bacon, Abr. It has been held that money lost at a game of "five-up" may be recovered; 13 So. Rep. (Miss.) 838. See also 48 Mo. App. 48; 16 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 90.

But when fraud has been practised, as in all other cases, the contract is void; and in some cases, when the party has been guilty of cheating, by playing with false dice, cards, and the like, he may be indicted at common law, and fined and imprisoned according to the heinousness of the offence; 1 Russ. Cr. 406.

Statutes have been passed in perhaps all the states forbidding gaming for money at certain games, and prohibiting the recovery of money lost at such games; and a court of equity will not lend its aid in a gambling transaction either to the winner to compel payment of his unpaid accounts or to the loser who has paid his losses to enable him to recover them back, whether the loser pays his losses in cash or in negotiable securities; 178 Pa. 525.

Statutes which forbid or regulate places of amusement that may be resorted to for the purpose of gaming or which forbid altogether the keeping of instruments made use of for unlawful games, are within the police power of the legislature, and therefore constitutional; Cooley, Const. Lim. 749. See 8 Gray 488; 29 Me. 457; 38 N. H. 420.

The uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice is sufficient to warrant a conviction of gaming; 89 Ga. 303.

See, generally, Oliphant, Gaming (58 L. L.); 4 Pothier 549-63; 5 Crim. L. Mag. 529; 642. 567; 18 Myer's Fed. Dec. 615; 4 Lawson, Crim. Def. 386, 732; GAMING HOUSES; WAGER; HORSE RACE; PRIZE FIGHT.

GAMING CONTRACTS. See WAGER.

GAMING HOUSES. In Criminal Law. Houses kept for the purpose of permitting persons to gamble for money or other valuable thing. They are nuisances in the eyes of the law, being detrimental to the public, as they promote cheating and other corrupt practices; 1 Russ. Cr. 299; Roec. Cr. Ev. 643; 3 Den. 101. See 63 N. J. L. 664; 85 Me. 237; 58 Mo. App. 371. In an indictment under a statute prohibiting gaming houses, the special facts making such a house a nuisance must be averred; Whar. Cr. Law § 1460; Whar. Cr. Pl. and Pr. §§ 154, 230; 5 Cra. 378. The proprietor of a gaming establishment cannot take advantage of a statute enabling a person losing money at a game of chance to recover it back; 14 Push 588.

They are sometimes prosecuted as disorderly houses (q. v.).

GAMANCIAL. In Spanish Law. Property held in community.

The property of which it is formed belongs in common to the two consorts, and, on the dissolution of the marriage, is divisible between them in equal shares. It is confined to their future acquisitions durante el matrimonio, and the frutos or rents and profits of the other property. See 1 Burge, Conf. Laws 418; Aso & M. Inst. b. 1, t. 7, c. 5, § 1.

All that which is increased or multiplied during marriage. By multiplied is understood all that is increased by onerous cause or title, and not that which is acquired by a lucrative one; 23 Mo. 254. See 18 Tex. 634; COMMUNITY.

GAMANCIAL PROPERTY. See GAMANCIAL.

GAMANCIAS. In Spanish Law. Gains or profits from the employment of gamancial property. White, N. Rec. b. 1, tit. 7, c. 5.

GANG-WEEK. In England, the time when the bounds of the parish are lustrated or gone over by the parish officers—Rogation week. Lond. Encyc.

GANGIATORI. Officers in ancient times whose duty it was to examine weights and measures. Skene.

GANTELOPE. A military punishment, in which the criminal running between the ranks receives a lash from each man. Lond. Encyc. This was called "running the gauntlet," the word itself being pronounced "gauntlett."

GAOL. (This word, sometimes written jail, is said to be derived from the Spanish jaula, a cage (derived from caula), in French gôle, gaol. 1 M. & G. 222, note a.) A place for the confinement of persons arrested for debt or for crime and held in the custody of the sheriff. Webster. Dict.

A prison or building designated by law or used by the sheriff for the confinement or detention of those whose persons are judicially ordered to be kept in custody. See 6 Johns. 23; 14 Vin. Abr. 9; Bacon, Abr.; Dane, Abr. Index; 4 Com. Dig. 619. It may be used also for the confinement of witnesses; and, in general, now there is no distinction between a jail and a prison, except that the latter belongs to a greater extent of country; thus, we say a state's prison or penitentiary and a county jail. Originally, a jail seems to have been a place where persons were confined to await further proceedings—e. g. debtors till they paid their debts, witnesses and accused persons till a certain trial came on, etc.—as opposed to prison, which was for confinement, as punishment. See 2 Poll. & Matil. 514, 518. A gaol is an inhabited dwelling-house, and a house within the statutes against arson; 2 W. Bla. 682; 1 Leach, 4th ed. 69; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 1020; 2 Cox, Cr. Cas. 65; 18 Johns. 115; 4 Call. 109; 4 Leigh. 683. See PENITENTIARY; PRISON; JAIL.

GAOL-DELIVERY. In English Law. To insure the trial, within a certain time, of all prisoners, a patent, in the nature of a letter, was issued from the king to certain persons, appointing them his justices and authorizing them to deliver his gaols. 3 Bla. Com. 60; 4 id. 269. This was the humblest of the temporary judicial commissions so frequent in the fourteenth century; 1 Poll. & Matil. 179; but so few men were kept in prison, that the work was regarded as easy work which might be entrusted to knights of the shire; 2 id. 643. See GENERAL GAOL DELIVERY; OYER AND TERMINER.

GAOL LIBERTIES, GAOL LIMITS. A space marked out by limits, which is considered as a part of the prison, and within which prisoners are allowed to go at large on giving security to return. Owing to the rigor of the law which allowed capias, or attachment of the person, as the first process against a debtor, statutes were from time to time passed enlarging the gaol liberties, in order to mitigate the hardships of imprisonment; thus, the whole city of Boston was held the "gaol liberties" of its county gaol. And so with a large part of New York city. Act of March 13, 1830. The prisoner, while within the limits, is considered as within the walls of the prison; 6 Johns. 121.

GAOLER. The keeper of a gaol or prison; one who has the legal custody of the place where prisoners are kept.

It is his duty to keep the prisoners in safe custody, and for this purpose he may use all necessary force; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 601; and a prisoner who assaults him in endeavoring to break gaol may be lawfully killed by him; 1 Russ. Cr. Sharw. ed. 860, 895. But any oppression of a prisoner, under a pretended necessity, will be punished; for the prisoner, whether he be a debtor or a criminal, is entitled to the protection of the laws from oppression. He was indictable if by oppression he induced a prisoner to accuse another; 4 Bla. Com. 123; but this statute was repealed by 4 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 1, 4d. note. He is also indictable for suffering an escape (q. v.), or for extortion; 1 Russ. Cr. Sharw. ed. 203.

When a county court delivers persons convicted by it of murder to a gaoler for safe-keeping till brought back for execution, the governor has no authority to countermand a subsequent order of that court requiring the gaoler to deliver them up, nor will the fact that a writ of error and supersedeas had been awarded each of the prisoners by the supreme court justify the gaoler in refusing to deliver up the prisoners on the order of the court that committed them; but the fact that a court having jurisdiction has granted the prisoners a writ of habeas corpus will justify such a refusal; 23 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 896.

GARAGE. A public or private place for the care and storage of motor vehicles; or a place in which such vehicles are kept for hire. Berry, Automobiles (4th ed.) § 1365.

GARANDA, or GARANTIA. A warranty. Spel. Gloss.

GARANTIE. In French law, this word corresponds to warranty or covenant for title in English law. In the case of a sale this garantie includes two things: (1) Peaceful possession of the thing sold; and (2) absence of undisclosed defects (défauts cachés) Brown.

GARATHINK. In old Lombardic law. A gift; a free or absolute gift; a gift of the whole of a thing. Spel. Gloss.

GARAUNTOR. In Old English Law. A warrantor or vouchee, who is obliged by his warranty (garantie) to warrant (garaunder) the title of the warrantee (garante), that is, to defend him in his seisin, and if he do not defend, and the tenant be ousted, to give him land of equal value. Britt. c. 75.

GARB, or GARBA. A bundle or sheaf of corn; bundle. Fleta 1, 2, c. xii.

GARBALLO DECIME, or GARBALLES DECIME (L. Lat.; from garba, a sheaf). In Scotch Law. Tithes of corn: such as wheat, barley, oats, pease, etc. Also called parsonage tithes (decime rectorie). Erskine, Inst. b. 11, tit. 10, § 18.

GARBLE. In English statutes, to sort or cull out the good from the bad in spices, drugs, etc. Cowel.

A garbler of spices was anciently in London an officer to inspect drugs and spices, with power to enter and search any shop or warehouse and garble and clean the goods or direct it to be done. Stat. 6 Anne, c. 16; Mozl. & Whit.

GARBONES, GARCEONES. Servants who follow a camp. Journeymen. Kelham, Wals. 242.

GARBIO STOLÆ (O. Fr. Garceons, servant). Groom of the stole. Pl. Cor. §1 Edw. I.

GARDE, or GARDIA (Garder, to watch). Wardship; custody; care. The judgment. The wardship of a city. Kelham.

GARDEIN. A constable; a keeper; a guardian. Kelham.

GARDEN. A piece of ground appropriated to raising plants and flowers.

A garden is a parcel of a house, and passes with it; 2 Co. 82; Plowd. 171; Co. Litt. 5 b, 56 a, b; Wood, Landl. and Tenn. 809. See F. Moore 24; Bac. Abr. Grants, I. See CUTLAGE.

GARDEYN. Another form of GARDEIN (q. v.). Also, a garden. Burrill. See GARDIEN; GARDIAN.

GARDEYNE. Another form of GARDIAN (q. v.). Burrill.

GARDIA or GUARDIA. A word used among the feudists for custodia, or custody. Cunningham. See GARD.

GARDIAN, or GARDEYNE. Old forms of GUARDIAN (q. v.). Burrill. See also GARDIEN; GARDEYN; GARDIEN.

GARDIANUS. A guardian; defender; protector.

A warden. Gardianus ecclesiæ, a churchwarden. Gardianus quinque portuum, warden of the Cinque Ports (q. v.). In feudal law, gardio. Spelman, Gloss.

GARDIEN. Warden. Burrill. See GARDEIN; GARDEYN; GARDIAN.

GARDINUM. In Old English Law. A garden. Reg. Orig. 1, b. 2.

GARENE (L. Fr.). A warren; a privileged place for keeping animals.

GARLANDA. A chaplet, coronet, or garland.

GARNESTURA. In Old English Law. Victuals, arms, and other implements of war, necessary for the defence of a town. Mat. Par. 1250. See GARNISTURA.

GARNISH. In English Law. Money paid by a prisoner to his fellow-prisoners on his entrance into prison.

To warn. To garnish the heir is to warn the heir. Obsolete.

GARNISHEE. In Practice. A person who has money or property in his possession belonging to a defendant, which money or property has been attached in his hands, with notice to him of such attachment; he is so called because he has had warning or notice of the attachment.

From the time of the notice of the attachment, the garnishee is bound to keep the money or property in his hands, to answer the plaintiff's claim, until the attachment is dissolved or he is otherwise discharged. See Serg. Att. 88; Wade, Att. 831; Drake, Att.; Comyns, Dig. Attachment, E.

Ordinarily all persons or corporations who may be sued, may also be summoned as garnishees; but a municipal corporation cannot be; 92 Ga. 261; 95 id. 747; 95 Tenn. 492; 11 Utah 209; 16 So. Rep. (Ala.) 713; 88 Ill. App. 27; 43 Kan. 294; 11 Mo. 60; nor can a receiver; 11 Ga. 13; 23 Texas 508; 115 Mass. 67; 114 Ill. 287; or trustee appointed by the court; 13 Md. 124; 106 Pa. 418; 44 N. H. 197; and the garnishment of an agent is insufficient as a garnishment of the principal; 63 Mo. App. 50; but an attorney may be summoned as garnishee of his client in some cases; 8 Ala. 312; 99 Mass. 187; 77 Me. 105; 20 La. Ann. 188; 63 N. H. 166.

Any rights of the garnishee under existing contracts with the principal debtor, he is entitled to have the benefit of, as against the attaching creditor; 152 U. S. 566. No judgment can be rendered against a garnishee unless one is obtained against the principal defendant; 46 Ill. App. 458. It is competent for garnishees to represent in their own defence the rights of a third party to whom they are in law liable; 121 U. S. 490. A garnishee has the right to set up any defence against attachment process which he could have done against the debtor in the principal action; 120 U. S. 506.

There are garnishees also in the action of detinue. They are persons against whom process is awarded, at the prayer of the defendant, to warn them to come in and interplead with the plaintiff; Brooke, Abr. Detinue. See ATTACHMENT.

GARNISHMENT. A warning to any one for his appearance, in a cause in which he is not a party, for the information of the court and explaining a cause. Cowel.

Now generally used of the process of attaching money or goods due a defendant in the hands of a third party. The person in whose hands such effects are attached is the garnishee, because he is garnished, or warned, not to deliver them to the defendant, but to answer the plaintiff's suit. The use of the term "garnishee" as a verb is a prevalent corruption in this country.

It is attachment in the hands of a third person, and so is a species of seizure by notice; 41 Kan. 297, 586.

For example, in the practice of Pennsylvania, when a writ of attachment issues against a debtor, in order to secure to the plaintiff a claim due by a third person to such debtor, it is served on such third person, which notice or service is a garnishment, and he is called the garnishee.

In detinue, the defendant cannot have a sc. fa. to garnish a third person unless he confess the possession of the chattel or thing demanded; Brooke, Abr. And when the garnishee comes in, he cannot vary or depart from the allegation of the defendant in his prayer of garnishment. The plaintiff does not declare de novo against the garnishee; but the garnishee, if he appears in due time, may have over of the original declaration to which he pleads.

Where plaintiff in execution paid to the sheriff $1,000 as the value of the debtor's homestead interest, and the land was sold under execution, the money in the sheriff's hands was subject to garnishment at the instance of the other judgment creditors; 60 Ill. App. 65; money taken from a person without his consent by a sheriff acting as trespasser in so doing, and delivered by him to a third person claiming title thereto, is not subject of garnishment in the hands of the sheriff or to the third parties as the property of the person from whom it was taken; 40 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 223.

See Brooke, Abr.; Drake; Wade; Shinn, Attachment; ATTACHMENT.

GARNISTURA. In Old English Law. Garniture; whatever is necessary for the fortification of a city or camp, or for the ornament of a thing. 8 Kymer 828; Du Cange; Cowel; Blount. See GARNESTURA.

GARROTE. A mode of capital punishment practised in Spain and Portugal formerly by a simple strangulation. The victim, usually in a sitting posture, is fastened by an iron collar to an upright post, and a knob, operated by a screw or lever, dislocates the spinal column, or a small blade severs the spinal cord at the base of the brain. Cent. Diet.; Encyclo. Dict.

GARSUMME. In Old English Law. An amercement or fine. Cowel. See GRESSUMME; GROSSOME; GRESUMA.

GARTH. In English Law. A yard; a homestead in the north of England. Cowel; Blount.

A yard, garden, or backside. Kelham.

GARYTOUR. In Old Scotch Law. Warden. 1 Pitc. Crim. Tr. pt. 1, p. 8.

GAS. An aeriform fluid, used for illuminating purposes and for fuel.

From a legal point of view it is to be considered with respect to the companies by which it is usually furnished, their status and obligations as affected by the nature of the business; and also whether the gas furnished by them is manufactured or natural.

Nature of the business. The business is not an ordinary one in which any person may engage as of common right, but a franchise of a public nature which, in the absence of constitutional restriction, may be granted by the legislature; 115 U. S. 650; id. 683; 83 Fed. Rep. 659; 84 Ky. 168. A grant of the right to lay pipes is valid, but it is a franchise to be strictly construed, and is void if the conditions are not complied with, pursuant to the legislative declaration in the grant; id. 48. Such a company cannot sell, lease, or assign its corporate privileges without consent of the legislature; 85 Me. 582.

They are not, however, always treated as strictly public corporations, but in some cases such a company is said to be simply "a private manufacturing corporation which furnishes gas to individuals as agreed. This of itself does not make it a public corporation;" 63 N. Y. 826. A company furnishing gas to a municipality under contract is not performing such public service as to exempt it from ordinary taxation; 20 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 484.

A gas company having power to manufacture and sell gas has an implied power to make all contracts necessary to that end; 86 Mo. 496.

Natural Gas. The gas obtained from wells in coal and oil regions, and used for lighting and heating. In nature and character, such gas has been termed "a mineral with peculiar attributes which require the application of precedents arising out of ordinary mineral rights, with more careful consideration of the principles involved than of the mere decisions. . . . Water and oil, and still more strongly, gas, may be classed by themselves, if the analogy be not too fanciful, as minerals feræ naturæ. In common with animals, and unlike other minerals, they have the power and the tendency to escape without the volition of the owner. Their fugitive and wandering existence within the limits of a particular tract is uncertain; (per Agnew, C. J. in 80 Pa. 147). They belong to the owner of the land, and are part of it, so long as they are on or in it, and are subject to his control; but when they escape, and go into other land, or come under another's control, the title of the former owner is gone. Possession of the land, therefore, is not necessarily possession of the gas. If an adjoining, or even a distant, owner, drills his own land, and taps your gas, so that it comes into his well and under his control, it is no longer yours, but his." Per Mitchell, J., in 130 Pa. 235.

Under a lease of land for the sole purpose of drilling and operating for oil and gas, the lessee's right in the surface of the land is in the nature of an easement of entry and examination, with a right of possession where the particular place of operation is selected, and the easement of ingress and egress, transportation and storage; id.

Whether the words "other valuable volatile substance" in a lease when they were used with petroleum, rock, or carbon oil, will include gas is a question for a jury, as the words have no settled meaning; 11 Pa. 81. The words oil and gas in a lease have been held not synonymous; 6 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 74; it is a fuel; 114 Ind. 338; but it has been held that a company incorporated for supplying heat cannot also furnish natural gas; 108 Pa. 126.

Natural gas is as much an article of commerce as any other product of the earth; 120 Ind. 575; and a state statute making it unlawful for any person to conduct natural gas out of the state violates the provisions of the federal constitution vesting in congress the regulation of interstate commerce; id.; 118 Pa. 468.

The business of transporting and furnishing natural gas is a public use, and the right of eminent domain may be constitutionally granted to companies engaged in it; 5 Cent. Rep. (Pa.) 564; the business is transportation of freight; 118 Pa. 408. Because of the public nature of the business taxation may be authorized for supplying it to municipal corporations; 39 Fed. Rep. 251; and any unreasonable restraint upon the business is against public policy; 130 Ill. 268. It was held that under the Pennsylvania general incorporation act of 1874, under which companies for the manufacture and supply of gas were formed, natural gas companies could not be incorporated; 108 Pa. 111; 111 id. 35. Consequently a general law was passed providing for such companies under which, when lawfully incorporated, may they exercise the right of eminent domain and the grant of the power is constitutional; 120 Ind. 581; 63 Barb. 437; 115 Pa. 4; 180 id. 367; and the use of city streets for that purpose imposes no additional servitude; id. In Pennsylvania, the courts of common pleas may hear and determine controversies between natural gas companies and municipalities as to the manner of laying their pipes; 115 Pa. 4.

A right to take natural gas from land under the Pennsylvania act of Apr. 7, 1870, P. L. 58, is not land held in fee, subject to be sold under a special f. fa. against an insolvent corporation; 163 Pa. 78. The lessee for oil and gas, having drilled a well and tapped the gas-bearing strata (the only one in the land), has both the possession of the gas and the right to it, and the owner will be enjoined from drilling; 180 Pa. 235. A lessee for oil only who took from the well both oil and gas was held not accountable to the lessee for the gas, which is, like air and water, the subject only of qualified property by occupancy; 28 W. Va. 210. From the nature of the gas, a lease of well-rights is necessarily exclusive so far as concerns the leased premises themselves; id.; 130 Pa. 235. A person who has a natural gas well on his premises has the right to explode nitro-glycerine therein for the purpose of increasing the flow, although such explosion may have the effect to draw gas from the land of another; 181 Ind. 590.

See also as to natural gas, 30 Cent. L. J. 497; 20 Am. L. Reg. 93, 102; 84 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 40-8.

The rights and liabilities of gas companies are, in the main, the same, whether they are engaged in the business of supplying artificial or natural gas.

Municipal lighting. The business is usually carried on by companies acting either under a legislative or municipal franchise or contract, or directly by the municipality under express legislative authority or implied power.

As to the implied power of a municipality to light its streets, etc., see ELECTRIC LIGHT.

A municipal corporation having power to light its own streets, and erect and maintain gas works has implied power to contract with others to do so; 84 Ky. 166. A municipal council exceeds its power, in granting an exclusive privilege; 43 Ohio St. 237; at least, without legislative authority; 3 Cent. Rep. (Pa.) 921. The authority to lay mains and pipes in streets and provide gas does not give an exclusive right to the use of the streets for that purpose; 21 Ohio L. J. 94.

A city engaged in making and selling gas is quoad hoc a private corporation, not legislating but making contracts which bind it as a natural person, and cannot be impaired by the legislature; 31 Pa. 175.

The grant of an exclusive privilege is a contract none the less because the business requires supervision by public authority, and such grant does not restrict the power of regulation by the state; 115 U. S. 650. A grant by a city, under legislative authority, of an exclusive privilege for a term of years of supplying the city and its people with gas, does not prevent the city from erecting its own gas works under a state law giving it power to do so; 146 U. S. 258. The grant of an exclusive privilege with an option to the city to buy the plant does not bind the city to maintain it when the sale of the plant is refused on application, but the city must elect whether it will purchase at the price fixed by referees before they are chosen, and until the city does so agree it is not a breach of contract for the company to refuse to join in selecting referees; 87 Ala. 245. Under a grant for a term of years of the exclusive privilege for this purpose, the right to use the streets for light other than gas is not implied and must be authorized; 11 Ky. L. Rep. 840. In this case it was held that the city had power to contract with another person for electric lighting, and pay for both gas and electricity, but it could not dispense with the gas company's gas without liability for breach of contract. When an exclusive privilege of lighting the city and using the streets was given by the city to one company for a term of years, in consideration of low rates, to citizens, it did not estop the municipal corporation from subscribing to the stock of a new gas company seeking to introduce gas; 8 Wall. 64. As to municipal authority to light streets, see 150 Mass. 592; 8 L. R. A. 437; ELECTRIC LIGHT.

The use of highways. The right to lay gas pipes in public highways can in general be granted only by the legislature. Such is the established rule both in England and in this country; 16 Q. B. 1012; 28 L. J. Q. B. 42; 3 Ex. Div. 429; 4 Bell, App. Cas. 874; 2 El. & El. 650; 39 N. J. Eq. 242; 18 Ohio St. 262. In a city it may be granted by the municipal or local authorities when empowered by the legislature to do so; 25 Conn. 19; 80 Barb. 24; in Massachusetts it was said to be not clear whether the city could act without authority from the state; per Gray, J., in 18 Allen 160; but in Michigan it was held to be essentially a matter of local control; 38 Mich. 184. The city may forbid opening the streets within certain periods as a regulation, but a prohibition of digging up the street to introduce gas on the opposite side of it is an unreasonable exercise of authority; 12 Pa. 318. In rural highways the laying of gas pipes is held to impose a new servitude not contemplated in the condemnation; 62 N. Y. 886; Mills, Em. Dom. § 55; 160 Pa. 367; but in city streets it does not; id. See 12 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 334; EMINENT DOMAIN; HIGHWAY; STREET.

Obligation to supply gas. The difference of opinion as to the public character of gas companies necessarily results in contradictory decisions as to whether the companies are under a public duty to supply gas on request. By the more recent decisions they are held to be subject to the duty of furnishing gas upon reasonable terms to any one who applies for it, especially if the franchise is exclusive; 25 Md. 1; 7 Gas J. 418; 14 id. 927; 17 id. 663; 6 Wis. 539; 12 Rob. La. 378; 67 Cal. 120; 4 Cush. 60; and the rule also applies where it is not; 53 Mich. 499; and companies may be compelled to do so by mandamus; 45 Barb. 136. On the other hand it has been held that they are under no public duty to supply gas; 30 Conn. 531; 6 C. B. N. s. 239; 20 U. C. Q. B. 233; 12 Allen 75; L. R. 15 Eq. 157; 27 N. J. L. 245. The last case was put solely on the lack of precedent and is practically overruled; 20 N. J. Eq. 77. See 34 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 618.

The principle of Munn v. Illinois has been applied to gas works; 47 Ohio St. 1. But the right to regulate rates is not arbitrary, even where given to a municipality by the legislature; the right to charge reasonable rates is part of the contract of the company with the state, and this reasonableness is a matter for judicial determination; 72 Fed. Rep. 818. See RATES.

A gas company which has been granted the exclusive privilege of supplying gas in a city for a certain number of years, under an agreement that at all times it would supply the citizens for private use with a sufficient quantity of gas, need not leave a gas meter in the house of a citizen who is using electric light, furnished by another company, so that in case of accident to the electric light he may use the gas; 13 So. Rep. (Ala.) 618.

Rules and Regulations. In the conduct of their business such companies may make and enforce rules and regulations if fair and reasonable. Regulations have been held to be reasonable, requiring a deposit; 6 Wis. 539; 52 Mich. 499; and that a written application should be signed; 11 Wis. 284; but such an application cannot be made to embrace an agreement to be bound by illegal rules and regulations; 15 Wis. 818. Regulations may be enforced respecting the care and treatment of meters; 12 Phila. 611; and inspection of the same, and of pipes; 80 Gas J. 836; but visits must be made at stated times and with notice; 6 Wis. 539. Regulations held unreasonable or oppressive, and therefore non-enforceable, are that after the admission of gas the pipes may not be opened without a permit under penalty of treble damage; id.; that meters be placed upon main pipes of apartment buildings instead of smaller pipes of individual occupants; 104 Mass. 95; that rents should be payable half yearly in advance with penalty twenty days after default enforceable by cutting off the attachment until payment of the arrears and additional half year in advance; 29 N. J. Eq. 77.

The right to cut off the supply. The company or the municipality has, as a general rule, the right to cut off the supply of gas if the bill for supplying it is not paid within a limited period. Such a provision by ordinance is a reasonable regulation; 182 Pa. 288; and furnishing gas without objection or account of former indebtedness is not a waiver of the right to shut off the gas for such prior indebtedness; 45 Barb. 136; but in New York the right was held not to extend to indebtedness of a former occupant of the premises; 88 N. Y. Super. Ct. 165; L. R. 4 C. P. D. 410; 13 Rob. (La.) 307. Even when the company has the right by statute to cut off the supply for non-payment of regular charges it does not extend to charges for special service; 20 U. C. Q. B. 233; nor can the supply be cut off from one house for non-payment for another supplied under a different contract; 25 Md. 1; Grant, U. C. 112; and even when the contract authorizes refusal to continue a supply in case of default in payment for "any premises" of the owner it will apply only to future defaults; 1 Mackey 331. Whenever there is a controversy as to the indebtedness the consumer may have an injunction; 66 How. Pr. 314. As to the measure of damages see that title. See also WATER.

Liability for negligence. Gas companies and others using or generating gas, artificial or natural, are subject to the general principle that one who uses a force which he cannot control is liable for the consequences, and where it may be controlled by due care and scientific knowledge and appliances he who receives the profit must bear the responsibility; 3 C. B. 1; they are liable for negligence which must involve the omission of, required by, or the doing of something forbidden by, reasonable care; 122 Mass. 319; 2 Fost. & F. 437; what is such care is not capable of exact definition but must vary with and conform to the exigencies of the situation; 8 Gray 123; 129 Mass. 318; the obligation is increased by the dangerous character of the force under control; 152 Pa. 355; 12 R. I. 149; 31 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 115, affirmed, 34 id. 508; and it extends to the company's agents and servants; 82 Ky. 432; 12 R. I. 149. The company is liable for such consequences as were natural and probable and, in view of the nature of the agency, ought to have been foreseen; 99 Pa. 1; 152 id. 355; 8 Allen 169; 3 id. 410. See CAUSA PROXIMA NON REMOTA; 78 Cal. 517; 44 N. Y. 459.

Where the municipality is held liable in damages for an injury resulting from the negligence of a gas company in failing to keep in repair its apparatus located under the sidewalk, the company is liable over to the municipality; 161 U. S. 316.

The company is bound to exercise reasonable care in the location, structure, and repair of its pipes to prevent escape of gas so as to become dangerous to life or property; L. R. 7 Exch. 96; 129 Mass. 318; 129 Ind. 472; Whether by reason of explosion or inhalation; 65 Hun 378; it must also provide with the like care for the inspection of pipes and repairing leaks; 34 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 547; 4 Fost. & F. 321; and the discovery of such leaks; 82 Md. 113; 105 Mass. 411; 148 N. Y. 112; 152 Pa. 355; and the safe condition of its apparatus authorized to be placed under the streets; 161 U. S. 316. The failure to use such care makes the company jointly liable with one who seeks for the leak with a lighted match, for the results of an explosion; 34 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 549. The mere fact that the gas was exploded by a lighted match will not relieve the company whose negligence caused the leak; 152 Pa. 355. It is not contributory negligence to search for a gas leak with a lighted match; 33 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 547; or a candle; 147 N. Y. 529. A city as a manufacturer and distributor of gas is liable for negligence of its officers, and its agents are bound to the exercise of due care in like manner as those of a private corporation; 106 Pa. 41; but not unless there is negligence; 13 Phila. 173.

Where the gas company is authorized by the legislature the public may not recover damages, but it will be liable to a private person; 64 Barb. 53; 6 Lans. 407. A gas company before turning on gas into an apartment house must use reasonable precautions to ascertain that the pipes in the building are in such condition that it will not flow out into the apartments of tenants, who have not applied for it, to their injury; per Peckham, J., in 147 N. Y. 529. For an elaborate note on the liability for negligence in the escape and explosion of gas, see 29 L. R. A. 837; 10 Alb. L. J. 466. See also NEGLIGENCE. As to gas as a nuisance, see that title.

Remedies. An injunction will be granted to restrain a company from improperly cutting off the supply on the ground of irreparable injury; 64 How. Pr. 83; L. R. 28 Ch. D. 188; 14 Gas J. 927; a private owner cannot ask for an injunction against acts of companies in laying pipes until a request to the municipal authorities to do it and their refusal; 142 Mass. 417; and one company will not be restrained at suit of another; 40 N. J. Eq. 427. When the gas becomes a nuisance by defective pipes, the municipality may abate it and will not be restrained, but when it is not a nuisance a bill for injunction will not be sustained at suit of the municipality; 5 Cent. Rep. (Pa.) 669.

Mandamus. Will lie to compel a supply of gas either artificial; 4 Cush. 60; 56 Cal. 431; 45 Barb. 137; or natural; 34 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 818.

A claim that gas is of poor quality is no defence to an action for the supply of it; 32 Gas J. 5; 3 id. 5; but it may be shown that the gas was put out by air passing through the tubes, the contract being to pay for gas only, and the meter not being conclusive; 63 Hun 621. An action will not lie against a gas company by a consumer for the failure of the company to give him a supply of gas of the amount and purity required by law; [1896] 1 Q. B. 592.

GASTALDERS. A temporary governor of the country. Blount. A steward or bailiff. Spel. Gloss.

GASTEL (L. Fr.). Wastel; wastel-bread; the finest kind of wheat bread. Britt. c. 30; Kelham.

GASTINE (L. Fr.). Waste or uncultivated ground. Britt. c. 57.

GATE (Sax. geat) at the end of names of places, signifies way or path. Cunningham, Law Dict.

In the words beast-gate and cattle-gate, it means a right of pasture; these rights are local to Suffolk and Yorkshire respectively; they are considered as corporeal hereditaments, for which ejectment will lie; 2 Stra. 1084 1 Term 137; and are entirely distinct from right of common. The right is sometimes connected with the duty of repairing the gates of the pasture; and perhaps the name comes from this.

GATEWAYS. See THROUGH ROUTE.

GAUDIES. A term used in the English universities to denote double commons.

GAUGER. An officer appointed to examine all tuns, pipes, hogsheds, barrels, and tierces of wine, oil, and other liquids, and to give them a mark of allowance, as containing lawful measure.

GAUGETUM. A gauge or gauging; a measure of the contents of any vessel.

GAUNTLET. See GANTELOPE.

GAVEL. In Old English Law. Tribute; toll; custom; yearly revenue, of which there were formerly various kinds. Jacob, Law Dict.; Taylor, Hist. Gavelkind, 28, 102. See GAVEL.

GAVELBRED. In English Law. Rent reserved in bread, corn, or provision; rent payable in kind. Cowel.

GAVELCESTER. See GAVELSESTER.

GAVELCHESTER. A certain measure of rent-ale. Cowel.

GAVELET. An obsolete writ, a kind of cessavit (q. v.), used in Kent. Cowel. The Kentish custom of forfeiture. 15 Harv. L. R. 40. See THREE-WEEKS CURFE.

GAVELGELD. Sax. gavel, rent, geld, payment). That which yields annual profit or toll. The tribute or toll itself. 3 Mon. Angl. 155; Cowel; Du Cange, Gavelgida.

GAVELHERTE. A customary service of ploughing. Du Cange.

GAVELKIND. The tenure by which almost all lands in England were held prior to the Conquest, and which is still preserved in Kent.

All the sons of a tenant of gavelkind lands take equally, or their heirs male and female by representation. The wife of such tenant is dowerable of one-half the lands. The husband of such tenant has curtesy, whether issue be born or not, but only of one-half while without issue. Such lands do not escheat, except for treason or want of heirs. The heir of such lands may sell at fifteen years old, but must himself give livery. The rule as to division among brothers in default of sons is the same as among the sons. Digb. R. P. 46.

Coke derives gavelkind from "gave all kinde;" for this custom gave to all the sons alike; 1 Co. Litt. 140 a; Lambard, from gavel, rent,—that is, land of the kind that pays rent or customary husbandry work, in distinction from lands held by knight service. Perambulations of Kent, 1656, p. 585. See Encyc. Brit.; Blount; 1 Bla. Com. 74; 2 id. 84; 4 id. 408; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 165; 2 id. 269, 416.

GAVELLER. An officer of the English crown, who had the management of the mines and quarries in the Forest of Dean and Hundred of St. Briavels, subject, in some respects, to the control of commissioners of woods and forests. He granted gales to free miners in their proper order, accepted surrenders of gales, and kept the registers required by the acts. There was a deputy-gaveller who appears to have exercised most of the gaveller's functions. Sweet.

The First Commissioner of Woods, Forests and Land Revenues is now ex-officio the gaveller. He is empowered to appoint deputies, and the deputies grant gales to free miners (q. v.) in their proper order, accept surrenders of gales, and keep the registers required by statute. Byrne. See GALE.

GAVELMAN. A tenant who is liable to tribute. Somner, Gavelkind, p. 33; Blount. Gavelingmen were tenants who paid a reserved rent, besides customary service. Cowel.

GAVELMED. A customary service of mowing meadow-land or cutting grass (consuetudo jalcandi). Somner, Gavelkind, App.; Blount.

GAVELREPER. In Old English Law. Bedreap or bidreap; the duty of reaping at the bid or command of the lord. Somn. Gavelkind 19, 21; Cowel.

GAVELSESTER, or GAVELCESTER. A certain measure of rent-ale. Wharton.

GAVELWERK (called also Gavelweek). A customary service, either manuopera, by the person of the tenant, or carropera, by his carts or carriages. Phillips, Purveyance; Blount; Somner, Gavelkind 24; Du Cange.

GAYNER. See GAINER.

GAZETTE. The official publication of the British government, also called the London Gazette. It is evidence of acts of state, and of everything done by the queen in her political capacity. Orders of adjudication in bankruptcy are required to be published therein, and a copy of the Gazette containing such publication is conclusive evidence of the fact, and of the date thereof. Moz. & W.

GEBOCCED (Anglo-Saxon). Conveyed.

GEBUR (Sax.). A boor. Mult. Domest. 37.

GEBURSCIPA, or GEBURSCIR. Neighborhood, or adjoining district. Cun-

GEBURSCRIPT. Neighborhood or adjoining district. Cowel.

GEBURUS. In Old English Law. A country neighborhood; an inhabitant of the same gaburscript, or village. Cowel.

GEBUCIAN (from Sax. boc). To convey boc land,—the grantor being said to gebucian the grantee of the land; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law. 10. But the better opinion would seem to be that boc land was not transferable except by descent. See Du Cange, Liber; Bocland; Folcland.

GELD (from Sax. gildan; Law Lat. geldum). A payment; tax, tribute. Laws of Hen. I. c. 2; Charta Edredi Regis apud Inghulfum, c. 81; Mon. Ang. t. 1, pp. 52, 211, 379; t. 2, p. 161; Du Cange; Blount.

The compensation for a crime. We find geld added to the word denoting the offence, or the thing injured or destroyed, and the compound taking the meaning of compensation for that offence or the value of that thing. Capitulare 3, anno 818, cc. 23, 25; Carl Magn. So, wergeld, the compensation for killing a man, or his value; orfild, the value of cattle; angeld, the value of a single thing; octogeld, the value eight times over, etc. Du Cange, Geldum.

GELDABILIS. In Old English Law. Taxable.

Same as geldable (q. v.). Jacob.

GELDABLE. Liable to be taxed. 1 Poll. & Matl. 552; Kelham.

GELDING. A horse that has been castrated, and is thus distinguished from a horse in his natural and unaltered condition. 4 Tex. App. 220.

GEMMA (Lat.). In the Civil Law. A gem; precious stones. Gems are distinguished by their transparency: such as emeralds, chrysolites, amethysts. Dig. 34, 2, 19, 17.

GEMOT (gemote, or mote; Sax., from gemelland, to meet or assemble; L. Lat. gemotum). An assembly; a mote or moot, meeting or public assembly.

There were various kinds: as, the witena-gemot, or meeting of the wise men; the folc-gemot, or folc-moot, the general assembly of the people; the shire-gemot, or county court; the burg-gemot, or borough court; the hundred-gemot, or hundred court; the hali-gemot, or court-baron; the halmote, a convention of citizens in their public hall; the holy-mote, or holy court; the swaimote, or forest court; the ward-mote, or ward court; Cunningham, Law Dict. And see the several titles.

GENEALOGY. The summary history, or table of a family, showing how the persons there named are connected together.

It is founded on the idea of a lineage or family. Persons descended from the common father constitute a family. Under the idea of degree is noted the nearness or remoteness of relationship in which one person stands with respect to another. A series of several persons, descended from a common progenitor, is called a line. Children stand to each other in the relation either of full blood or half-blood, according as they are descended from the same parents or have only one parent in common. For illustrating descent and relationship, genealogical tables are constructed, the order of which depends on the end in view. In tables the object of which is to show all the individuals embraced in a family, it is usual to begin with the oldest progenitor, and to put all the persons of the male and female sex in descending, and then in collateral lines. Other tables exhibit the ancestors of a particular person in ascending lines both on the father's and the mother's side. In this way four, eight, sixteen, thirty-two, etc., ancestors are exhibited, doubling at every degree. Some tables are constructed in the form of a tree, after the model of canonical law (arbor consanguinitatis), with the progenitor beneath, for the root or stem. See CONSAUQUINITY.

GENEARCH. The head of the family.

GENEATH. In Saxon Law. A villan, or agricultural tenant (villanus rusticus); a hind, or farmer (Amarius rusticus). Spel. Gloss.

GENER (Lat.). A son-in-law.

GENERAL ACCEPTANCE. An acceptance is general when it imports an absolute acceptance precisely in conformity to the tenor of the bill itself. It is conditional or qualified when it contains any qualification, limitation or condition, different from what is expressed on the face of the bill, or from what the law implies, upon a "general acceptance." It is qualified when the drawee absolutely accepts the bill, but makes it payable at a different time or place, or for a different firm, or in a different mode from that which is the tenor of the bill. 3 Bush (Ky.) 628. See CONDITIONAL ACCEPTANCE.

GENERAL (or PUBLIC) AOT. An act of the legislature which regards the whole community; a universal rule, of which the courts of law are bound to take notice judicially and ex officio. 1 Bl. Com. 85, 86. See PUBLIC ACT.

GENERAL AGENT. See AGENT.

GENERAL APPEARANCE. See APPEARANCE, COMMON APPEARANCE.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY. A name given in some of the states to the senate and house of representatives, which compose the legislative body. See JUDICATORIES.

GENERAL ASSIGNMENT. An assignment of all one's property for the benefit of his creditors, and necessarily includes an assignee who shall by the terms of the instrument, or as an inference from those terms, take as a trustee for the creditors. 19 N. Y. S. 284.

A general assignment for the benefit of creditors embraces any conveyance by a debtor of substantially all his property to a party in trust to collect the amounts owing to him, to sell and convey the property, to distribute the proceeds of the property among his creditors, and to return the surplus, if any, to the debtor. It includes the ordinary form of conveyance to an assignee for the benefit of creditors, a deed of trust (q. v.), or a bill of sale for the benefit of creditors. 1 Loveland, Bankruptcy 4th ed., § 152. See ASSIGNMENT.

GENERAL AVERAGE. A loss arising out of extraordinary sacrifices made, or extraordinary expenses incurred, for the joint benefit of a ship and cargo. 19 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 10.

The scuttling of a ship by the municipal authorities of a port, without the direction of her master, to extinguish a fire in her hold, is not a general average loss; 157 U. S. 386; which see generally on the subject. See AYERAGE; FOLLOWING BASIS.

GENERAL CHALLENGE. A challenge for cause to a particular juror, upon a ground which disqualifies him from serving in any case. Cal. Pen Code § 1071. See CHALLENGE.

GENERAL CHARACTER. The general character is the estimation in which a person is held in the community where he has resided, and, ordinarily, the members of that community are the only proper witnesses to testify as to such character. Accordingly a witness who goes to the place of the former residence of a party to learn his character will not be allowed to testify as to the result of his inquiries. 2 Wend. 354. See CHARACTER.

GENERAL CHARGE. The charge or instruction of the court to the jury upon the case, as a whole, or upon its general features and characteristics. See CHARGE.

GENERAL CIRCULATION. That of a general newspaper only, as distinguished from one of a special or limited character; 1 Lack. Leg. N. (Pa.) 114.

For a paper to have a general circulation, it was held not necessary that the newspaper circulate to any considerable extent, if at all, out of the state, nor that it circulate in every county in the state, but it must extend beyond the county in which it is published. The court said: "If the circulation of a paper in one county is a general circulation, then why is not the same true if it circulates in a village, township, or other subdivision of a county?" 14 A. & E. Encyc. 949; 35 Neb. 676. Where a statute required publication in three papers of general circulation, it was held that this required only a publication in a general newspaper as distinguished from one of special or limited character. Id.; 1 Lack. Leg. N. (Pa.) 114.

GENERAL COUNCIL. A council of bishops of the Roman Catholic Church, from different parts of the world.

A name sometimes applied to the British parliament.

GENERAL COURT. The official name of the legislature in Massachusetts and New Hampshire. Stand. Dict.

May be the legislature of any state, so called from having had, in colonial days, judicial power. Webster.

GENERAL CREDIT. The character of a witness as one generally worthy of credit. There is a distinction between this and particular credit, which may be affected by proof of particular facts relating to the particular action; 5 Abb. Pr. N. S. 232.

GENERAL CUSTOM. See CUSTOM.

GENERAL DAMAGES. See DAMAGES.

GENERAL DEMURRER. See DEMURRER.

GENERAL DENIAL. See DENIAL; PLEA; TRAVERSE.

GENERAL DEPOSIT. Of money in a bank, it means one to be returned to the depositor in a like sum, but not the same money which was deposited. 43 Ill. App. 340; 43 Ala. 188. See DEPOSIT; SPECIAL DEPOSIT. Same as irregular deposit (q. v.).

GENERAL ELECTION. An election of officers of the general government, either federal or state, as distinguished from an election of local officers.

One held to choose an officer after the expiration of the full term of the former officer, as distinguished from one held to fill a vacancy occurring before the expiration of the full term for which the incumbent was elected. 52 Cal. 164.

In England, An election, following a dissolution of Parliament, in which every constituency elects a member. Stand. Dict. See ELECTION; SPECIAL ELECTION.

GENERAL EXECUTOR. See EXECUTOR.

GENERAL FIELD. A number of separate lots or parcels of land inclosed together and fenced as a single field. 14 Mass. 440.

GENERAL FUND. A phrase used in some states as a collective designation of all the assets of the state available for the support of the state government and for defraying the ordinary appropriations of the legislature. It is so used in New York; 27 Barb. 575, 688; and also in Delaware in the messages of the governor and other state papers to distinguish such funds as are available in the hands of the state treasurer for general purposes from assets of a special character, such as the school fund.

GENERAL GAOL DELIVERY. In English Law. One of the four commissions issued to judges holding the assizes, which empowers them to try and deliverance make of every prisoner who shall be in the gaol when the judges arrive at the circuit town, whether an indictment has been preferred at any previous assize or not.

It was anciently the course to issue special writs of gaol delivery for each prisoner, which were called writs de bono et malo; but, these being found inconvenient and oppressive, a general commission for all the prisoners has long been established in their stead. 4 Steph. Com. 328, 334; 3 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 14, 28.

Under this authority it was necessary that the gaol be cleared and delivered of all prisoners in it, whenever or before whomsoever indicated o. for whatever crime. Such deliverance took place when the person is either acquitted, convicted, or sentenced to punishment. Bract. 110. See COURTS OF OYER AND TERMINER and GENERAL GAOL DELIVERY; GAOL DELIVERY; AMERE.

GENERAL IMPARLANCE. In Pleading. One granted upon a prayer in which the defendant reserves to himself no exceptions.

GENERAL INCLOSURE ACT. The Stat. 41 Geo. III. c. 109, which consolidated a number of regulations respecting the inclosure of common fields and waste lands. See 3 and 9 Vict. c. 118; INCLOSURE.

GENERAL ISSUE. In Pleading. A plea which denies or traverses at once the whole indictment or declaration, without offering any special matter to evade it. It is called the general issue because, by importing an absolute and general denial of what is alleged in the indictment or declaration, it amounts at once to an issue. 2 Bla. Com. 305. In the early manner of pleading, the general issue was seldom used except where the party meant wholly to deny the charges alleged against him. When he intended to excuse or palliate the charge, a special plea was used to set forth the particular facts. See 2 Poll. & Maitl. 617.

But now, since special pleading is generally abolished, the same result is secured by requiring the defendant to file notice of special matters of defence which he intends to set up on trial, or obliging him to use a form of answer adapted to the plaintiff's declaration, the method varying in different systems of pleading. Under the English Judicature Acts, the general issue is no longer admissible in ordinary civil actions, except where expressly sanctioned by statute.

In criminal cases the general issue is, not guilty. In civil cases the general issues are almost as various as the forms of action: in assumpsit, the general issue is non assumpsit; in debt, nil debet; in detinue, non detinet; in trespass, non culpabilis (not guilty); in replevin, non cepit, etc. Steph. Pl. 232.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE. A bureau in the United States government which has the charge of matters relating to the public lands.

It was established by the act of April 23, 1812, 2 Story, Laws 1288. Another act was passed March 24, 1824, 8 Story 1938, which authorized the employment of additional officers. And it was reorganized by an act entitled "An act to reorganize the General Land Office," July 4, 1866. It was originally a bureau of the treasury department, but was transferred in 1859 to the department of the interior. The statutes on the subject are comprised in U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 448-461. As to the organization of the executive departments of the federal government, see DEPARTMENT. See also Zabriske's Pub. Land Laws of U. S.

GENERAL LAW. Laws which apply to and operate uniformly upon all members of any class of persons, places, or things, requiring legislation peculiar to themselves in the matters covered by the laws. Binney, Restrictions upon Local and Special Legislation.

Statutes which relate to persons and things as a class. 77 Pa. 348. Laws that are framed in general terms, restricted to no locality, and operating equally upon all of a group of objects which, having regard to the purpose of the legislation, are distinguished by characteristics sufficiently marked and important to make them a class by themselves. 40 N. J. L. 128.

The later constitutions of many of the states place restrictions upon the legislature as to passing special laws in certain cases. In some states there is a provision that general laws only may be passed, in cases where such can be made applicable. Provisions requiring all laws of a general nature to be uniform in their operation do not prohibit the passage of laws applicable to cities of a certain class having not less than a certain number of inhabitants, although there be but one city in the state of that class; 18 Ohio N. S. 85; Cooley, Const. Lim. 136. See 37 Cal. 386.

The wisdom of these constitutional provisions has been the subject of grave doubt. See Cooley, Const. Lim. 150, n.

When thus used, the term "general" has a twofold meaning. With reference to the subject-matter of the statute, it is synonymous with "public" and opposed to "private"; 37 Cal. 300; 14 Wis. 373; 46 id. 218; Dwarria, Stat. 629; Sedgw. Stat. L. 80; but with reference to the extent of territory over which it is to operate, it is opposed to "local," and means that the statute to which it applies operates throughout the whole of the territory subject to the legislative jurisdiction; 4 Co. 79a; 1 Bla. Com. 85; 83 Ill. 585; 87 Tenn. 304; 10 Wis. 180. Further, when used in antithesis to "special" it means relating to all of a class instead of to men only of that class; 70 Ill. 398; 26 Ind. 431; 22 Ia. 301; 77 Pa. 342; 32 Pac. Rep. (Nev.) 440.

When the constitution forbids the passing of special or local laws in specified cases, it is within the discretion of the legislature to decide whether a subject not named in the constitution is a proper subject for general legislation; the fact that a special law is passed in relation thereto is evidence that it was thought that a general law would not serve; and in such a case clear evidence of mistake is required to invalidate the enactment; 81 Cal. 499; 92 Ind. 236; 107 id. 15; 77 Ia. 513.

In deciding whether or not a given law is general, the purpose of the act and the objects on which it operates must be looked to. If these objects possess sufficient characteristics peculiar to themselves and the purpose of the legislation is germane thereto, they will be considered as a separate class, and legislation affecting them will be general; 49 N. J. L. 356; 41 Minn. 74; 131 Ind. 448; 87 Mich. 217; 124 Ill. 686; 87 Tenn. 214; but if the distinctive characteristics of the class have no relation to that purpose of the legislatures, or if objects which would appropriately belong to the same class have been excluded, the classification is faulty, and the law not general; 87 Ga. 444; 91 Cal. 238; 93 Kan. 431; 51 N. J. L. 403; 52 id. 808; 19 Nev. 43; 2 N. Dak. 270; 106 Pa. 377. The effect, not the form of the law, determines its character; 20 Ia. 338; 71 Mo. 645; 82 id. 231; 53 N. J. L. 4; 45 Ohio St. 63; 48 id. 211; 88 Pa. 258.

See 43 N. J. L. 337; id. 538; 40 id. 123; 31 Wis. 257. See LEGISLATIVE POWER; SPECIAL LAW; STATUTE.

GENERAL LEGACY. A pecuniary legacy, payable out of the general assets of a testator. 2 Bl. Com. 512. See LEGACY.

GENERAL LIEN. The right which the bailee of a chattel has to retain possession of it from the owner, until payment be made not only for the particular article, or some labor, service or expense performed, incurred or laid out upon or in relation to it, but of any balance that may be due on general account in the same line of business. See LIEN.

GENERAL MALICE. See MALICE.

GENERAL MEETING. See MEETING.

GENERAL OCCUPANT. The man who could first enter upon lands held pur autre vie, after the death of the tenant for life, living the cestui que vie. At common law he held the lands by right for the remainder of the term; but this is now altered by statute, in England, the term going to the executors if not devised; 29 Car. II. c. 3; 14 Geo. II. c. 20; 2 Bla. Com. 258. This has been followed by some states; 1 Md. Code 666, s. 220, art. 98; in some states the term goes to heirs, if undevise; Mass. Gen. Stat. c. 91, § 1.

GENERAL ORDERS. Orders or rules of court, entered for the guidance of practitioners and the general regulation of procedure, or in some branch of its general jurisdiction; as opposed to a rule or an order made in a particular case. The rules of court.

GENERAL OWNER. The general

owner of a thing is one who has the primary title to it; as distinguished from a special owner, who has a special interest in the same thing, amounting to a qualified ownership, such, for example, as a bailee lien. One who has both the right of property and of possession.

GENERAL PARTNERSHIP. See PARTNERSHIP.

GENERAL PROPERTY. The right and property in a thing enjoyed by the general owner (q. v.).

GENERAL BELIEF. See RELIEF.

GENERAL RESTRAINT OF TRADE. A contract which forbids the party to it from engaging in a particular business without limitation either of time or locality. Such contracts are void. 2 Add. Cont., Abb. & Wood ed. 787.

One which forbids the person to employ his talents, industry, or capital in any undertaking within the limits of the state or country. 9 How. Pr. 337. See RESTRAINT; GOOD WILL.

GENERAL RETAINER. See RETAINER.

GENERAL RETURN DAY. In any court the day for the return of all process, such as writs of summons, subpoenas, etc., issued returnable to a particular term of the court. See RETURN OF WRITS.

GENERAL RULES. Standing orders of a court for the regulation of its practice. See GENERAL ORDERS.

GENERAL SESSIONS. See COURT OF GENERAL QUARTER SESSIONS OF THE PEACE.

GENERAL SHIP. One which is employed by the charterer or owner on a particular voyage, and is hired by a number of persons, unconnected with each other, to convey their respective goods to the place of destination. A ship advertised for general receipt of goods to be carried on a particular voyage. The advertisement should state the name of the ship and master, the general character of the ship, the time of sailing, and the proposed voyages. See 1 Pars. Mar. Law 130; Abb. Shipp. 123.

The shippers in a general ship generally contract with the master; but in law the owners and the masters are separately bound to the performance of the contract, it being considered as made with the owners as well as with the master; Abb. Shipp. 319.

GENERAL SPECIAL IMPARLANCE. In Pleading. One in which the defendant reserves to himself "all advantages and exceptions whatsoever." 2 Chitty, Pl. 408. See IMPARLANCE.

GENERAL STATUTE. See GENERAL LAW.

GENERAL TAIL. See FEE-TAIL.

GENERAL TENANCY. A tenancy which is not fixed and made certain, as to its duration, by agreement of the parties. 22 Ind. 122. Tenancy from year to year. See TENANT.

GENERAL TERM. A phrase used in some jurisdictions to designate the regular session of a court, for the trial and decision of causes, as distinguished from a special term, for the hearing of motions or arguments, or the despatch of routine or formal business, or the trial of a special list or class of causes or a particular case. It is also sometimes used to designate a sitting of the court in banc (q. v.).

GENERAL TRAVERSE. See TRAVERSE.

GENERAL USAGE. See USAGE.

GENERAL VERDICT. See VERDICT.

GENERAL WARRANT. A process which used to issue from the state secretary's office, to take up (without naming any person in particular) the author printer, and publisher of such obscene and seditious libels as were particularly specified in it. The practice of issuing such warrants was common in early English history, but it received its death blow from Lord Camden, in the time of Wilkes. The latter was arrested and his private papers taken possession of under such a warrant, on a charge of seditious libel in publishing No. 45 of the North Briton. He recovered heavy damages against Lord Halifax who issued the warrant. Pratt, C. J., declared the practice to be "totally subversive of the liberty of the subject," and with the unanimous concurrence of the other judges condemned this dangerous and unconstitutional practice. See May, Const. Hist. of England; 5 Co. 91; 2 Wils. 151, 275; 10 Johns. 263; 11 id. 500; Cooley, Const. Lim. 369. Such warrants were declared illegal and void for uncertainty by a vote of the house of commons. Com. Jour. 22, April, 1766; Whart. Law Dict.

A writ of assistance.

The issuing of these was one of the causes of the American republic. They were a species of general warrant, being directed to "all and singular justices, sheriffs, constables and all other officers and subjects," empowering them to enter and search any house for uncustomed goods, and to command all to assist them. These writs were perpetual, there being no return to them. They were not executed, owing to the eloquent argument of Otis before the supreme court of Massachusetts against their legality. See Tudor, Life of Otis 66; Story, Const. 1901.

GENERAL WARRANTY. See COVENANT OF WARRANTY; WARRANTY.

GENERAL WORDS. Such words of a descriptive character as are used in conveyances in order to convey, not only the specific property described, but also all kinds of easements, privileges, and appurtenances which may possibly belong to the property conveyed. Such words are in general unnecessary; but are properly used when there are any easements or privileges reputed to belong to the property not legally appurtenant to it.

Such words are rendered unnecessary by the English conveyancing act of 1891, under which they are presumed to be included.

See, as to the effect of such words in deeds, 1 Show. 150; 4 M. & S. 423; 1 Ld. Raym. 235, 662; 2 Tyrw. 178; Loft 398; 4 Mo. 443; in a will; 1 P. Wms. 302; in a lease; 2 Moo. 592; in a release; 3 Mod. 277; 3 Lev. 273; in a covenant; 8 Moo. 703; in a statute; 1 Bla. Com. 88; Cowp. 860; 12 Mod. 166; 2 Co. 46; 1 Ld. Raym. 321.

General words are taken in their general sense. Where general words follow an enumeration of particular cases, such words apply only to cases of the same kind as those expressly mentioned. Anderson; 5 McLean 183-4. The meaning of general words will be restricted to carry out the legislative intent. Id.; 13 Wall. (U. S.) 165. Where particular words, in a statute, are followed by words of a general character, the latter are to be restricted to the objects particularly mentioned. If the act begins with words which speak of things or persons of an inferior degree and concludes with general words, the latter are not to be extended to a thing or person of a higher degree. If a particular class is mentioned and general words follow, they must be treated as referring to matters of the same kind, thus subordinating general terms to the preceding particulars. Id.; 83 Ky. 100. General words in any instrument or statute are strengthened by exceptions, and weakened by enumeration. Id.; 21 Pa. 161.

GENERATIO. The issue or offspring of a mother monastery.

GENERATION. A simple succession of living beings in natural descent; the age or period between one succession and another. It is not equivalent to degree. 107 N. C. 609.

GENS (Lat.). In Roman Law. A union of families, who bore the same name; who were of an ingenuous (free) birth, ingenui, none of whose ancestors had been a slave, and who had suffered no capitis diminutio (reduction from a superior to an inferior condition), of which there were three degrees, maxima, media, minima. The first was the reduction of a free man to the condition of a slave, and was undergone by those who refused or neglected to be registered at the census, who had been condemned to ignominious punishments, who refused to perform military service, or who had been taken prisoners by the enemy, though those of the last class, on recovering their liberty, could be reinstated in their rights of citizenship. The second degree consisted in the reduction of a citizen to the condition of an alien (Latinus or peregrinus), and involved in the case of a Latinus, the loss of the right of legal marriage, but not of acquiring property, and in the case of the peregrinus, the loss of both. The third degree consisted in the change of condition of a pater familias into that of a filius familias, either by adoption or by legitimation.

Gentiles sunt, qui inter se eodem nomine sunt; qui ab ingenuis orti sunt; quorum majorum nemo servitutem servit; qui capite non sunt diminuti. This definition is given by Cicero (Topic 6), after Scævola, the pontifex. But, notwithstanding this high authority, the question as to the organization of the gens is involved in great obscurity and doubt. The details are more vague and unsatisfactory. He says, "Gentilia dicitur et eodem genere orti, et is qui simili nomine appellatur, ut ait Cincius: Gentiles mihi sunt, qui meo nomine appellantur." Gens and gens are convertible terms; and Cicero defines the latter word, "Gens autem est quodammodo similes communione quadam, specie autem differentes, dum aut plures complectitur partes." De Oratore, 1, 42. The gens is that which comprehends two or more particulars, similar to one another by having something in common, but differing in species. From this it may fairly be concluded that the gens or race comprises several families, always of ingenuous birth, resembling each other by their origin, general rites, — nomen, — and common sacrifices or sacred rites, — sacra gentilitia (qui simili communione quadam), — but differing from each other by a particular name, — cognomen and agnatio (specie autem differentes). It would seem, from the litigation between the Claudii and Marcelli in relation to the inheritance of the son of a freedman, reported by Cicero, that the deceased, whose succession was in controversy, belonging to the gens Claudia, for the foundation of their claim was the gentile rights, — gentes; and the Marcelli (plebeians belonging to the same gens) supported their pretensions on the ground that he was the son of their freedman. This fact has been thought by some writers to contradict that part of the definition of Scævola and Cicero where they say, quorum majorum nemo servitutem servit. And Niebuhr, in a note to his history, concluded that the definition was erroneous. He says, "The claim of the patrician Claudii is at variance with the definition in the Topics, which excludes the posterity of freedmen from the character of gentiles; probably the decision was against the Claudii, and this might be the ground on which Cicero denied the title of gentiles to the descendants of freedmen, — to conceive in so doing he must have been mistaken. We know from Cicero himself (de Leg. 11, 22) that no bodies or ashes were allowed to be placed in the common sepulchre unless they belonged to such as shared in the gens and its sacred rites; and several freedmen have been admitted to the sepulchre of the Scipios." But in another place he says, "The division into houses was no essential to the patrician order that the appropriate ancient term to designate that order was climulatio. — the patrician gentes; but the instance just mentioned shows beyond the reach of a doubt that such a gens did not consist of patricians alone. The Claudian contained the Marcelli, who were plebeians, equal to the Applii in the splendor of the honors they attained to, and incomparably more useful to the commonwealth; such plebeian families must evidently have arisen from marriages of disparagement, contracted before there was any right of intermarriage between the orders. But the Claudian house had also a very large number of insignificant persons who bore its name, — such as the M. Claudii who disputed the freedom of Virginia; nay, according to an opinion of earlier times, as the very ancestors of Cicero, proper, it contained the freedmen and their descendants. Thus, among the Gaels, the clan of the Campbells was formed by the nobles and their vassals: if we apply the Roman phrase to them, the former had the clan, the latter only belonged to it." It is obvious that, if what is said in the concluding part of the passage last quoted be correct, the definition of Scævola and Cicero is perfectly consistent with the theory of Niebuhr himself; for the definition, of course, refers to the original stock of the gens, and not to such as might be attached to it or stand in a certain legal relation toward it. The Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities, edited by that accomplished classical scholar, Professor Anthon, the same distinction is intimated, though not fully developed, as follows: — "But it must be observed, though the descendants of freedmen might have no claim to the rights of membership of the gens, as such, have claims against them; and in this sense the descendants of freedmen might be gentiles." This article by George Long is much quoted and contains references to the principal German authorities, and it may be consulted with profit. Hugo, in his history of the Roman Law, vol. 1, p. 83, says, "Those who bore the same name be longed all to the same gens; they were gentiles with regard to each other. Consequently, as the freedmen took the name of their former master, they adhered to his gens, or, in other words, stood in the relation of gentiles to him and his male descendants. Livy refers in express terms to the gens of an enfranchised slave (b. 39, 10), "Tecenia Hupale . . . gens et cognomen," and in the instance of the son of a freedman was conferred on the ground of a civil relationship, — gentis. But there must necessarily have been a great difference between those who were born in the gens and those who had only entered it by adoption, and their descendants; that is to say, between those who formed the original stock of the gens, who were all of patrician origin, and those who had entered the family by their own enfranchisement or that of their ancestors. The former alone were entitled to the rights of the gentes; and perhaps the appellation itself was confined to them, while the latter were called gentilitii, to designate those agnates from the gens to whom certain rights to exercise." In a lecture of Niebuhr on the Roman Gentes, vol. 1, p. 70, he says, "Such an association, consisting of a number of families, from which a person may withdraw, but into which he cannot be admitted at all, or only by being adopted by the whole association, is a gens. It must not be confounded with the family, the members of which are descended from a common ancestor; for the patronymic names of the gentes are nothing but symbols, and are derived from heroes." Arnold gives the following exposition of the subject: —

"The people of Rome were divided into the three tribes of the Ramnenses, Titenses, and Luceres, and each of these tribes was divided into ten curiae; it would be more correct to say that the union of ten curiae formed the tribe. For the state grew out of the junction of certain original elements; and these were neither the tribes, nor the curiae, but the gentes, or houses, who made up the curiae. The first element of the whole system was the gens, or house, a union of several families who were bound together by the joint performance of certain religious rites. Actually, where a system of houses has existed within historical memory, the several families who composed a house were all closely related to one another; they were not really cousins more or less distant, all descended from a common ancestor. But there is no reason to doubt that in the original idea of a house the bond of union between the several families was truly a sameness of blood, such was likely to be the earliest socially acknowledged tie, though afterwards, as names are apt to outlive their meaning, an artificial bond may have succeeded to the natural one, and a house, instead of consisting of families of real relations, was made up sometimes of families of strangers, whom it was supposed to bind together by the ties of a common law that law and custom and religion might together rival the force of nature." Arnold, Hist. 81. Maine, in his chapter on the origin of property, selects the village community of India as a type of "an organized patriarchal society and an assemblage of co-proprietors," — our first idea of a community, — and draws our attention from its exactly fitting in with the ideas which our studies in the law of persons would lead us to entertain respecting the original condition of property." Anc. L. 232. After describing it somewhat fully he says: The type with which it should be compared is evidently not the Roman family, but the Roman gens or house. The gens was not so a group on the model of a family; it was the family extended by a variety of fictions of which the exact nature was lost in antiquity. In historical times, its leading characteristics were the very two which Elphinstone remarks in the village community, "that there was always the assumption of a common origin, an assumption sometimes notoriously at variance with fact; and, to repeat the historian's words, 'if a family became extinct, its share returned to the common stock.'" In old Roman Law, unclaimed inheritances escheated to the gentiles. It is further examined by all who have written on the subject, that the communities, like the gentes, have been very generally adulterated by the admission of strangers, but the exact mode of absorption cannot now be ascertained; id. 230. Another writer considers that the gens "was something very nearly identical with a Celtic clan, the identity or similarity of name being always supposed to have arisen from relationship, and not from similarity of occupation, as in the case of the Smiths, Taylors, Lorimers, etc., of modern Europe. There was this peculiarity, however, about the gens which did not belong to the Celtic clan, that it was possible for gentiles born in it to cease to belong to it by capitis diminutio, or by adoption (by a family not of the same gens), or adoption as it was called when the person adopted was qui jstria." Int. Cyc.

A recognized authority on the civil law refers to the obscurity of this subject in treating of successions. Under the twelve tables there are recognized only (1) ut legatus; (2) agnatus; (3) gentilis, and in default of the latter the inheritance lapsed to the state. The praetors called the cognati for the first time to the succession, "probably because," says Sanders (Inst. 250), "at the time of the praetor's legislation there were certain families that could boast the nearest so pure and accurately known as to satisfy the requisite of gentilitas." He also says in the same connection: "The subject of gentilitas is too obscure, and repays investigation too little, to permit us to enter into it here. Probably the original notion of gentiles was that of members of some pure uncorrupted patrician stock, though not necessarily of the same descent, but bearing the same name, and having the same sacra. Probably, also, freedmen and clients of gentiles were in some degree considered as themselves gentiles; probably if the property was not claimed by their patron it went to the members of his gens, but they had not any claim on the property of any other gentiles. We know also that there were plebeian gentes, formed probably by the marriage of a patrician with a plebeian, the plebs received the conubium. Members of ple-between gentes would, we may suppose, have the rights of gentiles towards other members of the same plebeian gens, and it would seem that they had them towards the members of the patrician gens from which they were an offshoot; Cic. de Off. l. 20. Of the mode in which the gentiles took the inheritance, we know nothing of, nor at how late a period of history the gentes were still really in existence. Gaius (ii. 11), treats the subject as one of mere antiquarian interest. In his introduction to the institutes, Savigny gives generally his understanding of the nature of the gens. The body of Roman citizens was composed of two distinct divisions, the populus and the plebs. The former consisted of three tribes, each of ten curiae, and each curia was divided into ten decuriae. For the latter another name was gens, and it included a great number of distinct families, united by having common sacred rites, and bearing a common name. In theory at least, the members of the same gens were descended from a common ancestor, and the families of the gens were subdivisions of the same ancestral stock, but both individuals and groups were occasionally admitted from outside. A pure unspotted pedigree was claimed by every member of a gens, and there was a theoretical equality among all the members of the whole tribe. The heads of the different families in these gens met together in a great council, called the council of the curies (comitia curiata). A small body of three hundred, answering in number to the gentes in each of the three tribes, and called the senate, was charged with the office of initiating the more important questions submitted to the great council; and a king, nominated by the senate, but chosen by the curies, presided over the whole, and was charged with the functions of executive government.

The gentiles inherited from each other in the absence of agnates. The rule of the Twelve Tables is, "Si agnatus non erit, gentilis familiaris ascendet," which has been paraphrased, "Si agnatus non erit, tum gentilis heres erit."

GENTLEMAN. In English Law. A person of superior birth.

According to Coke, he is one who bears armor, the grant of which adds gentility to a man's family. The eldest son had no exclusive claim to the degree; for, according to Littleton, "every son is as great a gentleman as the eldest." Co. 2d Inst. 67. Sir Thomas Smith, quoted by Blackstone, 1 Com. 406, says, "As for gentlemen, they are made good cheap in this kingdom; for whosoever studies the laws of the realm, who studies in the universities, who professeth liberal learning, and (to be short) who can live idly and without manual labor, and will bear the port, charge, and countenance of a gentleman, shall be called master, and be taken for a gentleman." In the United States, this word is unknown to the law. See Pothier, Proc. Crim. sec. 1, App. § 3; 1 C. P. D. 60; 1 Ch. Div. 377; 3 E. & N. 82.

GENTLEWOMAN. An addition formerly appropriate in England to the state or degree of a woman. Co. 2d Inst. 667.

GENTOO LAW. See HINDU LAW.

GENUINE. Not false, fictitious, simulated, spurious, counterfeit. 37 N. Y. 492.

GEORGIA. The name of one of the original thirteen states of the United States of America.

It was called after George II., king of Great Britain, under whose reign it was colonized.

George II. granted a charter, dated June 9, 1732, to a company consisting of General James Oglethorpe, Lord Percival, and nineteen others, who planted a colony on the west bank of the Savannah river, a short distance from its mouth.

The corporation thus created was authorized, for twenty years, to erect courts of judicature for all civil and criminal causes, and to appoint a governor, judges and other magistrates. The territory was to be held, as of the manor of Hampton Court in Middlesex, in free and common socage, and not in capite.

This charter was to expire by its own limitation in 1753; and under it the colony was governed by trustees, who, on December 19, 1751, in anticipation of the expiration of the charter, offered to surrender it up to the crown. The offer was accepted and on June 23, 1752, the trustees closed their accounts, made their last grant, and affixed the seal to the deed of surrender, and the colony became a royal province, of which the first governor was appointed August 6, and landed October 29, 1754; the colony having in the mean governed by the Board of Trade and Plantations.

A state constitution was adopted in 1777, another in 1789, and a third in 1790, which, with some amendments, remained in force until the civil war. The state seceded January 19, 1861, and was readmitted to the Union under act of congress approved July 15, 1870.

GEREFA. Reeve, which see.

GERMAN. Whole or entire, as respects genealogy or descent: thus "brother-german" denotes one who is brother both by the father's and mother's side; "cousin-german," those in the first and nearest degree, i. e. children of brothers or sisters. Tech. Dict.: 4 M., & G. 56.

GERMAN DUTY. A tax imposed by the German Government on merchandise when sold by manufacturers for consumption or sale in the markets of Germany but is remitted by that Government when the goods are purchased in bond or consigned while in bond for exportation to a foreign country. 169 U. S. 16. See BONIFICATION OF TAX.

GERBONTOCOMI. In Civil Law Officers appointed to manage hospitals for poor old persons. Clef des Lois Rom. Ad ministrateurs.

GERSEME (Sax.). In Old English Law. Expense; reward; compensation; wealth; especially, the consideration or fine of a contract: e. g. et pro hac concessione dedit nobis predictus Jordanus 100 sol. sterling de gerseme. Old charter, cited Sommer, Gavelkind, 177; Tabul. Reg. Ch. 377; 3 Mon. Ang. 720; 8 id. 126. It is also used for a fine or compensation for an offence. 3 Mon. Ang. 978.

GESTATION, UTERO-GESTATION. In Medical Jurisprudence. The time during which a female, who has conceived, carries the embryo or fœtus in her uterus.

This directly involves the duration of pregnancy, questions concerning which most frequently arise in cases of contested legitimacy. The descent of property and peage may be made entirely dependent upon the settlement of this question, as to which see PREGNANCY.

There are some women to whom it is peculiar always to have the normal time of delivery anticipated by two or three weeks. Montgomery, Preg. 264. So, also, there are many cases establishing the fact that the usual period is sometimes exceeded by one, two, or more weeks, the limits of which it is difficult or impossible to determine. Coke seems inclined to adopt a peremptory rule that forty weeks is the longest time allowed by law for gestation. Co. Litt. 133 b. But although the law of some countries prescribes the time from conception within which the child must be born to be legitimate, that of England and America fixes no precise limit, but admits the possibility of the birth's occurring previous or subsequent to the usual time. The following are cases in which this question will be found discussed: 3 Bro. Ch. 349; Gardner Peage case, Le Marchant Report; Cro. Jac. 686; 7 Hazard, Reg. of Penn. 863; 2 Wh. & Stillé, Med. Jur. § 4; 2 With. & Beck, Med. Jur. 264. See PREGNANCY.

GESTIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The doing or management of a thing. Negotium gestio, the doing voluntarily without authority business of another. L. 20, C. de neg. gest. Gestio negotiorum, one who so interferes with business of another without authority. Gestio pro herede, behavior as heir; such conduct on the part of the heir as indicates acceptance of the inheritance and makes him liable for ancestor's debts universally: e. g. an entry upon, or assigning, or letting any of the heritable property, releasing any of the debtors of the estate, or meddling with the title-deeds or heirship movables, etc. Erskine, Inst. 3. 8. 82 et seq.; Stair, Inst. 3. 6. 1.

GET BY. The expression to "get by" means that the person referred to has done some act and has escaped the injurious and detrimental consequences which usually attend such an act. 162 Ky. 298, 172 S. W. 530.

GETTING. The word "getting" used in an indictment for obtaining money under false pretenses, instead of the word "obtaining," does not render the indictment defective. 151 Ky. 639, 152 S. W. 773.

GEWRITE. In Saxon Law. Deeds or charters; writings. Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 10.

GIFT. A voluntary conveyance or transfer of property; that is, one not founded on the consideration of money or blood.

A voluntary, immediate and absolute transfer of property without consideration. 189 Pa. 640.

As used by the old text writers it signified a distinct species of deed, applicable said that the word denotes rather the motive of the conveyance; so that a feoffment or grant may be called a gift when gratuitous. A gift is of the same nature as a settlement; neither denotes a form of assurance, but the nature of the transaction. Watk. Conv. 199. The operative words of this conveyance are do, or dedi—I give, or I have given. The maker of this instrument is called the donor, and he to whom it is made, the donee, and the entail the gift or donation, the issue taking per formam doni. 2 Bla. Com. 816; Littleton to the creation of an estate tail; while a feoffment was strictly confined to the creation of a fee-simple estate. This use is almost obsolete: Wharton. It has been 59; Shepp. Touchst. c. 11; 2 Poll. & Maitl. 12, 81, 211.

Gifts inter vivos are gifts made from one or more persons, without any prospect of immediate death, to one or more others. Gifts causa mortis are gifts made in prospect of death.

Gifts inter vivos have no reference to the future, and go into immediate and absolute effect. Delivery is essential. Without actual possession, the title does not pass. A mere intention or naked promise to give, without some act to pass the property, is not a gift. There may be repentance (the locus penitentiae) as long as the gift is incomplete and left imperfect in the mode of making it; 1 Pars. Contr. 245; 7 Johns. 26; but see 79 Ga. 11, where it was held that a donatio inter vivos, as distinguished from a donatio mortis causa, does not require actual delivery; and it is sufficient to complete a gift inter vivos that the conduct of the parties should show that the ownership of the chattels has been changed.

The subject of the gift must be certain; and there must be the mutual consent and concurrent will of both parties. There must be an intention on the part of the donor to make a gift; Thorn. Gifts & Adv. § 70, and expressions of it are admissible as part of the res gesta; 1 Wils. Ch. 312; 9 Redf. 251, 261, 265; 117 N. Y. 843; and also declarations of the donor prior to the gift; 25 Barb. 33; if followed up by proof of delivery; 29 Ohio St. 13; and subsequent to the gift to support it; 87 Ga. 578; 140 Mass. 157; 169 Ind. 403; but not to disprove it; 12 Allen 114. See Thorn. Gift §§ 222-232. Acceptance is also necessary; 66 N. H. 302; 28 Md. 327; 107 Mo. 459; and this is true under both the common and civil law; 39 Cal. 120. It must be in the life-time of the donor; 34 Ia. Ann. 709; but it is presumed if the gift is in value; 24 Tex. 438; 68 Mich. 181. Delivery must be according to the nature of the thing. It must be an actual delivery, so far as the subject is capable of delivery. If the thing be not capable of actual delivery, there must be some act equivalent to it; something sufficient to work an immediate change in the dominion of the property; 45 Mo. App. 160. The donor must part not only with the possession, but with the dominion. If the thing given be a chose in action, the law requires an assignment or some equivalent instrument, and the transfer must be executed; 1 Swanst. 496; 1 Dev. 809. Delivery first and gift afterwards of a chattel capable of delivery, is as effectual as gift first and delivery afterwards; 64 Law T. 645. The presumption of a resulting trust in favor of the donor arises where a conveyance has been made, without consideration, to one of an estate or other property which has been purchased with the money of another; but this presumption is rebutted where the purchase may fairly be deemed to be made for another from motives of natural love and affection; 85 Pa. 64; 82 Md. 78. Knowledge by the donee that the gift has been made is not necessary; L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 104. The gift is complete when the legal title has actually vested in the donee; 109 E. C. L. R. 486; and in cases of gifts by husband to wife, or parent to child living at home, the necessity for an actual change of possession does not exist; 61 Pa. 88. Where a father gives money deposited in bank to his infant son, the gift will not be defeated by the failure of the father to deliver to the son the pass book evidencing the gift, the father as natural guardian being the proper custodian of such book during the infancy of the son; 62 Hun 194. The instances here given are merely illustrative of the cases on the subject of the necessity of delivery, the number of which is almost without limit. For a full discussion of the subject, see Thornt. Gifts & Adv. ch. ix., where the cases are collected; 15 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 701, n.; 15 Va. L. J. 737; 82 Cent. L. J. 11; 25 Ir. L. T. 4, 409. As to what circumstances will dispense with actual physical delivery, see 9 id. 639; 26 Am. L. Reg. 587; Law O. Rev. 446; see also DONATIO MORITIS CAUSA, with respect to delivery, the requisites of which in the two classes of gifts are the same; Thornt. Gifts § 180; 1 Nott & McC. 237; 2 Sandf. Ch. 400. "Gifts inter vivos and gifts causa mortis differ in nothing, except that the latter are made in expectation of death, become effectual only upon the death of the donor, and may be revoked. Otherwise, the same principles apply to each." 46 Me. 48; 3 Del. Ch. 51; 89 Mo. 548; 80 N. Y. 428; 78 Ky. 572; 54 Md. 175. A parol gift of land is valid when possession is taken and valuable improvements are made thereunder; 88 Tex. 563.

When the gift is perfect it is then irrevocable, unless it is prejudicial to creditors or the donor was under a legal incapacity or was circumvented by fraud; except in case of donatio mortis causa (q. v.), as to which one of the distinguishing characteristics is that it is revocable during the donor's life.

If a man, intending to give a jewel to another, say to him, Here I give you my ring with the ruby in it, etc., and with his own hand delivers it to the party, this will be a good gift notwithstanding the ring bear any other jewel, being delivered by the party himself to the person to whom given; Bacon, Max. 87. See 68 Hun 632.

Where a father bought a ticket in a lottery, which he declared he gave to his infant daughter E., and wrote her name upon it, and after the ticket had drawn a prize he declared that he had given the ticket to his child E., and that the prize money was hers, this was held sufficient for a jury to infer all the formality requisite to a valid gift, and that the title in the money was complete and vested in E. See 10 Johns. 293. Where notes are endorsed by the owner, placed in a pocketbook, and the packet marked with the name of the donee, a delivery to one of the donees is sufficient, though he at once returns the packet to the donor to keep for the present; 51 Mo. App. 237.

A certificate of deposit may be the subject of gift, and, when endorsed and delivered for such purpose, the gift is perfect and cannot be revoked by the donor before the money is collected; 97 Ala. 700. A written assignment, under seal, of money in the hands of a third person, delivered to the assignee, constitutes a valid gift and acceptance of the money; 141 N. Y. 179.

See two papers containing an extended examination and discussion of the authorities on the subject of gifts causa mortis of checks and orders published after the title on that subject had gone through the press; 86 Am. L. Reg. 247, 289.

A special act directing a board of supervisors of a city to pay a certain sum as compensation for the improvement of streets to an individual was held to be a gift of public money to an individual, and hence within the inhibition of the constitution and void; 99 Cal. 17.

See, generally, Thornton, Gifts and Advancements, and an elaborate classified list of authorities in the St. Louis Law Library Catalogue. DONATIO INTER VIVOS; DONATIO MORITIS CAUSA; DONATIO MORNING GIFT.

GIFT ENTERPRISE. A scheme for the division or distribution of certain articles of property, to be determined by chance, amongst those who have taken shares in the scheme; the phrase has attained such a notoriety as to justify courts in taking judicial notice of what is meant and understood; 81 Ind. 17; 106 Mass. 422. See LOTTERY; SALE.

A business, such as the selling of books or works of art, the publication of a newspaper, etc., in which presents are given to purchasers as an inducement. 14 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 1005.

GIFTOMAN. In Swedish Law. He who has a right to dispose of a woman in marriage.

The right is vested in the father, if living; if dead, in the mother. They may nominate a person in their place; but for want of such nomination the brothers-german, and for want of them the consanguine brothers, and in default of the latter the uterine brothers, have the right; but they are bound to consult the paternal or maternal grandfather. Swed. Code, Marriage, c. 1.

GILDA MERCATORIA (L. Lat.). A mercantile meeting.

If the king once grants to a set of men to have gilda mercatoria, mercantile meeting assembly, this is alone sufficient to incorporate and establish them forever. 1 Bla. Com. 473. A company of merchants incorporated. Stat. Will. Reg. Scot. c. 35; Leg. Burghum Scot. c. 99; Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss.; 8 Co. 125 a; 2 Ld. Raym. 1184.

GILDO. In Saxon Law. Members of a gild or decennary. Oftener spelled congild. Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss. Geldum.

GILL. A measure of capacity, equal to one-fourth of a pint. See MEASURE.

GIN. See INTOXICATING LIQUOR.

GIN MEN. "Gin men" are men employed in coal mines who have no specific work to do, but are hired to do general work, or any kind of work they are ordered to do. 131 Ky. 198, 114 S. W. 785.

GIRANTEM. An Italian word which signifies the drawer. It is derived from gira, to draw, in the same manner as the English verb to murder is transformed into murdrare in our old indictments. Hall, Mar. Loans 183, n.

GIRTH. A girth, or yard, is a measure of length. The word is of Saxon origin, taken from the circumference of the human body. Girth is contracted from girdeth, and signifies as much as girdle. See ELL.

GIRTH AND SANCTUARY. In Scotch Law. A refuge or place of safety given to those who had slain a man in heat of passion (chaude medley) and unpremeditatedly. Abolished at the Reformation. 1 Hume 285; 1 Ross, Lect. 381.

GIST (sometimes, also, spelled git).

In Pleading. The essential ground or object of the action in point of law, without which there would be no cause of action. Gould, Pl. c. 4, § 12; 19 Vt. 102. The cause for which an action will lie; the ground or foundation of a suit, without which it would not be maintainable; the essential ground or object of a suit, without which there is not a cause of action. 101 Ill. 894. In stating the substance or gist of the action, everything must be averred which is necessary to be proved at the trial. The moving cause of the plaintiff's bringing the action, and the matter for which he recovers the principal satisfaction, is frequently entirely collateral to the gist of the action. Thus, where a father sues the defendant for a trespass for the seduction of his daughter, the gist of the action is the trespass and the loss of his daughter's services; but the collateral cause is the injury done to his feelings, for which the principal damages are given. See 1 Viner, Abr. 593; Tayl. Ev. 384; Bac., Abr. Pleas, B.; Doctr. Plac. 85; DAMAGES.

GIVE. A term used in deeds of conveyance. At common law, it implied a covenant for quiet enjoyment; 2 Hill. R. P. 866. So in Kentucky; 1 Pirtle, Dig. 211. In Maryland and Alabama it is doubtful; 7 G. & J. 811; 5 Ala. N. S. 555. In Ohio, in conveyance of freehold, it implies warranty for the grantor's life; 2 Hill. R. P. 866. In Maine it implies a covenant; 6 Me. 227; 23 id. 219. In New York it does not, by statute. See 14 Wend. 83. It does not imply a covenant in North Carolina; 1 Murph. 343; nor in England, by statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, § 4. See COVENANT; GIFT.

The word give, in a statute providing that no person shall give away any intoxicating liquors, etc., does not apply to giving such liquor at private dwellings, etc., unless given to a habitual drunkard, or unless such dwelling, etc., becomes a place of public resort. 144 U. S. 833. See LIQUOR LAWS.

GIVE, GRANT, CONVEY. The words "give, grant and convey" are as comprehensive as any that can be used to convey a legal title, and are as efficient in law to transfer the title. 1 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 31.

GIVER. He who makes a gift. By his gift, the giver always impliedly agrees with the donee that he will not revoke the gift.

GIVING IN PAYMENT. In Louisiana. A term which signifies that a debtor, instead of paying a debt he owes in money, satisfies his creditor by giving in payment a movable or immovable. See DATION EN PAIEMENT.

GIVING TIME. An agreement by which a creditor gives his debtor a delay or time in paying his debt beyond that contained in the original agreement. When other persons are responsible to him, either as drawer, indorser, or surety, if such time be given without the consent of the latter, it discharges them from responsibility to him; and the same effect follows if time is given to one of the joint makers of a note; 3 Dan. Neg. Inst. 299. See SURETYSHIP; GUARANTY.

GLADIUS (Lat.). In old Latin authors, and in the Norman laws, this word was used to signify supreme jurisdiction: jus gladii.

GLANVILLE. The author of the most ancient treatise on English law, written in Latin, about A. D. 1181.

GLEANING. The act of gathering such grain in a field where it grew, as may have been left by the reapers after the sheaves were gathered.

There is a custom in England, it is said, by which the poor are allowed to enter and glean upon another's land after harvest, without being guilty of a trespass; 3 Bla. Com. 212. But it has been decided that the community are not entitled to claim this privilege as a right; 1 H. Bla. 51. In the United States, it is believed, no such right exists. It seems to have existed in some parts of France. Merlin, Rép. Glanage. As to whether gleaning would or would not amount to larceny, see Wood, Landl. & T. 242; 2 Russ. Cr. 99. The Jewish law may be found in the 19th chapter of Leviticus, verses 9 and 10. See Ruth ii. 2, 3; Isaiah xxii. 6.

GLEBE. In Ecclesiastical Law. The land which belongs to a church. It is the dowry of the church. Gleba est terra qua consistit dos ecclesie. 9 Cra. 329.

In Civil Law. The soil of an inheritance. There were serfs of the glebe, called glebae addicti. Code 11. 47. 7, 21; Nov. 54, c. 1.

GLOSS (Lat. glossa). Interpretation; comment; explanation; remark intended to illustrate a subject,—especially the text of an author. See Webster, Dict.

In Civil Law. Glossae, or glossemata, were words which needed explanation. Calvinus, Lex. The explanations of such words. Calvinus, Lex. Especially used of the short comments or explanations of the text of the Roman Law, made during the twelfth century by the teachers at the schools of Bologna, etc., who were hence called glossators, of which glosses Accursius made a compilation which possesses great authority, called glossa ordinaria. These glosses were at first written between the lines of the text (glossae interlineares), afterwards, on the margin, close by and partly under the text (glossa marginalis). Cush. Intr. to Rom. Law 180.

GLOSSATOR. A commentator or annotator of the Roman law. One of the authors of the Gloss.

GLOUCESTER, STATUTE OF. An English statute, passed 6 Edw. I. c. 1, a. d. 1278; so called because it was passed at Gloucester. It was the first statute giving to a successful plaintiff "the costs of his writ purchased." There were other statutes made at Gloucester which do not bear this name. See stat. 2 Rich II.; Coers.

GO. To issue, as applied to the process of a court. 1 W. Bla. 50; 8 Mod. 421; 18 C. R. 85. Not frequent in modern use.

To be discharged from attendance at court. See GO WITHOUT DAY.

In a statute of descents, to go to is to vest in.

In a statute stating that property shall go to the survivor, etc., held to mean shall vest. 14 A. & E. Ency. 1072; 121 Cal. 131. The words "take effect," "be in force," "go into operation," are used interchangeably. Id.; 4 Ind. 348. Where it is agreed that a paper shall go in evidence, it should be considered in evidence whether read in evidence or not. "Shall go in evidence" is tantamount to "shall be considered in evidence." Id.; 81 Ill. 88. The words "to go" in a will have been held equivalent to the word "descend." Id.; 106 Pa. St. 181.

GO BAIL. To become surety in a bail bond.

GO IN EVIDENCE. To be considered in evidence. 14 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 1072; 81 Ill. 88.

GO TO. May mean to be given to, to descend to. Anderson.

GO TO PROTEST. Of negotiable paper, to be protested for non-payment or non-acceptance.

GO WITHOUT DAY. Words used to denote that a party is dismissed the court. He is said to go without day, because there is no day appointed for him to appear again, or because the suit is discontinued.

GOAT, GOTE (Law Lat. gota; Germ. gote). A canal or sluice for the passage of water. Charter of Roger, Duke of Basingham, anno 1220, in Tabularis S. Bertini; Du Cange.

A ditch, sluice, or gutter. Cowel, Gote; stat. 23 Hen. VIII. c. 5. An engine for draining waters out of the land into the sea, erected and built with doors and percelluses of timber, stone, or brick,—invented first in Lower Germany. Callis, Sewers 66.

GOD AND MY COUNTRY. When a prisoner is arraigned, he is asked, How will you be tried? he answers, By God and my country. This practice arose when the prisoner had the right to choose the mode of trial, namely, by ordeal or by jury, and then he elected by God or by his country, that is, by ordeal or by jury. It is probable that originally it was By God or my country; for the question asked supposes an option in the prisoner, and the answer is meant to assert his innocence by declining neither sort of trial. 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 416; Barring. Stat. 73, note. See ORDEAL; WAGER OF BATTLE.

GOD BOTE. In Ecclesiastical Law. An ecclesiastical or church fine imposed upon an offender for crimes and offences committed against God.

GOD'S PENNY. In Old English Law. Money given to bind a bargain; earnest-money. So called because such money was anciently given to God,—that is, to the church and the poor.

"All over western Europe the earnest becomes known as the God's penny or Holy Ghost's penny (denarius Dei). Sometimes we find that it is to be expended in the purchase of tapers for the patron saint of the town, or in works of mercy. Thus the contract is put under divine protection. In the law merchant as stated by Fleta we seem to see God's penny yet afraid, if we may so speak, to proclaim itself as what it really is, namely, a sufficient vestment for a contract of sale. A few years later Edward I. took the step that remained to be taken, and by his Corfa Mercatoria in words which seem to have come from the south of Europe, proclaimed that among merchants the God's penny binds the contract of sale so that neither party may renege from it. At a later day this now rule passed from the law merchant into the common law." 3 Pol. & Maitl. 307. See DENARIUS DEI; EARNEST.

GOING. The "going" of sheep in Barnham in Norfolk meant that the sheep should be pasture fed. 3 B. & Ad. Rep. 543.

GOING CONCERN. An existing and prosperous company. 14 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 1072.

One that is still continuing to transact its ordinary business, though it may be insolvent. Anderson. See GOING VALUE.

GOING FREE. A nautical phrase meaning sailing with eased sheets. Stand. Dict. See GOING OFF LARGE.

GOING OFF LARGE. A nautical phrase, signifying having the wind free on either tack. Steam vessels, in that their impetus is controlled by human skill, are considered as vessels "going off large," or navigating with a fair wind. Abbott. See GOING FREE.

GOING RATE. "Going rate" as to freight, like "market price" for produce, means a fixed and established price for the time. To make a market price there must be buying and selling, purchase and sale. 14 A. & E. Ency. 1072; 1 Flipp. 519.

GOING VALUE. The value arising from having an established going business. The added value of a plant as a whole over the sum of the values of its component parts, which is attached to it because it is in active and successful operation and earning a return. Not equivalent to good-will (q. v.), but of a somewhat similar nature. 7 Fletch. Corp. § 4537; 212 U. S. 9. See GOING CONCERN.

GOING WITNESS. One who is going out of the jurisdiction of the court, although only into a state or country under the same general sovereignty: as, for example, if he is going from one to another of the United States, or, in Great Britain, from England to Scotland. 2 Dick. Ch. 454. See DEPOSITION; WITNESS.

GOLD. Contracts expressly stipulating for payment in gold and silver dollars can only be satisfied by the payment of coined dollars; Bronson v. Rodas, 7 Wall. 220; where it was said: "A contract to pay a certain number of dollars in gold or silver coins is nothing else than an agreement to deliver a certain weight of standard gold to be ascertained by a count of coins, each of which is certified to contain a definite proportion of that weight." This case was followed in Id. 278; 96 U. S. 619; 162 U. S. 291. In the last case it was said: "This court has held that parties may contract for the payment of an obligation in gold, or any other money or commodity, and it must then be paid in the medium contracted for." It has been pointed out in 29 L. R. A. 593, note, that the rule in Bronson v. Rodas has not been affected in any way by the Legal Tender Cases in 12 Wall. 467. In Trebilcock v. Wilson, 12 Wall. 687, where a note in dollars was made payable in specie, it was held that the designated number of dollars must be paid in so many gold or silver dollars of the coinage of the United States, reversing the supreme court of Iowa, which had held that a tender of greenbacks or United States legal tender notes was sufficient.

In Gregory v. Morris, 96 U. S. 619, the party was entitled to recover a certain amount in gold coin; it was held that where the party, with the approbation of the court, takes judgment which might be discharged in currency, it should be entered for a sum in currency equivalent to the specified amount of that coin as bullion. A decision of a state court, which holds a tender of legal tender notes as valid in the payment of a contract payable only in specie, will be reviewed by the supreme court of the United States; 12 Wall. 667. The doctrine of the latter court is therefore binding upon all the state courts.

A contract to pay a certain number of dollars in gold; 4 Colo. 109; a draft for a certain number of gold dollars; 43 N. Y. 209; a note payable "in gold or silver;" 21 Ohio St. 406; a ground rent payable in "gold or silver lawful money of the United States;" 61 Pa. 263; are all enforceable according to their terms. A ground rent payable in "gold or silver money of the United States" must be paid in coin or its equivalent; 61 Pa. 263. In this case Agnew, J., said that the distinction taken in the earlier Pennsylvania cases between contracts for a specific article and contracts for lawful money (coin or currency) had become unimportant since the decision in Bronson v. Rodas. In such cases it is held that payment in currency is to be computed upon the value of gold at the time of payment; 4 Colo. 109. Where rent was payable "in current money of the State of New York equal in value to money of Great Britain," it was held that if payment was made in legal tender notes, the amount paid must equal the value of the stipulated amount of coin; 65 Barb. 392.

Where an act authorized a city to issue negotiable bonds, it was held to authorize the issue of bonds payable in gold coin; 87 Ala. 240; s. c. 4 L. R. A. 742; so of bonds "payable in gold coin of the present standard weight and fineness;" 700 Fed. Rep. 061. To the same effect, 3 Dill. 105; but, contra, of levee bonds which were issued payable "in gold coin," under an act which authorized the levee board to borrow money and issue its bonds therefor; 60 Miss. 298. But this judgment was reversed by the supreme court of the United States (162 U. S. 291), which held: That the inquiry as to the medium in which the bonds were payable raised a federal question and that the bonds were legally saleable in the money of the United States, whatever its description, and not in any particular kind of money, and that they were not void because of a want of power to issue them. Field, J., concurring, said that no transaction of commerce or business, etc., that is not immoral in its character, and which is not in its manifest purpose detrimental to society, can be declared invalid because made payable in gold coin or currency when that is established or recognized by the government.

An injunction will not lie to restrain the issue of municipal bonds payable "in gold or lawful money of the United States, at the option of the holder;" 96 Ga. 312. But where a statute authorized the issue of bonds payable "in gold coin or lawful money of the United States," an issue of bonds payable in gold coin of the United States of the present standard of weight and fineness was held invalid; 29 L. R. A. (Cal.) 512.

In the absence of stipulation in the contract, a right to demand payment in coin will not be implied, although it appear that payment in coin was the only method of payment recognized by law when the contract was entered into and that the parties no doubt expected that payment would be made in coin; 22 Wall. 105. So when the consideration in a note was a loan of gold and silver and there was no stipulation to pay in such money; 25 Cal. 502.

An insurance company in an action against an agent who had collected premiums in gold; 104 Mass. 192; and a hotel guest in an action against an innkeeper to recover for gold coin left at the inn for safe keeping; 46 N. Y. 291, are entitled to judgment in gold coin. In an action against an express company for failure to deliver gold coin which it received for transportation, judgment was entered in currency notes for the amount of the gold coin with the premium on gold added with interest from the date of demand; 98 Mass. 550. Where a person deposited both coin and treasury notes in a bank in 1861, it was held that the bank need not pay him in coin unless there was an express agreement to that effect; 5 Wall. 663.

Dollars payable in gold means that every such dollar is a piece of gold certified to be a certain weight and purity, by the form and impress given to it at the mint of the United States. Any number of such dollars is the number of grains of standard gold or silver in one dollar multiplied by the given number. A contract to pay a certain number of dollars in gold coins is, therefore, in legal import, nothing else than an agreement to deliver a certain weight of standard gold, to be ascertained by a count of coins, each of which is certified to contain a definite proportion of that weight. 7 Wall. (U. S.) 250.

GOLD CERTIFICATES. Certificates issued by the United States as currency, redeemable in gold deposited for their redemption. English.

GOLDEN RULE AND SACRED ADVICE. In Law. "Agree with thine adversary quickly whilst thou art in the way with him." 5 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 416.

GOLDSMITH'S NOTES. In English Law. Banker's notes: so called because the trades of banker and goldsmith were originally joined. Chitty, Bills 423.

GONORRHEA. "Gonorrhea," if contracted by voluntary act, is a loathsome disease within the meaning of the statute entitling a wife to a divorce on such grounds. 41 S. W. 27.

GOOD.

In an action for the breach of a contract calling for the delivery of "good merchantable corn," an instruction using the phrase "sound merchantable corn" is not erroneous for the words "sound" and "good" mean substantially the same. 132 Ky. 496, 116 S. W. 784. See FOR GOOD CAUSE.

GOOD AND LAWFUL FENCE. Every strong and sound fence of rails, or plank, or wire, or wire and plank, or iron, or of hedge, four and one-half feet high, and being so close that cattle cannot creep through, or made of stone and brick, four and one-half feet high, or a ditch three feet deep, and three feet broad, with a hedge two feet high, or a rail, plank, stone, smooth or barbed wire, or brick fence two and one-half feet high on the margin thereof, the hedge or fence being so close that cattle cannot creep through, shall be deemed a "good and lawful fence." 153 Ky. 816, 156 S. W. 861.

GOOD AND LAWFUL MEN. Those qualified to serve on juries; that is, those of full age, citizens, not infamous or non compos mentis; and they must be resident in the county where the venue is laid. Racon, Abr. Juries (A); Cro. Eliz. 654; Co. 3d Inst. 80; 2 Rolle 82; Cam. & N. 88.

GOOD AND VALID. Legally firm: e. g. a good title. Adequate; responsible: e. g. his security is good for the amount of the debt. Webst. A note satisfies a warranty of it as a "good" note if the makers are able to pay it, and liable to do so on proper legal diligence being used against them. 26 Vt. 406.

GOOD BEHAVIOR. Conduct authorized by law. Surety of good behavior may be demanded from any person who is justly suspected, upon sufficient grounds, of intending to commit a crime or misdemeanor. Surety for good behavior is somewhat similar to surety of the peace, but the recognizance is more easily forfeited, and it ought to be demanded with greater caution: 1 Binn. 98, n.; 14 Viner, Abr. 21; Dane, Abr. As to what is a breach of good behavior, see 2 Mart. La. n. 8. 693; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 61, s. 6; 1 Chitty, Pr. 676.

See SURETY OF THE PEACE.

A judge holding office for life also holds it during good behavior, dum se bene gesserit.

GOOD CONSIDERATION. See CONSIDERATION.

GOOD FAITH. An honest intention to abstain from taking any unconscientious advantage of another, even though the forms or technicalities of law, together with an absence of all information or belief of facts which would render the transaction unconscientious. 2 S. Dak. 384. See 84 Ill. 588; 65 Id. 200; 46 Ala. 79; 17 Hun 442.

That honesty of intention and freedom from knowledge, of circumstances which ought to put him on inquiry, which protects a purchaser, holder, or creditor from being implicated in an effort by one with whom he is dealing to defraud some party in interest. 111 U. S. 80. Good faith, in a statute regulating chattel mortgages, and declaring unrecorded mortgages to be invalid as against purchasers and mortgagees in good faith, means such as parted with something of value, or otherwise altered their position irretrievably, on the strength of the apparent ownership, and without notice. Good faith in this connection means actual reliance upon the ownership of the vendor or mortgagor, because without notice of the incumbrance. 21 N. J. Eq. 536.

Good faith is presumed in favor of the holder of negotiable paper: 93 U. S. 94; 94 Id. 754; 8 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 360; it is a presumption of law; 116 U. S. 609; and outweighs a presumption of payment; 107 Ind. 442; and such holder takes the paper free from any infirmity in its origin except such as make it void for illegality of consideration or want of capacity in the maker; 141 Mass. 296; 96 U. S. 51. While the presumption of law is sufficient in the absence of evidence, if the good faith of a party is put in issue by his adversary, he has a right to give affirmative evidence of it; 97 U. S. 272; as, where his ownership of negotiable paper is put in issue he may prove he became the owner in good faith; 105 U. S. 728. A person to whom the want of good faith is imputed in a statement shown to have been made by him may be asked if he believed this statement to be correct; 27 N. Y. 282. After proof of circumstances relied on as showing want of good faith by putting a person on inquiry, he may explain them by showing the reasons why he did not pursue the inquiry; 54 N. Y. 288; and after stating the explanation received upon inquiry he may testify that he was satisfied with it; 73 N. Y. 236. Where the knowledge of the third person is in issue proof of general reputation is sometimes competent as tending to show reasonable ground of belief or suspicion; 69 Mass. 504; 6 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 446; 96 Barb. 205. Good faith is not disproved by a forgotten conversation; 29 Hun 214.

One who has purchased for value and without notice, or his transferee, is termed a holder in good faith; 94 U. S. 432.

Trustees and persons acting in a fiduciary capacity are held to the utmost good faith. See TRUST; TRUSTEE; FIDUCIARY.

So long as the parent, in correcting his child, acts in good faith and without malice the criminal law will not interfere with him, however severe and unmerited the punishment, unless it produces permanent injury; Bish. New Cr. L. § 881; 95 N. C. § 88. See FATHER.

GOOD HABITS. The term "good habits" does not mean absolutely correct according to the strict rules of ethics, but that they are and always have been ordinarily good. 12 Bush (Ky.) 39.

GOOD HEALTH. The term "good health" is relative. It is not every indisposition, such as an occasional headache, or pains in the stomach or abdomen, or a discharge from the womb, that will justify a woman in saying that she is not in "good health." 145 Ky. 610, 140 S. W. 1018.

GOOD MORAL CHARACTER. The naturalization laws require that in order to be admitted to citizenship the applicant must, during his residence in the United States since his declaration of intention, have "behaved as a man of good moral character"; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2165.

What is a good moral character may vary in some respects in different times and places, but "it would seem that whatever is forbidden by the law of the land ought to be considered for the time being immoral within the purview of this statute;" 5 Sawy. 185. Accordingly a person who commits perjury is not a man of good moral character, and is therefore not entitled to naturalization; 62. But a distinction is drawn between acts which are mala se and those which are mala prohibita; and it is said that a single act of the former grade is sufficient to establish immoral character, but only habitual acts of the latter character; 62. It has been held that an alien who lives in a state of polygamy or believes that it may be rightfully practiced in defiance of the laws to the contrary, is not a person of good moral character entitled to naturalization; Ex parte Douglass, cited in 2 Bright. Fed. Dig. 25, from 5 West. Jur. 171.

Under the English excise laws it was held that the mere fact that a man lived in a state of concubinage was not such an absence of good character as would justify his conviction under the excise law for making and using a certificate of good character knowing it to be false; 16 C. B. n. s. 584. "Good or bad character does not depend on what a man knows of himself; it means his general reputation in the estimation of his neighbors; . . . the fact of a man's living with a woman without marrying her may possibly admit of some palliating circumstances;" 62.

The question what is a good moral character under the Pennsylvania license law of 1887 has recently been considered and passed upon by a divided court, the applicant for renewal having received his license upon stipulation not to apply again. It was held by Sulzberger, J., that the act "is not to be understood as setting up the highest ethical character. It means good moral character as it is used among men in the ordinary business of life, not that high type which ought to form the ideal of every virtuous person." McMichael, J., said: "I cannot consider a citizen of the United States one of good moral character who voluntarily files a stipulation that he will not apply again for the succeeding year before this court, and in violation of that agreement does make an application for a license. . . . But when a man has made a promise last year not to apply for a license this year, and has come into court with an application for a license in violation of that promise, my judgment and my judicial opinion is that he is not a man of good moral character as contemplated by the Act of Assembly." An appeal is now pending and undecided. Appeal of Donoghue. Superior Court, Pa. Oct. 3, 1897.

GOOD ORDER. A clause in a bill of lading stating goods were received in "good order," should be considered as referring to the exterior and apparent condition, and to the internal only so far as it might be inferred from external appearances. 9 B. Mon. (Ky.) 114.

GOOD ORDER AND CONDITION.

The general statement in a bill of lading that the goods have been shipped "in good order and condition," amounts to an admission by the shipowner that, insofar as he and his agents had the opportunity of judging, the goods were so shipped. Carsen, Carr of Goods by Sea, § 73, as between the shipowner and indorsee, who, on the faith of that admission, has become indorsee for value of the bill of lading.

GOOD REPAIR. A stipulation in a lease that lessee is to repair, or leave the premises in good repair at the expiration of the lease, does not obligate the tenant to restore the building which is destroyed by fire or other casualty without his fault. 103 Ky. 764, 46 S. W. 486.

GOOD REPUTE. An expression synonymous with and meaning only "of good reputation." 18 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 924.

GOOD AND SUFFICIENT DEED.

A "good and sufficient deed" is a marketable deed, one that will pass a good title to the land it purports to convey. 147 Ky. 844, 145 S. W. 1129.

GOOD TITLE. Such a title as a court of chancery would adopt as a sufficient ground for compelling specific performance, and such a title as would be a good answer to an action of ejectment by any claimant. 6 Exch. 878. See 23 Barb. 870. See TITLE.

GOOD WILL. The benefit which arises from the establishment of particular trades or occupations. The advantage or benefit which is acquired by an establishment, beyond the mere value of the capital, stocks, funds, or property employed therein, in consequence of the general public patronage and encouragement which it receives from constant or habitual customers, on account of its local position, or common celebrity, or reputation for skill or affluence or punctuality, or from other accidental circumstances or necessities, or even from ancient partialities, or prejudices. Story, Partn. § 99; 30 Cent. L. J. 153. See 1 Hoffm. 68; 16 Am. Jur. 87; 23 Beav. 84; 60 Pa. 161; 5 Russ. 29; 10 So. Rep. (La.) 616.

The advantages which may inure to the purchaser from holding himself out to the public as succeeding to an enterprise which has been identified in the past with the name and repute of his predecessor. 47 Fed. Rep. 465.

"The term good will can hardly be said to have any precise signification. It is generally used to denote the benefit arising from connection and reputation; and its value is what can be got for the chance of being able to keep that connection and improve it. Upon the sale of an established business its good will has a marketable value, whether the business is that of a professional man or of any other person. But it is plain that good will has no meaning except in connection with a continuing business; it may have no value except in connection with a particular house, and it may be so inseparably connected with it as to pass with it, under a will, or deed, without being specially mentioned." Lindl. Partn., Wentworth's ed. 440.

"The good will . . . is nothing more than the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place." Per Eldon, C., in 17 Ves. 335; but this is said to be too narrow a definition by Wood, V. C., who said that the term meant every advantage . . . that has been acquired by the old firm in carrying on its business, whether connected with the premises in which the business was previously carried on, or with the name of the late firm, or with any other matter carrying with it the benefit of the late business. Johns. (Eng. Ch.) 174.

The point of the opinion of Lord Eldon, so much referred to, was that there is no implied covenant or promise on the part of the vendor or assignor of the good will of a business, not to set up the same trade, in opposition to the purchaser, in the neighborhood; accordingly an injunction to prevent him from doing so was refused; 17 Ves. 335; Colly. Partn. 174. Since this case the English decisions, after passing through a period of vacillation, seemed recently to have established the implied contract of one who simply sells the business and good will upon a much more substantial basis. It was held by Lord Romilly in Labouchere v. Dawson that an outgoing partner may not solicit the old customers privately by letter or by a travelling agent if he has sold the good will to his former partners. This went upon the principle that a grantor may not derogate from his grant. This was considered to have gone beyond any previous case and was overruled in Pearson v. Pearson, 27 Ch. D. 145, where Cotton, L. J., said: "It is admitted that a person who has sold the good will of his business may set up a similar business next door and say that he is the person that carried on the old business, yet such proceedings manifestly tend to prevent the old customers going to the old place." See 74 L. T. 243. Between the rendering of these judgments Jessel, M. R., had enjoined the solicitation of old customers but not the dealing with them; 14 Ch. D. 603; in that case good will is defined as "the formation of that connection which has made the value of the thing that the late firm sold," and is frequently the only thing saleable. This definition was quoted with approval by Lord Herschell in Trego v. Hunt, infra. Another decision of Jessel, M. R., restraining a former partner from dealing with old customers was reversed by the court of appeal, but the order in this case, restraining the solicitation, was not appealed from; the court said that "to enjoin a man against dealing with people whom he has not solicited is not only to enjoin him, but to enjoin them, for it prevents them from having the liberty which anybody in the country might have of dealing with whom they like;" 15 Ch. D. 306. But the court of appeal, affirming the same judge, held that on the compulsory sale of a good will in bankruptcy proceedings, the bankrupt would not be restrained from solicitation. All the decisions based upon Labouchere v. Dawson were overturned by the case in 27 Ch. D. 145, which was followed by 44 Ch. D. 616. But in the recent case of Trego v. Hunt, [1896] App. Cas. 7, reversing [1895] 1 Ch. 462, the later decisions were overruled and the doctrine of Labouchere v. Dawson, was approved. There the good will remained with the old concern and the outgoing partner who had sold it to his former partner employed a clerk in the firm to keep the names and addresses of the firm's customers so that he might solicit their business on his own account. This the house of lords restrained him from doing. Lord MacNaghten designated the good will as "the very sap and life of the business, without which the business would yield little or no fruit," the result "of the reputation and connection of the firm which may have been built up by years of honest work or gained by lavish expenditure of money."

The vendor or retiring partner "may not sell the custom and steal away the customers. It is not an honest thing to pocket the price and then to recapture the subject of sale, to decoy it away or call it back before the purchaser has had time to attach it to himself and make it his very own." But "he may do everything that a stranger in the ordinary course of business would be in a position to do. He may set up where he will. He may push his wares as much as he pleases." In the same case it was said by Lord Dary, "that the idea of good will and what is comprised in the sale of business has silently been developed and grown since the days of Lord Eldon."

In this country the expressions of the courts as to what is the precise effect of a sale of good will, without restrictive covenants, vary as much as might be expected from the indefinable nature of the subject. The opinion of Lord Eldon has been, in the main, very closely followed, though often criticised in both countries. Such a sale has been said to carry with it only the probability that the business will continue in the future as in the past; 33 Cal. 620; or the favor which the management has won from the public and the possibility that the customers will continue their patronage; 50 Mich. 401; and commend it to others; 54 id. 215. A recent writer concludes, that it amounts to nothing more than the right to succeed to the business and carry it on as a successor to the old concern; 33 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 217; and a recent federal decision terms it, "those advantages which may inure to the purchaser from holding himself out to the public as succeeding to an enterprise which has been identified in the past with the name and the repute of his predecessors;" 47 Fed. Rep. 467, affirmed 55 id. 895. The principle of Labouchere v. Dawson that the vendor would not be permitted to solicit trade from the customers of the old business was maintained in this country in cases prior to the English decisions; 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. (Pa.) 476; 14 Allen 211; 36 Ohio St. 261; nor has he the right to hold himself out as the successor of the old firm or as continuing its business; 60 Pa. 458; 113 Mass. 175; 47 Fed. Rep. 465; affirmed, 55 id. 895; 44 N. H. 835; 8 L. T. n. s. 447; 11 id. 299; but he may set up a similar business; 85 La. Ann. 60; 83 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 551; 143 Mass. 593; 8 Brewst. Pa. 133; 5 Allen 345; 3 Tenn. Ch. 347; 128 N. Y. 650 (but in this case there was no conveyance of the good will in terms). See 129 id. 156. The vendor may bind himself not to engage in the same business within a limited time or distance, by express covenant, which, if reasonable, is valid. See RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

The question has been much discussed whether good will is an incident of the business, of the premises, or of the person. It has been held to be personal and not local; 21 La. Ann. 391; 25 L. J. n. s. 194; but it is said to be the general rule that the good will is an incident of the premises; 60 Pa. 161; 84 N. Y. 550; 35 La. Ann. 60; where a widow carried on the business of a licensed victualler on leased premises and assigned all her goods, stock in trade, etc., without mentioning the good will, in trust prior to her second marriage, the good will passed by the assignment as an incident to the stock and license, and not to the husband with the premises; 6 Beav. 269. It is said by the United States supreme court, that good will is only an incident, as connected with a going concern, of business having locality or name, and is not susceptible of being disposed of independently; 149 U. S. 436. See 36 Fed. Rep. 722.

As between partners, it has been held that the good will of a partnership trade survives; 5 Ves. 639; but this appears to be doubtful; 15 Ves. 227; and is not in accord with modern authorities; 27 Beav. 440; id. 236; 28 id. 453. A distinction in this respect has been suggested between commercial and professional partnerships; 3 Madd. 79; 2 De G. & J. 620; but see 14 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 10, where the distinction is said to be untenable. It has been held that the firm name constitutes a part of the good will of a partnership; Johns. (Eng. Ch.) 174; 6 Hare 325; contra, 19 How. Pr. 14. Where a partner sells out his share in a going concern, he is presumed to include the good will; Johns. (Eng. Ch.) 174; see 46 Ill. App. 188; 128 U. S. 514; and he cannot use the firm name in a business of like character carried on by him in the vicinity; 33 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 88; or a name so similar to that of the first as to mislead and draw off business; 54 Mich. 215. When a partnership is dissolved by death, bankruptcy, or otherwise, the good will is an asset of the firm, and should be sold and the proceeds distributed among the partners; 15 Ves. 218; 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. (Pa.) 270; Lindl. Partn. Wentworth's ed. 443. On the death of a partner the good will does not go to the survivor, unless by express agreement; 22 Beav. 84; 26 L. J. n. s. 391. It has been held, however, that on the dissolution of a partnership by the death of one of its members, the surviving partners may carry on the same line of business, at the same place, without liability to account to the legal representative of the deceased partner for the good will of the firm, in the absence of their own agreement to the contrary; 37 Neb. 158. The dissolution of the firm during the life time of all the partners gives each of them the right to use the firm name; 34 Beav. 566; contra, 4 Sandf. Ch. 379. See 19 Alb. L. J. 602; 13 Cent. L. J. 161. The good will of a trade or business is a valuable right of property; 83 Cal. 450; 10 Exch. 147; it is an asset of the business; 17 Neb. 187; or of a decedent; 21 La. Ann. 391; but it does not include the use of the name of a deceased person; 8 N. Y. Supp. 652. It may be bequeathed by will; 27 Beav. 446. It may be sold like other personal property; see 3 Mer. 452; 1 J. & W. 589; 1 V. & B. 505; 17 Ves. 346; 2 Madd. 220; 2 B. & Ad. 841; 4 id. 592, 596; 5 Russ. 29; 2 Watts 111; 1 S. & S. 74; 75 Ia. 173; 62 Pa. 81. The right to use a name on a medicine may be assigned to an outgoing partner or to a successor in business, as an incident to its good will; 139 U. S. 540. In the United States the subject of good will has in the original technical sense less relative prominence than in England, but the subject has developed very great importance in connection with the use of trademarks and trade names, which titles see.

A good will may be mortgaged, assigned, or taken in execution, in connection with the business; 62; 89 L. J. Ch. n. s. 79; but not if dependent on the ability and skill of the proprietor; 25 Ch. D. 472. The vendor of a business and good will who stipulates against carrying on the business in the same place, may be enjoined from doing so as the agent of another; 88 Me. 357. The purchaser who finds there is no good will is without remedy unless he can show fraudulent representation or suppression of fact by the vendor; 7 Misc. Rep. 484.

The purchaser of a good will and firm name is entitled to receive letters and telegrams addressed to it and to the advantage of business propositions from customers of the old firm contained in them; 27 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 885.

The measure of damages for the breach of a contract of sale of good will is the loss suffered by the vendee, not the profits made by the vendor; 110 Cal. 150.

See, generally, 14 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 1, 829, 849, 713; 83 Id. 210; 30 Cent. L. J. 155; 84 Sol. J. 204; Lindl. Partn. Wentworth's ed. 440-9; Allan, Law of Goodwill.

GOODS. In Contracts. The term goods is not so wide as chattels, for it applies to inanimate objects, and does not include animals or chattels real, as a lease for years of house or land, which chattels does include. Co. Litt. 118; 1 Russ. 876.

Goods will not include fixtures; 2 Mass. 495; 4 J. B. Moore 73; a subscription for stock; 77 Md. 99; or teams and wagons, notes and accounts due; 55 Ia. 520. In a more limited sense, goods is used for articles of merchandise; 2 Bla. Com. 889. It has been held in Massachusetts that promissory notes were within the term goods in the Statute of Frauds; 8 Metc. Mass. 865; but see 24 N. H. 484; 4 Dudl. 28; so stock or shares of an incorporated company; 20 Pick. 9; 8 H. & J. 88; 15 Conn. 400; so, in some cases, bank notes and coin; 2 Stor. 52; 5 Mas. 587; 12 Wend. 486. The word "goods" is always used to designate wares, commodities, and personal chattels; the word effects is the equivalent of the word movables; 83 Pa. 126.

In Wills. In wills goods is nomen generalissimum, and, if there is nothing to limit it, will comprehend all the personal estate of the testator, as stocks, bonds, notes, money, plate, furniture, etc.; 1 Atk. 180; 1 P. Wms. 267; 1 Bro. C. C. 128; 4 Russ. 370; Wms. Ex. 1014; 1 Rep. Leg. 250; but in general it will be limited by the context of the will; see 2 Belt. Suppl. Ves. 287; 1 Ves. 63; 2 Dall. 142; Sugd. Vend. 493. See 1 Jarm. Wills 751; and the titles BIENS, CHATTELS; FURNITURE.

GOODS AND CHATTELS. In Contracts. A term which includes not only personal property in possession, but choses in action and chattels real, as a lease for years of house or land, or emblements. 12 Co. 1; 1 Atk. 182; Co. Litt. 118; 1 Russ. 876; see 31 Gratt. 181; it includes railroad ties; 39 Minn. 145.

A merchant's stock in trade is "goods and chattels permanently located," provided such goods and chattels are taxable in the city or county where they are so located; 28 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 284.

In Criminal Law. Choses in action, as bank notes, mortgage deeds, and money, do not fall within the technical definition of "goods and chattels." And if described in an indictment as goods and chattels, these words may be rejected as surplusage; 4 Gray 416; 3 Cox, Cr. Cas. 460; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 450; 1 Dears. & B. 426; 2 Zab. 207; 1 Leach 241, 4th ed. 488. See 5 Mas. 537.

In Wills. If unrestrained, these words will pass all personal property; Wms. Ex. 1014 Am. notes. See 1 Jarm. Wills 751; Add. Contr. 81, 201, 912; Beach, Wills 470.

GOODS SOLD AND DELIVERED. A phrase used to designate the action of assumption brought when the sale and delivery of goods furnish the cause.

A sale, delivery, and the value of the goods must be proved. See ASSUMPT.

GOODS, WARES, AND MERCHANDISE. A phrase used in the Statute of Frauds. Fixtures do not come within it; 1 Cr. M. & R. 275. Growing crops of potatoes, corn, turnips, and other annual crops, are within it; 8 D. & R. 814; 10 B. & C. 446; 4 M. & W. 847; contra, 3 Taunt. 88. See Addison, Contr. 31; Blackb. § 4, 5; 2 Dana 200; 2 Rawle 161; 5 B. & C. 829; 10 Ad. & E. 758. As to when growing crops are part of the realty and when personal property, see 1 Washb. R. P. 8. A contract for the sale of apples, peaches, and blackberries which might be raised during certain years, are chattels personal and not within the statute; 37 Mo. App. 56. Promissory notes and shares in an incorporated company, and, in some cases, money and bank-notes, have been held within it; see 2 Pars. Contr. 830; and so have a bond and mortgage; 53 N. J. Law 168; 20 Mo. App. 200; the term "merchandise" as used in the revised statutes of the United States includes goods, wares, and chattels of every description capable of being imported; R. S. § 2786. See 109 Mo. 78; GOODS AND CHATTELS.

GORGE. A defile between hills or mountains, that is a narrow throat or outlet from a region of country. 25 Kan. 214.

GOTTEN BY. "Gotten by" means that the person referred to had done some act and has escaped the injurious and detrimental consequences which usually attend such an act. 162 Kv. 298, 172 S. W. 530.

GOUT. In Medical Jurisprudence. A nutritional disorder associated with an excessive formation of uric acid, and characterized by attacks of acute inflammation of the joints, by the gradual deposit of urate of sodium in and about the joints, and by the occurrence of irregular constitutional symptoms. Osler, Practice of Med.

In case of insurance on lives, when there is warranty of health, it seems that a man subject to the gout is capable of being insured, if he has no sickness at the time to make it an unequal contract; 2 Park, Ins. 350.

GOVERNMENT (Lat. gubernaculum, a rudder. The Romans compared the state to a vessel, and applied the term gubernator, helmsman, to the leader or actual ruler of a state. From the Latin, this word has passed into most of the modern European languages). That institution or aggregate of institutions by which a state makes and carries out those rules of action which are necessary to enable men to live in a social state, or which are imposed upon the people forming that society by those who possess the power or authority of prescribing them. Government is the aggregate of authorities which rule a society. By administration, again, we understand in modern times, and especially in more or less free countries, the aggregate of those persons in whose hands the reins of government are for the time being (the chief ministers or heads of departments). But the terms state, government, and administration are not always used in their strictness. The government of a state being its most prominent feature, which is most readily perceived, government has frequently been used for state; and the publicists of the last century almost always used the term government, or form of government, when they discussed the different political societies or states. On the other hand, government is often used, to this day, for administration, in the sense in which it has been explained. We shall give in this article a classification of all governments and political societies which have existed and exist to this day.

Governments, or the authorities of societies, are, like societies themselves, grown institutions. See INST. 101.

They are never actually created by agreement or compact. Even where portions of government are formed by agreement, as, for instance, when a certain family is called to rule over a country, the contracting parties must previously be conscious of having authority to do so. As society originates with the family, so does authority or government. Nowhere do men exist without authority among them, even though it were but in its mere incipency. Men are forced into this state of things by the fundamental law that with them, and with them alone of all mammals, the period of dependence of the young upon its parents outlasts by many years the period of lactation; so that, during this period of post-lactational dependence, time and opportunity are given for the development of affection and the habit of obedience on the one hand, and of affection and authority on the other, as well as of mutual dependence. The family is a society, and expands into clusters of families, into tribes and larger societies, collecting into communities, always carrying the habit, and necessity of authority and mutual support along with them. As men advance, the great and pervading law of mutual dependence shows itself more and more clearly, and acts more and more intensely. Man is eminently a social being, not only as to an instinctive love of aggregation, but not only as to material necessity and security, but not only as to mental and intellectual development, and not only as to a given number of distinct beings, or what we will call as to extent, but also as to descent of generation after generation, or, as we may call it, transmission. Society, and its government along with it, are continuous. Government exists and continues among men, and laws have authority for generations which neither made them nor had any direct representation in making them, because the necessity of government—necessary according to the nature of social man and to his wants—is a continuous necessity. But the family is not only the institution from which once, at a distant period, society, authority, government arose. The family increases in importance, distinctness, and intensity of action as man advances, and continues to develop authority, obedience, affection, and social adhesiveness, and thus acts with reference to the state as the feeder acts with reference to the canal; the state originates daily anew in the family.

Although man is an eminently social being, he is also individual, morally, intellectually, and physically; and though his individuality may endure even beyond this life, he is compelled, by his physical condition, to appropriate and to produce, and thus to imprint his individuality upon the material world in order to create proper food for himself, and also an appropriating and producing, he is also an exchanging being. He always exchanges and always intercommunicates. This constant intertwining of man's individualism and socialism creates mutual claims of protection, rights, the necessity of rules, and, in one word, the importance of distinctness, and members of society, men produce and require government. No society, no cluster of men, no individuals banded together even for a temporary purpose, can exist without some sort of government instantly springing up. Government is natural to human characteristics. No animals have a government; no authority exists among the brutes, and physical submission alone exists among them. Man alone has laws which ought to be obeyed but may be disobeyed. Expansion, accumulation, development, progress, relapses, disintegration, violence, error, superstition, the necessity of intercommunication, wealth, and poverty, peculiar disposition, temperament, configuration of the country, traditional types, pride and avarice, knowledge and ignorance, sagacity of individuals, taste, activity and sluggishness, noble or criminal bias, position, both geographical and chronological,—all that affects numbers of men affects the government, and an endless variety of governments and political societies has been the consequence; but, whatever form of government may present itself to us, the fundamental idea, however rudely conceived, is always the protection of society and its members, security of person and person, the administration of justice, therefore, and the united efforts of society to furnish the means to authority to carry out its objects,—contribution, which, viewed as imposed by authority, is taxation. Those bands of robbers which occasionally have risen in disintegrating societies, as in India, to whom robbery and theft were the only means by which they did not mean to administer justice or protect the people, form no exception, although the extent of their soldiery and the periodicity of their raids caused them to be called governments. What little of government continued to exist was still the remnant of the continuing government of the oppressed hamlets; while the robbers themselves could not exist without a government among themselves.

Aristotle classified governments according to the seat of supreme power, and he has been generally followed down to very recent times. Accordingly, we had Monarchy, that government in which the supreme power is vested in one man, to which was added, at a later period, the idea of hereditaryness. Aristocracy, the government in which the supreme power is vested in the aristoi, which does not mean, in this case, the best, but the excelling ones, the prominent, i. e. by property and influence. Privilege is its characteristic. Its corresponding degenerate government is the Oligarchy (from oligos, little, few), that government in which supreme power is exercised by a few privileged ones, who have arrogated to themselves the right of ruling. Democracy, that government in which supreme power is vested in the people at large. Equality is one of its characteristics. Its degenerate correspondent is the ochlocracy (from ochlos, the rabble), for which at present the barbarous term mobocracy is frequently used.

But this classification was insufficient even at the time of Aristotle, when, for instance, theocracies existed; nor is the seat of supreme power the only characteristic, nor, in all respects, by any means the chief characteristic. A royal government, for instance, may be less absolute than a republican government. In order to group together the governments and political societies which have existed and are still existing, with philosophical discrimination, we must pay attention to the chief principle, or, in other words, to the chief characteristic. The pervading spirit of the administration or wielding of the power, to the characteristics of the society or the influencing interests of the same, to the limitation or entirety of public power, to the peculiar relations of the citizen to the state. Indeed, every principle, relation, or condition characteristically influencing or shaping society or government in particular may furnish us with a proper division. We propose, then, the following

Grouping of Political Societies and Governments.

I. According to the supreme power-holder or the placing of supreme power, whether really or nominally so.

The power-holder may be one, a few, many, or all; and we have, accordingly:

A. Principality, that is, states the rulers of which are set apart from the ruled, or tabernally differ from the ruled, as in the case of the theocracy.

1. Monarchy.

- a. Patriarchy.
  - b. Christian government (as our Indians).
  - c. Secordotal monarchy (as the States of the Church; former sovereign bishoprics).
  - d. Kingdom, or Principality proper.
  - e. Theocracy (Jehovah and the chief magistrates in Israelite state).
2. Dynasty. It exists in Siam, and existed occasionally in the Roman empire; not in Sparta, because Sparta was a republic, although her two hereditary generals were called kings.

B. Republic.

1. Aristocracy.

- a. Aristocracy proper.
- aa. Aristocracies which are democracies within the body of aristocrats (as former Polish government).
- bb. Organic internal government (as Venice formerly).
- b. Oligarchy.
- c. Secordotal republic, or Hierarchy.
- d. Plutocracy (as we adopt this term from antiquity for a government in which it is the principle that the possessors of great wealth constitute the body of aristocracy).

2. Democracy.

- a. Democracy proper.
- b. Ochlocracy (Mob-rule), mob meaning unorganised multitude.

II. According to the unity of public power, or its division and limitation.

A. Unitariness, or absolutism.

1. According to the form of government.
  - a. Absolute monarchy, or despotism.
  - b. Absolute aristocracy (Venice); absolute secordotal aristocracy, etc. etc.
  - c. Absolute democracy (the government of the Agora, or market democracy).
2. According to the organization of the administration.
  - a. Centralized absolutism. Centralism, called bureaucracy when carried on by writing; at least, bureaucracy has very rarely existed, if ever, without centralism.
  - b. Provincial (satrap, pashas, provinces).

B. According to divisions of public power.

1. Governments in which the three great functions of public power are separate, viz., the legislative, executive, judiciary. If a distinct term contradistinguished to centralism was wanted, we might call these co-operative governments.
2. Governments in which these branches are not strictly separate, as, for instance, in our government, but which are nevertheless not centralized governments; as Republican Rome, Athens, and several modern kingdoms.

C. Institutional government.

1. Institutional government comprehending the whole, or constitutional government.
  - a. Deputative government.
  - b. Representative government.
  - aa. Bicameral.
  - bb. Unicameral.
2. Local self-government. See V. We do not believe that any substantial self-government can exist without an institutional character and subordinate self-governments. It can exist only under an institutional government (see Lieber's Civil Liberty and Self-Government, under "Institution").

D. Whether the state is the substantive or the means, or whether the principle of socialism or individualism prevails.

1. Socialism. That state of society in which the socialist principle prevails, or in which government considers itself the substantive; the ancient states absorbing the individual or making citizenship the highest phase of humanity; absolutism of Louis XIV. Indeed, all modern absolutism is socialism.
2. Individualism. That system in which the state remains acknowledged a means, and the individual the substantive; where primary claims, that is, rights, are felt to exist, for the obtaining and protection of which the government is established—the government, or even society, which must not attempt to absorb the individual. The individual is immortal, and will be of another world; the state is neither.

III. According to the descent or transfer of supreme power.

A. Hereditary governments.

- a. Monarchies.
- b. Hierarchies, etc.

B. Elective.

- a. Monarchies.
- b. Hierarchies.

C. Hereditary-elective governments, the rulers of which are chosen from a certain family or tribe.

- D. Governments in which the chief magistrate or monarch has the right to appoint the successor, as occasionally the Roman emperors, the Chinese, the Russian, in theory, Bonaparte when consul for life.

IV. According to the origin of supreme power, real or theoretical.

- A. According to the primordial character of power.

1. Based on jus divinum.

- a. Monarchies.
- b. Communism, which rests its claims on a jus divinum or extra-political claim of society.
- c. Democracies, when proclaiming that the people, because the people, can do what they list, even against the law; as the Athenians once declared it, and Napoleon III. when he desired to be elected president a second time against the constitution.

2. Based on the sovereignty of the people.

- a. Establishing an institutional government as with us.
- b. Establishing absolutism (the Bonaparte sovereignty).

B. Delegated power.

1. Chartered governments.
  - a. Chartered city governments.
  - b. Chartered companies, as the reform great East India Company.
  - c. Proprietary governments.
2. Viceroyalties; as Egypt, and, formerly, Algiers.
3. Colonial government with constitution and high amount of self-government—a government of great importance in modern history.

V. Constitutions. (To avoid too many subdivisions, this subject has been treated here separately. See II.)

Constitutions, the fundamental laws on which governments rest, and which determine the relation in which the citizen stands to the government, as well as each portion of the government to the whole, and which therefore give feature to the political society, may be:

A. As to their origin.

1. Accumulative; as the constitutions of England or Republican Rome.
2. Enacted constitutions (generally, but not philosophically, called written constitutions).
  - a. Outroyed constitutions (as the French, by Louis XVIII).
  - b. Elected by the people, as our constitutions. ["We the people charter governments; formerly governments chartered the liberties of the people."]
    3. Facts between two parties, contracts, as Magna Charta, and most charters in the Middle Ages. The medieval rule was that as much freedom was enjoyed as it was possible to conquer, exiguam in the true sense.

B. As to extent or uniformity.

1. Broadened over the land. We may call them national constitutions, popular constitutions, constitutions for the whole state.
2. Special charters. Chartered, accumulated and varying franchises, medieval character. (See article Constitution in the Encyclopedia Americana.)

VI. As to the extent and comprehension of the chief government.

A. Military governments.

1. Commercial government; one of the first in Asia, and that into which Asiatic society relapses, as the only remaining element, when barbarous conquerors destroy all bonds which can be torn by them.

2. Tribal government.

- a. Stationary. We mention the nomadic government under the tribal government, because no other government has been nomadic, except the patriarchal government, which indeed is the incipency of the tribal government.
- b. Nomadic. We mention the nomadic government under the tribal government, because no other government has been nomadic, except the patriarchal government, which indeed is the incipency of the tribal government.

3. City government (that is, city-states; as all free states of antiquity, and as the Hanseatic governments in modern times).

4. Government of the Medieval Orders extending over portions of societies far apart; as the Templars, Teutonic Knights, Knights of St. John, Political societies without necessary territory, although they had always landed property.
5. National states; that is, populous political societies spreading over an extensive and cohesive territory beyond the limits of a city.

B. Confederacies.

1. As to admission of members, or extension.
  - a. Closed, as the Amphictyonic council, Germany.
  - b. Open, as ours.

2. As to the federal character, or the character of the members, as states.

- a. Leagues.
  - aa. Tribal confederacies; frequently observed in Asia; generally of a loose character.
  - bb. City leagues; as the Hanseatic League, the Lombard League.
  - cc. Congress of deputies, voting by states and according to instruction; as the Netherlands republic and our Articles of Confederation, Germanic Confederation.
  - dd. Present state system of Europe "with constant congresses, if we may call this "system," a federative government in its incipency.
- b. Confederacies proper, with national congresses.
  - aa. With ecclesiastical or democratic congresses (Achaean League).
  - bb. With representative national congresses, as ours.

C. Mere agglomerations of one ruler.

1. As the early Asiatic monarchies, or Turkey.
2. Several crowns on one head; as Austria,

Sweden, Denmark.

VII. As to the construction of society, the title of property and allegiance.

A. As to the classes of society.

1. Castes, hereditarily dividing the whole population, according to occupations and privileges. India, ancient Egypt.
2. Special castes.
  - a. Government with privileged classes or caste; nobility.
  - b. Government with degraded or oppressed caste; slavery.
  - c. Governments founded on equality of citizens (the uniform tendency of modern civilization).

B. As to property and production.

1. Communism.

2. Individualism.

C. As to allegiance.

1. Plain, direct; as in unitary governments.
2. Varied; as in national confederacies.
3. Graduated or encorporated; as in the feudal system, or as in the case with the serf.

D. Governments are occasionally called according to the prevailing interest or classes; as Military states; for instance, Prussia under Frederick II.

Maritime state.

Commercial.

Agricultural.

Manufacturing.

Ecological, etc.

VIII. According to simplicity or complexity, as in all other spheres, we have:

- A. Simple governments (formerly called pure; as pure democracy).
- B. Complex governments, formerly called mixed. All organism is complex.

See STATE; FEDERAL GOVERNMENT; EXECUTIVE POWER; JUDICIAL POWER; LEGISLATIVE POWER; UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, and the titles concerning the several states and countries. See LOCAL GOVERNMENT; MILITARY GOVERNMENT; REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT.

GOVERNMENT AS A CONTRACT.

Although, in the absence of special laws, the Government, purely as a contractor, may stand like a private person, it does not, by making a contract, waive its sovereignty or give up its power to make laws which render criminal a breach of the contract. 206 U. S. 246.

GOVERNMENTAL PURPOSES.

See PUBLIC PURPOSE.

GRACE. Favor or indulgence, as distinguished from right.

GRACE, DAYS OF. See DAYS OF GRACE.

GRADE. Used in reference to streets:

- (1) The line of the street's inclination from the horizontal;
- (2) a part of a street inclined from the horizontal. Cent. Dict. That is, it sometimes signifies the line established to guide future construction, and at other times, the street wrought to the line; 56 Ark. 38.

Grades of crime, in legal parlance, are always spoken of and understood as higher or lower in grade, or degree, according to the measure of punishment attached and meted out on conviction, and the consequences resulting to the party convicted; 61 Barb. 619.

GRADE CROSSING.

A place where one highway crosses another; in particular, a place where a railroad is crossed at grade by a public or private road, or by another railroad. The term is most frequently used with reference to the crossing of a public highway by a railroad.

At such a crossing it is the duty of the railroad company to construct and maintain safe and proper crossings; and it is liable for all injuries resulting from a failure to perform this duty; 91 Ind. 119; 43 Ia. 284; 80 Ky. 147; 88 Ohio St. 436; 56 Pa. 380; but the most numerous class of cases relating to grade crossings, arises from accidents to persons who are using the crossing, caused by the operation of trains thereon.

The rule that the roadbed and track of a railroad company are its private property, and that one who gets thereon does so at his own peril, does not apply to a highway crossing; 20 So. Rep. (Fla.) 536. At such a place the company hold its roadbed, subject to the right of the public to cross it; and that circumstance creates mutual rights and obligations. Both parties must use ordinary care in the exercise of their own rights. Theoretically, the rights of the company and a person who intends to cross are equal; practically, the more onerous duty of avoiding danger rests upon the latter, on account of the difficulty in stopping a train in rapid motion. But this fact, on the other hand, imposes upon the railroad company the duty of using every practicable agency consistent with the operation of its trains, to give due warning of their approach; 94 U. S. 105; 72 Ill. 235; 70 Ga. 261; 82 Ind. 485; 79 Ky. 442; 65 Md. 502; 58 N. Y. 451; 65 Pa. 269. Thus, the whistle must be sounded on approaching a crossing; 94 U. S. 105; 109 N. C. 472; 30 Pa. 454; and the better view is that watchmen should be stationed at every much-used crossing; 94 U. S. 105. But this rule is not uniformly held; and some courts have decided that the railroad company, unless required by statute, is under no obligation to give warning; 22 Minn. 165; 114 Mass. 850. This duty is now, however, generally prescribed by statute; and a failure to discharge it is in such a case always evidence of negligence, though not conclusive; 72 N. Y. 26; 34 S. C. 444; 90 Tenn. 144; 24 Ga. 75; 129 Mass. 810; 61 La. 432; 65 Ga. 120; 123 N. Y. 496; 125 N. Y. 715; 109 N. C. 472; 64 N. H. 823. As to the duty of the railway in the operation of its line at grade crossings, see Patterson, Ry. Acc. L. § 155, 172.

The railroad company is not alone bound to the exercise of care in approaching a crossing. A traveller who intends to cross is also bound to use ordinary prudence, by which is to be understood such as is fairly commensurate with the risk. He must, therefore, look for an approaching train, if he has a fair view of the track; and if his view is obstructed, he must also listen. If he does not do so, and is injured, he cannot recover; but if he does, and is nevertheless injured by the negligence of the company, the latter is liable to him; 110 Ill. 114; 49 La. 469; 31 La. Ann. 490; 67 Nev. 100; 143 Ind. 424; 39 Md. 574; 105 Mass. 203; 129 Mass. 440; 46 Minn. 230; 52 Mass. 806; 78 Mo. 138; 42 N. J. L. 180; 58 N. Y. 451; 92 N. Y. 658; 73 N. Y. 437; 24 Ohio St. 419; 73 Pa. 501; 81 id. 274; 6 Heisk. 174; 41 Wis. 44. It is not necessary to leave to the jury whether a prudent man would look and listen before attempting to cross a railroad track. It is the duty of the court to declare that a failure to do so is negligence; 75 Fed. Rep. 644; it is a conclusion of law; 61 Ark. 549; 48 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 1019; 14 C. A. 555; s. c. 67 Fed. Rep. 591; 54 id. (C. C. A.) 301.

One, who, on approaching a double-track railroad, looked to the north, and seeing no train, concentrated his attention on a switch-engine on the nearer track for a minute and a half, and then, without looking again to the north, started across and was struck by a train coming from that direction on the further track, was held guilty of negligence; 75 Fed. Rep. 644. See 159 U. S. 608; 3 App. D. C. 101; 14 C. C. A. 894; s. c. 67 Fed. Rep. 277. It is held in Pennsylvania that a traveller is required to stop, look, and listen for an approaching train; 78 Pa. 504; 90 Pa. 838; 97 id. 91; 102 id. 425. But this rule does not prevail in other courts, and in a recent Pennsylvania case it is said that without relaxing the rule just stated, "yet when the facts are not clear and simple, and where the existence of contributory negligence depends upon inferences to be drawn from the evidence, the question must go to the jury for decision;" 179 Pa. 227.

There are three very well-recognized exceptions to the rule which requires a traveller to look and listen for approaching trains. These are thus classified in a Rhode Island case; 14 R. I. 102: (1) When the view of the track is obstructed, and hence the injured party, not being able to see, is obliged to act upon his judgment at the time; 94 U. S. 105; 159 id. 608; L. R. 8 C. P. 868; 3 App. Cas. 1155; 57 Me. 117; 118 Mass. 431; 85 Pa. 60; (2) where the injured person is a passenger going to, or alighting from, a train, under the implied invitation and assurance of the company that he may cross the track in safety; L. 104 Mass. 157; 105 Mass. 203; 28 N. J. Eq. 474; 84 N. Y. 241; and (3) when the direct act of some agent of the company has put the person off his guard and induced him to cross the track without precautions; e. g. when the flagman beckons to him to cross; 29 Ia. 53; 10 Allen 868; 20 N. Y. 383. To these may be added cases where the traveller (as might happen to a stranger on a dark night) is ignorant of the nearness of the railroad, and when the driver of a horse, which becomes suddenly frightened, is obliged to choose between the risk of an upset or a collision. See Patterson, Ry. Acc. L. §§ 173-183, where the cases on the subject of contributory negligence at grade-crossings are collected.

It is also the general rule outside of Pennsylvania, that if the company maintains safety-gates at a crossing, which are closed at the approach of a train, a traveller who sees them standing open has the right to presume upon the implied invitation to cross; and may do so without looking and listening; 13 Wall. 270; 81 Cal. 326; 104 Mass. 109; 120 Mass. 257; 115 id. 190; 87 Ill. 401; 30 Minn. 482; 14 Nev. 351; 370; 40 N. J. L. 189; 78 N. Y. 518; 79 N. Y. 72; 24 Ohio St. 654; 48 Wis. 603.

The fact that one's sight or hearing is defective does not exonerate him from the exercise of due care, but rather raises the standard to be observed by him. The employee of the company have a right to presume that his sight and hearing are normal; and he must observe all the added precautions necessary to make him as safe as if his faculties were normal. If he does not, he is guilty of contributory negligence; 28 La. An. 320; 72 Mo. 168; 6 Oreg. 417.

As to the power of the states to require railroad companies to change, alter, or abolish grade crossings, see 4 Thomp. Corp. § 5503; POLICE POWER. As to signals at crossings; 37 Am. Rep. 443; as to care at crossings; 26 id. 207.

See CROSSING: RAILROAD; NEGLIGENCE; HIGHWAY; STREETS.

GRADED SCHOOL. "Graded schools" are common schools. 135 Ky. 468, 122 S. W. 813.

GRADED SCHOOL DISTRICT. The words "graded school district" and "common school district" as used in a statute are used as synonymous or interchangeable terms, and where the words "common school district" are used it applies to common school, graded or ungraded, white or colored. Middleton v. Stone, 163 Ky. 571, 174 S. W. 6.

GRADUATE. One who has taken a degree in a college or university. It is said to be a word of elastic meaning, involving infinite variety in the methods and standards of graduation which may be adopted; 40 La. Ann. 463.

GRADUS (Lat. a step). A measure of space. Vicat, Voc. Jur. A degree of relationship (distancia cognatorum). Heinkeius, Elem. Jur. Civ. § 153; Bract. fol. 184, 874; Fleta, lib. 6, c. 2, § 1, lib. 4, c. 17, § 4.

A step or degree generally; e. g. gradus honorum, degrees of honor. Vicat, Voc. Jur. A pulpit; a year; a generation. Du Cange.

A port; any place where a vessel can be brought to land. Du Cange.

GRAFFER (Fr. greffier, a clerk, or prothonotary). A notary or scrivener. See stat. 5 Hen. VIII. c. 1.

GRAFFIUM. A register; a ledger-book or cartulary of deeds and evidences. 1 Anal. Eccles. Menevensio, apud Angl. Sac. 658.

GRAFIO. A baron, inferior to a count. 1 Marten, Anecd. Collect. 18. A fiscal judge. An advocate. Gregor. Turon. l. 1, de Mirac. c. 33; Spelman, Gloss.; Cowell. For various derivations, see Du Cange.

GRAFT. In Equity. A term used to designate the right of a mortgagee in premises to which the mortgagor at the time of making the mortgage had an imperfect title, but afterwards obtained a good title. In this case the new title is considered a graft into the old stock, enuring to the benefit of the mortgagee, and arising in consideration of the former title; 1 Ball & B. 40, 46, 57; 1 Pow. Mort. 100. See 9 Mass. 34. "It is well settled that when a mortgage of land is made, purporting to convey the land in fee, any title afterward acquired by the mortgagor will feed the mortgage and enure to the benefit of the mortgagee." 1 Pingree, Mort. § 304; 70 Am. Dec. 449; 57 Cal. 507; 67 id. 275. And this is so where the title was in the government when the mortgage was made and a patent afterwards issued to the mortgagor; 1 Pingree, Mort. § 304; 71 Wis. 279. See 4 Wall. 232; 21 How. 228. But it is the prevailing doctrine that in the absence of statutory enactment there must be a covenant of warranty or something tantamount to it, to give this effect to the mortgage; 88 Mich. 382; 80 Ala. 178; 47 Ark. 111. See 1 Pingree, Mort. §§ 696-706. The purchase of a paramount title by a purchaser from the mortgagor does not inure to the benefit of the mortgagee; id. § 1012; and in some cases the mortgagee may be estopped to assert the after-acquired title of the mortgagor against an innocent purchaser; id.; 52 Pa. 359. The same principle has been obtained by legislative enactment in Louisiana. If a person contracting an obligation towards another, says the Civil Code, art. 3271, grants a mortgage on property of which he is not then the owner, this mortgage shall be valid if the debtor should ever acquire the ownership of the property, by whatever right. This principle is also adopted by statute in other states, as Arkansas; Mansf. Dig. § 842; and California; Civ. Code § 2980. See MORTGAGE.

GRAFTER. A "grafter" means a dishonest official. 133 Ky. 668, 118 S. W. 929.

GRAIN. The twenty-fourth part of a pennyweight.

For scientific purposes the grain only is used, and sets of weights are constructed in decimal progression, from ten thousand grains to one-hundredth of a grain.

Wheat, rye, barley, or Indian corn sown in the ground. It may include millet and oats; 34 Ga. 455; 29 N. J. L. 337; flaxseed; 55 La. 823; peas; 2 Strobl. 474; sugar cane seed; 34 Ga. 455. See AWAY-GOING CROP.

GRAINAGE. In English Law. The name of an ancient duty collected in London, consisting of one-twentieth part of the salt imported into that city.

GRAMME. The French unit of weight. The gramme is the weight of a cubic centimetre of distilled water at the temperature of 4° C. It is equal to 15.4341 grains troy, or 5.6481 drachms avoirdupois.

GRAND ASSIZE. An extraordinary trial by jury, instituted by Henry II., by way of alternative offered to the choice of the tenant or defendant in a writ of right, instead of the barbarous custom of trial by battle. For this purpose a writ de magna assize eligenda was directed to the sheriff to return four knights, who were to choose twelve other knights to be joined with themselves; and these sixteen formed the grand assize, or great jury to try the right between the parties; 3 Bla. Com. 351. Abolished by 8 and 4 Wm. IV. c. 42.

A later work says: "It is abundantly clear that, whatever may have been the practice at a later time, the grand assize was a body of twelve, not of sixteen, knights; in other words, the four electors took no part in the verdict." 2 Poll. & Matl. 618, n. 3.

Although the jury were theoretically to speak only about matter of fact, the principle was long latent and tacit. "The recognitors in a grand assize were called upon to say whether the defendant had greater right than the tenant, and in so doing they had an opportunity of giving effect of law. . . . We must not suppose that in such a case they followed the ruling of the justices;" id. 627.

The assize of novel disseisin, the requirement of a royal writ to compel a man to answer for his free tenement, and the grand assize, are considered by the writers last quoted to have been fashioned at the same time to uphold three principles founded upon the idea of the sacredness of a freehold and intended to assure the royal protection of possession. "No one is to be dissolved of his free tenement unjustly and without a judgment, . . . (nor) even by a judgment unless he has been summoned to answer by a royal writ; no one is to be forced to defend his estate of a free tenement by battle. The ordinance that instituted the grand assize was a one-sided measure, a protection of possessors. The claimant had to offer battle; the possessor, if he pleased, might refuse battle and put himself upon the grand assize." 1 id. 130. As to its place in the history of possessory actions. See 2 id. 62.

GRAND BILL OF SALE. In English Law. The name of an instrument used for the transfer of a ship while she is at sea. 7 Mart. La. 318; 3 Kent. 133. See BILL OF SALE.

GRAND CAPE. In English Law. A writ judicial which lieth when a man has brought a procepe quod reddat, of a thing that toucheth plea of lands, and the tenant makes default on the day given him in the writ original, then this writ shall go for the king, to take the land into the king's hands, and if he comes not at the day given him by the grand cap, he has lost his lands. Old N. B. fol. 161, 163; Regist. Judic. fol. 2 b; Brac. lib. 5, tr. 8, cap. 1, nu. 4, 5, 6. So called because its Latin form began with the word cape, "take thou," and because it had more words than the petit cape, or because petit cape summons to answer for default only. Petit cape issues after appearance to the original writ, grand magnum cape before. These writs have long been abolished. In Glanvill's day three successive summonses preceded the cape. See 2 Poll. & Maitl. 580.

GRAND COUTUMIER. Two collections of laws bore this title. One, also called the Coutumier of France, is a collection of the customs, usages, and forms of practice which had been used from time immemorial in France; the other, called the Coutumier de Normandie (which indeed, with some alterations, made a part of the former), was composed, about the fourteenth of Henry III., A. D. 1229, and is a collection of the Norman laws, not as they stood at the conquest of England by William the Conqueror, but some time afterwards, and contains many provisions probably borrowed from the old English or Saxon laws. Hale, Hist. Com. Law c. 6. The work was reprinted in 1891 with notes by William L. De Gruchy. The Channel Islands are still for the most part governed by the dual customs of Normandy; 1 Steph. Com. 100.

GRAND DAYS. In English Practice. Those days in the term which are solemnly kept in the inns of court and chancery, viz.: Candlemas-day in Hilary Term, Ascension-day in Easter Term, St. John the Baptist's day in Trinity Term, and All Saints' day in Michaelmas Term, which are dies non juridici, or no days in court, and are set apart for festivity. Jacob, Law Dic.

All this is now altered: the grand days, which are different for each term of court, are those days in each term in which a more splendid dinner than ordinary is provided in the hall; Moz. & W.

GRAND DISTRESS (Lat. magna districtio). An ancient kind of distress, more extensive than the writs of grand and petit cape, extending to all the goods and chattels of the party distressed within the county. T. L.; Cowel. The writ lay in real actions, and was so called on account of its quality and great extent. It lay in two cases, either when the tenant or defendant was attached, and did not appear, but made default; or when the tenant or defendant had once appeared, and afterwards made default. Fleta lib. 2, c. 69; Cowell; Holthouse. See WRIT OF GRAND DISTRESS.

GRAND JURY. In Practice. A body of men, consisting at common law of not less than twelve nor more than twenty-four, respectively returned by the sheriff of every county to every session of the peace, oyer and terminer, and general goal delivery, to whom indictments are preferred. 4 Bl. Com. 802; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 310, 311; 1 Jur. Soc. Papers; 31 Fla. 540, 556.

There is reason to believe that this institution existed among the Saxons; Crabb, Eng. Law 35. By the constitution of Clarendon, enacted 10 Hen. II. (A. D. 1164), it is provided that "if such men were suspected whom none wished or dared to accuse, the sheriff, being thereto required by the bishop, should swear twelve men of the neighborhood, or village, to declare the truth" respecting such supposed crime, the jurors being summoned as witnesses or accusers, rather than judges. It seems to be pretty certain that this statute either established grand juries, if this institution did not exist before, or reorganized them if they already existed; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 63. But a later work (passing over the question of the relation of the old Frankish inquest to the initiation of criminal proceedings by presentment by indictment) says of the accusing jury of the time of Henry II.: "The ancestors of our 'grand jurors' are from the first neither exactly accusers, nor exactly witnesses; they are to give voice to common repute." 2 Poll. & Maitl. 630; 1 id. 130; 2 id. 644; and the conclusion reached is "a great deal yet remained to be done before that process of indictment by a 'grand jury' and trial by a 'petty jury' with which we are all familiar would have been established. The details of this process will never be known until large piles of records have been systematically perused. This task we must leave for the historian of the fourteenth century. Apparently the change was intimately connected with the discontinuance of those cumbersome old eyes which brought 'the whole county' and every hundred and vill in it before the eyes of the justices;" 2 id. 646.

Organization. Where the common law prevails, unmodified by statutory or constitutional provisions, the law requires that twenty-four citizens shall be summoned to attend as grand jurors; but in practice not more than twenty-three are sworn, because of the inconvenience which might arise of having twelve, who are sufficient to find a true bill, opposed to another twelve who might be against it; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 161; 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. 854; 6 Ad. & El. 236; 2 Caines 98. There is no distinction between the qualification of grand and petit jurors; 35 S. C. 334.

In the United States the number is a matter of local regulation, and while in the main the common-law system has been continued, there is in this country a growing disposition to reduce the number of jurors by statute where it was practicable, and by constitutional provision where that was held to be necessary. It is beyond the present purpose to state in detail all the changes, or to do more than to indicate the existence of a prevailing tendency to simplify the proceedings, which, however, is coupled with a great respect for the grand jury as one of the common-law institutions protected by constitutional guaranty. For the regulations in force at any particular time in the several states, reference should be had to the local law.

The question has been much discussed whether in states having constitutional provisions for indictment by a grand jury a legislative change in the number required to find an indictment at common law is permissible. In several states this question has been answered in the negative where the constitutional provision specified "indictment by grand jury;" at least so far as to forbid a change making less than twelve sufficient to find an indictment; 107 N. C. 913; 31 Fla. 253, 340; 16 Wis. 384. See 25 Ga. 220. But the provision of the federal constitution securing the "due process of law" does not prevent the states from varying the common-law rule as to a grand jury; 85 Va. 703; 13 Col. 155; or even from dispensing with it; 110 U. S. 516. Where the state constitution prescribes a number it is obligatory; 84 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 120; but where the grand jury consisted of less than the required number but as many jurors concurred as were necessary to find an indictment it was sufficient; 56 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 540; and where the requisite number do concur, the fact that the panel was not full, either by reason of the discharge, or improper excusing of one or more members, or any like cause, does not invalidate an indictment; 25 Tex. App. 298, 314; 22 id. 572; 77 Ia. 417; 46 Fed. Rep. 881; 69 Ga. 11; 60 Vt. 142; 89 Ill. 571; 19 Wis. 583; 68 Ala. 92. A discharge of a juror is presumed to be proper; 54 Ark. 611; 4 Ind. 198; but if improper and void it does not affect the legal organization; 19 Tex. App. 95. It will be presumed that a grand jury was legally organized; 34 La. Ann. 216; 8 Colo. 325; and where the court has power to fill up the panel it will be presumed to have been rightly done; 129 Ill. 290. It has been held that when, on calling the grand jury, some of them fail to appear, the court may orally direct the sheriff to fill the vacancy without issuing a precept; 53 Ia. 84, 154; in other states a new venire facias is necessary; 63 Ala. 163; 20 N. J. L. 218. The power to excuse grand jurors confers upon the court, by implication, the power to fill the vacancy; 129 Ind. 290. If more are present than the statute permits the indictment is bad; 34 Miss. 614; 1 Utah 226; 92 Ky. 605; 2 Pears. Pa. 461, 460. A constitutional provision fixing the number of the panel and prescribing how many must concur is held to be self-executing; 18 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 528; 9 Mont. 187.

Constitutional and statutory provision. In Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Nebraska, Oregon, and Colorado, the constitution gives the legislature authority to make laws dispensing with a grand jury in any case. And in Alabama and Mississippi there is provision for other process in criminal cases. In Nebraska, the legislature may provide for holding persons to answer for criminal offences on the information of a public prosecutor. In a majority of the states there is an adherence to twelve as the number required to concur in finding an indictment, although in many of these less than twenty-three may be summoned, the change being in some cases by statute and in others by constitutional provision. Of these states, the required number is thirteen to eighteen in Alabama, Mississippi, and Tennessee; see 15 Miss. 58; sixteen in Arkansas and Louisiana; see 28 La. Ann. 187; sixteen to twenty-three in Wisconsin; eighteen in South Carolina and Vermont; see 11 Rich. 581; 35 S. C. 344; nineteen in California, but seventeen have been held sufficient; 5 Cal. 214; see 92 Cal. 289; seventeen to twenty-three in Arizona; thirteen to twenty-three in Rhode Island. In Montana, Idaho, and Oregon the number is seven, of whom five must concur; and in Colorado, Georgia, Kentucky, Missouri, and Texas, the number is twelve, of whom nine must concur; in Virginia, it is nine to twelve, of whom seven must concur; in Florida twelve to fifteen, of whom eight must concur; and in Indiana six, of whom five must concur; while in Iowa there is a provision for from five to fifteen according to the population of the county, with a corresponding variation in the number for concurrence. In Utah fifteen were held sufficient; 98 U. S. 145; and see 1 Utah 11. In some cases when twenty-three were required, the provision was held to be directory merely; 2 Cush. 149.

Objections. An objection must be properly made as to time and manner; 140 U. S. 575; 178 Pa. 187; 55 Md. 845; 6 Ohio 435; 67 Mo. 488; 2 Ad. & El. 280; 1 Nev. & P. 187. A person summoned to testify before the grand jury de facto cannot question its organization; 91 Cal. 545. An objection to the competency of a grand juror must be raised before the general issue; 80 Ohio St. 542; s. c. 27 Am. Rep. 478; Whart. Cr. Pl. 350. It has been held that an objection comes too late after the jury has been empanelled and sworn; 9 Mass. 110; 8 Wend. 314; but on this point the authorities are conflicting; see contra, 12 R. I. 492; s. c. 84 Am. Rep. 704, n. The proper method of taking objection to the organization of a grand jury is by plea in abatement; 19 Ala. 240; 106 Ind. 896; 18 Ark. 96; 2 Lea 29; and not by demurrer; 9 Stew. 898; 1 Okla. 232; or motion to quash; 78 N. C. 487; 3 Wyo. 140; 6 Black. 248; or motion in arrest of judgment; 5 Ala. 72; or collaterally on habeas corpus; 28 Fla. 371; 87 Wis. 340. A plea in abatement must specify the objection with particularity; 86 Mo. 871; 69 Va. 186; 14 Wis. 894; 15 Ill. 511; 34 Kan. 256; 19 Neb. 61. If a method of objection is prescribed by a statute it must be followed strictly; 96 N. Y. 149; 51 Ala. 18; 38 Tex. 570; 86 Ind. 400; 17 Ohio St. 588.

Federal courts may, on their own motion, enforce other objections to grand jurors than those prescribed by state statute; 69

Fed. Rep. 978.

See an elaborate note upon the organization of grand jury in which are collected the cases relating to defects of every kind in the summoning, organization, and proceedings of grand jury; 27 L. R. A. 776; and one on the qualification of grand jurors; 28 id. 195; as to the number of grand jurors necessary or proper to act and the constitutional and statutory provisions relating thereto in states which have changed the common-law rule, see 27 id. 848; and as to the number necessary to concur in finding an indictment; 28 id. 33.

Proceedings. Being called into the jury-box, they are usually permitted to select a foreman, whom the court appoints; but the court may exercise the right to nominate one for them.

The foreman then takes the following oath or affirmation, namely: "You, A. B., as foreman of this inquest for the body of the _____, do swear (or affirm) that you will diligently inquire, and true presentment make of all such articles, matters, and things as shall be given you in charge, or otherwise come to your knowledge, touching the present service; the commonwealth's counsel, your fellows', and your own, you shall keep secret; you shall present no one for envy, hatred, or malice; nor shall you leave any one unpresented for fear, favor, affection, hope of reward or gain, but shall present all things truly, as they come to your knowledge, according to the best of your understanding. So help you God." It will be perceived that this oath contains the substance of the duties of the grand jury. The foreman having been sworn or affirmed, the other grand jurors are sworn or affirmed according to this formula: "You and each of you do swear (or affirm) that the same oath (or affirmation) which your foreman has taken on his part, you and every one of you shall well and truly observe on your part." In Massachusetts it is not necessary to show that those affirming had conscientious scruples about taking the oath; 7 Gray 438; 9 Mass. 107; but in New Jersey it was originally held that it would be necessary to show this or the indictment would be invalid; 6 N. J. L. 408; 9 id. 305; 7 id. 432; but since then by the N. J. Crim. Code § 58, it is provided that objection to the indictment for form or substance shall be by demurrer or motion to quash before the jury are sworn in and not after, and an objection to affirmance not made as so provided will not avail.

On being sworn or affirmed, and having received the charge of the court, the grand jury are organized, and may proceed to transact the business which may be laid before them; 2 Burr. 1088; Bacon, Abr. Juries, A. See 12 Tex. 210. The grand jury constitute a regular body until discharged by the court, or by operation of law, as where they cannot continue, by virtue of an act of assembly, beyond a certain day. But although they have been formally discharged by the court, if they have not separated, they may be called back and fresh bills be submitted to them; 9 C. & P. 43. When properly organized, in some states, it meets and adjourns upon its own motion, and it may lawfully proceed in the performance of its duties whether the court is in session or not, until the final adjournment of the court; 39 Ill. App. 481. In other states it is always discharged from time to time by the court, to which it reports at each session. The grand juries in the federal courts usually meet and adjourn on their own motion.

The jurisdiction of the grand jury is co-extensive with that of the court for which they inquire, both as to the offences triable there and the territory over which such court has jurisdiction.

The mode of doing business. The foreman acts as president, and the jury usually appoint one of their number to perform the duties of secretary. No records are to be kept of the acts of the grand jury, except for their own use, because their proceedings are to be secret. Bills of indictment against offenders are then supplied by the attorney-general, or other officer representing government. See 11 Ind. 473; Hempst. 176; 2 Blatchf. 485. On these bills are indorsed the names of the witnesses by whose testimony they are supported. The jury are also required to make true presentment of all such matters as have otherwise come to their knowledge. These presentments, which are technically so called, are, in practice, usually made at the close of the session of the grand jury, and include offences of which they had personal knowledge; they should name the authors of the offences, with a view to indictment. The witnesses in support of a bill are to be examined in all cases under oath, even when members of the jury itself testify,—as they may do.

When the number required by law (supra) concur in finding a true bill, the foreman must write on the back of the indictment, "A true bill," sign his name as foreman, and date the time of finding. On the contrary, where there is not sufficient evidence to authorize the finding of the bill, the jury return that they are ignorant whether the person accused committed the offence charged in the bill, which is expressed by the foreman indorsing on the bill, "Ignoramus," "Not a true bill," or similar words, signing his name as before, and dating the indorsement. The grand jury cannot find a bill, true for part, and false for part; 1 Russ. Cr., Sharps, ed. 480.

A grand jury cannot indict without a previous prosecution before a magistrate; except in offences of public notoriety, such as are within their own knowledge, or are given them in charge by the court, or are sent to them by the prosecuting officer of the commonwealth; Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr. § 388; 67 Pa. 80.

As to the witnesses, and the power of the jury over them. The jury examine all the witnesses in support of the bill, or enough of them to satisfy themselves of the propriety of putting the accused on trial, but none in favor of the accused. The jury are the sole judges of the credit and confidence to which a witness before them is entitled. It is decided that when a witness, duly summoned, appears before the grand jury, but refuses to be sworn, and behaves in a disrespectful manner towards the jury, they may lawfully require the officer in attendance upon them to take the witness before the court, in order to obtain its aid and direction in the matter; 8 Cush. 338; 14 Ala. N. S. 450. Such a refusal, it seems, is considered a contempt; 14 Ala. N. S. 450; the disobedience of this order of the court constituting the contempt; 17 Colo. 252; but the governor of a state is exempt from the powers of subpoena, and this immunity extends to his official subordinates; 81 Pa. 433. A person having knowledge of a crime has the right to go before the grand jury, and disclose his knowledge, without being summoned; 45 La. Ann. 1164.

As to the competency of evidence before grand jury see 28 L. R. A. 318; and as to the sufficiency of evidence to sustain indictment; id. 324; as to improper influence or interference with a grand jury; id. 367.

Of the secrecy to be observed. This extends to the vote given in any case, to the evidence delivered by witnesses, and to the communications of the jurors to each other. The disclosure of these facts, unless under the sanction of law, would render the imprudent juror who should make them public liable to punishment. Giving intelligence to a defendant that a bill has been found against him, to enable him to escape, is so obviously wrong that no one can for a moment doubt its being criminal. The grand juror who should be guilty of this offence might, upon conviction, be fined and imprisoned. One who stealthily listens to a grand jury while in the performance of their duties commits the offence of eavesdropping; 3 Head 299. The duration of the secrecy depends upon the particular circumstances of each case; 20 Mo. 326. In a case, for example, where a witness swears to a fact in open court, on the trial, directly in opposition to what he swore before the grand jury, there can be no doubt that the injunction of secrecy, as far as regards this evidence, would be at an end, and the grand jurors might be sworn to testify what this witness swore to in the grand jury's room, in order that the witness might be prosecuted for perjury; 3 Russ. Cr., Sharps, ed. 520; 4 Me. 439; 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. 857; 92 Ky. 120; 77 Md. 110; 65 Mass. 137. A member of the grand jury may testify as to how the jury acquired knowledge of an alleged offence; 126 Pa. 531; 157 id. 611; but see contra, 2 Halst. 847; 1 C. & K. 512. It has been held that the foreman of a grand jury may be called as a witness concerning an admission of gaming made by defendant when testifying before the grand jury concerning another offence, since the statute enjoining secrecy as to proceedings before the grand jury is intended only for the protection of the jurors and of the public; 8 Utah 21.

A grand juror is not competent to testify in a civil case as to the statements of a witness before the grand jury; 61 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 138. It is not error to reject evidence of grand jurors disclosing testimony given before the grand jury; 105 Mo. 24. As to grand jurors as witnesses under statutory provisions, see 12 Crim. L. Mag. 588. Statements of the prosecuting officer as to what occurred in the grand jury room are inadmissible; 115 Mo. 480. The fact that a stenographer, at the request of the prosecuting attorney, attended before the grand jury and took the testimony of the witnesses, is no ground for quashing the indictment; 5 Ind. App. 356; the presence of the state's attorney while inquiry is being made by the grand jury is not objectionable; 45 Ill. App. 110; but the presence of a private prosecutor is ground for reversal of a judgment of conviction; 70 Miss. 595.

The privilege given by the fifth amendment to the constitution, that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, extends to a proceeding before a grand jury; 142 U. S. 547. See INDICTMENT; PRESENTMENT; CHARGE; INFORMATION.

GRAND LARCENY. In Criminal Law. By the English law simple larceny was divided into grand and petit: the former was committed by the stealing of property exceeding twelve pence in value; the latter, when the property was of the value of twelve pence or under; Stat. West. 1 (8 Edw. I.), c. 15. This distinction was abolished in England by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, and is recognized in only a few of the United States. Grand larceny was a capital offence, but clergyable unless attended with certain aggravations. Petty larceny was punishable with whipping, "or some such corporal punishment less than death;" and, being a felony, it was subject to forfeiture, whether upon conviction or flight. See 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 879; LARCENY.

GRAND REMONSTRANCE. The Grand Remonstrance was a document presented by Parliament to King Charles I., Nov. 22, 1641, protesting against his misgovernment: A forerunner of the Civil War that preceded the Commonwealth (1649-1653). Stand. Dict.

GRAND SERJEANTY. See SERJEANTY.

GRANDCHILDREN. The children of one's children. Sometimes these may claim bequests given in a will to children; though in general they can make no such claim; 6 Co. 16.

The term grandchildren has been held to include great-grandchildren; 2 Eden 184; but contra, 3 Barb. Ch. 488, 505; 3 N. Y. 538.

See CHILD; CONSTRUCTION.

GRANDFATHER. The father of one's father or mother. The father's father is called the paternal grandfather; the mother's father is the maternal grandfather.

GRANDFATHER CLAUSE. A clause in the constitution of some of the southern states allowing descendants of voters prior to the Civil War to vote without regard to the customary property and literacy requirements. Stand. Dict.

GRANDMOTHER. The mother of one's father or mother. The father's mother is called the paternal grandmother; the mother's mother is the maternal grandmother.

GRANGE. A farm furnished with barns, granaries, stables, and all conveniences for husbandry. Co. Litt. 5 a.

A combination, society, or association of farmers for the promotion of the interests of agriculture, by abolishing the restraints and burdens imposed on it by railway and other companies, and by getting rid of the system of middlemen or agents between the producer and the consumer. Encyc. Dic.

The members of such associations are called grangers, from which was derived the name, applied to certain leading cases, of granger cases, which see.

GRANGER. A member of a grange association. Formerly, a farm steward. Webster. See GRANGE; GRANGER LEGISLATION.

GRANGER CASES. A name applied to six cases decided by the supreme court of the United States in 1876, which are reported in 94 U. S. 113, 135, 165, 179, 180, 181, those most frequently cited being Munn v. Illinois, and C. B. & Q. R. Co. v. Iowa. They are so called because they arose out of an agitation commenced by the grangers which resulted in the enactment of statutes for the regulation of the tolls and charges of common carriers, warehousemen, and the proprietors of elevators. The enforcement of these acts was resisted and their constitutionality questioned. The supreme court affirmed the common-law doctrine that private property appropriated by the owner to a public use is thereby subjected to public regulation. They also held that the right of regulation was not restrained by the prohibition of the fourteenth amendment of the federal constitution against the taking by the states of private property without due process of law. A text writer, who was at that time a member of the court, says of these cases: "But these decisions left undecided the question how far this legislative power of regulation belonged to the States, and how far it was in the congress of the United States"; Miller, Const. U. S. 897.

As to what are public uses see EMINENT DOMAIN.

GRANGER LEGISLATION. Certain stringent statutes, for the regulation of railway charges, passed by some of the Western states during the decade from 1870 to 1880, the litigation that arose from which is known as the Granger cases. 3 Moore, Carriers 2nd ed., § 9.

Acquired its name from the fact that it was supposed to be in the interest of the farmers. Dembits, Law Language, p. 163. See GRANGE; GRANGER.

GRANT. A generic term applicable to all transfers of real property. 8 Washb. R. P. 181, 353.

A transfer by deed of that which cannot be passed by livery. Wms. R. P. 147, 149. An act evidenced by letters patent under the great seal, granting something from the king to a subject. Cruise, Dig. tit. 33, § 4.

A technical term made use of in deeds of conveyance of lands to import a transfer. 8 Washb. R. P. 373; Dev. Deeds 12; 84 Tex. 107.

"This word is taken largely where anything is granted or passed from one (the grantor) to another (the grantee). And in this sense it doth comprehend feoffment, bargains and sales, gifts, leases, charges, and the like; for he that doth give or sell doth grant also. . . . And so some grants are of the land or soil itself; and some are of some profit to be taken out of, or from the soil, as rent, common, etc.; and some are of goods and chattels; and some are of other things, as authorities, elections, etc."; Shepp. Touchet, 228.

The term grant was anciently and in strictness of usage applied to denote the conveyance of incorporeal rights, and it is the appropriate word for that purpose. Such rights are said to lie in grant, and not in livery; for, existing only in idea, in contemplation of law, they cannot be transferred by livery of possession. Of course as common law, a conveyance in writing was necessary; hence they were said to lie in grant, and to pass by the delivery of the deed. By the act of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, § 2, and also by statute in some states, as New York, Maine, and Massachusetts, all corporeal hereditaments are said to lie in grant as well as in livery. See 40 N. Y. 140; 59 Me. 100. Grant is now therefore both sufficient, and technically proper, as a word of conveyance of a freehold estate, and in the largest sense the term comprehends everything that is granted or passed from one to another, and is now applied to every species of property. But although the proper technical word, its employment is not absolutely necessary, and it has been held that other words indicating an intention to grant will answer the purpose: Wms. R. P. 6th Am. ed. 201; 5 T. R. 124; 5 B. & C. 101. As to the effect of the word grant in conveyances an how far any covenant is implied therefrom see COVENANT.

Grant was one of the usual words in a feoffment; and a grant differed but little from a feoffment except in the subject-matter; for the operative words used in grants are dedi et concessi, "have given and granted." But the simple deed of grant has superseded the ancient feoffment, leases, and releases which were used to convey freehold estates in possession. See, generally, 1 Dav. Conv. 73; 2 id. 76.

The word is also applied in the case of copyholds to indicate the acceptance by the lord of a person as tenant. It is termed an ordinary grant when the tenant is admitted in pursuance of a surrender by the preceding tenant; and voluntary grant when the land is in possession of the lord discharged from all rights of any tenant, or as it is termed "in hand;" in that case the lord regrants the land to the new tenant to be holden by copy of court roll.

A grant of personality is a method of transferring personal property, distinguished from a gift, which is always gratuitous, by being founded upon some consideration or equivalent. Such grants are divided as to their subject-matter into grants of chattels real, which includes leases, assignments, and surrenders of leases, and grants of chattels personal, which consist of transfer of the right and possession of them whereby one renounces and the other acquires all title and interest therein. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 440, and see also id. notes 1, 2, and 3. Such a grant may be by parol: 3 M. & S. 7; but they are usually by assignment or bill of sale in writing. The proper legal designation of such a grant is an "assignment" or bargain or sale: 2 Steph. Com. 102.

Office grant applies to conveyances made by some officer of the law to effect certain purposes where the owner is either unwilling or unable to execute the requisite deeds to pass the title.

Among the modes of conveyance included under office grant are levies and sales to satisfy execution creditors, sales by order or decree of a court of chancery, sales by order or license of court, sales for non-payment of taxes and the like. See Blackw. Tax Title, passim; 8 Washb. R. P. 208.

Private grant is a grant by the deed of a private person. See DEED.

Public grant is the mode and act of creating a title in an individual to lands which had previously belonged to the government.

The public lands of the United States and of the various states have been to a great extent conveyed by deeds or patents issued in virtue of general laws; but many specific grants have also been made, and were the usual method of transfer during the colonial period. See 3 Washb. R. P. 181; 8 Wheat. 543; 6 Pet. 548; 16 id. 367. See LAND GRANT. Uninterrupted possession of land for a period of twenty years or upward, has been often held to raise a presumption of a grant from the state: 4 Harr. (Del.) 521; 20 Ga. 487; 4 Dev. & B. L. 241; 6 Pet. 498; 3 Head 423; 85 Tex. 357; 66 Hun 683; 278 W. Rep. (Mo.) 409.

By the word grant, in a treaty, is meant not only a formal grant, but any concession, warrant, order, or permission to survey, possess, or settle, whether written or parol, express, or presumed from possession. Such a grant may be made by law, as well as by patent pursuant to a law: 12 Pet. 410. See 9 Ad. & E. 532; 5 Mass. 472; 9 Pick. 80; TREATY.

The term grant is applied in Scotland to original disposition of land, as when a lord grants land to his tenants; and to gratuitous deeds; in the latter case the donor is said to grant the deed, an expression unknown in English law; Moz. & W.

The term grant is also applied to the creation or transfer by the government of such rights as pensions, patents, charters, and franchises. See Chit Prerog. 884; and also these several titles.

The word grant is also sometimes used with reference to the allowance of probate, and the issue of letters testamentary, and of administration, as to which see the several titles relating thereto. See LIMITED ADMINISTRATION.

GRANT (v.). To concede; the conferring of something by one person upon another. Synonymous with "give" and "bestow." 249 U. S. 39.

GRANT AND DEMISE. In a lease for years these words create an implied warranty of title and a covenant for quiet enjoyment; 92 U. S. 107. See COVENANT.

GRANT, BARGAIN AND SELL. Words used in instruments of conveyance of real estate. See CONSTRUCTION. From these words, in many states, is implied a covenant of seisin. See COVENANT.

GRANTEE. He to whom a grant is made.

GRANTOR. He by whom a grant is made.

GRANTZ. In Old English Law. Grandees or noblemen. Jac. L. Dict.

GRASS. See EMBLEMENS.

GRASS WEEK. Rogation week. A term anciently used in the inns of court and chancery.

"Rogation week, so called in the inns of Court and Chancery because the commons of that week consist chiefly of sallets, with hard eggs, green sauce, etc." Byrne. See ROGATION WEEK; GANG-WEEK.

GRASSHEARTH. In Old English Law. The name of an ancient customary service of tenants doing one day's work for their landlord.

GRASSON, or GRASSUM. A fine paid upon the transfer of a copyhold estate.

GRATIFICATION. A reward given voluntarily for some service or benefit rendered, without being requested so to do, either expressly or by implication.

GRATIS (Lat.). Without reward or consideration.

When a bailee undertakes to perform some act or work gratis, he is answerable for his gross negligence if any loss should be sustained in consequence of it; but a distinction exists between non-feasance and misfeasance,—between a total omission to do an act which one gratuitously promises to do, and a culpable negligence in the execution of it: in the latter case he is responsible, while in the former he would not, in general, be bound to perform his contract; 4 Johns. 84; 5 Term 148; 2 Ld. Raym. 913. An appearance gratis is one entered without service of process.

GRATIS DICTUM (Lat.). A saying not required; a statement voluntarily made without necessity.

Mere naked assertions, though known to be false, are not the ground of action, as between vendor and vendee. Thus it is not actionable for a vendor of real estate to affirm falsely to the vendee that his estate is worth so much, that he gave so much for it, etc. But fraudulent misrepresentations of particulars in relation to the estate, inducing the buyer to forbear inquiries he would otherwise have made, are not gratis dicta; 6 Metc. Mass. 246.

GRATUITOUS. Without valuable or legal consideration. A term applied to deeds of conveyance.

In Old English Law. Voluntary; without force, fear, or favor. Bract. fols. 11, 17.

GRATUITOUS BAILMENT. See

BAILMENT.

GRATUITOUS CONTRACT. In Civil Law. One the object of which is for the benefit of the person with whom it is made, without any profit, received or promised, as a consideration for it: as, for example, a gift. It is sometimes called a contract of beneficence. It is the result of a classification of contracts, in relation to the motive for making them, under which they are termed either gratuitous or onerous. A contract is onerous when a party is required by its terms or nature to do or give something as a consideration. Howe, Studies in the Civil Law 107.

GRATUITOUS DEED. One made without consideration. 2 Steph. Com. 47.

GRATUITY. See BONUS; BOUNTY.

GRAVA. In English Law. A grove; a small wood; a coppice or thicket. Co. Litt. 4 b.

A thick wood of high trees. Blount.

GRAVAMEN (Lat.). The grievance complained of; the substantial cause of the action. See Greenl. Ev. § 66. The part of a charge which weighs most heavily against the accused. In England, the word is specially applied to grievance complained of by the clergy to the archbishop and bishops in convocation; Phill. Eccl. 1944.

GRAVARE. In old English law, to grieve or aggrieve; to injure or oppress. Burrill.

GRAVATIO. An accusation or impeachment. Leg. Ethel. c. 19.

See GRAVARE ET GRAVATIO.

GRAVE. A place where a dead body is interred.

The violation of the grave, by taking up the dead body, or stealing the coffin or grave clothes, is a misdemeanor at common law; 1 Russ. Cr. 414; 6 Sawy. 442; and has been made the subject of statutory enactment in some of the states. See 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 1188; Dears. & B. 169; 19 Pick. 304; 4 Blackf. 228; DEAD BODY.

When a body has once been buried, no one has the right to remove it without the consent of the owner of the grave, or leave of the proper ecclesiastical, municipal, or judicial authority; 130 Mass. 428; 42 Pa. 208.

A singular case, illustrative of this subject, occurred in Louisiana. A son, who inherited a large estate from his mother, buried her with all her jewels, worth two thousand dollars: he then made a sale of all he inherited from his mother for thirty thousand dollars. After this, a thief broke the grave and stole the jewels, which, after his conviction, were left with the clerk of the court, to be delivered to the owner. The son claimed them, and so did the purchaser of the inheritance: it was held that the jewels, although buried with the mother, belonged to the son, and that they passed to the purchaser by a sale of the whole inheritance; 6 Rob. La. 488. See 23 Ir. L. T. 405; CEMETERY; DEAD BODY.

GRAVIA. See GRAVIUS.

GRAVIS. Grievous; great. Ad grave damnum, to the grievous damage. 11 Coke 40.

GRAVIUS. A graf; a chief magistrate or officer. A term derived from the more ancient "grafio" and used in combination with various other words as an official title in Germany; as Margravius, Rheingravius, Landgravius, etc. Spel. Gloss.

GRAY WOOL. See WOOL.

GRAY'S INN. See INNS OF COURT.

GREAT BODILY INJURY. In an instruction as to the danger one must reasonably have apprehended before he may take life the words "great bodily injury are equivalent to enormous injury," "enormous bodily injury" and "dreadful injury." 47 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 867.

GREAT ASSIZE. An edict whose date is uncertain, but which was probably issued during the first years of Henry II.'s reign, developed and set in full working order the imperfect system of "recognition" established by the Norman kings. See RECOGNITION.

GREAT CHARTER. See MAGNA CHARTA.

GREAT LAKES. A name commonly used to designate the five great lakes, viz., Superior, Michigan, Huron, Ontario, and Erie.

The open waters of the Great Lakes are "high seas" within the meaning of the Revised Statutes; 150 U. S. 249. It had been held otherwise in 32 Fed. Rep. 406. The common-law doctrine, as to the dominion, sovereignty, and ownership of lands under tide waters on the borders of the sea applies equally to the lands beneath the navigable waters of the Great Lakes; 146 U. S. 387. See ADMIRALTY; LAKE.

GREAT LAW, THE, or "The Body of Laws of the Province of Pennsylvania and Territories thereunto belonging, Past at an Assembly held at Chester, alias Up-land, the 7th day of the tenth month, called December, 1682."

This was the first code of laws established in Pennsylvania, and is justly celebrated for the provision in its first chapter for liberty of conscience. See Linn's Charter and Laws of Pennsylvania (Harrisburg, 1879), pp. 107, 478, etc.

GREAT SEAL. A seal by virtue of which a great part of the royal authority is exercised. The office of the lord chancellor, or lord keeper, is created by the delivery of the great seal into his custody. There is one great seal for all public acts of state which concern the United Kingdom. The seal of the United States, or of a state, used in the execution of commissions and other public documents is usually termed the great seal of the United States, or of the state, as the case may be.

GREAT TITHES. In Ecclesiastical Law. The more valuable tithes: as, corn, hay, and wood. 3 Burn. Eccl. Law 630, 631; 3 Steph. Com. 127. See TITHE.

GREATLY. The use of the word "greatly" in instructions in a personal injury case, by calling attention to the injury by the repeated expressions "greatly injured," "greatly wounded" and "suffered greatly" is error, either to mislead the jury to understand there could be no recovery unless the injury was great, or to give them the impression that the trial judge considered the injury great. 137 Ky. 696, 126 S. W. 362.

GREE. Satisfaction for an offence committed or injury done. Cowel.

GREEN CLOTH. An English board or court of justice, composed of the lord steward and inferior officers, and held in the royal household; so named from the cloth upon the board at which it was held.

GREEN SILVER. A feudal custom in the manor of Writell, in Essex, where every tenant whose front door opens to Greenbury shall pay a half-penny yearly to the lord, by the name of "green silver" or "rent." Cowel.

GREEN WAX. In English Law. The name of the estreats of fines, issues, and amercements in the exchequer, delivered to the sheriff under the seal of that court, which is made with green wax.

GREENBACK. This term is the ordinary and almost exclusive name popularly applied to all United States Treasury issues, and is not applied to any other species of money; 23 Ind. 121; but this term alone is not a proper denomination for these notes; 61 Ala. 282. See LEGAL TENDER.

GREENHEW. In Forest Law. The same as Vert. (q. v.). Termes de la Ley.

GREFFE. A prothonotary's office. English. See PROTHONOTARY.

GREFFIERS. In French Law. Registrars, or clerks of the courts. They are officials attached to the courts to assist the judges in keeping the minutes, writing out judgments, orders, and other decisions given by the tribunals, and deliver copies thereof to the applicants.

GREGORIAN CALENDAR. See CALENDAR.

GREGORIAN CODE. See CODE.

GREGORIAN EPOCH. The time from which the Gregorian calendar or computation dates; i. e. from the year 1582.

GREMIO. In Spanish Law. The union of merchants, artisans, laborers, or other persons who follow the same pursuits and are governed by the same regulations. The word guild, in English, has nearly the same signification.

GREMIO (Lat.). Bosom. Almsworth, Dict. De gremio mittere, to send from their bosom; used of one sent by an ecclesiastical corporation or body. Alatere mittere, to send from his side, or one sent by an individual: as, a legate sent by the pope. Du Cange. In English law, an inheritance is said to be in gremio legis, in the bosom or under the protection of the law, when it is in abeyance. See IN NUBIUS.

GRENVILLE ACT. The statute 10 Geo. III. c. 16, by which the jurisdiction over parliamentary election petitions was transferred from the whole house of commons to select committees. Repealed by 9 Geo. IV. c. 22.

GRESSUME (variously spelled Gressame, Gressum, Grossome; Scotch, grassum).

In Old English Law. A fine due from a copyholder on the death of his lord. Plowd. fol. 271, 285; 1 Stra. 654. Cowel derives it from gersum.

In Scotland. Grassum is a fine paid for the making or renewing of a lease. Paterson.

GRETNA GREEN. A farmstead near the village of Springfield, Dumfriesshire, Scotland, eight miles northwest of Carlisle. Cent. Dict. The name was afterward applied to the village which became notorious for the celebration of irregular marriages. By the law of Scotland nothing was required to constitute a marriage but the mutual declaration of the parties in the presence of witnesses—a ceremony which could be performed instantly, and it was immaterial whether or not the parties were minors. These conditions afforded an easy method of evading the Marriage Act, 26 Geo. II. c. 83, which required the publication of banns or a license. By act 19 & 20 Vict. c. 90, § 1, no irregular marriage in Scotland is now valid unless one of the parties had at the date thereof his or her usual place of residence there, or had lived in Scotland for twenty-one days next preceding such marriage.

GRETNA GREEN MARRIAGE. See GRETNA GREEN.

GREVA. In old records. The sea-shore, sand, or beach. 2 Mon. Angl. 625; Cowel.

GREVE. A word of power or authority. Cowel.

GREY MERINO. See WOOL.

GRIEVED. Aggrieved. 8 East 22.

GRITH. Peace; protection. Termes de la Ley.

GRITHBRECH (Sax. grith, peace, and brych, breaking). Breach of the king's peace, as opposed to frithbrech, a breach of the nation's peace with other nations. Leges Hen. I. c. 36; Chart. Willielm. Conq. Eccles. 8. Pauli in Hist. ejusd. fol. 90.

GRITHSTOLE. A place of sanctuary. Cowel.

GROOER. In Old English Law. A merchant or trader who engrossed all vendible merchandise; an engrosser (q. v.). St. 87 Edw. III. c. 6.

GROCERIES. Articles of provision; the wares of a grocer; general supplies for table and household use.

Shovels, pails, and buckets have been held not to be groceries, although usually kept in a country grocery shop; 118 Mass. 585. It is a question of fact whether wines and liquors are groceries; 18 Mich. 185. A grocery has been held to be an "offensive trade or calling" within a prohibition of use of a dwelling-house; 101 Mass. 531. Groceries kept as part of the stock, by a merchant, are not "provisions found on hand for family use," within the meaning of an exemption law; 73 Mo. 575. See PROVISIONS.

GROOM. The name of a servant in some inferior place, generally applied to servants in stables. Jacob.

The designation, with an explanatory affix, of various offices in the British royal household, as Grooms in Waiting, and Groom of the Robes; also, formerly, Groom Porter, Groom of the Stole (q. v.), etc. Byrnes.

GROOM OF THE STOLE. In England an officer of the royal household who has charge of the king's wardrobe.

GROOM PORTER. An officer belonging to the royal household. Jacob.

GRONNA. A bog; a deep hollow or pit. Cowel. A deep pit or place where turfs are dug for fuel. Hoved. 436.

GROSS. Absolute, entire. A thing in gross exists in its own right, and not as an appendage to another thing. See IN GROSS. WILFLL.

GROSS ADVENTURE. In Maritime Law. A maritime or bottomry loan. It is so called because the lender exposes his money to the perils of the sea, and contributes to the gross or general average. Pothier; Pardessus, Dr. Com.

GROSS AVERAGE. In Maritime Law. That kind of average which falls on the ship, cargo, and freight, and is distinguished from particular average. See AVERAGE.

GROSS EARNINGS. See EARNINGS.

GROSS NEGLIGENCE. "Gross neglect" is either an intentional wrong, or such a reckless disregard of security and right, as to imply bad faith, and, therefore squints at fraud, and is tantamount to the magna culpa of the civil law, which in some respects, is quasi criminal. 4 Bush (Ky.) 509. See WILFLL NEGLIGENCE.

GROSS NEGLIGENCE. The omission of that care which even inattentive and thoughtless men never fail to take of their own property. Jones, Bailm.; 23 Conn. 437; 3 Hurlst. & C. 387.

Such as evidences wilfulness; such a gross want of care and regard for the right of others as to justify the presumption of wilfulness or wantonness; 2 Thomp. Neg. 1264, § 53; such as implies a disregard of consequences or a willingness to inflict injury; Deering, Neg. § 29; 139 Ill. 596.

Lata culpa, or, as the Roman lawyers most accurately called it, dolo proxima, is, in practice, considered as equivalent to dolus, or fraud itself. It must not be confounded, however, with fraud; for it may exist consistently with good faith and honesty of intention, according to common-law authorities; 82 Vt. 532; Shearn & Red. Neg. § 3; Webb, Foll. Torts 588, n.

The distinction between degrees of negligence is not very sharply drawn in the later cases. See BAILMENT; NEGLIGENCE.

The intentional failure to perform a manifest duty, in reckless disregard of the consequences as affecting the life or property of another; a thoughtless disregard of consequences without the exertion of any effort to avoid them. 21 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 775; 87 Mich. 400. It has been held to have no legal significance which imports other than a want of due care; 18 So. Rep. (Ala.) 80.

GROSS WEIGHT. The total weight of goods or merchandise, with the chests, bags, and the like, from which are to be deducted tare and tret.

GROSSE AVANTURE (Fr.) In French Marine Law. The contract of bottomry. Ord. Mar. liv. 3, tit. 5.

GROSSE AVENTURE, CONTRAT A LA. In French marine law, a contract of bottomry (q. v.). Burrill. See GROSS ADVENTURE.

GROSSE BOIS. Timber. Cowel.

GROSSEMENT (L. Fr.) Largely; greatly. Grossement encinte or ensient. Big with child; in the last stage of pregnancy. Plowd. 76.

GROSSOME. In Old English Law. A fine paid for a lease. Corrupted from gersum. Plowd. fol. 270, 285; Cowel.

GROUND. Land; soil; earth. See LAND. It may include an improved town lot; 76 Pa. 378.

GROUND ANNUAL. In Scotch Law. An annual rent of two kinds; first, the feu-duties payable to the lords of erection and their successors; second, the rents reserved for building-lots in a city, where sub-feus are prohibited. This rent is in the nature of a perpetual annuity. Bell, Dict.; Erskine, Inst. 11. § 52.

GROUND LANDLORD. The grantor of an estate on which a ground-rent is reserved.

GROUND OF ACTION. The foundation, basis, or data, upon which a cause of action rests. See 24 Com. 33.

GROUND RENT. A rent reserved to himself and his heirs, by the grantor of land in fee-simple, out of the land conveyed. See 9 Watts 262; 8 W. & S. 185; 2 Am. L. Reg. 577.

In Pennsylvania, it is real estate, and in cases of intestacy goes to the heir; 14 Pa. 444. See 147 id. 319. The interest of the owner of the rent is an estate altogether distinct and of a very different nature from that which the owner of the land has in the land itself. Each is the owner of a fee-simple estate. The one has an estate of inheritance in the rent, and the other has an estate of inheritance in the land out of which the rent issues. The one is an incorporeal inheritance in fee, and the other is a corporeal inheritance in fee; Irwin v. Bank of United States, 1 Pa. 349, per Kennedy, J.; 47 Md. 300. So, the owner of the rent is not liable for any part of the taxes assessed upon the owner of the land out of which the rent issues; 1 Whart. 72; 4 Watts 98. Being real estate, it is bound by a judgment, and may be mortgaged like other real estate. It is a rent-service; 1 Whart. 337.

A ground-rent, being a rent-service, is, of course, subject to all the incidents of such a rent. Thus, it is distrainable of common right, that is, by the common law; Co. Litt. 142 a; 9 Watts 262. So, also, it may be apportioned; 1 Whart. 337; 58 Md. 323; 56 id. 51. And this sometimes takes place by operation of law, as when the owner of the rent purchases part of the land; in which case the rent is apportioned, and extinguished pro tanto; Littleton 222. And the reason of the extinguishment is that a rent-service is given as a return for the possession of the land. Thus, upon the enjoyment of the lands depends the obligation to pay the rent; and if the owner of the rent purchases part of the land, the tenant, no longer enjoying that portion, is not liable to pay rent for it, and so much of the rent as issued out of that portion is, consequently, extinguished. See 2 Bla. Com. 41; 1 Whart. 235, 352; 3 id. 197, 365.

At law, the legal ownership of these two estates—that in the rent and that in the land out of which it issues—can coexist only while they are held by different persons or in different rights; for the moment they unite in one person in the same right, the rent is merged and extinguished; 2

Binn. 142; 6 Whart. 382; 5 Watts 457. But if the one estate or interest be legal and the other equitable, there is no merger; 6 Whart. 288. In equity, however, this doctrine of merger is subject to very great qualification. A merger is not favored in equity; and the doctrine there is that although in some cases, where the legal estates unite in the same person in the same right, a merger will take place against the intention of the party whose interests are united (see 8 Whart. 421, and cases there cited), yet, as a general rule, the intention, actual or presumed, of such party will govern; and where no intention is expressed, if it appears most for his advantage that a merger should not take place, such will be presumed to have been his intention; and that it is only in cases where it is perfectly indifferent to the party thus interested that, in equity, a merger occurs; 5 Watts 457; 8 id. 146; 4 Whart. 421; 6 id. 283; 1 W. & S. 487.

A ground-rent being a freehold estate, created by deed and perpetual by the terms of its creation, no mere lapse of time without demand of payment raises, at common law, a presumption that the estate has been released; 1 Whart. 229. But this is otherwise in Pennsylvania now, by act of April 27, 1855, sec. 7, P. L. 369, whereby a presumption of a release or extinguishment is created where no payment, claim, or demand is made for the rent, nor any declaration or acknowledgment of its existence made by the owner of the premises subject to the rent, for the period of twenty-one years. This applies to the estate in the rent, and comprehends the future payments. And this act makes no exception in behalf of persons under disability when the title accrues, nor of persons taking as heirs at law or distributees; where a life tenant in ground rent released the same absolutely, as against the remainderman the limitation commenced to run from the date on which the first payment thereafter became due and unpaid, rather than at the death of the life tenant; 152 Pa. 258. It has been held that this act, affecting the remedy merely, is not unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of a contract; Biddle v. Hooven, 120 Pa. 221. But this case is criticised and the Pennsylvania cases reviewed in 34 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 557. But independently of this act of assembly, arrearages of rent which had fallen due twenty years before commencement of suit might be presumed to have been paid; 1 Whart. 229. These arrearages are a lien upon the land out of which the rent issues; but, as a general rule, the lien is discharged by a judicial sale of the land, and attaches to the fund raised by the sale. See 2 Binn. 140; 3 W. & S. 9; 4 Whart. 516; 2 Watts 378; 1 Pa. 349.

Ground rents in Pennsylvania were formerly made irredeemable, usually after the lapse of a certain period after their creation. But now the creation of such is forbidden by statute. Act of 22 April, 1850. But this does not prohibit the reservation of ground-rents redeemable only on the death of a person in whom a life interest in the rents is vested; 11 W. N. Cas. (Pa.) 11. The Act of April 15, 1809, providing for the extinguishment of irredeemable ground-rents, theretofore created, by legal proceedings instituted by the owner of the land, without the consent of the owner of the ground-rent, was declared unconstitutional; 87 Pa. 479.

As ground-rent deeds are usually drawn, the owner of the rent has three remedies for the recovery of the arrearages, viz., by action (of debt or covenant; but debt is now seldom employed), distress, and (for want of sufficient distress) the right to re-enter and hold the land as of the grantor's former estate. See 2 Am. L. Reg. 577; 3 id. 65; Cadw. Gr. Rents; Mitch. R. P.

The term "ground rents" held to import not merely the rents that were to accrue during the residue of a lease, but included the reversion as well, it appearing that the entire beneficial interest of the owner of the ground rents and the reversion was undoubtedly the subject of the sale and within the contemplation of the buyer and seller. 229 U. S. 530.

GROUNDAGE. In Maritime Law. The consideration paid for standing a ship in a port. Jacob, Law Dict.

GROWING CROPS. Growing crops of grain, potatoes, turnips, and all annual crops raised by the cultivation of man, are in certain cases personal chattels, and in others, part of the realty. A crop is to be considered as growing from the time the seed is put in the ground, at which time the seed is no longer a chattel, but becomes part of the realty, and passes with a sale of it: 69 Ala. 435. If planted by the owner of the land, they are a part of the realty, but may by sale become personal chattels, if they are fit for harvest, and the sale contemplates their being out and carried off, and not a right in the vendee to enter and cultivate. So even with trees: 4 Metc. Mass. 530; 9 B. & C. 561; 7 N. H. 522; 11 Co. 50. The distinction has been made that growing crops of grain and annual productions raised by cultivation and the industry of man are personal chattels; while trees, fruit, or grass and other natural products of the earth are parcel of the land; 1 Denio 530. But if the owner in fee conveys land before the crop is severed, the crop passes with the land as appertaining to it; 41 Ill. 466; 83 Pa. 234; 9 Rob. (La.) 256; and the same rule applies to foreclosure sales; 8 Wend. 534; 29 Pa. 68; 43 N. Y. 150. See 20 Am. L. Reg. 615, n. But before the foreclosure sale is confirmed, the purchaser has no title, with right to possession in the crops growing on the land at the time of sale, that will entitle him to maintain replevin therefor after they have been severed by the person in possession; 46 Wis. 801. Though growing crops, unless reserved, pass under a conveyance of the land, they are subject to levy and sale the same as other personal property; 47 Minn. 525. If a tenant, who holds for a certain time, plant annual crops, or even trees in a nursery for the purposes of transplantation and sale, they are personal chattels when fit for harvest; 1 Metc. Mass. 27, 313; 4 Taunt. 316, per Heath, J. If planted by a tenant for an uncertain period, they are regarded, whether mature or not, in many respects as personal property, but liable to become part of the realty if the tenant voluntarily abandons or forfeits possession of the premises; 5 Co. 116 a; 5 Halst. 128; Co. Litt. 55; 2 Johns 438, 421, n. See 2 Dana 206; 2 Rawle 161; 1 Washb. R. P. 3.

See as to validity and effect of mortgages on crops planted and unplanted, MORTGAGE.

Between the lessor of lands and his lessee on shares, growing crops are personal property, and they may be sold by parol as against a subsequent grantee, especially where the latter has notice of such sale; 89 Ill. App. 404. The grantor of farm lands may reserve the growing crops by oral agreement; 86 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 914.

The measure of damages for the destruction of a crop planted, but not yet up, is the rental value of the land and the cost of the seed and labor; but when the crop is somewhat matured, so that the product can be fairly determined, the value thereof when destroyed is the measure of damages; 43 Ill. App. 108. See 56 Ark. 612; 57 id. 512. Where a crop is lost through the wrongful act of another, the measure of damages is the market value of the crop less the cost of producing, harvesting, and marketing it; 8 Wash. 337; 4 Tex. Civ. App. 530. See 25 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1023.

GROWTH HALFPENNY. A rate paid in some places for the tithe of every fat beast, ox, or other unfruitful cattle. Clayt. 92.

GRUARI. The principal officers of a forest.

GUADALUPE HIDALGO, TREATY OF. A treaty effected in 1848 between the United States and Mexico which ceded to the United States New Mexico and Upper California in return for a payment of fifteen million dollars. Followed in 1853-54 by the Gadsden Treaty or Purchase (q. v.) by which new acquisitions of land were made, and which attempted to settle the differences which had arisen between the two powers under the earlier treaty. 3 Von Holst, Const. Hist. U. S., p. 344-347; 5 id., p. 6.

GUADIA. A pledge; a custom. Spel. Gloss; Calv. Lex. See WADIA.

GUARANTEE. He to whom a guaranty is made. Also, to make oneself responsible for the obligation of another.

The guarantee is entitled to receive payment, in the first place, from the debtor, and, secondly, from the guarantor. He must be careful not to give time, beyond that stipulated in the original agreement, to the debtor, without the consent of the guarantor. The guarantee should, at the instance of the guarantor, bring an action against the principal for the recovery of the debt; 2 Johns. Ch. 554; 17 Johns. 884; 8 S. & R. 116; 10 id. 33; 2 Bro. Ch. 579, 582; 2 Ves. 543. But the mere omission of the guarantee to sue the principal debtor will not, in general, discharge the guarantor; 8 S. & R. 112; 6 Binn. 292. See GUARANTEE.

Treaty. The best means of securing treaties, and one which is still in use generally, is the guarantee of such other States as are not directly affected by the treaty. Such guarantee is a kind of accession (q. v.) to the guaranteed treaty, and a treaty in itself—namely, the promise of the guarantor eventually to do what is in his power to compel the contracting party or parties to execute the treaty. Guarantee of a treaty is a species only of guarantee in general. Opp. Int. L. I § 528.

GUARANTEED STOCK. See STOCK.

GUARANTOR. He who makes a guaranty.

GUARANTY. An undertaking to answer for another's liability, and collateral thereto. A collateral undertaking to pay the debt of another in case he does not pay it. Shaw, C. J., 24 Pick. 252.

A provision to answer for the payment of some debt, or the performance of some duty in the case of the failure of some person who, in the first instance, is liable for such payment or performance; 60 N. Y. 438; Bayl. Sur. & Guar. 2.

A promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person; 94 Cal. 98. See 72 Ill. 13.

It is distinguished from suretyship in being a secondary, while that is a primary, obligation; or, as sometimes defined, guaranty is an undertaking that the debtor shall pay; suretyship, that the debt shall be paid. Or again, a contract of suretyship creates a liability for the performance of the act in question at the proper time, while the contract of guaranty creates a liability for the ability of the debtor to perform the act; Bayl. Sur. & Guar. 3. Guaranty is an engagement to pay on a debtor's insolvency, if due diligence be used to obtain payment; 52 Pa. 440.

The undertaking is essentially in the alternative. A guarantor cannot be sued as a promisor, as the surety may; his contract must be specially set forth. A guarantor warrants the solvency of the promisor, which an indorser does not; 8 Pick. 423.

The distinction between suretyship and guaranty has been expressed as follows: A surety is usually bound with his principal by the same instrument, executed at the same time, and on the same consideration. He is an original promisor and debtor from the beginning, and is held, ordinarily, to know every default of his principal. Usually, he will not be discharged, either by the mere indulgence of the creditor to the principal, or by want of notice of the default of the principal, no matter how much he may be injured thereby. On the other hand, the contract of the guarantor is his own separate undertaking, in which the principal does not join. It is usually entered into before or after that of the principal, and is often supported on a separate consideration from that supporting the contract of the principal. The original contract of his principal is not his contract, and he is not bound to take notice of its non-performance. He is often discharged by the mere indulgence of the creditor to the principal, and is usually not liable unless notified of the default of the principal. Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 1. See also, 53 Pa. 438, 535; 87 Ind. 560; 63 Ala. 410; 135 N. Y. 438. A written guaranty which fails to show on its face the person to whom the guaranty is made is void; 17 N. Y. Supp. 609; and where a contract contains no guaranty, parol evidence of one is inadmissible; 146 U. S. 42.

At common law, a guaranty could be made by parol; but by the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. II. c. 3, re-enacted almost in terms in the several states, it is provided that "No action shall be brought whereby to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person, . . . unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing, signed by the party to be charged therewith, or by some person thereunto by him lawfully authorized."

While, under this statute "no action shall be brought" on a contract not in writing, etc., yet such a contract may be enforced by a court against an attorney, by summary proceedings; 1 Cr. & J. 374.

"Any special promise" in the act does not apply to promises implied in law; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 53.

The following classes of promises have been held not within the statute, and valid though made by parol.

First, where there is a liability pre-existent to the new promise.

1. Where the principal debtor is discharged by the new promise being made; 8 Bingh. N. C. 889; 28 Vt. 185; 8 Gray 238; 1 Q. B. 933; 8 Johns. 876; 13 Md. 181; Bro. Stat. Fr. § 166, 193; and an entry of such discharge in the creditor's books is sufficient proof; 3 Hill, S. C. 41. This may be done by agreement to that effect; 1 Allen 405; by novation, by substitution, or by discharge under final process; 1 E. & Ald. 297; 18 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 646; but mere forbearance, or an agreement to forbear pressing the claim, is not enough; 1 Sm. L. Cas. 387; 6 Vt. 666.

2. Where the principal obligation is void or not enforceable when the new promise is made, and this is contemplated by the parties. But if not so contemplated, then the new promise is void; Burge, Surety 10; 1 Burr. 873. But see, on this point, 17 Md. 268; 18 Johns. 175; 6 Ga. 14.

3. So where the promise does not refer to the particular debt, or where this is unascertained; 1 Wils. 805.

In these three classes the principal obligation ceases to exist after the new promise is made.

4. Where the promisor undertakes for his own debt. But the mere fact that he is indebted will not suffice, unless his promise refers to that debt; nor is it sufficient if he subsequently becomes indebted on his own account, if not indebted when he promises, or if it is then contingent; 4 Hill, N. Y. 211. See 82 Tex. 255. The provision of the statute does not apply whenever the main purpose of the promisor is not to answer for another, but to subvert some pecuniary or business purpose of his own, although it may be in form a promise to pay the debt of another; 141 U. S. 479. So, if the vendee of land promise to pay the purchase-money on a debt due by the vendor; 82 Tex. 255.

5. Where the new promise is in consideration of property placed by the debtor in the promisor's hands; 1 Gray 891; 41 Me. 559; 28 Cal. 187; 72 Ill. 442. And where the new promise is made in a transaction which is in substance a sale to the promisor; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 53.

6. Where the promise does not relate to the promisor's property, but to that of the debtor in the hands of the promisor.

7. Where the promise is made to the debtor, not the creditor; because this is not the debt of "another" than the promisee; 1 Gray 76; 11 Ad. & E. 488.

8. Where the creditor surrenders a lien against the debtor or on his property, which the promisor acquires or is benefited by; Fell, Guar. c. 3; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. §§ 63, 64; 7 Johns. 463; 3 B. & Ald. 613; 21 N. Y. 412; but not so where the surrender of the lien does not benefit the promisor; 8 Metc. Mass. 396; 21 N. Y. 412; 8 Esp. 96.

In the five last classes, the principal debt may still subsist concurrently with the new promise, and the creditor will have a double remedy; but the fulfillment of the new promise will discharge the principal debt, because he can have but one satisfaction. The repeated dicta, that if the principal debt subsists, the promise is collateral and within the statute, are not sustainable; 30 Vt. 641. But the general doctrine now is that the transaction must amount to a purchase, the engagement for the debt being the consideration therefor, in whole or in part; 1 Gray 391; 5 Cush. 488.

Where one owes a debt to another, and promises to pay his debt to a creditor of such other party, the promise is not within the statute; 5 Greenl. 81; 3 B. & C. 843.

Second, if the new promise is for a liability then first incurred, it is original, if exclusive credit is given to the promisor; 5 Allen 370; 13 Gray 613; 28 Conn. 544; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 155. Whether exclusive credit is so given is a question of fact for the jury; 7 Gill 7. Merely charging the debtor on a book-account is not conclusive.

Whether promises merely to indemnify come within the statute is not wholly settled; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 158; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. §§ 59, 61. In many cases they are held to be original promises, and not within the statute; 15 Johns. 425; 4 Wend. 657. But few of the cases, however, have been decided solely on this ground, most of them falling within the classes of original promises before specified. On principle, such contracts seem within the statute if there is a liability on the part of any third person to the promisee. If not, these promises would be original under class seven, above. Where the indemnity is against the promisor's own default, he is already liable without his promise to indemnify; and to make the promise collateral would make the statute a covert fraud; 10 Ad. & E. 453; 1 Gray 391; 10 Johns. 242; 1 Ga. 294; 5 B. Monr. 339; 20 Vt. 205; 10 N. H. 175; 1 Conn. 519; 5 Me. 504. The weight of American authority is said to be in favor of applying the statute to cases of indemnity; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 59, n. When the promise to indemnify is in fact a promise to pay the debt of another it is within the statute. See 21 N. Y. 412. A promise to indemnify another against loss in becoming surety on a replevin bond is within the statute; 12 Ohio St. 219. So on a bond for stay of execution; 111 Pa. 471. But a promise to indemnify one if he will become bail in a criminal case has been held not within the statute; 4 B. & S. 414; 119 Ind. 85.

Third, guaranties may be given for liabilities thereafter to be incurred, and will attach when the liability actually accrues. In this class the promise will be original, and not within the statute, if credit is given to the promisor exclusively; 2 Term 80; 1 Cowp. 227. See 40 Ill. App. 275. But where the future obligation is contingent merely, the new promise is held not within the statute, on the ground that there is no principal liability when the collateral one is incurred; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 160. But this doctrine is questionable if the agreement distinctly contemplates the contingency; 1 Cra. C. C. 77; 5 Hill, N. Y. 483. An offer to guarantee must be accepted within a reasonable time; but no notice of acceptance is required if property has been delivered under the guaranty; 8 Gray 211; 2 Mich. 511; 54 Fed. Rep. 846; 104 U. S. 159.

"A contract of guaranty, like every other contract, can only be made by the mutual assent of the parties. If the guaranty is signed by the guarantor, at the request of the other party, or if the latter's agreement to accept is contemporaneous with the guaranty; or if the receipt from him of a valuable consideration, however small, is acknowledged in the guaranty, the mutual assent is proved, and the delivery of the guaranty to him or for his use completes the contract. But if the guaranty is signed by the guarantor, without any previous request of the other party, and in his absence, for no consideration moving between them, except future advances to be made to the principal debtor, the guaranty is in legal effect an offer or proposal on the part of the guarantor, needing an acceptance by the other party to complete the contract;" 115 U. S. 624. See 34 Am. L. Reg. & Rev. 257.

The agreement of a del credere agent to pay for goods sold by him is not within the statute; 23 Vt. 720; 14 N. Y. 267.

The form of the writing is not material: it may consist of one or more writings (provided they refer to each other on their face); 27 Mo. 388; 11 East 142; but see 14 How. 446; in such case it is enough if one be signed; 11 East 142. A minute of a vote of a corporation is sufficient; 14 Allen 407.

There is a conflict of authority as to whether the consideration need appear in the writing. It was finally settled in England that it must; 5 East 10; 4 B. & Ald. 595; but this is now changed by statute 19 & 20 Vict. The cases are reviewed in Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 63. A seal imports a consideration; id. As to the signature of the party to be charged, a seal alone is generally held sufficient; Stra. 764; so is a mark; 49 Barb. 62; 2 M. & S. 266; and a signature by the initials only; 1 Den. 471; 9 Allen 474; and a signature on a telegram; 85 Barb. 468. The signature need not be at the foot of the writing; 2 M. & W. 653.

Guaranty may be made for the tort as well as the contract of another, and then comes under the term misfeasance in the statute; 2 B. & Ald. 613; 2 Day 457; 1 Wils. 305; 9 Cow. 154; 14 Pick. 174.

All guaranties need a consideration to support them, none being presumed as in case of promissory notes. A guaranty of the payment of a negotiable promissory note, written by a third person upon a note before its delivery, need express no consideration, even where the law requires the consideration of the guaranty to be expressed in writing; but the consideration which the note upon its face implies to have passed between the original parties is sufficient; 149 U. S. 293. Forbearance to sue is good consideration; Cro. Jac. 683; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 190; 4 Johns. 257; 6 Conn. 81; 27 L. J. Exch. 120; 21 Fed. Rep. 836; 77 Ind. 1. Where the guaranty is contemporaneous with the principal obligation, it shares the consideration of the latter; 8 Johns. 23; 1 Paine 590; 2 Pet. 170; 3 Mich. 396; 38 N. H. 73.

A guaranty may be for a single act, or may be continuous. The cases are conflicting, as the question is purely one of the intention of the particular contract; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. 156. The tendency in this country is said to be against construing guaranties as continuing, unless the intention of the parties is so clear as not to admit of a reasonable doubt; Bayl. Sur. & Guar. 7, citing 33 Ohio St. 177; s. c. 30 Am. R. 572; Lent v. Padleford, 2 Am. Lead. Cas. 141; 24 Wend. 83; 145 Ill. 438. If the object be to give a standing credit to be used from time to time, either indefinitely or for a fixed period, the liability is continuing; 40 Ill. App. 333; 3 Ind. App. 1; but if no time is fixed and nothing indicates the continuance of the obligation, the presumption is in favor of a limited liability as to time; Bayl. Sur. & Guar. 7; 82 Barb. 351. A guaranty of any bills of account for goods sold another to a certain amount is a continuing guaranty; 40 Ill. App. 389. A sealed continuing guaranty is revoked by the death of the guarantor; 22 W. N. C. (Pa.) 457.

The authorities are not agreed as to the negotiability of a guaranty. It is held that a guaranty which is a separate and distinct instrument is not negotiable separately; 3 W. & S. 272; 4 Chandl. 151; 14 Vt. 233; 31 Me. 536; 31 Barb. 92; 21 Pick. 140. The right of the acceptor of a bill, to the benefit of a guaranty given to him, is not transfeble to a holder of the bill, unless it was given for the purpose of being exhibited to other parties; 3 Ch. App. 736. But if a guaranty is on a negotiable note, it is negotiable with the note; and if the note is to bearer, the guaranty has been held to be negotiable in itself; 24 Wend. 450; 6 Humphr. 261. But an equitable interest passes by transfer, and the assignee may sue in the name of the assignor; 12 S. & R. 100; 20 Vt. 506. It has been held that no suit can be maintained upon a guaranty except by the person with whom it was made; Bayl. Sur. & Guar. 14; 8 Watts 381; but it has also been held that a guaranty of a note may be sued on by any person who advances money on it, but that it is not negotiable unless made upon the note the payment of which it guarantees; Bayl. Sur. & Guar. 15; 26 Wend. 425.

It is held that a guaranty is not enforceable by others than those to whom it is directed; 3 McLean 279; 1 Gray 317; 6 Watts 182; 10 Ala. N. S. 798; although they advance goods thereon; 4 Cra. 224.

In one case it was held that the guarantor was not bound where the guaranty was addressed to two and acted on by one of them only; 3 Tex. 199. It was held, also, that the guaranty was not enforceable by the survivor of two to whom it was addressed, for causes occurring since the decease of the other; 7 Term 254.

In the case of promissory notes, a distinction has sometimes been made between a guaranty of payment and a guaranty of collectibility; the latter requiring that the holder shall diligently prosecute the principal debtor without avail; 4 Wis. 190; 25 Conn. 576; 6 Barb. 547; 26 Me. 358; 4 Conn. 527; 48 Minn. 207.

It has in some cases been held that an indorsement in blank on a promissory note by a stranger to the note was prima facie a guaranty; 37 Ill. App. 616. A second acceptance on a bill of exchange may amount to a guaranty; 2 Camp. 447.

A guarantor is discharged by a material alteration in the contract without his consent. Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 378; 137 N. Y. 307; 85 Ia. 617. Modification of a contract made by the contractor and the owner will not release the guarantor, if they are such as are permitted by the terms of the contract; 155 Pa. 36. See SURETYSHIP.

The guarantor may also be discharged by the neglect of the creditor in pursuing the principal debtor. The same strictness as to demand and notice is not necessary to charge a guarantor as is required to charge an indorser; but in the case of a guaranteed note the demand on the maker must be made in a reasonable time, and if he is solvent at the time of the maturity of the note, and remains so for such reasonable time afterwards, the guarantor does not become liable for his subsequent insolvency; 2 H. Bla. 612; 18 Pick. 584. Notice of non-payment must also be given to the guarantor; 9 Ohio 490; but where the name of the guarantor of a promissory note does not appear on the note, such notice is not necessary unless damage is sustained thereby, and in such case the guarantor is discharged only to the extent of such damage; 12 Pet. 497. One who guarantees that another will pay promptly for goods to be purchased is not liable where the purchaser becomes insolvent after the guaranty is given, and the seller gives the guarantor no notice of the purchaser's failure to pay; 145 Ill. 488. A presentment for payment is now decided not to be necessary in order to charge one who guarantees the due payment of a bill or note; 5 M. & G. 559. It is not necessary that an action should be brought against the principal debtor; 7 Pet. 113. See, also, 2 Watts 128; 11 Wend. 620.

From the close connection of guaranty with suretyship, it is convenient to consider many of the principles common to both under the head of suretyship, which article see.

Where an innocent person acts upon a guaranty, the execution of which was procured by misrepresentation, the burden devolves upon the guarantor to show that he was free from negligence; the rule in such cases being the same with respect to the execution of guaranties as to that of negotiable instruments; 17 N. Y. Supp. 764. Whether a guaranty is absolute or special is a question of fact; 37 Ill. App. 616.

Where the guaranty of a written contract is executed on the same paper, notice of acceptance by the person for whose benefit it is made, is unnecessary; 130 Ind. 194. See SURETYSHIP.

It is not within the general scope of a partner's authority to give guaranties in the name of the firm; Wood's Byles, Bills 48; 35 Minn. 229. And an officer of a company cannot bind it as surety or guarantor; 91 Pa. 367.

Consult Fell on Guaranty; Burge; Theobald; Putman on Suretyship; Browne; Reed, on Statute of Frauds; Addison; Chitty; Parsons; Story on Contracts. Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty. See, generally, SURETYSHIP.

GUARANTY COMPANY.

A "guaranty company" is such a corporation as may become surety for another, and an insurance company is not a guaranty or security company within the ordinary meaning of the term. 115 Ky. 787, 74 S. W. 1052. See SURETY COMPANY.

GUARANTY FUND. A depositor's guaranty fund is a fund created by law in many states for the purpose of securing to bank depositors the full repayment of their deposits in case of the insolvency of any of the banks existing under the laws of the state. Accumulated by an assessment on each bank of a certain per cent of its average daily deposits, and under the control of a state banking board. 219 U. S. 109.

As used and defined in the New York Banking Law, "the term 'guaranty fund' means a fund created by a mutual non-stock corporation from its earnings or from contributions, which is not available for the payment of expenses, so long as such corporation has any undivided profits, or for the payment of dividends, and against which losses upon its investments, whether resulting from the depreciation in the value of its securities or otherwise, may be charged, without encroaching upon its undivided profits or net earnings, until such guaranty fund is exhausted."

GUARANTY INSURANCE. See INSURANCE.

GUARDAGE. The condition of one who is under a guardian. A state of wardship.

GUARDIA. See GARDIA.

GUARDIAN. One who legally has the care and management of the person, or the estate, or both, of a child during his minority. Reeve, Dom. Rel. 811.

The term Guardian has been held to be synonymous with "next friend"; 80 Fla. 210.

A person having the control of the property of a minor without that of his person is known in the civil law, as well as in some of the states of the United States, by the name of curator. 1 Leg. 61, du Droit Civ. Rom. 241. The guardian of the person is called "tutor." Tiff. Pers. & Dom. Rel. 295.

Guardian by chancery. This guardianship, although unknown at the common law, is well established in practice now. It grew up in the time of William III., and had its foundation in the royal prerogative of the king as pater patrie. 2 Fonbl. Eq. 246.

This power the sovereign is presumed to have delegated to the chancellor; 10 Ves. 63; 2 P. Wms. 118; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 817. By virtue of it, the chancellor appoints a guardian where there is none, and exercises a superintending control over all guardians, however appointed, removing them for misconduct and appointing others in their stead; Co. Litt. 89; 1 P. Wms. 703; 1 Ves. 160; 2 Kent 227. But only, it is said, where the minor has property; Tiffany, Dom. Rel. 800; 2 Russ. 1, 20.

An infant with property becomes a ward of court (1) if an action is commenced in his name; (2) if an order is made on petition or summons for the appointment of a guardian; if an order is made in like manner for maintenance; (4) if a fund belonging to an infant is paid into court under the acts for the relief of trustees; Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 95. See Simpson, Inf. 2d. ed. 241; 1 Sharw. Bla. Com. 462 note 8.

This power, in the United States, resides in courts of equity; 1 Johns. Ch. 99; 2 id. 439; 139 Ind. 268; but more commonly by statute in probate or surrogate courts; 2 Kent 226; 30 Miss. 458; 3 Bradf. Surr. 133.

Guardian by nature is the father, and, on his death, the mother; 2 Kent 220; 2 Root 320; 2 Wend. 158; 4 Mass. 675.

This guardianship, by the common law, extends only to the person, and the subject of it is the heir apparent, and not the other children,—not even the daughter when there are no sons; for they are but presumptive heirs only, since their right may be defeated by the birth of a son after their father's decease. But as all the children male and female equally inherit with us, this guardianship extends to all the children, as an inherent right in their parents during their minority; 2 Kent 220. In default of both parents, the natural guardian is the grandfather or grandmother, or next of kin; 114 U. S. 218; 60 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 614.

The mother of a bastard child is its natural guardian; 6 Blackf. 357; 2 Mass. 109; but not by the common law; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 314, note. The power of a natural guardian over the person of his ward is perhaps better explained by reference to the relation of parent and child. See DOMICIL. It is well settled that the court of chancery may, for just cause, interpose and control the authority and discretion of the parent in the education and care of his child; 8 Paige, Ch. 47; 10 Ves. 52.

A guardian by nature is not entitled to the control of his ward's personal property; 34 Ala. N. S. 15, 565; 1 P. Wms. 285; 6 Conn. 474; 7 Wend. 334; 3 Pick. 213; 95 Ill. 519; unless by statute. See 10 Mo. 845; 110 U. S. 42. The father must support his ward; 2 Bradf. Surr. 841. But where his means are limited, the court will grant an allowance out of his child's estate; id.; 1 Bro. Ch. 387. But the mother, if guardian, is not obliged to support her child if it has sufficient estate of its own; nor is she entitled, like the father, when guardian, to its services, unless she is compelled to maintain it. But where the mother, who is guardian of her son, engages board for him, she incurs liability personally and not as guardian; 5 Ind. App. 204.

A father as guardian by nature has no right to the real or personal estate of his child; that right, whenever he has it, must be as a guardian in socage, or by some statutory provision; 15 Wend. 631.

Guardian by nurture. This guardianship belonged to the father, then to the mother.

The subject of it extended to the younger children, not the heirs apparent. In this country it does not exist, or, rather, it is merged in the higher and more durable guardianship by nature, because all the children are heirs, and, therefore, the subject of that guardianship; 2 Kent 221; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 315; 6 Ga. 401. It extended to the person only; 6 Conn. 494; 40 L. & Eq. 109; and terminated at the age of fourteen; 1 Bla. Com. 461.

Guardian in socage. This guardianship arose when socage lands descended to an infant under fourteen years of age; at which period it ceased if another guardian was appointed, otherwise it continued; 5 Johns. 66.

The person entitled to it by common law was the next of kin, who could not by any possibility inherit the estate; 1 Bla. Com. 461. If the lands descended from a paternal relative, the mother or next of kin on her part was the guardian; if from a maternal relative the father, or next of kin on his part was; 2 Wend. 153. Although recognized in New York, it was never common in the United States; 5 Johns. 60; 7 id. 157; because, by the statutes of descents generally in force in this country, those who are next of kin may eventually inherit. Wherever it has been recognized, it has been in a form differing materially from its character at common law; 15 Wend. 631. Such guardian was also guardian of the person of his ward as well as his real estate; Co. Litt. 87, 89. Although it did not arise unless the infant was seized of lands held in socage, yet when it did arise it extended to hereditaments which do not lie in tenure and to the ward's personal estate. See Hargrave's note 67 to Co. Litt. This guardian could lease his ward's estate and maintain ejectment against a disseisor in his own name; 2 Bacon, Abr. 683. A guardian in socage cannot be removed from office, but the ward may supersede him at the age of fourteen, by a guardian of his own choice; Co. Litt. 89. In New York guardians in socage have neither common law nor statutory right to control the personal estate of the wards; 138 N. Y. 333.

There was anciently a guardianship by chivalry at the common law, where lands came to an infant by descent which were held by knight-service; Co. Litt. 88, 11, note. That tenure being abolished by statute Car. II., the guardianship has ceased to exist in England, and has never had any existence in the United States.

Guardians by statute are of two kinds: first, those appointed by deed or will; second, those appointed by court in pursuance of some statute.

Testamentary guardians are appointed by the deed or last will of the father; 88 Ga. 722; and they supersede the claims of all other guardians, and have control of the person and the real and personal estate of the child till he arrives at full age.

This power of appointment was given to the father by the stat. 12 Car. II. c. 24, which has been pretty extensively adopted in this country, though in some states the appointment is limited to will. Under it, the father might thus dispose of his children, born and unborn; 7 Ves. 315; but not of his grandchildren; 5 Johns. 278. Nor does it matter whether the father is a minor or not; 2 Kent 225. It continues during the minority of a male ward, both as to his estate and person, notwithstanding his marriage; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 328; 2 Kent 224; 4 Johns. Ch. 390. There seems to be some doubt as to whether marriage would determine it over a female ward; 2 Kent 224. It is more reasonable that it should, inasmuch as the husband acquires in law a right to the control of his wife's person. But it would seem that a person marrying a testamentary guardian is not entitled to the money of the ward; 12 Ill. 431. In England and most of the United States a mother cannot appoint a testamentary guardian, nor can a putative father, not a person in loco parentis; 1 Bla. Com. 462, n.; but by statute in Illinois she may make an appointment, if the father has not done so, provided she be not remarried after his death; 2 Kent 225. In New York, the consent of the mother is required to a testamentary appointment by the father; Schoul. Dom. Rel. 400. A man cannot by law appoint his son testamentary guardian for the children of the latter; 79 Ga. 897.

Guardians appointed by court. The greater number of guardians among us, by far, are those appointed by court, in conformity with statutes which regulate their powers and duties. In the absence of special provisions, their rights and duties are governed by the general law on the subject of guardian and ward.

Appointment of guardians. All guardians of infants specially appointed must be appointed by the infant's parent; or by the infant himself; or by a court of competent jurisdiction.

After the age of fourteen, the ward is entitled to choose a guardian, at common law, and generally by statute; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 320; 15 Ala. N. S. 687; 80 Miss. 458; 11 Jur. 114. His choice is subject, however, to the rejection of the court for good reason, when he is entitled to choose again; 14 Ga. 594. So guardianship by the sole appointment of the infant cannot now be said to exist. If the court appoint one before the age of choice, the infant may appear and choose one at that age, without any notice to the guardian appointed; 30 Miss. 458; 15 Ala. N. S. 687; 50 Ga. 332; 38 Conn. 804. But if none be chosen, then the old one acts. It seems that in Indiana the old one can be removed only for cause shown; in which case, of course, he is entitled to notice; 8 Ind. 307. See 66 Pa. 248. As to the method of appointment by the Ward see 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 462, note 8. A probate, surrogate, or county court has no power to appoint, unless the minor resides in the same county; 2 Bradf. Surr. 214; 7 Ga. 362; 9 Tex. 109; 18 Ala. N. S. 759; 27 Mo. 280; 45 Mo. App. 415; but where the ward is a nonresident, guardianship is frequently recognized for the collection and preservation of his estate in the jurisdiction, and in such cases, the court where the property is situated will appoint a guardian, the existence of the property determining the jurisdiction; 4 Allen 466; 27 E. L. & Eq. 249. Persons residing out of the jurisdiction will not, usually be appointed guardians; but this rule is not invariable, except in those states which require resident guardians by statute; Schoul. Dom. Rel. 419.

It has been a subject of much doubt whether a married woman may be a guardian; while there are cases which sustain their acts while acting as guardians, clear precedents for their actual appointment are wanting. See 2 Dougl. 433. It has been held, however, that a married woman may be co-guardian with a man, though her sole appointment is improper; L. R. 1 Ch. 387. See 29 Miss. 185; 1 Paige 488; 19 Ind. 88. A single woman by her marriage loses her guardianship, it would seem; but she may be reappointed; 2 Kent 225, n. b; 2 Dougl. 433. It seems probable that recent statutes relating to the rights of married women will modify these cases. Where there is a valid guardianship unrevoked, the appointment of another is void; 23 Miss. 530.

The court has jurisdiction to interfere with and remove the guardian of a child who has no property, on proof of misconduct of the guardian towards the child or on proof that it is for the welfare of the child that the guardian should be removed; [1893] 1 Ch. 143.

Powers and liabilities of guardians. The relation of a guardian to his ward is that of a trustee in equity, and bailee at law; 2 Md. 111. It is a trust which he cannot assign; 1 Pars. Contr. 116. He will not be allowed to reap any benefit from his ward's estate; 2 Comyns 230, except for his legal compensation or commission; but must account for all profits, which the ward may elect to take or charge interest on the capital used by him; 17 Ala. N. S. 306; he cannot purchase lands belonging to him; 54 Ark. 627. He can invest the money of his ward in real estate only by order of court; 8 Ind. 320; 3 Yerg. 836; 21 Miss. 9. 38 Me. 47; 56 N. W. Rep. (S. Dak.) 82; 56 Fed. Rep. 699. And he cannot convert real estate into personalty without a similar order; Field, Inf. 109; 25 Mo. 548; 4 Jones 15; 16 B. Monr. 289; 1 Rawle 293; 1 Ohio 297; 1 Dutch. 121; 2 Kent 280. The law does not favor the conversion of the real estate of minors; 14 Pa. 372; but if it be clearly to the interest of a minor that his real estate be sold and converted into money, the court will award an order of sale, notwithstanding that in the event of his death during minority, the proceeds would go to other parties than those to whom the land would have descended had it not been converted; 6 Phila. 157. The rule is different in England; there land converted into money, or money into land, retains its character of land or money, as the case may be, during the nonage of the minor; 6 Ves. 6; 11 Ill. 278. They cannot bind their wards by contracts as to the proportion of the claims against the estate each shall bear; 2 Colo. App. 306.

He may lease the land of his ward; 1 Pars. Contr. 114; 2 Mass. 50; but if the lease extends beyond the minority of the ward, the latter may avoid it on coming of age; 1 Johns. Ch. 561; 10 Yerg. 100; 2 Wils. 129; 5 Halst. 188. He may sell his ward's personalty without order of court; 27 Ala. N. S. 198; 19 Mo. 845; 153 U. S. 409; and dispose of and manage it as he pleases; 2 Pick. 248. He is required to put the money out at interest, or show that he was unable to do this; 21 Miss. 9; 2 Wend. 424; 1 Pick. 527; 7 W. & S. 48; 13 E. L. & Eq. 140; 92 Mich. 275; 39 Ill. App. 882. And in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed that a guardian might have kept funds of his ward at interest; 39 Ill. App. 882. If he spends more than the interest and profits of the estate in the maintenance and education of the ward without permission of the court, he may be held liable for the principal thus consumed; 1 S. & M. 545; 26 Miss. 393; 6 B. Monr. 1292; 2 Strobb. 40; 3 Sneed 520; 99 N. C. 118.

If he erects buildings on his ward's estate out of his own money, without order of court, he will not be allowed any compensation; 11 Barb. 22; 11 Pa. 326; 23 Miss. 189; 17 Or. 115. He is not chargeable with the services of his wards if for their own benefit he requires them to work for him; 12 Gratt. 608. A married woman guardian can convey the real estate of her ward without her husband joining; 2 Dougl. 433. On marriage of a female minor in Mississippi, her husband, although a minor, is entitled to receive her estate from her guardian; 3 Miss. 893. A guardian who deposited the moneys of his ward, as guardian, in a bank that was solvent, with his sureties was held not liable for loss upon the failure of the bank; 144 Pa. 499.

Joint guardians may sue together on account of any joint transaction founded on their relation to the ward, even after the relation ceases; 4 Pick. 283; see 101 Mass. 592; and where one guardian consents to his co-guardian's misapplication of funds, he is liable; 11 S. & R. 66; 18 Pa. 175. Guardians like other trustees—executors and administrators excepted—may portion out the management of the property to suit their respective taste and qualifications, while neither parts irrevocably with the control of the whole; and in such case each is chargeable with no more than what he received, unless unwarrantable negligence in superintending the others' acts can be shown; 8 W. & S. 149; and the discharge of one who has received no part of the estate relieves him from liability; 33 Pa. 466.

Contracts between guardian and ward immediately after the latter has attained his majority are unfavorably regarded by the courts, and will be set aside where they redound to the profit of the guardian; Bisp. Eq. 284; 4 S. & R. 114; 8 Md. 280; 28 Miss. 787; 14 B. Monr. 688; 13 Barb. 84; 10 Ala. N. S. 400. Neither is he allowed to purchase at the sale of his ward's property; 2 Jones, Eq. 285; 22 Barb. 167; 54 Ark. 627. But the better opinion is that such sale is not void, but voidable only; 2 Gray 141; 10 Humphr. 275. He is not allowed, without permission of court under some statute authority, to remove his ward's property out of the state; 24 Ala. N. S. 486; 45 La. Ann. 1062. He cannot release a debt due his ward; 1 J. J. Marsh. 441; 11 Mo. 640; although he may submit a claim to arbitration; 22 Miss. 118; 11 Me. 326; 6 Pick. 269; Dy. 216; but he cannot do so when he is interested adversely to them in the subject-matter of the arbitration; 96 Tex. 172. He may collect or compromise and release debts due to the ward, subject to the liability to be called to account for his acts; 153 U. S. 499. He cannot by his own contract bind the person or estate of his ward; 1 Pick. 314; nor avoid a beneficial contract made by his ward; 13 Mass. 237; Co. Litt. 17 b, 89 a. He becomes liable for negligence for failure to sue on a note due his ward's estate until the parties thereto are insolvent; 118 N. C. 102.

He is entitled to the care and custody of the person of his ward; 7 Humphr. 111; 4 Bradf. Surr. 221; even against parents in England; L. R. 8 Q. B. 168; but latterly, the wishes and best interests of the child will be consulted; 41 Ind. 92; 60 Mich. 261. If a female ward marry, the guardianship terminates both as to her person and property. It has been thought to continue over her property if she marries a minor. If a male ward marries, the guardianship continues as to his estate, though it has been held otherwise as to his person. If he marries a female minor, it is said that his guardian will also be entitled to her property; Reeve, Dom. Fel. 328; 2 Kent 226.

A guardian may change the residence of his ward from one county to another in the same state. But it seems that the new county may appoint another guardian; 4 Bradf. Surr. 221. Whether he has the right to remove his ward into a foreign jurisdiction has been a disputed question; Field, Inf. 114. In England, a guardian, being a parent, can change the child's domicile; 10 Cl. & F. 42; otherwise probably if the guardian be not a parent; Tiffany, Dom. Rel. 317. A natural guardian may change the domicile of his ward; 60 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 614. So held of a paternal grandfather, as guardian; id. Guardians who are not natural guardians can change the municipal domicile of a ward, in the same state; Tiff. Dom. Rel. 317; but not to another state; 146 Pa. 585; 112 U. S. 472; but see 52 Barb. 294; 3 MacArth. 95. By the common law, his authority both over the person and property of his ward was strictly local; 1 J. J. Ch. 156; 1 N. H. 193; 12 Wheat. 169; 10 Miss. 532. And this is the view maintained in most of the states. See Story, Conf. Laws § 540. But see, on this question, 5 Paige, Ch. 596; 8 Ala. N. S. 789; 18 id. 34; 11 Ired. 36; 9 Md. 227; 3 Mer. 67; 5 Pick. 20; DOMICIL.

The court of chancery may interfere to prevent a guardian from attempting an important change in the religious impressions of a ward if upon examination such change seems dangerous and improper; 8 D. M. & G. 760. See Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 90 and note.

Nor can a guardian in one state maintain an action in another for any claim in which his ward is interested; 11 Ala. N. S. 843; 18 Miss. 529; see 31 Barb. 304; 36 Miss. 69; 80 Conn. 508; Story, Conf. Laws § 490; a guardian appointed in one state has no authority in another, except by comity, but the modern tendency is to support the authority of the guardian appointed in the domicile; 103 U. S. 8, 13; L. R. 2 Eq. 704. He cannot waive the rights of his ward,—not even by neglect or omission; 2 Vern. 388; 14 Ill. 417. Noguadian, except a father, is bound to maintain his ward at his own expense. But it is his duty to maintain and educate the ward, in a suitable manner from the income of the ward's estate; 48 Me. 279; 101 Mich. 313. It is discretionary with a court whether to allow a father anything out of his child's estate for his education and maintenance; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 324; 6 Ind. 66.

Rights and liabilities of wards. A ward owes obedience to his guardian, which a court will aid the guardian in enforcing; 3 Atk. 721; 7 Kulp 66. The general rules that the ward's contracts are voidable; 13 Mass. 237; yet there are some contracts so clearly prejudicial that they have been held absolutely void; such as contracts of suretyship; 4 Conn. 870.

A ward cannot marry without the consent of his or her guardian; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 327. And any one marrying or aiding in the marriage of a ward without such consent is guilty of contempt of court; 2 P. Wms. 689; 8 id. 116; but this whole subject is peculiar to the laws of England and has no application in the United States; Schoul. Dom. Rel. 517. Infants are liable for their torts in the same manner as persons of full age; 5 Hill, N. Y. 801; 3 Wend. 891; 9 N. H. 441. A ward is entitled to his own earnings; 1 Bouvier, Inst. 849. He attains his majority the day before the twenty-first anniversary of his birthday; 8 Harring. 557; 4 Dana 507; 1 Saik. 44. He can sue in court only by his guardian or prochein ami; 4 Bla. Com. 404. He could not bring an action at law against his guardian, but might file a bill in equity calling him to account; 2 Vern. 342; 3 P. Wms. 119; 3 Atk. 25; 1 Ves. 91; 92 Tenn. 459. Minors who are kept occupied by their tutor, to teach them habits of industry, cannot exact compensation of him; 45 La. Ann. 134. By the practice in chancery, he was allowed one year to examine the accounts of his guardian after coming of age; 7 Paige 46. See 73 Hun 532; 86 Wis. 99. The statute of limitations will not run against him during the guardianship; 34 Ala. n. s. 15. But see LIMITATIONS.

Sale of infant's lands. It is probable that the English court of chancery did not have the inherent original power to order the sale of minors' lands; 2 Ves. 23; 1 Moll. 525. But, with the acquiescence of parliament, it claims and exercises that right for the purpose of maintaining and educating the ward. This power is not conceded as belonging to our courts of chancery in this country by virtue of their equity jurisdiction, nor to our probate courts as custodians of minors; 6 Hill 415; 3 Kent 239, n. a. It must be derived from some statute authority; 27 Ala. n. s. 198; 7 Johns. Ch. 154; 2 Pick. 243; Ambler 419. There being no inherent authority in a guardian by virtue of his office to convey lands of his wards, a deed by him will not, in the absence of evidence of sharing his authority, convey any title; 69 Tex. 27.

It has been a much-disputed question whether an infant's lands can be sold by special act of the legislature. On the ground that the state is the supreme guardian of infants, this power of the legislature has been sustained where the object was the education and support of the infant; 29 Miss. 146; 5 Ill. 127; 20 Wend. 365; 8 Blackf. 10; 16 Mass. 826. See 103 U. S. 618; 56 Mo. 211. So it has been sustained where the sale was merely advantageous to his interest; 11 Gill & J. 87; 14 S. & R. 435. There has been some opposition on the ground that it is an encroachment on the judiciary; 4 N. H. 585, 575; 10 Yerg. 59. Such sales have been sustained where the object was to liquidate the ancestor's debts; 4 T. B. Monr. 95. This has been considered questionable in the extreme; 10 Am. Jur. 297; 10 Yerg. 59; contra, 10 Ill. 548. It has also been exercised in the case of idiots and lunatics, and sustained on the same reasons as in the case of infants; 7 Metc. 338.

A ward's title to land passes by his guardian's deed therefor, and not by the confirmation of the sale by the court; 97 Cal. 860.

By statute, we have also guardians for the insane and for spendthrifts; 2 Barb. 153; 8 Ala. n. s. 796; 18 Me. 864; 8 N. H. 589; 19 Pick. 506. This guardian is sometimes designated as the committee; Schoul. Dom. Rel. 389.

A guardian to a lunatic cannot be appointed till after a writ of lunaticus inquiring; 21 Ala. n. s. 504. An order removing a guardian is equivalent to an order to pay over the money in his hands to his successor; 9 Mo. 225, 227. In some states the court is authorized to revoke for non-residence of the guardian; id.

A keeper or protector; one who has the charge or custody of any person or thing. In a stricter sense, one who has or is entitled to the custody of the person or property of an infant.

GUARDIAN AD LITEM. A guardian appointed to represent the ward in legal proceedings to which he is a party defendant.

The appointment of such is incident to the power of every court to try a case; 3 Cow. 430; and the power is then confined to the particular case at bar; Co. Litt. 89, n. 16. His duty is to manage the interest of the infant when sued. In criminal cases no guardian is appointed: the court acts as guardian; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 318; Field, Inf. 163. A guardian ad litem cannot be appointed till the infant has been brought before the court in some of the modes prescribed by law; 16 Ala. n. s. 509; 1 Swan 75; 3 B. Monr. 458. See 86 Ky. 198. Such guardian cannot waive service of process; 2 Ind. 74; and his powers are not limited to defence, objection, and opposition merely, but he may file a cross bill to protect the infant's interest involved in the litigation, and appeal from a decree dismissing the same; 45 Ill. App. 17. The writ and declaration in actions at law against infants are to be made out as in ordinary cases. In English practice where the defendant neglects to appear, or appears otherwise than by guardian, the plaintiff may apply for and obtain a summons calling on him to appear by guardian within a given time; otherwise the plaintiff may be at liberty to proceed as in other cases, having had a nominal guardian assigned to the infant; Macpherson, Inf. 359. A like rule prevails in New York and other states; 6 Cow. 50; 12 N. H. 515; Schoul. Dom. Rel. 590.

The omission to appoint a guardian ad litem does not render the judgment void, but only voidable; 8 Metc. 190. See 89 Kan. 548. It will be presumed, where the chancellor received the answer of a person as guardian ad litem, that he was regularly appointed, although it does not appear of record; 10 Miss. 418; 98 Mich. 408. See 2 Swan 197. It is error to decree the sale of a decedent's property on the petition of the representatives, without the previous appointment of a guardian ad litem for the infant heirs; 16 Ala. n. s. 41. Where the general guardian petitions for a sale of his ward's lands, the court must appoint a guardian ad litem; 18 B. Monr. 779; 21 Ala. n. s. 803; 80 Miss. 258; 1 Ohio St. 544; but this is not necessary where the application is for leave to invest money of the ward in land; 79 Ga. 759.

It seems that a guardian ad litem can elect whether to come into hotch-pot; 15 Ala. 85. An appearance of the minor in court is not necessary for the appointment of a guardian to manage his interest in the suit; 11 E. L. & Eq. 156; 15 id. 817. If an infant comes of age pending the suit, he can assert his rights at once for himself, and if he does not he cannot generally complain of the acts of his guardian ad litem; 1 Metc. (Ky.) 602; 50 Me. 62; 48 Wisc. 89.

The appointment of a guardian ad litem is valid, although the infant has not been regularly served with process, but has only accepted service thereof; 97 N. C. 21. The rule that a next friend or guardian ad litem cannot by admissions or stipulation, surrender the rights of the infant, does not prevent a guardian ad litem or prochein ami from assenting to such arrangements as will facilitate the determination of the case in which the rights of the infant are involved; 134 U. S. 650. A married woman cannot be a guardian ad litem or next friend; 84 Ch. D. 485.

GUARDIAN, OR WARDEN, OF THE CINQUE PORTS. A magistrate who has the jurisdiction of the ports or havens which are called the "Cinque Ports" (q. v.). This office was first created in England in imitation of the Roman policy, to strengthen the sea-coasts against enemies, etc.

GUARDIAN OF THE SPIRITUALITIES. The person to whom the spiritual jurisdiction of any diocese is committed during the vacancy of the see.

The archbishop, or one whom he appoints, is guardian of the spiritualities on the vacancy of any see within his province, but when the archiepiscopal see is vacant, the dean and chapter of the archbishop's diocese are guardians. Jacob. See GUARDIAN OF THE TEMPORALITIES.

GUARDIAN OF THE TEMPORALITIES. The person to whose custody a vacant see or abbey was committed by the crown.

GUARDIANSHIP. The power or protective authority given by law, and imposed on an individual who is free and in the enjoyment of his rights, over one whose weakness on account of his age renders him unable to protect himself.

The authority of all guardians is derived from the state, such guardians being appointed when the occasion for them arises, or is expected to arise. The nature of guardianship is that of a trust, the execution of which is at all times superintended by the state. 60 Okl. Cr. Rep. 509.

GUARDIANUS. A guardian, warder, or keeper. Spel. Gloss.

GUARENTIGIO. In Spanish Law. A term applicable to the contract or writing by which courts of justice are empowered to execute and carry into effect a contract in the same manner as if it were decreed by the court after the usual legal formalities. This clause, though formerly inserted in contracts of sale, etc., stipulating the payment of a sum of money, is at present usually omitted, as courts of justice ordinarily compel the parties to execute all contracts made, by authentic acts, that is, acts passed before a notary, in the presence of two witnesses.

GUARNIMENTUM. In old European Law. A provision of necessary things. Spel. Gloss.

GUASTALD. One who had the custody of the royal mansions.

GUERRA, GUERRE. War. Spel. Gloss.

GUERRILLA PARTY (Span. guerra, war; guerrilla, a little war).

In Military Law. Self-constituted bodies of armed men, in times of war, who form no integral part of the organized army, do not stand on the regular pay-roll of the army, or are not paid at all, take up arms and lay them down at intervals, and carry on petty war, chiefly by raids, extortion, destruction, and massacre. Lieber, Guerr. Part. 18. See Halleck, Int. Law 886; Wools. Int. Law 299.

Partisan, free-corps, and guerrilla are terms resembling each other considerably in signification; and, indeed, partisan and guerrilla are frequently used in the same sense. See Halleck, Int. Law 886.

Partisan corps and free-corps both denote bodies detached from the main army; but the former term refers to the action of the troop, the latter to the composition. The partisan leader commands a corps whose object is to injure the enemy by action separate from that of his own main army; the partisan acts chiefly upon the enemy's lines of connection and communication, and outside of or beyond the lines of operation of his own army, in the rear and on the flanks of the enemy. But he is part and parcel of the army, and, as such, considered entitled to the privileges of the law of war so long as he does not transgress it. Free-corps, on the other hand, are troops not belonging to the regular army, consisting of volunteers generally raised by individuals authorized to do so by the government, used for petty war, and not incorporated with the ordre de bataille. The men composing these corps are entitled to the benefit of the laws of war, under the same limitations as the partisan corps.

Guerrilla-men, when captured in fair fight and open warfare, should be treated as the regular partisan is, until special crimes, such as murder, or the killing of prisoners, or the sacking of places, are proved upon them.

The law of war, however, would not extend a similar favor to small bodies of armed country people near the lines, whose very smallness shows that they must resort to occasional fighting and the occasional assuming of peaceful habits and brigandage; Lieber, Guerr. Part. 20.

GUEST. A traveller who stays at an inn or tavern with the consent of the keeper. Bacon, Abr. Inns, C 6; 8 Co. 82; Story, Bailm. § 477. It is not now deemed essential that a person should have come from a distance to constitute him a guest; 68 Wis. 6; 85 Conn. 188.

And if, after taking lodgings at an inn,

he leaves his horse there and goes elsewhere to lodge, he is still to be considered a guest; 28 Vt. 316; but not if he merely leaves goods for keeping which the landlord receives no compensation; 1 Salk. 388; 3 Ld. Raym. 366; Cro. Jac. 188. And where one leaves his horse with an innkeeper with no intention of stopping at the inn himself, he is not a guest of the inn, and the liability of the landlord is simply that of an ordinary bailee for hire; 68 Md. 489; 33 N. Y. 577. The length of time a man is at an inn makes no difference, whether he stays a day, a week, or a month, or longer, or only for temporary refreshments, so always that, though not strictly transiens, he retains his character as a traveller; 5 Term 273; 5 Barb. 560. But if a person comes upon a special contract to board at an inn, he is not, in the sense of the law, a guest, but a boarder; Racon, Abr. Inns, C 5; Story, Bailm. § 477; Wand. Inns 64; but this is a question of fact to be determined by a jury; 33 Wis. 118; 96 Cal. 678. The payment of a stipulated sum per week does not of itself change the relation of a party from that of a guest to that of a lodger; 7 Cush. 417; 88 Cal. 557; 98 id. 678; 20 Alb. L. J. 64. The relation exists where one who keeps a house for the entertainment of all who choose to visit it, extends a general invitation to the public to become guests, although the house is situated on enclosed grounds; 93 Cal. 253. See BAILLEE; INNKEEPER; BOARDER.

GUEST-TAKER. See AGISTER.

GUEST. In French Law. Watch. Ord. Mar. liv. 4, tit. 6.

GULA. In Spanish Law. A right of way for narrow carts. White, New Recop. 1, §. c. 6.

GUIDAGE. In English Law. A reward for safe conduct, through a strange land or unknown country. Cowel. The office of guiding of travellers through dangerous or unknown ways. 2 Inst. 626.

GUIDON DE LA MER. The name of a treatise on maritime law, written in Rouen in Normandy in 1671, as is supposed. It was received on the continent of Europe almost as equal in authority to one of the ancient codes of maritime law. The author of this work is unknown. This tract or treatise is contained in the "Collection de Lois maritimes," by J. M. Pardessus, vol. 2, p. 371 et seq.

GUILD, GILD. A brotherhood or company governed by certain rules and orders made among themselves by king's license; a corporation, especially for purposes of commerce; so called because on entering the guild the members pay an assessment or tax (gild) towards defraying its charges. T. L.; Du Cange. A guild held generally more or less property in common,—often a hall, called a guild-hall, for the purposes of the association. The name of guild was not, however, confined to mercantile companies, but was applied also to religious, municipal, and other corporations. A mercantile meeting of a guild was called a guild merchant.

A fridborg (q. v.), that is, among the Saxons, ten families' mutual pledges for each other to the king. Spelman. See 8 Steph. Com. 81; Turner's Hist. Ang. Sax. v. iii. p. 98.

The earliest corporations in Scotland were not for trading but to perpetuate some public service; and they took their rise from Papal bulls, royal charters, etc., or frequently such charter was presumed; Ersk. Pr. 811.

GUILD HALL (Law Lat. gildhalla, variously spelled ghildhalla, guilhalla, guhalla; from Sax. gild, payment, company, and halla, hall). A place in which are exposed goods for sale. Charter of Count of Flanders; Hist. Guineai, 202, 203; Du Cange. The hall of a guild or corporation. Du Cange; Spelman; e. g., Gildhalla Teutonicorum. The chief hall of the city of London, where the mayor and commonalty hold their meetings. The hall of the merchants of the Hanseatic League in London, otherwise called the "Stylard." Id.

GUILD MERCHANT. See GUILD.

GUILD RENTS. Rents payable to the crown by any guild, or such as formerly belonged to religious guilds, and came to the crown on the dissolution of the monasteries. Toml.

GUILDHALL SITTINGS. The sittings held in the Guildhall of the city of London for city of London cases.

Also known sometimes as the London Sittings. In 1885, these sittings were abandoned, and all such cases as had been tried before them were transferred to the Royal Courts of Justice. Resumed again for a short time in 1891, but not for long. Byrne. See GUILD HALL; LONDON AND MIDDLESEX SITTINGS.

In English Parliamentary Practice. The setting of dates for the discussion of different stages of a measure, for applying the closure, and for taking a division. Stand. Dict.

GUILLOTINE. An apparatus for beheading criminals with a single blow, used in some countries, as France and Greece, for capital punishment. A form of it was in use in the middle ages, but, being improved by Dr. Guillotin at the time of the French Revolution, it received its present name. Cent. Dict.

GUILT. In Criminal Law. That which renders criminal and liable to punishment.

That disposition to violate the law, which has manifested itself by some act already done. The opposite of innocence. See Rutherf. Inst. b. 1, c. 18, a. 10.

In general, every one is presumed innocent until guilt has been proved; but in some cases the presumption of guilt overthrows that of innocence; as, for example, where a party destroys evidence to which the opposite party is entitled. The apportionment of papers material to show the neutral character of a vessel furnishes strong presumption against the neutrality of the ship; 3 Wheat. 227.

GUILTY. The state or condition of a person who has committed a crime, misdemeanor, or offence.

This word implies a malicious intent, and can only be applied to something universally allowed to be a crime. Cowp. 275.

In Pleading. A plea by which a defendant who is charged with a crime, misdemeanor, or tort admits or confesses it. In criminal proceedings, when the accused is arraigned, the clerk asks him, "How say you, A. B., are you guilty or not guilty?" His answer, which is given ore tenus, is called his plea; and when he admits the charge in the indictment, he answers or pleads guilty; otherwise, not guilty. See CULPRIT.

GUINEA. A coin issued by the English mint during the time of Wm. IV. These coins were called in. The word now means only the sum of £1. 1s. First coined in 1662, of gold brought from Guinea. Worcester.

GULA-THING, THE. A law in force in the southern part of Norway dating from the 11th century. This, along with the law called the Frosta-thing (in force in the more northerly division of Drontheim) are the two most important of those Scandinavian codes which, it is said, help us to understand more especially the law prevailing in the northern parts of England, where the Danish influence was the strongest. 2 Holdsw. Hist. E. L. 3rd ed., 32, 33.

GULE OF AUGUST. The first of August, being the day of St. Peter ad Vincula. T. L.

GULES. The heraldic name of the color usually called "red." The word is derived from the Arabic word "gule," a rose, and was probably introduced by the Crusaders. Gules is denoted in engravings by numerous perpendicular lines. Heraldry who blazoned by plants and jewels called it "Mars" and "ruby;" Wharton.

GWARR MERCHED. Maid's fee. A British word signifying a customary fine payable to lords of some manors on marriage of tenant's daughter, or otherwise on her incontinence. Cowel, Marchet.

GWALSTOW. A place of execution. Cowel.

GYLTWITE OR GUILTWIT (Sax.). Compensation for fraud or trespass. Grant of King Edgar, anno 964; Cowel.

H. The eighth letter of the alphabet. See ABBREVIATIONS.

HABE OR HAVE (Lat.). Sometimes used in the titles of the codes of Theodosius and Justinian for Ave (hall). Calv. Lex.; Spel. Gloss.

HABEANT EOS AD RECTUM. See AD RECTUM.

HABEAS CORPORA JURATORUM (Lat. that you have the bodies). In English Practice. A writ issued out of the common pleas, commanding the sheriff to compel the appearance of a jury in a cause between the parties. It answered the same purpose as a distingas juratores in the king's bench. See 3 Bla. Com. 354. It is abolished by the Common-law Procedure Act.

HABEAS CORPUS (Lat. that you have the body). A writ directed to the person detaining another and commanding him to produce the body of the prisoner at a certain time and place, with the day and cause of his caption and detention, to do, submit to, and receive whatsoever the court or judge awarding the writ shall consider in that behalf.

Habeas Corpus is an appropriate proceeding for determining whether one held under an extradition warrant is a fugitive from justice; and he should be discharged if he shows by competent evidence, overcoming the presumption of a properly issued warrant, that he is not a fugitive from the demanding State. 207 U. S. 100.

Although the power exists and will be exercised in cases of great importance and urgency, a Federal court or a Federal judge will not ordinarily interfere by habeas corpus with the regular course of the procedure under state authority, but will leave the petitioner to exhaust the remedies afforded by the State for determining whether he is legally restrained of his liberty, and then to bring his case to this court by writ of error under § 709, Rev. Stat. 205 U. S. 178.

This is the most famous writ in the law; and, having for many centuries been employed to remove illegal restraint upon personal liberty, no matter by what power imposed, it is often called the great writ of liberty. It takes its name from the characteristic words it contained when the process and records of the English courts were written in Latin:

Præcipimus tibi quod corpus A B in custodia vestra detentum, ut dicitur, una cum causa captionis et detentionis sue, cunctisque nomine idem A B conceatur in eodem, habere coram nobis apud Westm. de. ad subiiciendum et recipiendum eo quod curia nostra de eo ad tunc et ibidem ordinari contigerit in hac parte, etc.

There were several other writs which contained the words habeas corpus; but they were distinguished from this and from one another by the specific terms declaring the object of the writ, which terms are still retained in the nomenclature of writs: as, habeas corpus ad respondendum, ad testificandum, ad satisfaciendum, ad prosequendum, and ad faciendum et recipiendum, ad deliberandum et recipiendum.

This writ was in like manner designated as habeas corpus ad subiiciendum et recipiendum; but, having acquired in public esteem a marked importance by reason of the nobler uses to which it has been devoted, it has so far appropriated the generic term to itself that it is now, by way of eminence, commonly called The Writ of Habeas Corpus.

The date of its origin cannot now be ascertained. Traces of its existence are found in the Year Book 4 Ed. III. 22; and it appears to have been familiar to, and well understood by, the judges in the reign of Henry VI. In its early history it appears to have been used as a means of relief from private restraint. The earliest precedents where it was used against the crown are in the reign of Henry VII. Afterwards the use of it became more frequent, and in the time of Charles I. it was held an admitted constitutional remedy; Hurd, Hab. Corp. 145; Church, Hab. Corp. 2. In writing of procedure in the thirteenth century the recent work which throws so much new light upon the early history of English law says: "Those famous words habeas corpus are making their way into divers writs, but for any habitual use of them for the purpose of investigating the cause of imprisonment we must wait until a later time." There is also a reference to what is termed the use of habeas corpus as "at one time a part of the ordinary mesne process in a personal action," also referred to as "the Bractonian process which inserts a habeas corpus between attachment and distress," which (habeas corpus) a little later seems to disappear. No other allusion is made to the subject; 2 Pol. & Maitl. 584, 591.

A still later writer who is as earnest in tracing the fountains of English law to a Roman source, as the writers last quoted are indisposed to do so, says on the subject:

"The presence in the Pandects of every important doctrine of habeas corpus is an interesting fact, and suggests that the proceeding probably came to England, as it did to Spain, from the Roman law. There is no evidence, so far as I have been able to discover, that the process was of British or Teutonic origin. It is fully described in the forty-third book of the Pandects. The first text is the line from the 'Perpetual Edict,' ait praetor: quem librum dolo malo retines, exhibeas. The praetor declares: produce the freeman whom you unlawfully detain.' The writ was called the interdiction or order 'de homine libero exhibendo.' After quoting this article of the Edict, the compilers of the Pandects introduced the commentary of Ulpian to the extent of perhaps two pages of a modern law book, and the leading rules which he derives from the text are law, I believe, to-day in England and America. Thus he says:—

"This writ is devised for the preservation of liberty to the end that no one shall detain a free person."

"The word freeman includes every freeman, infant or adult, male or female, one or many, whether sui juris, or under the power of another. For we only consider this: Is the person free?"

He who does not know that a freeman is detained in his house is not in bad faith; but as soon as he is advised of the fact he becomes in bad faith."

"The praetor says exhibeas (produce, exhibit). To exhibit a person is to produce him publicly, so that he can be seen and handled."

"This writ may be applied for by any person; for no one is forbidden to act in favor of liberty."

And to this commentary of Ulpian the compilers also add some extracts from Vaulsius, who, among other things says:

"A person ought not to be detained in bad faith for any time; and so no delay should be granted to the person who thus detains him." In other words, a writ of habeas corpus should be returnable and heard instantly.

"It seems certain that this writ might have been applied for in Britain during the four centuries of Roman occupation, at least when not suspended by a condition of martial law; and after the restoration of the Christian Church in the sixth century, and the occupation of judicial positions by bishops and other learned clerics, familiar with such procedure, it is not unreasonable to assume that it was revived and took its place in English law." Howe, Studies in the Civil Law 64.

After the use of the writ became more common, abuses crept into the practice, which in some measure impaired the usefulness of the writ. The party imprisoning was at liberty to delay his obedience to the first writ, and might wait till a second and third were issued, before he produced the party; and many other vexatious shifts were proposed to detain state prisoners in custody; 3 Bla. Com. 185.

Greater promptitude in its execution was required to render the writ efficacious. The subject was accordingly brought forward in parliament in 1693, and renewed from time to time until 1679, when the celebrated Habeas Corpus Act of 31 Car. II. was passed. The passage of this act has been made the theme of the highest praise and congratulation by British authors, and is even said to have "extinguished all the resources of oppression;" Hurd, Hab. Corp. 93; Church, Hab. Corp. 87.

This act being limited to cases of commitments for "criminal or suppur criminal matters," every other species of restraint of personal liberty was left to the ordinary remedy at common law; but, doubts being entertained as to the extent of the jurisdiction of the judge to inquire into the truth of the return to the writ in such cases, an attempt was made, in 1777, in the house of lords, to render the jurisdiction more remedial. It was opposed by Lord Mansfield as unnecessary, and failed, for the time, of success. It was subsequently renewed, however, and the act of 56 Geo. III. c. 100 supplies, in England, all the needed legislation in cases not embraced by the act of 31 Car. II.; Hurd, Hab. Corp.

The English colonists in America regarded the privilege of the writ as one of the greatest birth-rights of Britons, and sufficient indications exist that it was frequently resorted to. The denial of it in Massachusetts by Judge Dudley in 1689 to Rev. John Wise, imprisoned for resisting the collection of an oppressive and illegal tax, was made the subject of a civil action against the judge, and was, moreover, denounced, as one of the grievances of the people, in a pamphlet published in 1790 on the authority of "the gentlemen, merchants, and inhabitants of Boston and the country adjacent." In New York in 1707 it was to effect the release of the Presbyterian ministers Makensie and Hampton from an illegal warrant of arrest issued by the governor, Cornbury, for preaching the gospel without license. In New Jersey in 1710 the assembly denounced one of the judges for refusing the writ to Thomas Gordon, which, they said, was the "undoubted right and great privilege of the subject." In South Carolina in 1692 the assembly adopted the act of 31 Car. II. This act was extended to Virginia by Queen Anne early in her reign, while in the assembly of Maryland in 1723 the benefit of its provisions was claimed independent of royal favor, as the "birth-right of the inhabitants." The refusal of parliament in 1774 to extend the law of habeas corpus to Canada was denounced by the continental congress in September of that year as oppressive, and was subsequently recounted in the Declaration of Independence as one of the manifestations on the part of the British government of tyranny over the colonies; Hurd, Hab. Corp. 100-120.

It is provided in art. i. sec. 9, § 2 of the constitution of the United States that "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it."

Similar provisions are found in the constitutions of most of the states. In Virginia, Vermont, Louisiana, and North Carolina, however, it is forbidden to suspend the privilege of the writ in any case; but in the constitution of Maryland, the writ is not mentioned. In Massachusetts the suspension cannot exceed twelve months, and in New Hampshire, three months. In Florida the governor is authorized to suspend the writ in case of insurrection or rebellion.

In 1861, C. J. Taney decided in the U. S. circuit court of Maryland, that congress alone possessed the power under the constitution to suspend the writ; 9 Am. L. Reg. 534; Taney 246; this view was also taken by other courts; 16 Wis. 860; 44 Harb. 93; 21 Ind. 370; contra, 5 Blatchf. 63. In the beginning of the war of the rebellion, President Lincoln suspended the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus on his own authority, and without the sanction of an act of congress. He was supported in his opinion of his right to suspend by some of the legal writers of the time, notably by Horace Binney of Philadelphia; but the better opinion has always been that this suspension without the sanction of congress was unconstitutional. For the history of this controversy see 3 Political Science Quarterly 454; 5 Am. Lawyer 169. The privilege of the writ is, however, necessarily suspended whenever martial law is declared in force; for martial law suspends all civil process. A prisoner of war, therefore, or one held by military arrest under the law martial, is not a subject for the habeas corpus writ; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 63. See MARTIN L. LAW. Nor is a prisoner in the military or naval service whose offence is properly cognizable before a court martial; 158 U. S. 109. Congress, by act of March 3, 1863, 12 Stat. L. 755, authorized the president to suspend the privilege of the writ throughout the whole or any part of the United States, whenever in his judgment the public safety might require it, during the rebellion. Under the provisions of this act, a partial suspension took place, but it was held that the suspension of the privilege of the writ does not suspend the writ itself. The writ issues as a matter of course; and on the return made to it the court decides whether the party applying is denied the right of proceeding any further with it; 4 Wall. 115. Nor does the suspension of the writ legalize a wrongful arrest and imprisonment; it deprives the person thus arrested of the means of procuring his liberty, but does not exempt the person making the illegal arrest from liability for damages, nor from criminal prosecution; 21 Ind. 472; contra, 1 Pacific L. Mag. 360; 1 Bishop, New Crim. L. § 64.

The power has never been exercised by the legislature of any of the states, except that of Massachusetts, which, on the occasion of "Shay's Rebellion," suspended the privilege of the writ from November, 1786, to July, 1787. And in the Confederate States, the privilege was suspended during the war of the rebellion; 3 Winston 143; 37 Tex. 703.

Congress has prescribed the jurisdiction of the federal courts under the writ; but, never having particularly prescribed the mode of procedure, they have substantially followed in that respect the rules of the common law.

In most of the states statutes have been passed, not only providing what courts or officers may issue the writ, but, to a considerable extent, regulating the practice under it; yet in all of them the proceeding retains its old distinctive feature and merit,—that of a summary appeal for immediate deliverance from illegal imprisonment.

Jurisdiction of state courts. The states, being in all respects, except as to the powers delegated in the federal constitution, sovereign political communities, are limited, as to their judicial power, only by that instrument; and they, accordingly, at will, create, apportion, and limit the jurisdiction of their respective courts over the writ of habeas corpus, as well as other legal process, subject only to such constitutional restriction: Church, Hab. Corp. 67.

The restrictions in the federal constitution on this subject are necessarily implied from the express grants of judicial power therein to the federal courts in certain cases specified in art. iii. sec. 2, and in which the decision of the supreme court of the United States is paramount over that of all other courts and conclusive upon the parties.

Jurisdiction of the federal courts. This is prescribed by several acts of congress. By the 14th sec. of the Judiciary Act of September 24, 1789, 1 Stat. L. 81, it is provided that the supreme, circuit, and district courts may issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions and agreeable to the principles and usages of law; and that either of the justices of the supreme court, as well as judges of the district courts, may grant writs of habeas corpus for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of commitment; "provided, that writs of habeas corpus shall in no case extend to prisoners in gaol, unless they are in custody under or by color of the authority of the United States, or are committed for trial before some court of the same, or are necessary to be brought into court to testify."

By the seventh section of the "Act further to provide for the collection of duties or imposts," passed March 2, 1833, 4 Stat. L. 634, the jurisdiction of the justices of the supreme court and judges of the district courts is extended to "all cases of a prisoner or prisoners in jail or confinement, where he or they shall be committed or confined on or by any authority or law for any act done or omitted to be done, in pursuance of a law of the United States, or any order, process, or decree of any judge or court thereof." The federal courts may grant the writ to inquire into the cause of restraint of any person in jail under the authority of a state in violation of the constitution or of a law or treaty of the United States, but except in cases of peculiar urgency they will not discharge the prisoner in advance of a final hearing of his cause in the courts of the state, and even after such final determination in those courts will generally leave the petitioner to his remedy by writ of error from this court; 160 U. S. 231. See also 155 U. S. 89. This decision was rendered necessary by the practice of using the writ of habeas corpus as a means to take an appeal from state tribunals to the supreme court of the United States for the purpose of delaying the trial or execution of criminals, and the evil of it has been well set forth by Hon. Seymour D. Thompson in 30 Am. Law Rev. 229, 290.

By the "Act to provide further remedial justice in the courts of the United States," passed August 29, 1842, 5 Stat. L. 589 the jurisdiction of the justices and judges aforesaid is further extended "to all cases of any prisoner or prisoners in jail or confinement, when he, she, or they, being subjects or citizens of a foreign state, and domiciled therein, shall be committed or confined or in custody under or by any authority or law, or process founded thereon, of the United States, or of any of them, for or on account of any act done or omitted under any alleged right, title, or authority, privilege, protection, or exemption set up or claimed under the commission or order or sanction of any foreign state or sovereignty, the validity and effect whereof depend upon the law of nations, or under color thereof."

By the third section of the "Act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchant service," passed July 20, 1790, 1 Stat. L. 131, it is provided that refractory seamen in certain cases shall not be discharged on habeas corpus or otherwise.

By an act approved February 6, 1867, it is provided that when, in any suit begun in a state court and removed to the circuit court of the United States, the defendant is in actual custody under state process, the clerk of the circuit court shall issue a writ of habeas corpus cum causa to the marshal to take the prisoner into custody to be dealt with in said circuit court according to its rules of law and order; R. S. § 642.

By act of congress, May 3, 1885, an appeal may be taken from the judgment of the United States circuit courts in habeas corpus cases to the supreme court. Since the passage of this act it has been generally held that the supreme court will not issue the writ where it may be done as well in the proper Circuit Court, unless there are special circumstances making action by the supreme court expedient or necessary; 119 U. S. 584; 137 U. S. 63. The writ will not be issued when it appears by the petition that the question has already been decided against the petitioner by another judge in the same court; 45 Fed. Rep. 241. In cases where the right of appeal seems inadequate by reason of its delay, the court may hold the person entitled to the writ as a means of speedy determination of the question; 40 Fed. Rep. 399. In 128 U. S. 395, a judge of the supreme court refused to grant the writ in chambers to the captain of a steamer committed under the laws of Pennsylvania for selling liquor on the steamer without license on the ground that the federal question if any could be raised by writ of error.

Federal courts cannot grant the writ upon a petition that the person is held under the captus of a state court issued upon a judgment that has been vacated; 39 Fed. Rep. 869. A district court cannot, by issuing a writ, declare a judgment of a state criminal court a nullity where such court had full jurisdiction over the crime; 43 Fed. Rep. 661. But the writ can be issued to test the question as to the arrest and imprisonment of a supposed fugitive from justice on the charge of a different offence from that for which he was extradited; 45 Fed. Rep. 471. See also 43 Fed. Rep. 517. In general the writ may be issued by federal courts in every case where a party is restrained of his liberty without due process of law in the territorial jurisdiction of such courts; 40 Fed. Rep. 66; 135 U. S. 1. The granting of the writ is within the discretion of the court and will not be reversed unless an abuse thereof be shown; 83 Fed. Rep. 117. But where the petitioner had been convicted on the indictment of a grand jury impanelled by a court without authority, it was held that the writ became a writ of right and the court having power to issue it could not exercise sound discretion against issuing it; 40 Fed. Rep. 66. A medical director in the navy notified by the secretary of the navy that he was under arrest and should confine himself to the city of Washington is not under such restraint as to sustain the writ; 114 U. S. 664.

The writ does not issue as a matter of course from the federal courts and the petition must show a prima facie right thereto; 53 Fed. Rep. 795; 51 id. 434; 49 id. 338. And only in rare cases will federal courts discharge prisoners held under process of state courts; 79 Fed. Rep. 303, 306. See 30 Am. L. Reg. 309.

The supreme court issues the writ by virtue of its appellate jurisdiction; 4 Cra. 75; 108 U. S. 552; and it will not grant it at the instance of the subject of a foreign government to obtain the custody of a minor child detained by a citizen of one of the states; for that would be the exercise of original jurisdiction; 2 How. 65. An appeal lies to this supreme court from a final order of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico ordering a writ of habeas corpus to be discharged; 164 U. S. 812.

It will grant it on the application of one committed for trial in the circuit court on a criminal charge; 4 Cra. 75; 3 Dall. 17; and where the petitioner is committed on an insufficient warrant; 3 Cra. 443; and where he is detained by the marshal on a captus ad satisfaciendum after the return-day of the writ; 7 Pet. 568; also for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of the restraint of the liberty of prisoners in jail under or by color of the authority of the United States, and all persons who are in custody in violation of the constitution or laws of the United States; 128 U. S. 289. An alien immigrant may have a writ to test the lawfulness of his restraint from landing by a federal office; 142 U. S. 651.

None of the courts of the United States have authority to grant the writ for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of commitment, where the prisoner is imprisoned under process issued from the state courts, excepting where he is denied, or cannot enforce, in the judicial tribunals of the state, any right secured to him by any law providing for the equal civil rights of citizens of the United States; R. S. § 641; 2 Woods 342. It was refused by the supreme court where the party for whose benefit the application was made had been convicted in a state court of levying war against the state; 3 How. 103. Federal courts will proceed with great caution upon applications for writ of habeas corpus in behalf of a person imprisoned under process of the state courts, and, when practicable, will investigate the questions raised before issuing the writ; 49 Fed. Rep. 238. See also paper by Seymour D. Thompson on the abuse and too rigorous use of the writ of habeas corpus by the federal judges; 6 Rep. Am. Bar. Assoc. 243.

It was refused by the circuit court where the petitioner, a secretary attached to the Spanish legation, was confined under criminal process issued under the authority of the state of Pennsylvania; 1 Wash. C. C. 232; also where the petitioner, a British seaman, was arrested under the authority of an act of the legislature of the state of South Carolina, which was held to conflict with the constitution of the United States; 2 Wheel. Cr. Cas. 56.

It will be granted, however, where the imprisonment, although by a state officer, is under or by color of the authority of the United States, as where the prisoner was arrested under a governor's warrant as a fugitive from justice of another state, requisition having been regularly made; 8 McLean 121; or where extradited under a treaty with a foreign country upon the charge of a certain offence for which he was afterwards tried and acquitted, and immediately thereafter he was arrested under a charge entirely separate and distinct from the former one; 39 Fed. Rep. 204. It will also be granted where U. S. Marshals or their deputies are arrested by state authority for using force or threats in executing process of the federal courts; 47 Fed. Rep. 602; but see 51 id. 277. Federal judges should grant writs to persons imprisoned for any act done in pursuance of a law of the United States; 135 U. S. 1.

The power of the federal courts to issue the writ is confined to cases in which the prisoner is in custody under or by order of the authority of the United States, or is committed for trial before some court thereof, or is in custody for an act done or omitted in pursuance of a law of the United States, or of an order, process, or decree of a court or judge thereof; or is in custody in violation of the constitution, or of a law or treaty of the United States, or being a subject or citizen of a foreign state, and domiciled therein, is in custody for an act done or omitted under any alleged right, title, authority, privilege, protection, or exemption claimed under the commission, or order, or sanction of any foreign state, or under color thereof, the validity and effect whereof depend upon the law of nations; or where it is necessary to bring the prisoner into court to testify; R. S. § 753.

If it appears from the petition itself that the applicant for the writ of habeas corpus is not entitled thereto, the writ need not be awarded; 128 U. S. 289; 52 Fed. Rep. 795. The writ cannot be made to perform the office of a writ of error to review the decision of a committing magistrate in extradition proceedings; 161 U. S. 502. Nor will the writ lie, except in rare and exceptional cases, where there is a remedy by writ of error or appeal; 159 U. S. 95. The writ may be issued to determine the right to the custody of an infant as between parents who are living apart; 42 Fed. Rep. 113.

Proper use of the writ. The true use of the writ is to cause a legal inquiry into the cause of imprisonment, and to procure the release of the prisoner where that is found to be illegal.

If the imprisonment be claimed by virtue of legal process, the validity and present force of such process are the only subjects of investigation; 5 Hill 184; 4 Barb. 31; 4 Harr. Del. 575.

But such process cannot, in this proceeding, be invalidated by errors which only render it irregular. The defects, to entitle the prisoner to be discharged, must be such as to render the process void; for the writ of habeas corpus is not, and cannot perform the office of, a writ of error; 3 Vt. 114; 4 Day 438; 3 Hawks 25; 2 La. 422, 597; 2 Park. Cr. Cas. 850; 1 Hill, N. Y. 154; 4 C. & P. 415; 7 Ohio St. 81; 81 Wis. 158; 25 Fla. 214; 16 Or. 83; 131 U. S. 267; 133 id. 333; 148 id. 162; 150 id. 637; 51 Fed. Rep. 434; 118 Mo. 377; but will only be issued if applied for to relieve from imprisonment under the order or sentence of some inferior federal court, when such court has acted without jurisdiction, or has exceeded its jurisdiction, and its order is for that reason void; 4 U. S. App. 73.

Although the writ of habeas corpus does not lie for the determination of mere errors where a conviction has been had and the commitment thereunder is in due form, yet if the court had no jurisdiction of the offence charged, or if it affirmatively appears by the record that the prisoner was tried and sentenced for the commission of an act which under the law constitutes no crime, the judgment is void and the prisoner should be discharged; 73 Cal. 120, 303; 127 U. S. 731; 181 id. 176; 19 Nev. 178; 79 Ga. 785.

It cannot be used to oust another competent and acting jurisdiction, or to divert or defeat the course of justice therein; 5 Ark. 424; 1 Ill. 198; 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 351; 19 Ala. n. s. 438; 2 Wheat. 532; 8 Yerg. 167; 1 Edw. Ch. 531; 1 Harr. Del. 802; 6 Miss. 80; 1 Curt. 178; 2 Green, N. J. 812; 4 McOrd 233; 1 Watts 66; 7 Cush. 285; 8 Ohio St. 599; 139 U. S. 449. It was not intended by congress that the federal courts should, by writs of habeas corpus, obstruct the ordinary administration of the criminal laws of the states through their own tribunals; 140 U. S. 278; 142 id. 155.

The only ground on which a court, without some special statute authorizing it, will give relief on habeas corpus to a prisoner under conviction and sentence of another court, is the want of jurisdiction in such court over the person or the cause, or some other matter rendering its proceedings void; 149 U. S. 70; 134 id. 136; 181 id. 176.

The writ is also employed to recover the custody of a person where the applicant has a legal right thereto; as, the husband for his wife, the parent for his child, the guardian for his ward, and the master for his apprentice; 85 W. Va. 696; 85 Fed. Rep. 854; [1892] App. Cas. 826. But in such cases, as the just object of the proceeding is rather to remove illegal restraint than to enforce specifically the claims of private custody, the alleged prisoner, if an adult of sound mind, is generally permitted to go at large; if an infant of sufficient age and discretion, it is usually permitted to elect in whose custody it will remain, provided that it does not elect an injurious or improper custody; and if of tender years, without such discretion, the court determines its custody according to what the true interests and welfare of the child may at the time require; Hurd, Hab. Corp. 450.

Application for the writ. This may be made by the prisoner, or by any one on his behalf, where for any reason he is unable to make it.

It is usually made by petition in writing, verified by affidavit, stating that the petitioner is unlawfully detained, etc., and, where the imprisonment is under legal process, a copy thereof, if attainable, should be presented with the petition; for where the prisoner is under sentence on conviction for crime, or in execution on civil process, or committed for treason or felony plainly expressed in the warrant, he is not, in most of the states, entitled to the writ; Hurd, Hab. Corp. 209; Church, Hab. Corp. 91. The application must set forth the facts concerning the detention of the party restrained, in whose custody he is detained, and by virtue of what authority, if known; 131 U. S. 280.

Where, with ample opportunity to do so, an accused did not apply for the writ of habeas corpus until after the jury had been sworn and his trial begun in a state court, the federal court will not interpose at that stage of the cause; 148 U. S. 183.

The return. The person to whom the writ is directed is required to produce the body of the prisoner forthwith before the court or officer therein named, and to show the cause of the caption and detention; 5 Term 89; 2 South. 545. The return must specify the true cause of the detention; and the party imprisoned may deny any of the facts set forth in the return, or may allege other facts that may be material in the case, so that the facts may be ascertained and the matter disposed of as law and justice require; 131 U. S. 280. No evidence is necessary to support the return, as it imports verity until impeached; 137 U. S. 86.

If the writ be returned without the body, the return must show that the prisoner is not in the possession, custody, or power of the party making the return, or that the prisoner cannot, without serious danger to his life, be produced; and any evasion on this point will be dealt with summarily by attachment; 5 Term 89; 10 Johns. 328; 1 Dudl. 46; 5 Cra. 622.

Where the detention is claimed under legal process, a copy of it is attached to the return. Where the detention is under a claim of private custody, all the facts relied on to justify the restraint are set forth in the return.

The hearing. The questions arising upon the return or otherwise in the proceeding, whether of fact or of law, are determined by the court or judge, and not by a jury; Hurd, Hab. Corp. 299.

The evidence on the hearing is such as is allowed in other summary proceedings in which the strictness exacted on the trial in civil actions or criminal prosecutions is somewhat relaxed, the practice sometimes permitting affidavits to be read where there has been no opportunity for cross-examination; but the introduction of such evidence rests in the sound discretion of the court; Archb. Cr. Pl. & P. 204; Coxe 403; Sandf. 701; 20 How. S. Tr. 1876; 1 Burr's Trial 97. The court is not concluded by the finding of a committing magistrate, but may go behind his order of commitment, and by certiorari look into the evidence before him; 5 Blatchf. 808; 82 Pa. 520. See 49 Fed. Rep. 569.

Pending the hearing the court may commit the prisoner for safekeeping from day to day, until the decision of the case; 14 How. 184; Bac. Abr. Habeas Corpus (B 12); 5 Mod. 82.

If the imprisonment be illegal, it is the duty of the court to discharge the prisoner from that imprisonment; but if the court or officer hearing the habeas corpus be invested with the powers of an examining and committing magistrate in the particular case, and the evidence taken before the court, or regularly certified to it in the habeas corpus proceeding, so far implicate the prisoner in the commission of crime as to justify his being held for trial, it is usual for the court, in default of bail, to commit him as upon an original examination; 3 East 157; 16 Pa. 575; 2 Cra. C. C. 612; 5 Cow. 12. Where a prisoner is held under a valid sentence and commitment, the illegality of a second sentence will not be inquired into as habeas corpus till the term under the first sentence has expired; 17 Nev. 139.

If the prisoner is not discharged or committed de novo, he must be remanded, or, in a proper case, let to bail; and all offences are available prior to the conviction of the offender, except "capital offences when the proof is evident or presumption great;" Hurd, Hab. Corp. 430.

Recommitment after discharge. The act of 31 Car. II. prohibited, under the penalty of five hundred pounds, the reimprisoning for the same offence of any person set at large on habeas corpus, except by the legal order and process of such court wherein such prisoner was bound by recognizance to appear, or other court having jurisdiction of the cause. Somewhat similar provisions are found in the statutes of many of the states. But these provisions are not held to prevent the subsequent arrest of the prisoner on other and more perfect process, although relating to the same criminal act; 9 Pet. 704; 2 Miss. 163.

HABEAS CORPUS ACTS. See HABEAS CORPUS.

HABEAS CORPUS AD DELIBERANDUM ET RECIPIENDUM (Lat.).

A writ which is issued to remove, for trial, a person confined in one county to the county or place where the offence of which he is accused was committed. Bac. Abr. Habeas Corpus, A; 1 Chitty, Cr. L. 132. Thus, it has been granted to remove a person in custody for contempt to take his trial for perjury in another county; 1 Tyrwh. 185.

HABEAS CORPUS AD FACIENDUM ET RECIPIENDUM (Lat.).

A writ usually issued in civil cases to remove an action from an inferior court, where the defendant is sued and imprisoned, to some superior court which has jurisdiction over the matter, in order that the cause may be determined there. This writ is commonly called habeas corpus cum causa, because it commands the judges of the inferior court to return the day and cause of the caption and detainer of the prisoner; Bac. Abr. Habeas Corpus, A; 3 Bla. Com. 130; Tidd, Pr. 290.

This writ may also be issued at the instance of the bail of the defendant, to bring him up to be surrendered in their discharge, whether he is in custody on a civil suit or on a criminal accusation; Tidd, Pr. 208; 1 Chitty, Cr. L. 132.

HABEAS CORPUS AD PROSECUTIENDUM (Lat.).

A writ which issues when it is necessary to remove a prisoner in order to prosecute in the proper jurisdiction wherein the fact was committed. 3 Bla. Com. 130.

HABEAS CORPUS AD RESPONDENDUM (Lat.).

A writ which is usually employed in civil cases to remove a person out of the custody of one court into that of another, in order that he may be sued and answer the action in the latter. 2 Mod. 198; 3 Bla. Com. 129; Tidd, Pr. 300.

This writ lies also to bring up a person in confinement to answer a criminal charge; thus, the court issued it to the warden of the fleet, to take the body of the prisoner confined there before a magistrate to be examined respecting a charge of felony or misdemeanor; 5 B. & Ald. 780.

But it was refused to bring up the body of a prisoner under sentence for a felony, for the purpose of having him tried for a previous felony.

HABEAS CORPUS AD SATISFACIENDUM (Lat.). A writ which is issued to bring a prisoner from the prison of one court into that of another, in order to charge him in execution upon a judgment of the last court. 3 Bla. Com. 180; Tidd, Pr. 301.

HABEAS CORPUS AD SUBJICIENDUM. See HABEAS CORPUS.

HABEAS CORPUS AD TESTIFICANDUM (Lat.). A writ which lies to bring up a prisoner detained in any jail or prison, to give evidence before any court of competent jurisdiction. Tidd, Pr. 780; 3 Bla. Com. 180; 20 Iowa 372; 91 Mo. 250; 3 Burr. 1440; Whart. Cr. Ev. § 351.

The allowance of this writ resting in the discretion of the court, it will be refused if the application appear to be in bad faith or a mere contrivance; 3 Burr. 1440.

It was refused to bring up a prisoner of war; 2 Dougl. 419; or a prisoner in custody for high treason; Peake, Add. Cas. 21.

It would of course be refused where it appear from the application that the prisoner was under sentence for crime which rendered him incompetent as a witness.

The application for the writ is made upon affidavit, stating the nature of the suit and the materiality of the testimony, together with the general circumstances of restraint which render the writ necessary; Cowp. 672; 2 Cow. & H. Notes to Phill. Ev. 658.

HABEAS CORPUS CUM CAUSA. See HABEAS CORPUS AD FACIENDUM ET RECIPIENDUM.

HABENDUM (Lat.). In Conveyancing. The clause usually following the granting part of the premises of a deed, which defines the extent of the ownership in the thing granted to be held and enjoyed by grantee. 3 Washb. R. P. 436.

It commences with the words "to have and to hold," habendum et tenendum. It is not an essential part of a deed, but serves to qualify, define, or control it. Co. Litt. 6 a, 299; 4 Kent 468; 8 Mass. 162, 174; and may be rejected if clearly repugnant to the rest of the deed; Shepp. Touchst. 102; Skinn. 543. See, generally, 3 Washb. R. P. 436; 4 Kent 468; 4 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 278; Elph. Deeds 217.

HABENTES HOMINES (Lat.). Rich men. Du Cange.

HABENTIA. Wealth; Riches. Mon. Ang. t. 1. 100.

HABERE (Lat.). To have. It is said to designate the right, while tenere (to hold) signifies the possession, and possidere (to possess) includes both. Calv. Lex.

HABERE FACIAS POSSESSIONEM (Lat.). In Practice. A writ of execution in the action of ejectment; originally to recover possession of a chattel interest in real estate.

The sheriff is commanded by this writ that, without delay, he cause the plaintiff to have possession of the land in dispute which is therein described: a ft. fa. or ca. sa. for costs may be included in the writ. The duty of the sheriff in the execution and return of that part of the writ is the same as on a common ft. fa. or ca. sa. The sheriff is to execute this writ by delivering a full and actual possession of the premises to the plaintiff. For this purpose, he may break an outer or inner door of the house; and, should he be violently opposed, he may raise the posse comitatus; 5 Co. 91 b; 1 Leon. 145.

The name of this writ is abbreviated hab. fac. poss. See 10 Vin. Abr. 14; Tidd, Pr. 1061; 2 Arch. Pr. 58; 8 Bla. Com. 412.

HABERE FACIAS SEISINAM (Lat.). In Practice. The name of a writ of execution, used in most real actions, by which the sheriff is directed that he cause the demandant to have seisin of the lands which he has recovered. 8 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3374. It lay to recover possession of the freehold, while to recover a chattel interest in real estate the habere facias possessionem was the appropriate writ. It was practically abolished in England by the Common Law Procedure Acts of 1853 and 1880, but is still known in some of the states in connection with the action of dower.

This writ may be taken out at any time within a year and a day after judgment. It is to be executed nearly in the same manner as the writ of habere facias possessionem, and for this purpose the officer may break open the outer door of a house to deliver seisin to the demandant; 5 Co. 91 b; Com. Dig. Execution, E. The name of this writ is abbreviated hab. fac. seis.

HABERE FACIAS VISUM (Lat.). In Practice. The name of a writ which lay when a view is to be taken of lands and tenements. Fitzh. N. B. Index, View.

HABERE LICERE. See SALE.

HABERGEON. A diminutive of hauberk, a short coat of mail without sleeves. Blount.

HABERJECTO. A cloth of mixed color. Magna charta, c. 28.

HABETO TIBI RES TUAS. Have or take thy property to thyself. A phrase used in connection with the Roman law of divorce. Calv. Lex. Where a marriage in one of their modes, by which the wife passed in manum viri, was dissolved by divorce, the husband had to restore the dos, as in case of the wife's death, unless her misconduct was the cause; Sand. Just. 152.

HABILIS (Lat.). Fit; suitable; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 436. Active; useful (of a servant). Du Cange. Proved; authentic (of Book of Saints). Du Cange. Fixed; stable (of authority of the king). Du Cange.

HABIT. A disposition or condition of the body or mind acquired by custom or a frequent repetition of the same act. See 2 Mart. La. n. s. 322; 18 Pa. 172; 5 Gray 851. The customary conduct, to pursue which one has acquired a tendency, from frequent repetition of the same acts. 105 U. S. 854.

The habit of dealing has always an important bearing upon the construction of commercial contracts. A ratification will be inferred from the mere habit of dealing between the parties: as if a broker has been accustomed to settle losses on policies in a particular manner, without any objection being made, or with the silent approbation of his principal, and he should afterwards settle other policies in the same manner, to which no objection should be made within a reasonable time, a just presumption would arise of an implied ratification: for, if the principal did not agree to such settlement, he should have declared his dissent. See USAGE.

The habit of an animal is, in its nature, a continuous fact, to be shown by proof of successive acts of a similar kind; 131 U. S. 22. See GOON HABITS.

HABIT AND REPUTE. Applied in Scotch law to a general understanding and belief of something's having happened: e. g. marriage may be constituted by habit and repute; Bell, Dict.

HABITABLE REPAIR. Such a state of repair that leased premises may be occupied, not only with safety, but with reasonable comfort. 2 Mood. & R. 186.

HABITANCY. See INHERITANT.

HABITANT. A resident; an inhabitant (q. v.). A native of Canada of French descent, particularly of the peasant or farming class; a tenant who kept hearth and home on the seigniorie.

HABITATIO (Lat.). A habitation, or dwelling.

HABITATION (Lat. Habitatio). In Civil Law. The right of a person to live in the house of another without prejudice to the property.

It differed from a usufruct in this, that the usufructuary might apply the house to any purpose,—as of a store or manufactory; whereas the party having the right of habitation could only use it for the residence of himself and family; 1 Bro. Civ. Law 184; Domat, l. 1, t. 11, s. 2, n. 7.

In Estate. A dwelling-house; a home stall. 2 Bla. Com. 4; 4 id. 220.

HABITUAL CRIMINALS ACT. The stat. 32 & 33 Vict. c. 99. Its object was to give the police greater control over convicted criminals at large, and to provide for the registration of criminals. Now repealed and other provisions substituted for it, by the Prevention of Crime Act, 84 & 85 Vict. c. 112. Moz. & W.

In Massachusetts it is held that the state habitual criminal act is not contrary to the United States constitution prohibiting ex post facto laws; 135 Mass. 163; 138 id. 598.

HABITUAL DRUNKARD. A person given to inebriety or the excessive use of intoxicating drink, who has lost the power or the will, by frequent indulgence, to control his appetite for it. 18 Pa. 172; 5 Gray 85. One who has the habit of indulging in intoxicating drinks so firmly fixed that he becomes drunk whenever the temptation is presented by his being near where liquor is sold. 35 Mich. 210. The custom or habit of getting drunk; the constant indulgence in such stimulants as wine, brandy, and whisky, whereby intoxication is produced; not the ordinary use, but the habitual use of them; the habit should be actual and confirmed, but need not be continuous, or even of daily occurrence; 9 So. Rep. (La.) 750. If there is a fixed habit of drinking to excess, so as to disqualify a person from attending to his business during the principal portion of the time usually devoted to business, it is habitual intemperance; 19 Cal. 267; but see 53 La. 511.

Habitual drunkenness of a husband does not entitle the wife to a divorce; L. R. 1 P. & M. 46; contra, 1 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. 1781. The fact that a man has had delirium tremens once does not prove, as a matter of law, that he is habitually intemperate, so as to contradict his representation to the contrary; 122 U. S. 501.

By the laws of some states, such persons are classed with idiots, lunatics, etc., in regard to the care of property; and in some, they are liable to punishment. See 8 N. Y. 889; Crabbe 558; 6 Wash. 271. See ROGERS, DRINKS, etc.; DRUNKENNESS; DELIRIUM TREMENS; INTOXICATION.

HABITUALLY. Customarily; by frequent practice or use. It does not mean entirely or exclusively; 91 Cal. 274.

HABLE. A seaport; a harbor; a naval station. Stat. 27 Hen. VI. c. 8.

HACIENDA. In Spanish Law. A generic term, applicable to the mass of the property belonging to a state, and the administration of the same. Also a private estate or plantation.

As a science, it is defined by Dr. Jose Canga Arguells, in his "Diccionario de Hacienda," to be that part of civil economy which teaches how to aggrandize a nation by the useful employment of its wealth.

A royal estate. Newman & B. Dict.

HACKNEY CARRIAGES. Carriages plying for hire in the street. The driver is liable for negligently losing baggage; 2 C. 18, 877; 83 How. Fr. 481. They are usually regulated in large cities by statute or ordinance; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 86; 122 Mass. 60.

HADBOTE. In English Law. A recompense or amends made for violence offered to a person in holy orders.

HADD. A boundary or limit. A statutory punishment defined by law, and not arbitrary. Moz. & W.

HADERUNGA. Hatred; ill-will; prejudice. Spelman.

HADGONEL. A tax or mulet. Jacob. HAEC EST CONVENTIO (Lat.). This is an agreement. Words with which agreements anciently commenced. Yearb. H. 6 Edw. II. 191.

HAEC EST FINALIS CONCORDIA (L. Lat.). This is the final agreement. The words with which the foot of a fine commenced. 2 Bl. Com. 351.

HÆREDA. The name, under the Gothic constitutions, of the hundred court (q. v.). 3 Bla. Com. 35; 3 Steph. Com. 281, 282, n. (q.).

HÆREDE ABDUCTO. An ancient writ that lay for the lord, who, having by right the wardship of his tenant under age, could not obtain access to his person, by reason of the ward having been carried away by another person. Old. Nat. Brev. 93; Cowel.

HÆREDE DELIBERANDO ALTERI QUI HABET CUSTODIAM TERRÆ. An ancient writ, directed to the sheriff, requiring him to command one who had taken away an heir under age, being his ward, to deliver him to the person whose ward he was by reason of his land. Reg. Orig. 161.

HÆREDE RATIO. An ancient writ that lay for the ravishment of the lord's ward. Reg. Orig. 163.

HÆREDES. Heirs. Plural of Hæres, which see, together with titles immediately following it.

HÆREDIPETA (Law Lat.). In Old English Law. The next heir to lands. Laws of Hen. I; Du Cange. And who seeks to be made heir (qui cupit hæreditatem). Concil. Compostel. anno 1114 can. 18, inter Hispan. t. 3, p. 324; Du Cange.

HÆREDITAS (Lat. from hæres). In Civil Law. "Nihil aliud est hæreditas, quam successio in universum jus, quod defunctus habuit." Inheritance is nothing else than succession to every right which the deceased possessed. Dig. 50. 17; 50. 16; 5. 2; Mack. C. L. § 605; Bracton 62 b. See HÆRES.

In Old English Law. An estate transmissible by descent; an inheritance. Marten, Anecd. Collect. t. 3, p. 289; Co. Litt. 9.

HÆREDITAS DAMNOSA. A burdensome inheritance. See DAMNOSA HÆREDITAS.

HÆREDITAS JACENS (Lat.). In Civil Law. A prostrate inheritance. The inheritance left to a voluntary heir was so called so long as he had not manifested, either expressly or by silence, his acceptance or refusal of the inheritance, which, by a fiction of law, was said to sustain the person (sustinere personam) of the deceased, and not of the heir. Mack. C. L. § 685 a. An estate with no heir or legatee to take. Code, 10. 10. 1; Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 68.

In English Law. An estate in abeyance; that is, after the ancestor's death and before assumption of heir. Co. Litt. 342 b. An inheritance without legal owner, and therefore open to the first occupant. 2 Bla. Com. 259.

HÆREDITAS LUCTUOSA. The succession of parents to the estate of deceased children. 4 Kent 397. It was called a mournful inheritance because out of the ordinary and natural course of mortality. It was sometimes termed tristitia successio.

HÆRES. In Roman Law. One who succeeds to the rights and occupies the place of a deceased person, being appointed by the will of the decedent. It is to be observed that the Roman hæres had not the slightest resemblance to the English heir. He corresponded in character and duties almost exactly with the executor under the English law.

The institution of the hæres was the essential characteristic of a testament: if this was not done, the instrument was called a codicillus. Mack. C. L. § 692, 690.

Who might not be instituted. Certain persons were not permitted to be instituted in this capacity: such as, persons not Roman citizens, slaves of such persons, persons not in being at the death of the testator, and corporations, unless especially privileged. Also, the emperor could not be made hæres with the condition that he should prosecute a suit of the testator against a subject. Nor could a second husband or wife be instituted hæres to a greater portion of the estate than was left to that child of the first marriage which received least by the will. So, a widow who married before the expiration of her year of mourning could not institute her second husband as hæres to more than a third of her estate. And a man who had legitimate children could not institute as hæres a concubine and her children to more than a twelfth of his estate, nor the mother alone to more than one-twenty-fourth; Mack. C. L. § 691.

The institution of the hæres might be absolute or conditional. But the condition, to be valid, must be suspensive (condition precedent, see CONDICTION), possible, and lawful. If, however, this rule was infringed, certain conditions, as the resolutive (condition subsequent, see CONDICTION), the impossible, and the immoral or indirect, were held nugatory, while others invalidated the appointment of the hæres, as the preposterous and captatory, i. e. the appointment of a hæres on condition that the appointee should, in turn, institute the testator or some other person hæres in his testament. In regard to limitations of time, they must, to be valid, commence ex die incerto. A condition that A should become hæres after a certain day, or that he should be hæres up to a day whether certain or uncertain, was nugatory. The testator might assign his reasons for the institution of a particular hæres, but a mistake in the facts upon which those reasons were based did not, in fact, invalidate the validity of the appointment. The institution might be accompanied with a direction that the hæres should apply the inheritance either wholly or in part to a specified purpose, which he was bound to comply with in case he accepted the inheritance, unless it was physically impossible to do so, or unless the hæres himself was the only person affected by such directions. The hæres might be instituted either simply, without any interest in the estate, or with a fixed share therein, or with regard to some particular thing; Mack. C. L. § 683. It was customary, in order to provide against a failure to accept or the part of the direct hæres, to substitute one or more hæredes to him. This substitution might be made in various forms; but the result was the same in all,—that if the first of the direct hæredes failed to accept the inheritance, whether from indisposition, permanent incapacity, or from dying before the testator, the substitutes, in the order in which they might be several degrees of substitutes, each ready to act in case of the failure of all the preceding; and the rule was substitutus substituto est substitutus: which meant that on a failure of all the intermediate substitutes the lowest in rank succeeded to the position of the first instituted hæres. This was called substitutio vulgaris. There was another, the substitutio pupillaris, which was nothing more than the appointment, by the testator, of a hæres to a minor child under his authority,—which appointment was good in case the child died after the testator, an adult, minor or otherwise, in which making a testament for such minor—an act which he could not perform for himself; Mack. C. L. § 686, 689.

Persons entitled to the inheritance. Though, generally speaking, the testator might institute as hæres any person whatsoever, the testator, in the directions above mentioned, yet his relatives, within certain limits, were considered as peculiarly entitled to the office, and if he instituted any one else they could not be entirely excluded, but were admitted to a share of the inheritance, which share, called portio legitima, was determined by law. The rules in regard to the persons entitled to this share of the estate, and its amount, are very intricate, and too voluminous to be introduced here. They may be found in Mackelday, §§ 654-667. Among those entitled to the pars legitima, the immediate ascendants, and the children, were distinguished in this, that they must be mentioned in the testament, either by being formally instituted as hæredes, or by being formally excluded, while the other relatives so entitled might receive their shares as a legacy, or in any other way, without being formally instituted. From this necessity of mentioning this class of relatives, they were called successores necessarii.

Acquisition of the inheritance. Except in the case of a slave of the testator (hæres necessarius), or a person under his authority (potestas) at his death (hæres suus et necessarius), the institution of a person as hæres did not oblige him to accept the office. A formal acceptance was requisite in the case of all other persons than the two classes just mentioned, whence such persons were called hæredes voluntarii, and in opposition to the hæreses extranei (hæreses extranei), which might be expressed (aditio hæreditatis), or tacit, i. e. by performing some act in relation to the inheritance which admitted of no other construction than that the person named as hæres intended to accept the office. The refusal of the office, if expressed, was called repudiatio; if tacit, through the neglect of the hæres to make use of his rights within a suitable period, it was called omissio hæreditatis. The acceptance could not be coupled with a condition; and a refusal was final and irrevocable; Mack. C. L. § 681-683.

Rights and liabilities of the hæres. The fundamental idea of the office is that as regards the estate the hæres and the testator form but a single person. Hence it follows that the private estate of the hæres and the estate of the testator are united (confusio bonorum defuncti et hæredis); the hæres acquires all rights of property, and becomes liable to all demands, except those purely personal, to which the testator was entitled and subject, and is, consequently, responsible for all the debts of the deceased, even if the estate left by the latter is not sufficient to pay them. He must, moreover, recognize as binding upon him all acts of the testator relating to the estate. He is bound to obey the directions of the will, especially to perform the trusts and pay the legacies imposed upon him, yet this only so far as the residue of the estate, after liquidating the debts, enables him to do so.

These were the strict rules of the law, but two modes, the spatium deliberandi and the beneficium inventarii, were in course of time contrived for relieving the hæres from the risk of loss by an acceptance of the office.

The spatium deliberandi was a period of delay granted to the hæres, upon application to the magistrate, in order that he might investigate the condition of the estate before deciding whether to accept or reject the office. If the hæres was pressed by the other hæredes, or by the creditors of the estate, to decide whether to accept or reject the office he must decide immediately, when allowed by the emperor continued for a year, and when by a judge, for nine months, from the day of its allowance. If the hæres had not decided at the expiration of this period, he was held to have accepted. If he was not pressed to a decision by the other hæres, or by the creditors, he was held to have accepted from the day he was notified of the inheritance having been conferred upon him, to deliberate whether to accept or not. If, after deliberating for the allotted period, he should accept the inheritance, he became responsible for the debts of the testator, without regard to whether the estate was sufficient or not to pay them.

The beneficium inventarii was an extension to all hæredes of the privilege belonging to soldiers not to be responsible for the debts beyond the assets. This privilege to the hæres was conditional upon his commencing an inventory within thirty days and completing it within sixty from the time he became notified of his appointment. The inventory must be prepared in the presence of a notary, and must be signed by the hæres, with a declaration that it included the whole estate, etc., to which fact he was obliged to make oath. His liability became liable only to the extent of the assets. He was allowed, before paying the debts, to deduct the expenses of the funeral, of establishing the testament, and of making the inventory. He could not be forced to pay debts or legacies during the preparation of the inventory, and afterwards he paid the claimants in full in the order in which they presented themselves, and when the assets were exhausted could not be required to pay any more. His own claims against the estate might be paid first, and his debts to the estate were part of the assets. If he neglected to make the inventory within the legal period, he forfeited the privilege of it; which also was the case if he applied for the spatium deliberandi; so that he must choose between the two.

The creditors and legatees of the testator were allowed the beneficium separationis, by which, when the hæres was deeply indebted, or when, from confusio bonorum defuncti et hæredis, they were in danger of losing their claims, they were permitted to have a separation of the assets from the private estate of the hæres. Application for this privilege must have been made within five years from the acceptance of the inheritance. It was not to be granted, if the creditors of the testator had in any way recognized the hæres as their debtor. If it was granted, they were in general restricted to the assets for payment of their claims, and the private estate of the hæres was discharged. If the assets were not exhausted in satisfying the claims of the creditors of the testator, the creditors of hæres might come in upon the balance; but these latter were not entitled to the beneficium separationis.

The hæres might transmit the inheritance by will; but, in general, he could not do so till after his acceptance. To this, however, there were numerous exceptions.

The remedies of the hæres are too intimately connected with the general system of Roman jurisprudence to be capable of a brief explanation. See Mack. C. L. § 688-690; Dig. 4. 3; Cod. 3. 31; Gaius, l. 1, § 1, Maine, Anc. Law.

Cohæredes. When several hæreses have accepted a joint inheritance, each, ipso jure, becomes entitled to a proportional share in the assets, and liable to a proportional share of the debts, though the testator may, if he choose, direct otherwise, and they may also share otherwise among themselves; but in both these cases the creditors are not affected, and may pursue each hæres to the extent of his legal share of liability, and no further.

One of the co-hæredes has a right to compel a partition of the assets and liabilities, subject, however, to an agreement among themselves, or a direction by the testator, that the inheritance shall remain undivided for a time; Mack. C. L. § 694, 696.

HÆRES ASTRARIUS. In Old English Law. An heir in actual possession of the house of his ancestor. Bract. 35, 267 b. See ASTRARIUS HÆRES.

HÆRES DE FACTO. An heir, made so by reason of the disseisin or other wrongful act of his ancestor. An heir in fact in contradistinction to an heir de jure.

HÆRES EX ASSE. In Civil Law. Sole heir. In inheritances and other money matters where a division was made the as (a unit) with its parts, was used to designate the portions, thus: Hæres ex asse, heir to the whole; hæres ex semisse, heir to one-half; hæres ex dodrante, heir to three-fourths; and so, hæres ex besse, triente, quadrante, sextante, etc.

HAERES EXTRANEUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. An extraneous or foreign heir, that is one who is not a child or slave of the testator. Those only could be extraneous heirs who had a capacity of accepting the inheritance both at the time of making the will and at the death of the testator. Halifax, Anal. b. 11, c. 6, § 38.

HAERES FACTUS (Lat.). An heir appointed by will. This expression is applicable in the Roman law and systems founded on it, but not in the English common law; Mos. & W.

(Otherwise called haeres ex testamento, and haeres institutus. Burrill; Inst. 2. 9. 7.)

HAERES FIDEI COMMISSARIUS (Lat.). See FIDEI COMMISSUM.

HAERES FIDUCIARIUS (Lat.). See FIDEI COMMISSUM.

HAERES LEGITIMUS (Lat.). A lawful heir, being a legitimate child of parents who were married.

HAERES NATUS (Lat.). An heir who is such by birth or descent. This is the only form of heirship recognized in the English law; Wms. R. P., 6th Am. ed. 96.

One born heir, as distinguished from one made heir (haeres factus, q. v.). An heir at law, or by intestacy; the next of kin by blood, in cases of intestacy. Burrill; Story's Conflict of Laws, § 507.

HAERES NECESSARIUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. A necessary heir, i. e. a slave instituted heir. He was so-called because whether he wished it or not, on the death of the testator he became instantly free and necessary heir. A person suspecting that he was insolvent usually made a slave his heir so that his goods would be sold, if that were necessary, in the name of this heir and not as those of the testator. Inst. 2. 19. 1; id. 1. 6. 1; Sand. Introd. § 76.

HAERES PROXIMUS (Lat.). The child or descendant of the deceased. Dalr. Feud. 110.

HAERES REMOTIOR (Lat.). A more remote heir. A kinsman, not a child or descendant.

HAERES SUUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. One's own heir; the natural heir of the decedent; his lineal descendants. Persons who were in the power of the testator but became sui juris at his death. Inst. 2. 13; id. 3. 1. 4. 5.

HAERES SUUS ET NECESSARIUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. An heir by relationship and necessity. The descendants of an ancestor in direct line were so-called, sui, denoting the relationship, and necessary, the necessity of law which made them heirs without their election, and whether the ancestor died testate or intestate. Halifax, Anal. b. 11, c. 6, § 38; Mack. Civ. L. § 681; Inst. 2. 19. 2.

HERETARE. To give a right of inheritance or make a donation hereditary to the grantee and his heirs. Cowel.

HERETICO COMBURENDO. A writ for the burning of heretics last executed in the ninth year of James I., and abolished in 1677. See DE HERETICO COMBURENDO.

HAFNE. A haven or port. Cowel.

HAFNE COURTS (hafne, Dan. a haven, or port). Haven courts; courts anciently held in certain ports in England. Spelman, Gloss.

HAG. A division of a coopce or wood on which timber was cut annually by the proprietor. Ersk. Pr. 222.

HAGA. A house in a city or borough. Scott.

HAGIA. A hedge. Mon. Angl. tome 2, 273.

HAGNE. A little hand-gun. Stat. 83 Hen. VIII. c. 6.

HAGNEBUT. A hand-gun larger than the hagne. Stat. 2 & 3 Edw. VI. c. 14; 4 & 5 P. & M. c. 2.

HAGUE ARBITRATION CONVENTION. See HAGUE CONFERENCE.

HAGUE CONFERENCE. A meeting of the representatives of practically every important State which was held at The Hague in 1899, in order to promote disarmament, a more humane method of conducting wars, and arbitration as a means of preventing wars. The most important result was the signing of the Hague Arbitration Convention, under which a permanent court—known as the Panel of Arbitrators, or the Permanent Hague Court, or the Tribunal of the Hague—was established for the settlement of international disputes. The court worked very well as regards various questions—such as the Newfoundland Fishery dispute—but it obviously could not prevent such a calamity as the war of 1914–18.

The conference reassembled in 1907 in order to consider various suggestions for the mitigation of the horrors of war and as to contraband, etc.: but little came of this further meeting. Byrne. See INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION.

HAIA. An enclosed park. Cowel.

HAIEBOTE. A permission to take thorns, etc., to repair hedges. Blount.

HAILL. Whole. All and haill are common words in Scotch conveyances. 1 Bell, App. Cas. 499.

HAIRWORKFOLK. Holy work folk. Persons who held lands of which the tenure was the service of defending or repairing some church or monument.

HAIMEHALDARE. In Old Scotch Law. To seek restitution of one's own goods and gear and bring the same home again. Skene de Verb. Sign.

HAIMSUCKEN. See HAMSUCKEN.

HAIR. A capillary outgrowth from the skin. It has been held not to include the bristles of animals; 13 Blatch. 251.

HAIEBOTE. See HAIEBOTE.

HAKETON. A military coat of defence.

HAKH. Truth; the true God; a just or legal prescriptive right or claim; a perquisite claimable under established usage by village officers. Wilson, Gloss. Ind.

HALAKAR. The realization of the revenue. Wilson, Gloss. Ind.; Moz. & W.

HALF-BLOOD. A term denoting the degree of relationship which exists between those who have one parent only in common.

By the English common law, one related to an intestate of the half-blood only could never inherit, upon the presumption that he is not of the blood of the original purchaser; but this rule has been greatly modified by the 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 106.

In this country, the common-law principle on this subject may be considered as not ordinarily in force, though in many states some distinction is still preserved between the whole and the half-blood; 4 Kent 408, n.; 2 Yerg. 115; 1 McCord 456; 81 Pa. 289; Dane, Abr. Index; Reeves, descents, passim; 2 Washb. R. P. 411. See DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

HALF-BROTHER, HALF-SISTER. Persons who have the same father, but different mothers; or the same mother, but different fathers.

HALF-CENT. A copper coin of the United States, of the value of one two-hundredth part of a dollar, or five mills, and of the weight of ninety-four grains. The first half-cent was issued in 1798, the last in 1857.

HALF-DEFENCE. See DEFENCE.

HALF-DIME. A silver coin of the United States, of the value of five cents, or the one-twentieth part of a dollar.

It weighs nineteen grains and two-tenths of a grain,—equal to four-hundredths of an ounce Troy,—and is of the fineness of nine hundred thousandths; nine hundred parts being pure silver, and one hundred parts copper. The fineness of the coin is prescribed by the 8th section of the general mint law, passed Jan. 18, 1837; 5 Stat. L. 137. The weight of the coin is fixed by the 1st section of the act of Feb. 21, 1838; 10 Stat. L. 160. The second section of this last-cited act directs that silver coins issued in conformity to that act shall be a legal tender in payment of debts for all sums not exceeding five dollars. This provision applies to the half-dollar and all silver coins below that denomination. The first coinage of half-dimes was in 1798. A few half "dimes," with a likeness of Mrs. Washington, the wife of the president, upon the obverse of the coin, were issued in 1792; but they were not of the regular coinage.

By act of 9 June, 1870, 21 Stat. L. 7 (Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 488), silver coin of smaller denominations than one dollar shall be a legal tender in all sums not exceeding ten dollars. The coining of the half-dime was abolished by act of 13 Feb. 1873, c. 131, s. 10. Its place was supplied by a five-cent piece composed of three-fourths copper and one-fourth nickel, of the weight of seventy-seven and sixteen-hundredths grains Troy. The minor coins, viz., the five, three, two, and one cent pieces, are a legal tender for any amount not exceeding twenty-five cents in any one payment.

HALF-DOLLAR. A silver coin of the United States, of half the value of the dollar or unit, and to contain one hundred and eighty-five grains and ten-sixteenth parts of a grain of pure, or two hundred and eight grains of standard, silver. Act of April 2, 1792, 1 Stat. L. 848. Under the provisions of this law, the fineness of the silver coins of the United States was 902.4 thousandths of pure silver.

The weight and fineness of the silver coins were somewhat changed by the act of Jan. 18, 1837, 5 Stat. L. 137; the weight of the half-dollar being by this act fixed at two hundred and six and one-quarter grains, and the fineness at nine hundred thousandths; conforming, in respect to fineness with the coinage of France and most other nations.

The weight of the half-dollar was reduced by the provisions of the act of February 21, 1838, 10 Stat. L. 160, to one hundred and ninety-two grains.

The half-dollars coined under the acts of 1792 and 1837 (as above) were a legal tender at their nominal value in payment of debts to any amount. Those coined since the act of February 21, 1833, were, under it, a legal tender in payment of debts for all sums not exceeding five dollars. Sec. 2. The silver coins struck in the year 1858, under this last-cited act, may be distinguished from the others of that year by the arrow-heads on the right and left of the date of the piece. In 1854, and subsequent years, the arrow-heads are omitted.

By the act of 12 Feb. 1873, c. 131, s. 13, the weight of the half-dollar shall be twelve and one-half grams (92.9 grains), and by act of June 8, 1879, Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 486, it is a legal tender for sums not exceeding ten dollars. The same act enables the holder of any silver coins of a smaller denomination than one dollar, to exchange them in sums of twenty dollars, or any multiple thereof, at the U. S. Treasury, for lawful money of the United States.

HALF-EAGLE. A gold coin of the United States, of the value of five dollars.

The weight of the piece is 129 grains (act, June 28, 1884) of standard fineness, namely, nine hundred thousandths of pure gold, and one hundred of alloy of silver and copper: "provided that the silver do not exceed one-half of the whole alloy." Act of Jan. 18, 1837, 5 Stat. L. 186. For the proportion of alloy in gold coins of the United States since 1833, see EAGLE.

For all sums whatever the half-eagle was a legal tender of payment of five dollars. It is now a legal tender to any amount, when not below the standard weight, and then in proportion to its actual weight. Act of February 12, 1873.

HALF ENDEAL or HALFEN DEAL. A moiety or half of a thing.

HALF-KING. In Saxon Law. Half-King. A title accorded to aldermen of all England. Crabb. Eng. L. 28; Spel. Glos.

HALF-MARK. A noble; six shillings, eight pence.

HALF-PROOF. In Civil Law. That which is insufficient as the foundation of a sentence or decree, although in itself entitled to some credit. Vicat, Probatio.

HALF-SEAL. A seal used in the English chancery for the sealing of commissions to delegates appointed upon any appeal, either in ecclesiastical or marine causes. 8 Eliz. c. 8.

HALF-TIMER. In England a child employed in a factory who, under the factory act of 1878, must give one school attendance on each work-day when employed on the morning and afternoon set, or two attendances on each non-working day, if employed on the alternate day system. "Experience has established the fact, that in proportion to the hours spent in school, these 'half-timers' make more rapid progress than the whole-day scholars; at the same time, whether they are designed to be factory workers for life or not, they are acquiring habits of industry and manual dexterity which are of essential use in any future employment." See Int. Cyc. Tit. Factory Acts. Education.

HALF-TONGUE. A jury half of one tongue or nationality and half of another. Vide De medietate lingue, Jacob, Law Dict.

HALF-YEAR. In the computation of time a half year consists of one hundred and eighty-two days. Cro. Jac. 166; Co. Litt. 135 b; N. Y. Rev. Stat. part 1, c. 19, t. 1, § 8.

HALL. A man employed in ploughing. Wilson, Glos. Ind.; Moz. & W.

HALIMAS. In English Law. The feast of all-Saints, on November 1. One of the cross-quarters of the year was computed from Halimas to Candlemas. Whart.

HALIMOTE. See HALMOTÉ.

HALL. A public building used either for the meetings of corporations, courts, or employed to some public uses: as, the city hall, the town hall. Formerly this word denoted the chief mansion or habitation.

HALL-MARK. An official stamp affixed by the goldsmiths upon articles made of gold or silver as an evidence of genuineness, and hence used to signify any mark of genuineness. "The power of free alienation is the 'hall-mark' of a fee-simple absolute." Rand. Em. Dom. § 206.

HALLAGE. A toll or license fee on goods vended in a hall. Jac. L. Dict.; 6 Co. 62.

A toll due to the lord of a market or fair, on commodities vended in the common hall. Cowel.

Particularly applied to a fee or toll due for cloth brought for sale to Blackwell Hall in London. Lords of fairs or markets are entitled to this fee. Tomlin; 6 Rep. 62..

HALLAMAS. See HALIMAS.

HALLAZCO. In Spanish Law. The finding and taking possession of something which previously had no owner, and which thus becomes the property of the first occupant. Las Partidas, 3. 5. 28, 5. 48. 49, 5. 20. 50.

HALLÉ-GE-MOTE. See HALIMOTE.

HALLUCINATION. In Medical Jurisprudence. The perception by any of the senses of an object which has no existence. The conscious recognition of a sensation of sight, hearing, feeling, taste, or smell which is not due to any impulse received by the perceptive apparatus from without, but arises within the perceptive apparatus itself. A false perception in contradistinction to a delusion or false belief. Wood, Am. Text-Book of Med.

An error, a blunder, a mistake, a fallacy; and when used in describing the condition of a person, does not necessarily carry an imputation of insanity. 64 Vt. 233.

An instance is given of a temporary hallucination in the celebrated Ben Jonson, the poet. He told a friend of his that he had spent many a night in looking at his great toe, about which he had seen Turks and Tartars, Romans and Carthaginians, fight, in his imagination. 1 Collin. Lun. 34. 17. Instead of being temporary, this affection of his mind had been permanent, he would doubtless have been considered insane. See, on the subject of spectral illusions, Ribber, Alderson, and Farrar's Essays; Scott on Demonology, etc.; 3 Bostock, Physiology 91, 181; 1 Esquirol, Maladies Mentales 159. See INSANITY.

HALMOTÉ or HALIMOTE. A court baron (q. v.). It was sometimes used to designate a convention of citizens in their public hall and was also called folk-mote and hallmote. The word hallmote rather signifies the lord's court or a court baron held in a manor in which the differences between the tenants were determined. Cunn. L. Dict.; Cowel.

The etymology is from the meeting of the tenants of one hall or manor. The name is still kept up in several places in Herefordshire. It has sometimes been taken for a convention of citizens in their public hall, where they held their courts, which was also called folk-mote and hallmote. But the word hallmote is rather the lord's court held within the manor, in which the differences between the tenants were determined. Jacobs; Leg. Hen. I. c. 10.

"Furthermore," it is said, "it seems to have been a common practice for a wealthy abbey to keep a court, known as a hallmote, on each of its manors, while in addition to these manorial courts it kept a central court, a libera curia for all its greater freehold tenants. And we may now and again meet with courts which are distinctly called courts of honors. The rule then was not merely this, that the lord of a manor may hold a court for the manor; but rather this, that a lord may hold a court for his tenants." 1 Poll. & Maitl. 573.

HALYWERC-FOLK. Those who held by the service of guarding and repairing a church or sepulchre, and were excused from feudal services. Hist. Dunelm. apud Whartoni Ang. Sax. pt. 1, p. 749. Especially in the county of Durham, those who held by service of defending the corpse of St. Cuthbert. Jacob, Law Dict.

HAM. A place of dwelling; a home-cloze; a little narrow meadow. Blount. A house or little village. Cowel.

A village or town; hence the termination of some of the towns, as Nottingham, Buckingham, etc. Jacob; Blount. See HAMLET.

HAMA. A hook; an engine with which a house on fire is pulled down. Yel. 60. A piece of land.

HAMBLING or HAMELING. Expedition (q. v.).

HAMEL, HAMELETA, or HAMLETA. A hamlet.

HAMESUCKEN. In Scotch Law. The crime of hamesucken consists in "the felonious seeking and invasion of a person in his dwelling-house." 1 Hume 812; Burnett 80; Allison, Cr. Law of Scotl. 199. By some authorities the word is written Hamesecken; Cowel; 4 Bla. Com. 223.

The mere breaking into a house, without personal violence, does not constitute the offence, nor does the violence without an entry with intent to commit an assault. It is the combination of both which completes the crime, and the injury to the person must be of a grievous character. The punishment of hamesucken, in aggravated cases of injury, is death; in cases of inferior atrocitv. an arbitrary punishment;

Alison, Cr. Law of Scotl. ch. 6; Erskine, Inst. 4. 9. 23.

This term was formerly used in England instead of the now modern term burglary; 4 Bla. Com. 223.

But in Hale's Pleas of the Crown it is said, "The common genus of offences that comes under the name of hamesucken is that which is usually called house-breaking; which sometimes comes under the common appellation of burglary, whether committed in the day or night to the intent to commit felony; so that house-breaking of this kind is of two natures." 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 547; 22 Pick. 4.

HAMFARE. This word by some is said to signify the freedom of a man's house; but Cowel seems to think that it signifies the breach of peace in a house. Holthouse.

HAMLET. A small village; a part or member of a vill. It is the diminutive of ham, a village. Cowel.

HAMMA. A close joining to a house; a croft; a little meadow. Cowel.

HAMMER. Used in connection with auction sales; as to bring or come to the hammer, to sell or be sold at auction. Cent. Dict.

On a stock exchange, to depress values or prices of. On the London Stock Exchange, to expel from membership on account of failure to meet engagements. Stand. Dict.

HAMMER, TO BRING TO THE. To put up at auction. Webster.

HAMMER, UNDER THE. Refers to public sales by a sheriff or auctioneer. Anderson.

HAMSOUCUE (Saxon from ham, house, soctue, liberty, immunity. The word is variously spelled hamsocia, hamsocua, hamsoken, haimuiken, hamesaken). The right of security and privacy in a man's house. Du Cange. The breach of this privilege by a forcible entry of a house is breach of the peace; Anc. Laws & Inst. of Eng. Glos.; Du Cange; Bracton, lib. 8, tr. 2, c. 2, § 8. The right to entertain jurisdiction of the offence. Spelman; Du Cange. Immunity from punishment for such offence. id.; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 47, § 18. An insult offered in one's own house (insultus factus in domo). Brompton, p. 957; Du Cange.

HANAPER. A hamper or basket in which were kept the writs of the court of chancery relating to the business of a subject, and their returns; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 118; 10 Ric. II. c. 1; equivalent to the Roman secus. According to Spelman, the fees accruing on writs, etc., were there kept; Du Cange; 3 Bla. Com. 48. The office where it was kept was called the Hanaper office.

HANAPER, CLERK OF THE. See CLERK OF THE HANAPER.

HAND. A measure of length, four inches long; used in ascertaining the height of horses.

In legal parlance, handwriting or written signature, as "witness my hand," etc.; 18 Colo. 338; 10 Mod. 108.

HAND-BILL. A written or printed notice displayed to inform those concerned of something to be done.

HAND-BOROW (from hand, and Saxon borow, a pledge). Nine of a deonary or friborg (q. v.) were so called, being inferior to the tenth or head borow,—a deana or friborga being ten freemen or frankpledges, who were mutually sureties for each other to the king for any damage. Du Cange, Friborg, Head-borow.

HAND DOWN. To announce or file an opinion in a cause. Used originally and properly of the opinions of appellate courts transmitted to the court below; but in later usage the term is employed more generally, but inaccurately, with reference to any decision by a court upon a case or point reserved for consideration.

HAND-FASTING. Betrothment.

HAND-GRITH. Peace or protection given by the king with his own hand used in the laws of Henry I. Tomlin; Cowel; Moz. & W.; Stat. Hen. I. c. 18.

HAND-HABEND. In Saxon Law. One having a thing in his hand; that is, a thief found having the stolen goods in his possession.—latro manifestus of the civil law. See Laws of Hen. I. c. 59; Laws of Athelstane § 6; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 88, § 1; Britton p. 73; Du Cange, Handhabenda. Jurisdiction to try such thief. Id.

HAND MONEY. Earnest (q. v.) when it is in cash. See HANDSALE.

HANDSALE. Anciently, among all the northern nations, shaking of hands was held necessary to bind a bargain,—a custom still retained in verbal contracts: a sale thus made was called handsale, renditio per mutuum manuum complexionem. In process of time the same word was used to signify the price or earnest which was given immediately after the shaking of hands, or instead thereof. In some parts of the country it is usual to speak of hand-money as the part of the consideration paid or to be paid at the execution of a contract of sale. See 2 Bla. Com. 448; Heineccius, de Antiquo Jure Germanico, lib. 2, § 835; Toul-lar, liv. 3, t. 8, c. 2, n. 83; EARNEST.

HANDESEL. Earnest; handsale (q. v.).

HANDWRITING. Anything written by a person. The manner in which a person writes, including the formation of the characters, the separation of the words, and other features distinguishing the written matter, as a mechanical result, from the writing of other persons.

That branch of the law of evidence which treats of handwriting is largely concerned with the determination of the genuineness or falsity of signatures. As to what constitutes a writing, generally, see that title, and, as to writing as required by the statutes of wills, see WILL.

With respect to proof of handwriting a signature by a person unable to write, or as it has been held, by one who can write, may be by mark, which is proved as the handwriting would be in case of a written signature. See MARK. The law of evidence as to handwriting applies also where it is in a disguised hand; 4 Esp. 117; 5 Cush. 295; 9 Conn. 55; or when a cipher is used; 133 Mass. 533.

One's own testimony is not the best evidence on this subject, and the writer need not be called; 2 Camp. 608; 1 Hawks 190; 49 N. J. L. 28. See 67 Barb. 124. Whether it is evidence at all is a question confused by the general disqualification of parties who were naturally in most cases those to whom the question would arise, and it has been of late assumed by many writers that since the statutes allowing parties to be witnesses they may be such, for this as well as any other purpose. See 5 Mass. 261; 5 Ohio 5; a. C. 22 Am. Dec. 767, with note citing cases. The handwriting of attesting witnesses after thirty years need not be proved; Stark. Ev. Sharsw. ed. 521; so also of unattested documents taken from proper depositories; 7 East 279; 62 Me. 414. The extrajudicial admissions of a party as to his handwriting are evidence to prove the same, though not of a very satisfactory nature; Whart. Ev. 705.

It is said that a witness has three means of becoming acquainted with a person's handwriting: (1) by seeing him write; (2) by having seen his writing; and (3) by a comparison of the writing in question with other writings shown to be genuine; Best, Ev. § 233; Steph. Ev. Art. 51.

As to the first, it is generally held that it is enough that the witness has seen the party write only once; 22 Gratt. 405; 17 N. H. 71; 185 Mass. 533; 26 Pa. 388; 9 C. & P. 890; 104 Ill. 827; 142 id. 453; 42 Mich. 473. The contrary, however, was held in one case, in which it was said:

"It is not enough that he (the witness) had seen the person, as is the proof of this case, write but once, and then under circumstances showing that the attention of the witness was not specially directed to the peculiarities of the penmanship;" 1

Bond 51.

Any person who has seen one write and has acquired a standard in his own mind of the general character of the writing is competent to testify as to his belief of the genuineness of a writing; 45 La. Ann. 207. Merely seeing the party write his surname once was held insufficient to warrant testifying to the full signature; 2 Stark. 164; but seeing the surname written several times was sufficient; Mood. & M. 39. See 1 Disney 539; 8 Gill 77. It is sufficient although the witness never saw the person write before the date of the paper in question; 10 Cush. 453; or although he had not seen him write for many years before the trial; 8 Gill 87 (three years); id. 18 (six years); 8 Scott 884 (ten years); 25 How. St. Tr. 71 (nineteen years); but not that he has seen writing that is done with reference to his testifying at the trial either at or before it; 90 Pa. 89; 16 N. J. L. 207; with this exception the circumstances under which the witness has seen the party write affect his credit, not his competency; Jones, Ev. § 559; 54 N. Y. 598; 26 Pa. 388; 135 Mass. 533.

As to the second method it is not necessary that the witness has seen the party write, as such personal acquaintance may be acquired by having seen papers purporting to be genuine and which have been acknowledged to be such by the writer; 49 Minn. 420; 38 S. C. 385; 5 Tex. Civ. App. 175; 54 N. Y. 598; 17 Pa. 514; 45 Ill. App. 462; but this is not always sufficient; 108 Mass. 344. The witness is qualified, as such, by knowledge derived from correspondence, including letters received from a person in answer to those written and addressed to him; 3 Allen 508; 62 Ga. 100; 103 Ind. 419; 41 Miss. 216; 39 Neb. 660; 83 Ala. 351; 1 Cra. 491; 25 Pa. 133; 46 Mich. 482; 21 Wend. 557; 5 A. & E. 740; but the mere receipt of letters is insufficient to prove that they were written by the person purporting to sign them; 124 Ind. 495; there must be a ratification or recognition; 21 Wend. 557; 113 Mass. 274; 48 Vt. 228; 40 Ill. 846; 59 Tex. 411; contra, 2 C. & K. 744; 2 C. & P. 31; but such knowledge may be gained in the ordinary course of business, as by seeing documents written by the person; 27 Gratt. 313; 8 Hun 175; 26 Ill. App. 445; and only seeing letters addressed to strangers purporting to be those of the person in question; 113 Mass. 275; 28 Pa. 318. Such knowledge may be that of a clerk who sees correspondence or documents; 12 Wall. 817; 2 Johns. Ch. 211; 2 Metc. 522; 5 C. & P. 213; 10 Mo. 597; a clerk in a bank; 56 Wis. 156; 35 Ala. 870; a servant who has taken his master's letters to the post; 5 A. & E. 740; or a public officer who has seen many official documents filed in his office, signed by a justice, may prove his signature; 47 Cal. 294; 2 Metc. 522; 12 Wall. 817. The weight of the testimony will depend on the means of knowledge; 87 Fed. Rep. 831. The witness must have an opinion; 88 Ill. 883; and may give it if the handwriting is disguised; 5 Cush. 301; a. C. 32 Am. Dec. 711; 80 N. H. 182; but positive knowledge or certainty is not necessary; 8 Ves. 474; 60 Ia. 180; 32 N. Y. 609; 116 Mo. 605; he need not swear to belief, an opinion is sufficient; 25 Pa. 133; 88 Ill. 883; Whart. Ev. § 709. A witness has been permitted to testify that the signature was like the writing of the party whose signature it is alleged to be; 4 Esp. 87.

The witness in such case need not be an expert; 72 Ala. 19; 5 Tex. Civ. App. 875; or familiar with the person's handwriting generally if he is so with the signature; 105 Mass. 62; as, e. g. he may prove the signature of a firm, when unacquainted with the handwriting of any partner; where he testifies that in his opinion, the handwriting was the same as that of many notes he had presented to the firm, and which had been paid by them; 10 Ired. 885.

A signature upon an ancient writing may be proved by a witness who has become familiar with it by the inspection of other authentic ancient documents on which the same signature appeared; 9 Wend. 420; 15 id. 111. If a witness says that he knows a party's handwriting, he is prima facie competent to testify with respect to it and, if not cross-examined, his knowledge is taken to be admitted; 8 Watts 485; 17 Pick. 490; 5 McLean 190; contra, 8 Ill. 644; 17 Ohio 16; he may be cross-examined as to the extent of his knowledge; 50 Md. 439; which goes to the weight of his testimony; 72 Ala. 79. But if want of knowledge appear; 46 Vt. 228; 38 Kan. 691; 3 Humph. 367; or his testimony is insufficient; 2 Cra. 253; 27 Tex. 345; 80 N. J. L. 387; 8 V. & B. 172; it may be rejected. But see 66 Pa. 253. A witness may testify as to handwriting who cannot read or write himself; 132 Mass. 105.

A witness may be asked if he would act upon the signature which he testifies to as genuine; 147 U. S. 130; contra, 44 N. Y. 514; his knowledge cannot be tested by irrelevant papers; 13 Gray 525; 11 A. & E. 322; 91 Mo. 399; 104 Ill. 827; 44 N. Y. 514. But see 2 M. & R. 536; 14 Me. 478; 41 Ala. 626; 1 Whart. Ev. § 10. But he may refresh his memory by reference to papers from which his knowledge is derived; 4 Cra. 312; 66 Md. 113; 26 Pa. 388; 42 Mich. 113; 6 Rand. 316.

The third method of proving handwriting is what is termed comparison. It is defined to be a mode of deducing evidence of the authenticity of a written instrument, by showing the likeness of the handwriting to that of another instrument proved to be that of the party whom it is sought to establish as the author of the instrument in question. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 578.

Another much cited definition is "when other witnesses have proved the paper to be the handwriting of a party, and then the witness on the stand is desired to take the two papers in hand, compare them, and say whether or not they are the same handwriting; the witness collects all his knowledge from comparison only; he knows nothing of himself; he has not seen the party write nor held any correspondence with him;" Duncan, J., 6 S. & R. 571.

But more briefly, though with great precision, Starkie says: "By comparison is meant a comparison by the juxtaposition of two writings in order, by such comparison, to ascertain whether both were written by the same person." Stark. Ev. Metc. ed. pt. 4, 664.

Scarcely any title of the law, certainly none in the law of evidence, has given rise to more discussion in England and in this country and the "confusion, obscurity, and contradiction" which is to be observed in the cases quite justifies the criticism of Woodward, J., in 43 Pa. 9, that much of the difficulty of the subject has arisen from the failure of judges to observe the essential rule "that terms be first correctly defined and then always used in the defined sense." A very pregnant cause of the confusion was the failure to preserve the distinction between comparison properly defined and the use of admittedly genuine signatures merely to enable a witness to refresh the memory as to his ideal standard formed by previous knowledge of the handwriting of the person whose signature was in issue. The latter process is in no sense a proper application of the term comparison as understood in the law of evidence, though often so used by judges. It is true as said by Paterson, J., in Doe v. Suckermore, 5 A. & E. 703 (and repeated in almost the same words by Judge Woodward in the case just cited), that all evidence of handwriting, except in the single instance where the witness saw the document written, is in its nature, comparison of hands. It is the belief which the witness entertains, upon comparing the writing in question with the exemplar in his mind derived from some previous knowledge. This language aptly expresses the idea which was in the mind of its author, but it has been quoted time and again by judges who apparently did not have clearly in mind the distinction which it was intended to emphasize and has contributed, perhaps, not a little to the continued misuse of the word comparison in this connection. Where a witness testifies from the comparison (used in what might be termed the colloquial sense referred to by Justice Patterson) of the writing in question with a mental standard derived from previous knowledge of the handwriting, he is simply stating his opinion, not in the sense of opinion evidence, but based upon his own knowledge. When a witness examines the writing in question and, placing it in juxtaposition with other writings proved to be genuine, having no previous knowledge, and testifies to his belief from the similitude, or want of it, it is properly and technically, evidence by comparison of hands. This distinction is stated with precision in some very early cases; Peake, N. P. 20; 21 How. St. Tr. 810; Rex v. Tandy, cited McNally, Ev. 409. It is in this latter technical sense that the phrase comparison of hands is here used and the cases properly relating to the subject apply to the two questions: (1) whether such comparison may be made by the jury, genuine writings, otherwise irrelevant, being admitted for that purpose; (2) whether it may be made by expert witnesses and their conclusions proved for the information of the jury.

Such evidence was admissible in the Roman law; 1 Whart. Ev. § 711, citing De Prob. de Lit. Comp. L. 20, c. iv. 21; Nov. 40, cap. 2; and also under the Code Napoleon, by three sworn experts appointed by the court, or agreed upon, and the writings must be executed before a notary or admitted; Gen. Code Proc. pt. 1, 1. 2. tit. 10, s. 200.

At common law the genuineness of a contested writing could not be proved by comparison, by a witness, of such writing with other writings acknowledged to be genuine; 1 Cr. & J. 47; 1 Nev. & P. 1; 7 C. & P. 548, 595; 1 Mood. & R. 133; 5 A. & E. 708. It was otherwise in the ecclesiastical courts; id.; 1 Phil. 78. See 2 Addams 58, 79, 91, note a; 1 id. 182, 214, 216.

Ancient writings could be proved by comparison; 14 East 327, n. a; 7 East 279, 232; Mood. & R. 141; 10 Cl. & F. 193; 2 H. L. Cas. 534, 557. The right of the jury to make comparisons, though denied by Lord Kenyon when the jurors were illiterate; Peake, N. P. C. 20; was allowed by him when the jury were considered competent; id. 27; and it was afterwards fully established; 1 Cr. & J. 47; 1 N. & P. 1; 4 C. & P. 207. Comparison by experts, after some fluctuation, it was settled could not be made; 5 C. & P. 106; 5 B. & A. 300; 5 A. & E. 708.

It had required infinite discussion to settle the rule of these cases. Something called comparison was known in very early cases; 10 How. St. Tr. 312; 12 id. 183, 306; 12 Mod. 72, but at this period the terms comparison of hand and similitude of hands were used to describe every method of the proof of writing except by one who had seen the document written. It is therefore necessary that the cases should be critically reviewed with reference to the varied meaning with which these terms were employed at different periods. This work has been very well done by Professor John H. Wigmore in 30 Am. L. Rev. 481. The conclusion reached is thus stated:—“(1) That the classes of witnesses who may testify to handwriting have increased in number by successive enlargements; (2) that the whole meaning of ‘comparison of hands’ has changed; (3) that the mere process of juxtaposition coram iudice, whether for witness or for the jury, was historically orthodox and unquestionable; and (4) that the opposite fates, at common law, of juxtaposition by experts and juxtaposition by jury—exclusion for the former but sanction (limited) for the latter—were due simply to the fact that the former had never been attempted till the 1800s and was merely prevented from coming into existence, while the latter had always existed and was thus able to survive the attempts on its life.” The entire article should be referred to in any examination of this subject, as, on the whole, throwing new light upon it from a point of view not elsewhere so well treated. It may be added that the historical development of the English rule has not lost its importance by reason of its being superseded in England by statute. It is of primary importance in considering the decisions in those American jurisdictions which adhere to the old rule, and scarcely less so in properly estimating those in the jurisdictions which have abandoned it. See infra.

The question was set at rest by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 27, authorizing comparison with a writing proved to the satisfaction of the judge to be genuine to be made by witnesses, and such writings to be submitted to the court and jury as evidence of the genuineness, or otherwise, of the writing in dispute. Under this act the jury may make comparison with papers relevant or not; 1 F. & F. 270; 2 id. 24; 4 id. 490. The court must determine the genuineness of the document offered for comparison and its decision is appealable; 80 L. T. 223.

The rule of the English courts (prior to this statute) forbidding the admission of documents irrelevant to the matter in issue for the sole purpose of comparison is known as the English rule, and is so referred to by American courts, including those which have and those which have not adopted it.

The objections to permitting comparison of the disputed paper with others conceded to be genuine but admitted for the sole purpose of comparison, which led to the adoption of the English rule, have been thus summarized: “First, that the writings offered for the purpose of comparison with the documents in question might be spurious, and consequently that, before any comparison between them and it could be instituted, a collateral issue must be tried to determine their genuineness. Nor is this all,—if it were competent to prove the genuineness of the main document by comparison with others, it must be equally so to prove that of the latter by comparison with fresh ones; and so the inquiry might go on ad infinitum, to the great distraction of the attention of the jury and delay in the administration of justice. Secondly, that the specimens might not be fairly selected. Thirdly, that the persons composing the jury might be unable to read, and consequently be unable to institute such comparison.” Best, Ev. § 288.

The rule is followed, generally, by the federal courts. It is specifically adopted by the supreme court; 91 U. S. 270; 125 id. 397; 151 id. 303; 6 Pet. 763. In the circuit and district court while the rule of the supreme court is generally followed; 56 Fed. Rep. 384; there is opportunity for some variation, growing out of the frequent necessity in those courts for the administration of local law. Comparison was allowed by both jury and experts in 12 Blatchf. 390; 31 Fed. Rep. 19; 32 id. 198, contra, 10 id. 469. No comparison was permitted by experts in 1 Baldwin. 49; 1 Wash. C. C. 1; 4 id. 729; but it was allowed by the jury with papers otherwise in evidence; 3 Wall. Jr. 88, 115; and with papers offered for comparison, merely; 1 Gall. 170. In the fourth circuit the supreme court rule was directly followed; 29 Fed. Rep. 247; and that of course is to be considered the rule of the federal courts unless the case is controlled by local law.

Many of the state courts have also followed the old English rule, and while permitting comparison by the jury, with papers in evidence in the case, they exclude irrelevant papers; 72 Ala. 79; 84 id. 53; 96 id. 357; 11 So. Rep. (Ala.) 395; 83 Ark. 387; 5 Col. 840; 40 Ill. 846; 64 id. 856; 142 id. 802 (contra, 46 Ill. App. 596; see 81 id. 592; 144 Ill. 632; 147 id. 652); 13 B. Monr. 237 (see also 68 Ky. 239); 11 Md. 148; 56 id. 439 (a genuine and disputed signature on the same page are not subject to comparison by the jury; 14 id. 566); 42 Mich. 473; 67 id. 222 (but in a later case irrelevant papers were admitted which had been shown to the party, denying the signature in dispute, on cross-examination; the court expressly stating that the case was different; 60 Mich. 287); 3 Mont. 262; 1 Pac. Rep. (N. Mex.) 170; 1 N. Dak. 30; 2 R. I. 316; 10 W. Va. 49; 28 Tex. 211; 67 id. 567; 69 id. 700; 63 id. 259; but papers otherwise in the case must be admitted or proved to be genuine; 47 id. 503; 29 W. Va. 147.

In some if not all of the states in which the subject is now regulated by statute the prior decisions were in support of this rule; 5 Houst. 220; 5 Neb. 247 (see 31 id. 124); 75 N. Y. 288; 85 id. 73; 2 Heiss. 206; 8 Baxt. 42 (but where no objection was interposed signatures admitted to be genuine were given to the jury for comparison; 90 Tenn. 167); 82 Wis. 34.

In some states the decisions indicate a tendency to allow comparison by the jury and experts where the genuineness is not denied or is conceded or the party is estopped to deny it. In Missouri earlier decisions excluded irrelevant papers but permitted comparison both by jury and experts with papers otherwise in the case; 29 Mo. 386; 83 id. 698; and later ones permitted it with other papers as to which no collateral issue could be raised, as if the genuineness was proved or the party was estopped to deny it or if they belonged to the witness who was acquainted with the handwriting in dispute; 15 Mo. App. 460; 67 Mo. 380 (and see 91 Mo. 399); and in North Carolina comparison by the jury was not permitted even with papers in the case; 1 Ired 16; 3 Jones 407; 101 N. C. 119; but it has been allowed by experts with papers admitted to be genuine and otherwise in evidence; 70 id. 142; and see 113 id. 688.

In Indiana the decisions are conflicting but comparisons are allowed, in most cases both by jury and experts, if the paper is genuine, otherwise by experts alone; 32 Ind. 472; 43 id. 381; 46 id. 88. See 60 id. 241; 66 id. 123; 78 id. 64. The later cases allowed comparison by experts as well as by the jury; 103 Ind. 14; 120 id. 103.

In many states comparison is permitted with genuine documents, without respect to relevancy, and usually when it is allowed at all it may be made by experts as well as by the jury.

There has, however, been some indisposition to permit experts to make the comparison. It has been permitted by the jury and experts; 1 Root 308; 9 Conn. 53; 10 Kan. 335; 47 id. 242; 17 Pick. 490; 83 Minn. 423; Wright 298; 80 Ohio St. 195; 8 Utah 11; in some cases it has been allowed by the jury; 14 Me. 482; 143 Mass. 23; 5 Vt. 532; 33 id. 225; 58 N. H. 155; and in others by experts; 53 Me. 9; 110 Mass. 331; 50 Miss. 24; 53 N. H. 452; 54 id. 470 (after much fluctuation); 82 Va. 1; 80 Cal. 82; but it was not permitted with a press copy of a disputed writing, though seemingly the original might have been used; 60 Cal. 533. The signatures used for comparison must be genuine; 36 Conn. 218.

In Pennsylvania and South Carolina until the late statute of the former state, infra, the decisions were substantially in accord. When there was conflicting direct evidence, only the jury might make comparison with papers duly proved; 10 S. & R. 110; 3 Watts 331; 82 Pa. 211; 96 id. 480; 153 id. 453; 1 McMull. 120; 2 McCord 516; 3 Brev. 51. The evidence of genuineness of a paper offered for comparison must be conclusive; 6 Whart. 281; 93 Pa. 123; and comparison could only be made by witnesses acquainted with the party's writing; 1 S. & R. 333; 28 Pa. 318. In criminal cases expert testimony is allowed; Pennsylvania act of 1860, March 81, § 55, P. L. 284.

A recent statute of Pennsylvania (1893, May 15, P. L. 60), codifying the law on this subject, enacts, (1) That the opinion of those acquainted with the handwriting of the supposed writer, and of experts, shall be deemed relevant; (2) That experts may compare the disputed writing with others admitted or proved to the judge's satisfaction to be genuine; (3) That experts may be required by counsel to state in full the ground of their opinions; (4) That the question shall still be one entirely for the jury; and (5) That the act shall apply to all courts and all persons having authority to receive evidence.

In several states, including some in which the courts had adhered to the English rule, the question has been settled by statute permitting the comparison of handwriting. Among the states which have legislated upon the subject are California, Delaware, Georgia, Iowa, Louisiana, Nebraska, New Jersey, New York, Tennessee, Wisconsin, and Pennsylvania as above stated. The most common form of such statutes is to authorize comparison of a disputed writing with any writing proved to the court to be genuine, to be made by a witness and to permit the submission of such writings and evidence of witnesses respecting the same, to the court and jury as evidence of the genuineness or otherwise of the writing in dispute. The tendency in the United States is in the direction of the rule established under these statutes. It is not within the present purpose to state all the decisions or to indicate the exact condition of the law in the several states. For any special case recourse should be had to the decisions and statutes of the particular state.

Under a statute providing that "evidence respecting the handwriting may also be given by comparison, made by a witness skilled in such matters, or the jury, with writings admitted or treated as genuine, by the party against whom the evidence is offered," papers not otherwise competent are admissible for the purpose of enabling the jury to make a comparison; 147 U. S. 150; 56 Fed. Rep. 384.

Prior to the statute of 17 and 18 Vict. already cited the English rule as to comparison was subject to certain exceptions which have been said to be as well settled as the rule itself; Bradley, J., in 91 U. S. 270; one of these was the admission of ancient writings; see supra; the other is that if a paper admitted to be in the handwriting of the person in question is in evidence for some other purpose in the cause, the signature in question may be compared with it by the jury. This is a settled rule of the American courts, including those which adhere to the English rule against comparison as well as those which, either under statute or decision, admit it; id.; 75 N. Y. 288; 113 N. C. 688; 120 Ind. 106; 144 Ill. 652; 73 Mich. 265; 90 Ia. 673; 50 Fed. Rep. 334; 125 U. S. 397, 414; 151 id. 808; 137 id. 127.

A writing specially prepared for the purpose of comparison is inadmissible on a question of genuineness; 151 U. S. 303. A party cannot himself write specimens for the instruction of witnesses; Whart. Ev. § 715; nor can he make test writings to be used for a comparison of hands; 110 Mass. 155; 128 id. 46; 64 Cal. 334; 151 U. S. 303.

In England, by statute, a person whose handwriting is in dispute, may be called upon by the judge to write in his presence, and such writing may be compared with the writing in question; Whart. Ev. § 706. See 4 F. & F. 490; 45 Me. 534, contra, 62 Conn. 515.

On cross-examination, other writings not in the case may be shown to the witness, and he may be asked whether they are in the handwriting of the party in question; if so declared by the witness, they may be shown not to be genuine and given to the jury for comparison; Whart. Ev. § 710; see 11 Ad. & E. 322.

Experts may be permitted to testify as to whether handwriting is natural or feigned; Tayl. Ev. 1209, 1590; 43 Pa. 9; 69 id. 235; 116 Mass. 331; 37 Miss. 481; as to the nature of the ink used; 30 N. Y. 385; 34 Pa. 363; whether the whole of an instrument was written by the same person, at the same time, and with the same pen and ink; 34 Pa. 363; 11 Gray 250; 90 Mich. 112; whether the figures in a check have been altered; 18 Ind. 329; see 7 Abb. (N. Y.) N. Cas. 113; 32 N. J. Eq. 819; 77 Pa. 20; 62 Ga. 100; 61 Ala. 33; 47 Wis. 530; 39 Md. 86.

An expert witness need not be a professional; 18 S. C. 506; a merchant and dealer in commercial paper is by his vocation qualified to some extent to testify as to the genuineness of a signature to a note; 45 Mo. App. 346. But the value of expert testimony as to handwriting, is to be determined by his opportunity and circumstances. If an illiterate man seldom brought by his business into familiarity with handwriting, his opinion is entitled to much less weight than if educated and accustomed to correspondence, and seeing people write; 37 Fed. Rep. 331.

The jury are not bound by expert evidence further than it accords with their own opinions or than they think it is to be credited; 31 id. 19; proof of a genuine signature to a document whose authenticity is denied casts upon the opposite party the burden of showing that the writing above the signature was forged; 150 U. S. 812.

On a question of the genuineness of the signatures of makers of an accommodation note, testimony of an expert that the ordinary handwriting of the nominal payee, as shown in letters, was such as to convince him that the payee could not successfully imitate the handwriting of one of the witnesses as easily as that of one of the makers of the note, though possibly irrelevant, is unimportant and its admission is not ground for reversal; 147 U. S. 150.

Forgeries of handwriting, and paper and ink to imitate various degrees of age, are so skilfully made, that examination and comparison, even by so-called experts, in the way heretofore usual in courts of justice, are often inadequate and misleading. A scientific use of the microscope, photography, and chemical agents, will generally prove a much surer means of discovering truth. See at large on this branch of the subject, Dr. Frazier's valuable Manual of the Study of Documents. See, generally, works on Evidence; Hogan, on Disputed Handwriting; 16 Am. L. Rev. 569; 17 id. 21; 10 Cent. L. J. 121, 141; 12 id. 507; 32 id. 531; 15 Can. L. J. 149, 181; 17 Myers, Fed. Dec. 369; 20 Weekly L. B. 350; 29 Sol. J. 554; 18 Am. L. Reg. 273; 21 id. 425, 489; 6 Am. St. Rep. 177; 9 id. 29; 27 Am. L. Reg. 273; EXPERT; OPINION.

HANGED, DRAWN, AND QUARTERED. A phrase used to describe an ancient punishment in England for high treason (q. v.), which consisted of first hanging the convicted person, of then taking him down while he was still alive and removing and burning his bowels, and finally of severing his head from his body and dividing the body into four quarters. Byrne.

HANGING. Death by the halter, or the suspending of a criminal, condemned to suffer death, by the neck, until life is extinct. A mode of capital punishment.

In Utah a person convicted of a capital crime has a right of election between hanging and shooting; Comp. L. § 5131. See CRIMES; CAPITAL PUNISHMENT; EXECUTION.

In Old English Law. Pending, as hanging the process. Co. Litt. 13a, 286a. Remaining undetermined. 1 Show. 77.

HANGING IN CHAINS. An ancient practice of hanging a murderer, after execution, upon a gibbet, in chains, near the place where the murder was committed. Abolished by 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 26.

HANGMAN. An executioner. The name usually given to a man employed by the sheriff to put a man to death, according to law, in pursuance of a judgment of a competent court and lawful warrant.

HANGWITE (from Saxon hangian, to hang, and wite, fine). Fine, in Saxon law, for illegal hanging of a thief, or for allowing him to escape. Immunity from such fine. Du Cange.

HANIG. Some customary labor to be performed. Holthouse.

HANSE. A commercial confederacy for the good ordering and protection of the commerce of its members. An imposition upon merchandise. Du Cange, Hansa.

HANSE TOWNS. A number of towns in Europe which joined in a league for mutual protection of commerce as early as the twelfth century.

Amsterdam and Bremen were the first two that formed it, and they were joined by others in Germany, Holland, England, France, Italy, and Spain, numbering ninety at one time. They made war and peace to protect their commerce, and held countries in sovereignty, as a united commonwealth. They had a common treasury at Lübeck, and power to call an assembly as often as they chose. For purposes of jurisdiction, they were divided into four colleges or provinces. Great privileges were granted them by Louis VI. of France and succeeding monarchs. One of their principal magazines was at London. Their power became so great as to excite the jealousy of surrounding nations, who forced the towns within their jurisdiction which belonged to the league to renounce it. Their number and power became thus gradually reduced, beginning from the middle of the fifteenth century; and the last general assembly, representing six cities, was held in Lübeck in 1609. Of the last three remaining cities, Hamburg and Bremen were incorporated into the German Zoll-Versein in 1888, and Lübeck some years previously, and are now, in substance, free cities or states constituting part of the German Empire. See Zimmerman, The Hansa Towns. See CODE.

HANSGRABE. The head officer of a company or corporation.

HANTELODE (German hant, a bond, and load, laid.). An arrest. Du Cange; Toml.; Moz. & W.; Holthouse.

HAP. To catch. Thus "hap the rent," "hap the deep-poll," were formerly used. Tech. Dict.

HAPPINESS. The "pursuit of happiness," as used in the United States Constitution, is said to be the right to pursue any lawful business or vocation, in any manner not inconsistent with the equal rights of others, which may increase one's prosperity, or develop one's faculties, so as to give to one his highest enjoyment. 111 U. S. 757.

HAQUE. In Old Statutes. A handgun, about three-quarters of a yard long.

HAQUEBUT. A gun. It is all one with an arquebuz. Termes de la Ley; 2 and 3 E. 6, c. 14.

HARACIUM. In English Law. A stud of horses and mares kept for breeding. Spel. Glos.

HARBINGER. An officer of the king's household. Toml.

HARBOR (Sax. here-berga, station for an army). A place where ships may ride with safety; any navigable water protected by the surrounding country; a haven. It is public property.

Harbor is to be distinguished from "port," which has a reference to the delivery of cargo. See 7 M. & C. 670; 9 Metc. 371-377; 2 B. & Aid. 460. Thus, we have the "salt harbor, basin, and docks of the port of Hull." 2 B. & Aid. 60. But they are generally used as synonymous. Webster, Dict.

In the United States the control of harbors and regulation of dock lines and the like is exercised by the states, although under the power to regulate commerce the federal government annually expends large sums of money in the improvement of navigation in harbors as well as other navigable waters.

A state may enact police regulations for the conduct of shipping in any of its harbors; 7 Cow. 351; Cooley, Const. Lim. 730; and congress has full power to make regulations on the same subject; 12 How. 299; 21 Ind. 450; 2 Wall. 450; 36 N. Y. 292. A statute passed for the protection of a harbor, which forbids the removal of stone, gravel, and sand from the beach, is constitutional; 11 Metc. 55; and the United States has the authority to make a contract for the removal of rock from a harbor; 134 N. Y. 156.

New harbor lines may be established without further legislative authority, and such establishment is a practical discontinuance of the old lines; 60 Conn. 278. The state board of harbor commissioners has power to establish harbor lines in front of towns; 4 Wash. 6; and an act which provides for the disestablishment of such lines is contrary to the state constitution and void; 18 Wash. 85; such an act on the part of such commissioners does not deprive a riparian owner of the right of access to his land, but merely determines the line to which he may fill without encroaching on public rights; 18 R. I. 504. The mere establishment of general harbor lines by such commissioners is not of itself an injury or a taking of the property and cannot be enjoined; 152 U. S. 59; 5 Del. Ch. 433. The authority to make improvements in harbors implies the power to employ all necessary means thereon; 44 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 238.

In England, as well as Scotland, the right to erect and hold ports and havens is vested in the crown; though a subject may have such right by charter, grant, or prescription, but in all cases charged with the right of the public to use it. In England such grantee is bound to repair, but in Scotland only to the extent of the dues received.

The insufficiency of the common-law power led to an extended course of legislation for the control of ports and harbors, through what is known in Great Britain as the harbor authority, which is vested in commissioners or bodies corporate or otherwise. Such bodies are charged with the duty of general supervision of the construction, extension, improvement, and lighting of the harbor and collection of dues therefrom. The general consolidation act of 10 Vict. c. 271, defined these duties and powers in detail as did the general act of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 47, supplemented by various local acts.

In Torts. To receive clandestinely or without lawful authority a person for the purpose of so concealing him that another having a right to the lawful custody of such person shall be deprived of the same. 2 Wall. Jr. 817. See 5 How. 215; 8 McLean 631. For example, the harboring of a wife or an apprentice in order to deprive the husband or the master of them; or, in a less technical sense, it is the reception of persons improperly; Poll. Torts 275; 10 N. H. 247; 5 Ill. 498.

It may be aptly used to describe the furnishing of shelter, lodging, or food clandestinely or with concealment, and under certain circumstances, may be equally applicable to those acts divested of any accompanying secrecy; 55 Fed. Rep. 415.

The harboring of such persons will subject the harbinger to an action for the injury; but, in order to put him completely in the wrong, a demand should be made for their restoration, for in cases where the harbinger has not committed any other wrong than merely receiving the plaintiff's wife, child, or apprentice, he may be under no obligation to return them without a demand; 1 Chit. Pr. 524; 2 No. C. Law Rep. 249; 5 How. 215, 227. See ENTICE.

HARD CASES. A phrase used to indicate decisions which, to meet a case of hardship to a party, are not entirely consonant with the true principle of the law. It is said of such: Hard cases make bad law. Hard cases must not make bad equity more than bad law; 6 Ia. 270.

HARD LABOR. In those states where the penitentiary system has been adopted, convicts who are to be imprisoned, as part of their punishment, are sentenced to perform hard labor. This labor is not greater than many freemen perform voluntarily, and the quantity required to be performed is not at all unreasonable. In the penitentiaries of Pennsylvania it consists in being employed in weaving, shoemaking, and such like employment.

Hard labor was first introduced in English prisons in 1706. By the Prison Act of 1805, it is divided into two classes, one for males above sixteen years old the other for males below that age and females; Moz. & W.

HARDHEIDIS. In old Scotch Law. Lions; coins formerly of the value of half pence. 1 Pitt. Crim. Tr. pt. 1. 64, note.

HARDSHIP. See HARD CASES.

HARIOT. The same as heriot (q. v.). Cowel; Termes de la Ley. Sometimes spelled Harriott; Wms. Seis. 203. See HERIOT.

HARMONIZE. Though not strictly synonymous with the word "reconcile," it is not improperly used by a court in instructing the jury that it is their duty to "harmonize" conflicting evidence if possible. 3 S. Dak. 134.

HARNASCA. Defensive armor; harness. Spel. Glos.

HARNESS. The defensive armor of a soldier or knight. All warlike instruments.

Hoved. 725. In modern poetical sense a suit of armor. The term is sometimes used to denote the trappings of a war-horse.

Harness was the early name for body armor of all kinds. Modern writers have tried to discriminate between harness as the armor of the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries, and armor as confined to the plate suits of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; but armor is the modern English word for defensive garments of all sorts, and harness in this sense, is a poetical archaism. Cent. Dict.

The tackle or furniture of a ship.

HARO, HARRON. An outcry, or hue and cry, after felons and malefactors. Cowel. The original of the clamour de haro comes from the Normans. Moz. & W.

HART. A stag or male deer of the forest five years old complete.

HARTER ACT. An act of congress of February 13, 1893, 2 Supp. R. S. 81, which provides that—"If the owner . . . shall exercise due diligence to make the said vessel in all respects seaworthy and properly manned, equipped, and supplied, neither the vessel, her owner or owners, agents or charterers shall become or be held responsible for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation, or in the management of said vessel."

Under this act it has been held that due diligence is not satisfied by the mere appointment of competent persons to repair. Due diligence in repair and equipment must be exercised in fact; 88 Fed. Rep. 919; 69 id. 470; 74 id. 253. See SHIPPING.

HASP AND STAPLE. A mode of entry in Scotland by which a bailee declared a person heir on evidence brought before himself, at the same time delivering the property over to him by the hasp and staple of the door, which was the symbol of possession. Bell; Ersk. Pr. 433.

HASPA. In Old English Law. A name anciently given to the hasp of a door, which was often used in giving livery of seisin of premises which included a house.

The hasp or clasp of a book. Cunningham.

HASTA (Lat.). A spear which in Roman law was the sign of an auction sale. Hastea subiecte, to put under the spear, like the modern phrase put under the hammer signified put up at auction. Calv. Lex. In feudal law it was the symbol of the investiture of a fee. Lib. Feud. 2, 2.

HAT MONEY. In Maritime Law. Primage: a small duty paid to the captain and mariners of a ship.

HAUBER. A great baron or lord. Spel. Gloss.

HAUGH, or HOUGH. Low-lying rich lands, lands which are occasionally overwooded. Encyc. Dict.

A green plot in a valley. Wharton.

HAUL. In an indictment for larceny this word is a sufficient substitute for carry, in the statutory phrase steal, take and carry away, being in the sense used equivalent to it. 108 Ind. 171.

HAULM, or HELM. Straw Webster.

HAUE. In the laws of William the Conqueror, hatred. Toml.

HAUSTUS (Lat. from haurire, to draw).

In Civil Law. The right of drawing water, and the right of way to the place of drawing. L. 1, D. de Servit. Præd. Rustic.; Fleta, l. 4, c. 27, § 9.

HAUT CHEMIN (L. Fr.). Highway. Yearb. M. 4 Hen. VI. 4.

HAUT ESTRET (L. Fr.). High street; highway. Yearb. P. 11 Hen. VI. 2.

HAUTHONER. A man armed with a coat of mail. Jac. L. Dict.

HAVE. See HABENDUM; HABE.

HAVEN. A place calculated for the reception of ships, and so situated, in regard to the surrounding land, that the vessel may ride at anchor in it in safety. Hale, de Port. Mar. c. 2; Chitty, Com. Law 2; 15 East 304, 305. See CREEK; PORT; HARBOR; ARM OF THE SEA.

HAW. A small parcel of land so called in Kent; houses. Cowel.

HAWAII. A group of islands in the Pacific Ocean about one thousand five hundred miles from the western coast of California. A republic was proclaimed and a new constitution promulgated July 4, 1894, succeeding a provisional government formed in January, 1893. The constitution provides for a president who is elected for six years and a cabinet of four members, a council of state of fifteen members, and a house of representatives of fifteen members. Justice is administered by a supreme court sitting in Honolulu with a chief justice and two associate justices. There are also circuit and district judges as prescribed by the legislature. The common law is administered as in England and the United States and the judicial decisions of those countries are of authority in the same way as those of each country are referred to in the other.

A treaty for the annexation of Hawaii to the United States has recently been negotiated and submitted to the United States Senate for its approval.

HAWBERK or HAWBERT. A shirt of mail. Moz. & W. See FIEF D'HAUBERK.

HAWGH or HOWGH. A valley. Co. Litt. 5 b.

HAWKER. An itinerant or travelling trader, who carries goods about in order to sell them, and who actually sells them to purchasers, in contradistinction to a trader who has goods for sale and sells them in a fixed place of business. Superadded to this, though perhaps not essential, is generally understood one who not only carries goods for sale, but seeks for purchasers, either by outcry, which some lexicographers conceive as intimated by the derivation of the word, or by attracting notice and attention to them, as goods for sale, by an actual exhibition or exposure of them by placards or labels, or by a conventional signal, like the sound of a horn for the sale of fish; 12 Cush. 495. To prevent imposition, hawkers are generally required to take out licenses, under regulations established by the local laws of the states. See 46 Minn. 435; and these laws have generally been held to be constitutional; 117 Pa. 207; 110 Mass. 254; 51 Ala. 52; 57 Ind. 74; PEDDLER. One who goes about a village carrying samples and taking orders for a non-resident firm is not a hawker or peddler; 135 Ill. 36. It is termed Hawking. See 107 Ind. 505.

See 7 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 667, note.

HAY. In a bequest, "Hay" in a barn is included in the words "All the household furniture and other property in and about the buildings." 63 Me. 350.

HAYBOTE (from hays, hedge, and bote, compensation). Hedgebote: one of the estovers allowed a tenant for life or for years; namely, material to repair hedges or fences, or to make necessary farming utensils. 2 Bla. Com. 35; 1 Wmsb. R. P. 90.

HAYWARD (from hays, hedge, and ward, keeping). In Old English Law. An officer appointed in the lord's court to keep a common herd of cattle of a town: so called because he was to see that they did not break or injure the hedges of inclosed grounds. His duty was also to inclose trespassing cattle, and to guard against pound-breaches. Kitch. 46; Cowel.

HAZADOR. See HAZARD.

HAZARD. To engage in a wager of any kind is a "hazard" within the meaning of a statute, providing for a fine for any person engaging in any "hazard," or game on which money or property is bet, won or lost. 100 Ky. 2, 37 S. W. 152.

HAZAR-ZAMIN. A bail or surety for the personal attendance of another. Moz. & W.

HAZARD. An unlawful game of dice. Hazardor. One who plays at it. Jac. L. Dict.

HAZARDOUS. Risky; perilous; involving hazard or special danger. See next title.

HAZARDOUS CONTRACT. A contract in which the performance of that which is one of its objects depends on an uncertain event. La. Civ. Code, art. 1769. See 1 J. J. Marsh. 596; 3 id. 84; MARITIME LOAN.

In a fire insurance policy, the terms "hazardous," "extra hazardous," "specially hazardous," and "not hazardous," are well understood technical terms, having distinct meanings. A policy covering only goods "hazardous" and "not hazardous" cannot be made to cover goods or merchandise "extra hazardous" or "specially hazardous;" 38 N. Y. 864.

On the other hand, it has been held that "hazardous" and "extra hazardous" are terms having no technical meaning, but are to be taken in their popular sense of dangerous and extra dangerous; 50 Minn. 409. See RISKS AND PERILS.

HAZING. "Hazing" is defined to be striking, laying open hands upon, treating with violence, or offering to do bodily harm to a new cadet with intent to punish or injure him; or other treatment of a tyrannical, abusive, shameful, insulting or humiliating nature. 158 Ky. 207, 164 S. W. 808.

HE. Properly a pronoun of the masculine gender, but usually construed in statutes to include both sexes and corporations. Where in a written instrument, a person, whose name was designated by an initial is referred to as "he," it is not conclusive that such person is a man, but the contrary may be shown by parol; 71 Cal. 38. See HIS.

HE WHO SEEKS EQUITY MUST DO EQUITY. This is a general principle applicable to all classes of cases whenever necessary to promote justice, and requires that any person seeking the aid of equity shall have accorded, shall offer to accord, or will be compelled to accord, to the other party all the equitable rights to which the other is entitled in respect to the subject matter. Relief inconsistent with the equities of the adverse party will be denied, and where the granting of relief raises equitable rights in favor of the defendant, the according of such rights will be imposed as a condition of granting the relief. It is on this principle that one who has failed to perform his own obligations under a contract cannot compel the others to perform. 161 Ky. 264, 170 S. W. 642.

HEAD. The principal source of a stream. Webster, Dict. The head of a creek will be taken to mean the head of its longest branch, unless there be forcible evidence of common reputation to the contrary; 2 Bibb 112.

The principal person or chief of any organization, corporation, or firm.

HEAD-COURT. Courts formerly held in Scotland yearly by sheriffs, stewards, and barons who had certain civil and criminal jurisdiction prior to 20 Geo. II. c. 60, by which the obligation of the vassals to attend these courts was abolished. Ersk. Prin. 34-40.

HEAD OF A CREEK. The "head of a creek" means the source of the longest branch unless general reputation had given the appellation to another. 2 Bibb. (Ky.) 112.

HEAD OF A DEPARTMENT. In 169, Rev. Stats., the term means the Secretary in charge of a great division of the executive branch of the Government like the State, Treasury, and War, who is a member of the Cabinet. It does not include heads of bureaus or lesser divisions. 252 U. S. 515, quoting 99 U. S. 510.

HEAD OF A FAMILY. Householder, one who provides for a family. 19 Wend. 470. There must be the relation of father and child, or husband and wife; 3 Humph. 216; 17 Ala. N. S. 486; contra, 20 Mo. 75; 41 Ga. 153. The father being dead, the mother is the head of the family; 63 Pn. 475. See 16 Mass. 135; 45 Ga. 168; 2 How. 881. See FAMILY; HOMESTEAD.

HEAD-LAND. In Old English Law. A narrow piece of unploughed land left at the end of a ploughed field for the turning of the plough. Called, also, buff. Kennett, Paroch. Antiq. 587; 2 Leon. 70, case 93; 1 Litt. 18.

HEAD MONEY. A name popularly applied to a tax on aliens landing in the United States under U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 870. Such tax by a state is unconstitutional; 92 U. S. 259; but as a federal regulation of commerce it is valid; 112 id. 380. See IMMIGRATION.

Under the act of Congress of August 3, 1882, 22 Stat. 214, an act to regulate immigration, the first section provides that there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of fifty cents for each and every passenger, not a citizen of the United States, who shall come by steam or sail vessel from a foreign port to any port within the United States. This tax upon such passengers has been termed "head money," "capitation tax," etc. 112 U. S. 589. Such a tax is constitutional when imposed by Congress (Id.), but unconstitutional when imposed by a State. 92 U. S. 275. See COMMERCE WITH FOREIGN NATIONS.

HEAD-NOTE. The syllabus of a reported case.

A statement of the points decided in a case, and preceding the printed report thereof. Anderson.

HEAD-PENCE. An exaction of 40d. or more, collected by the sheriff of Northumberland from the people of that county twice in every seven years, without account to the king. Abolished by 23 Hen. VI. c. 6, in 1444. Cowel.

HEAD-SILVER. A name sometimes given to a Common Fine (q. v.). Also said to be a fine of £40 levied by the sheriff upon the inhabitants of Northumberland, twice in seven years.

Dues paid to lords of fiefs. Also given as synonymous with "head-pence" (q. v.). Wharton.

HEAD OF A STREAM. In determining the "head of a stream" which has several branches it was held that branch to be the main fork which furnishes the main volume of water. 64 S. W. 501.

HEADBOROUGH. In English Law. An officer who was formerly the chief officer in a borough, who is now subordinate to the constable. Originally the chief of the tithing, or frank pledge. St. Armand, Leg. Power of Eng. 88. See DE-CERNARY.

HEADER. As Used in Mining. "Headers" are long pieces of plank supporting a large area of the roof and supported by two props, one at each end. 160 Ky. 671, 170 S. W. 14.

HEAFODWEARD. A service rendered by athane or a genath or vellein, the precise nature of which is unknown. Anc. Eng. Inst.

HEALGEMOTE. Halimote (q. v.).

HEALSFANG (from Germ. hals, neck, fangen, to catch). A sort of pillory, by which the head of the culprit was caught between two boards, as feet are caught in a pair of stocks.

"The fine which every man would have to pay in commutation of this punishment, had it been in use,"—for it was very early disused, no mention of it occurring in the laws of the Saxon kings. Anc. Laws & Inst. of Eng. Gloss; Spelman, Gloss.

HEALTH. Freedom from pain or sickness; the most perfect state of animal life. It may be defined as the natural agreement and concordant disposition of the parts of the living body.

Public health is an object of the utmost importance, and has attracted the attention of the national and state legislatures.

By the act of Congress of the 25th of February, 1796, it is enacted: sect. 1. That the quarantines and other restraints, which shall be established by the laws of any state, respecting any vessels arriving in or bound to any port or district thereof, whether coming from a foreign port or some other port of the United States, shall be observed and enforced by all officers of the United States in such places; sect. 4. In times of contagion the collectors of the revenue may remove, under the provisions of the act, into another district; sect. 5. The judge of any district court may, when a contagious disorder prevails in his district, cause the removal of persons confined in prison under the laws of the United States, into another district; sect. 6. In case of the prevalence of a contagious disease at the seat of government, the president of the United States may direct the removal of any or all public officers to a place of safety; sect. 7. In case of such contagious disease at the seat of government, the chief justice, or, in case of his death or inability, the senior associate justice, of the supreme court of the United States, may issue his warrant to the marshal of the district court within which the supposed case of the disease exists, directing him to adjourn the said session of the said court to such other place within the same or adjoining district as he may deem convenient. And the district judges, under the same circumstances, have the same power to adjourn to some other part of their several districts.

By the act of March 3, 1879, ch. 202, § 1, R. S. Suppl. 490, enforced by subsequent acts, a National Board of Health was established, to consist of seven members appointed by the president, and of four members detailed from the armed services, whose duty shall be to obtain information upon all matters affecting the public health, to advise the heads of departments and state executives, to make necessary investigations at any places in the United States or at foreign ports, and to make rules guarding against the introduction of contagious diseases into the country, and their spread from state to state. See 143 U. S. 578.

The protection of cattle from contagious diseases has received legislative attention in some of the states. In Pennsylvania, the governor may make proclamation whenever pleuro-pneumonia exists among the cattle in any county, and adopt means, such as the quarantining of affected places, to prevent its spread; act May 1, 1879. The introduction of cattle into Virginia, between March 10, and October 10, without careful inspection, is forbidden; act April 2, 1879.

Closely connected with the subject of health is the adulteration of food. See ADULTERATION. The English Sale of Food and Drugs Act (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63, § 6) provides that "no person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food" not of the quality demanded, and authorizes the appointment of a public analyst with power to examine and certify samples of food, drinks, and drugs; L. R. 4 Q. B. D. 289; L. R. 3 Ex. D. 175. A state analyst with similar powers has been appointed in most states. This is a more practical measure than has been attempted in the previous legislation throughout the country, where the mode of detection and proof have been left to the operation of general rules.

In Scotland the care of the public health is vested in the county council acting through the district committee. These authorities are charged with the regulation of sewerage, privies, scavenging, nuisances, lodging-houses and cellar dwellings, and with the prevention of infection. Ersk. Pr. 619; Act 1867, § 94; 32 Vict. c. 50.

Public policy requires that health officers be undisturbed in the exercise of their powers, unless clearly transcending their authority; 3 Paige 218; 1 Dill. § 369; but in so acting such officers must not interfere with the natural right of individuals; 21 Vt. 13; 67 id. 502; the people "shall be secure in their persons and homes from unreasonable searches and seizures"; 10 Phila. 94; 40 N. J. Ex. 325. See 146 N. Y. 68, which case, overruling 32 N. Y. 817, held that health officers may not quarantine persons refusing to be vaccinated when small-pox is imminent. A board of health is not a natural or an artificial person, and cannot sue or be sued; 2 Lack. Leg. N. (Pa.) 181. A court of chancery can only interfere with the trustees of a sanitary district where such trustees have acted in violation of the law or in a fraudulent manner; 58 Ill. App. 806.

Offences against the provisions of the health laws are generally punished by fine and imprisonment. They are offences against public health, punishable by the common law by fine and imprisonment, such, for example, as selling unwholesome provisions. 4 Bla. Com. 162; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 822; 6 id. 133; 3 Maule & S. 10; 4 Campb. 10.

Mandamus will issue to compel a board of health to award compensation to one whose property it has occupied or destroyed to prevent the spread of contagious disease, when such board of health has refused so to do; 67 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 1094.

Injuries to the health of particular individuals are, in general, remedied by an action on the case, or perhaps, in some instances, for breach of contract, and may be also by abatement, in some cases of nuisance. See 4 Bla. Com. 197; 81 Ky. 171; 26 Mo. App. 253; Billings; Parker & Worthington, Pub. Health; Upton, Health Stat.; NUISANCE; ABATEMENT; QUARANTINE; CONTAGIOUS DISEASES; VACCINATION. GOOD HEALTH.

HEALTH OFFICER. The name of an officer invested with power to enforce the health laws. The powers and duties of health officers are regulated by local laws.

HEALTHY. Free from disease or bodily ailment or from a state of the system susceptible or liable to disease or bodily ailment. 13 Ired. 357.

HEARING. In Chancery Practice. The trial of a chancery suit. 24 Wis. 165; 112 Mass. 359.

The hearing is conducted as follows. When the cause is called on in court, the pleadings on each side are opened in a brief manner to the court by the junior counsel for the plaintiff; after which the plaintiff's leading counsel states the plaintiff's case and the points in issue, and submits to the court his arguments upon them. Then the depositions (if any) of the plaintiff's witnesses, and such parts of the defendant's answer as support the plaintiff's case, are read by the plaintiff's solicitor; after which the rest of the plaintiff's counsel address the court. Then the same course of proceedings is observed on the other side, excepting that no part of the defendant's answer can be read in his favor if it be replied to. The leading counsel for the plaintiff is then heard in reply; after which the court pronounces the decrees. 14 Vin. Abr. 283; Com. Dig. Chancery, (T. 1, 2, 8); Daniell, Chanc. Pract.

In Criminal Law. The examination of a prisoner charged with a crime or misdemeanor, and of the witnesses for the accused. See EXAMINATION. FINAL HEARING.

HEARSAY EVIDENCE. That kind of evidence which does not derive its value solely from the credit to be given to the witness himself, but rests also, in part on the veracity and competency of some other person. 1 Phill. Ev. 185.

Hearsay evidence is incompetent to establish any specific fact, which fact is in its nature susceptible of being proved by witnesses who speak from their own knowledge; this species of testimony supposes some better which might be adduced in a particular case and its intrinsic weakness, its incompetency to satisfy the mind of the existence of the fact, and the frauds which might be practiced under its cover combine to support the rule that it is inadmissible; 110 U. S. 581; 7 Cra. 205.

The term applies to written as well as oral matter; but the writing or words are not necessarily hearsay, because those of a person not under oath. Thus, information on which one has acted; 2 B. & Ad. 845; 9 Johns. 45; the conversation of a person suspected of insanity; 3 Hagg. Eccl. 574; 2 Ad. & E. 3; 7 id. 313; see 51 Kan. 720; 24 S. W. Rep. One may testify to his own age, where it is shown that his father and mother are dead; 49 Kan. 780; 53 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 541; 108 N. C. 747. See as to age, 11 Cent. L. J. 461.

As a general rule, hearsay reports of a transaction, whether oral or written, are not admissible as evidence; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 124; 9 Ind. 572; 5 Iowa 532; 14 La. Ann. 830; 6 Wis. 63; 68 Hun 412; 97 Ala. 639; 5 C. C. App. 220; 6 id. 428; 86 Ky. 605; 77 Ga. 563. The rule applies to evidence given under oath in a cause between other litigating parties; 1 East 378; 8 Term 77; 7 Cra. 296.

At one time in England it was held on the authority of Luttarell v. Reynell, 1 Mod. 282, that hearsay evidence of a witness' previous declarations might be admitted to confirm his testimony by showing that he "was constant to himself"; but this theory of confirming a sworn statement by declarations not under oath was abandoned in England; Buller, J., in 8 Doug. 242; and (except in a few cases which followed the earlier English case) repudiated in the United States; Stark. Ev. Sharsw. ed. 253, n. 2; 12 Am. L. Reg. 1, where the cases are collected.

Matters relating to public interest, as, for example, a claim to a ferry or highway, may be proved by hearsay testimony; 1 Stark. Ev. 195; 6 M. & W. 234; 1 M. & S. 679; 19 Conn. 250; but the matter in controversy must be of public interest; 2 B. & Ad. 245; 29 Barb. 593; 14 Md. 898; 6 Jones, N. C. 459; the declarations must be those of persons supposed to be dead; 11 Price 162; 1 C. & K. 58; 12 Vt. 178; and must have been made before controversy arose; 13 Ves. 514; 8 Campb. 444; 4 id. 417. See 108 N. C. 203. The rule extends to deeds, leases, and other private documents; 10 B. & C. 17; 1 M. & S. 77; maps; 2 Moore & P. 525; 19 Conn. 250; and verdicts; 1 East 335; 9 Bingh. 465; 10 Ad. & E. 151; 7 C. & P. 181. Testimony based on daily market reports from a commercial center comes from a public authentic source and is not hearsay; 5 Tex. Civ. App. 186.

Ancient documents purporting to be a part of the res gestæ are also admissible, although the parties to the suit are not bound; 5 Term 413, n.; 5 Price 312; 4 Pick. 160. See 2 C. & P. 440; 3 Johns. Cas. 283; 1 H. & J. 174; 4 Denio 201. So also declarations which form part of the res gestæ, which explain and give character to what was done at the time are not liable to the objection that they are hearsay; Stark. Ev. Sharwood's ed. 53, note 1, 59, note 1, where the cases illustrating this branch of the subject are collected and classified by the American editor.

When two persons not speaking a common language voluntarily agree on a third to interpret between them, the latter is to be regarded as the agent of each to translate and communicate what he says to the other, and such communication to the interpreter is not hearsay, and the party to whom it is made may testify to it; 50 Minn. 91; 51 Ia. 25; the weight only of such being affected thereby and not its competency; 157 Mass. 393.

See Works on Evidence; Stark. Ev. Sharsw. ed. 43-66, 185-191; 3 Sm. L. Cas. 9th Am. ed. 1768; 37 Alb. L. J. 130; 29 Sol. J. 181; 5 L. Q. Rev. 285; and as to corroboration, 12 Am. L. Reg. 1; DECLARATION; DYING DECLARATIONS; EVIDENCE; PREGREE; RES GESTÆ.

HEARTH-MONEY. A tax, granted by 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 10, abolished 1 Will. & Mary, St. 1, c. 10, of two shillings on every hearth or stove in England and Wales. Jacob, Law Dict. Commonly called chimney-money. Id.

See FUMAGE; WINDOW TAX; INHABITED HOUSE DUTY.

HEARTH-SILVER. A sort of modus for tithes, viz.: a prescription for cutting down and using for fuel the tithe of wood. 2 Burn. Eccl. Law 304.

HEAT OF PASSION. This does not mean passion or anger which comes from an old grudge, or no immediate cause or provocation; but passion or anger suddenly aroused at the time by some immediate and reasonable provocation, by words or acts of one at the time. 106 Mo. 196.

HEBBERMAN. An unlawful fisher in the Thames below London bridge; so called because they generally fished at ebbing tide or water. 4 Hen. VII. c. 15; Jacob, Law Dict.

HEBBERTHEF. The privilege of having goods of a thief and trial of him within such a liberty. Cartular, S. Edmundi MS. 163; Cowel.

HEBBING-WEARS. A device for catching fish in ebbing water. Stat. 23 Hen. VIII. c. 5.

HEBDOMAD. A week; a space of seven days.

HEBDOMADIUS. A week's man; a canon, or prebendary in a cathedral church, who has the care of the choir and the officers belonging to it, for his own week Cowel.

HECCAGIUM. Rent paid to the lord for liberty to use engines called hecks. Toml.

HECKS. The name of an engine to take fish in the river Ouse near York, anno 23 Hen. 8. cap. 18. Cunningham.

HECTARE. A measure of land used in Mexican land grants, containing 2,471 acres. 161 U. S. 219. See VARA; CORDEL; CABALLERIA; SITIO.

HEDA. A small haven, wharf, or landing-place.

HEDAGIUM (Sax. heda, hitha, port). A toll or custom paid at the hith or wharf, for landing goods, etc., from which an exemption was granted by the king to some particular persons and societies. Cartular. Abbatæ de Redinges; Cowel.

HEDGE-BOTE. Wood used for repairing hedges or fences. 2 Bla. Com. 35; 16 Johns. 15; HAYBOTE.

HEDGE PARSON. See HEDGE PRIEST.

HEDGE-PRIEST. A hedge-parson; specifically, in Ireland, formerly, a priest who has been admitted to orders directly from a hedge-school, without preparation in theological studies at a regular college. Cent. Dict.

HEDGE SCHOOL. Formerly, in Ireland, a school kept in a hedge corner. An open air school. English. See HEDGE PRIEST.

HEDGING. A means by which collectors and exporters of grain or other products, and manufacturers who make contracts in advance for the sale of their goods, secure themselves against the fluctuations of the market by counter contracts for the purchase or sale, as the case may be, of an equal quantity of the product, or of the material of manufacture. It is none the less a serious business contract for a legitimate and useful purpose that it may be offset before the time of delivery in case delivery should not be needed or desired. 198 U. S. 249.

HEGEMONY. The leadership of one among several independent confederate states.

HEGIRA. The epoch or account of time used by the Arabians and the Turks, who begin the Mohammedan era and computation from the day that Mahomet was compelled to escape from Mecca to Medina which happened on the night of Thursday, July 15th, A. D. 622, under the reign of the Emperor Heraclius. Townsend, Dict. Dates; Wilson, Gloss. The era begins July 16th. The word is sometimes spelled Hejira but the former is the ordinary usage. It is derived from Ajraal, in one form or another, an oriental term denoting flight, departure.

As the years of the Hegira consist of only 354 days, they are reduced to the Julian calendar by multiplying the year of the Hegira by 354, dividing the product by 355, subtracting the intercalary days, or as many times as there are four years in the quotient, and adding 622 to the remainder. Tomlin.

HEIFER. A young cow which has not had a calf. A beast of this kind two years and a half old was held to be improperly described in the indictment as a cow; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 616; 1 Leach 105.

HEIR. At Common Law. He who is born or begotten in lawful wedlock, and upon whom the law casts the estate in lands, tenements, or hereditaments immediately upon the death of his ancestor. Thus, the word does not strictly apply to personal estate. Wms. Per. Pr.

Ordinarily used to designate those persons who answer this description at the death of the testator. In its strict and technical import applies to the person or persons appointed by law to succeed to the estate in case of intestacy. 2 Bla. Com. 201; 52 Ill. 62; 139 id. 433; 37 S. C. 255.

The term heir has a very different signification at common law from what it has in those states and countries which have adopted the civil law. In the latter the term applies to all persons who are called to the succession, whether by the act of the party or by operation of law. The person who is created universal successor by a will is called the testamentary heir; and the next of kin by blood is, in cases of intestacy, called the heir-at-law, or heir by intestacy. The executor of the common law is in many respects not unlike the testamentary heir of the civil law. Again, the administrator in many respects corresponds with the heir by intestacy. By the common law, executors—unless expressly authorized by the will—and administrators have no right except to the personal estate of the deceased; whereas the heir by the civil law is authorized to administer both the personal and real estate. 1 Brown, Civ. Law 344; Story, Conf. Laws § 508.

No person is heir of a living person. A person occupying a relation which may be that of heirship is, however, called heir apparent or heir presumptive; 2 Bla. Com. 205; and the word heir may be used in a contract to designate the representative of a living person; 9 Conn. 272. A monster cannot be heir; Co. Litt. 7 b; nor at common law could a bastard; 2 Kent 208. See BASTARD; DESCENT and DISTRIBUTION.

In the word heirs is comprehended heirs of heirs in infinitum; Co. Litt. 7 b 9 a; Wood, Inst. 69. The words "heir" and "heirs" are interchangeable, and embrace all legally entitled to partake of the inheritance; 63 Va. 724.

According to many authorities, heir may be nomen collectivum, as well in a deed as in a will, and operate in both in the same manner as the word heirs; 1 Rolle, Abr. 233; Ambl. 433; Cro. Eliz. 313; 1 Burr. 83. But see 2 Prest. Est. 9, 10. In wills, in order to effectuate the intention of the testator, the word heirs is sometimes construed to mean the next of kin; 1 Jac. & W. 393; 51 N. J. Eq. 1; and statutory next of kin; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 209; 2 Hawks 473; the word "heir" can be construed as "distributees" or "representatives"; 84 Penn. 245; and children; Ambl. 273; 86 S. C. 88; 87 Ga. 290; 91 Tenn. 119; 62 N. H. 538; 117 Ind. 308; it can be construed to mean "heirs of his body"; 75 Md. 141; and grand-children; 81 Va. 40. Under the term "heirs-at-law" a widow has been allowed to share; 158 Mass. 392; 63 Ind. 72; but see 137 N. Y. 106. See 12 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 721; 13 id. 46; Jarm. Wills 905. See FELLOW-HEIR; JOINT-HEIR.

In a bequest of personality the word "heirs" is used to mean those entitled under the statute of distribution in case of intestacy; 136 Pa. 158.

In Civil Law. He who succeeds to the rights and occupies the place of a deceased person. See the following titles, and HEIRS.

HEIR APPARENT. One who has an indefeasible right to the inheritance, provided he outlive the ancestor. 2 Bla. Com. 206.

HEIRS, BENEFICIARY. In Civil Law. Those who have accepted the succession under the benefit of an inventory regularly made. La. Civ. Code, art. 879. If the heir apprehend that the succession will be burdened with debts beyond its value, he accepts with benefit of inventory, and in that case he is responsible only for the value of the succession.

HEIR, COLLATERAL. One who is not of the direct line of the deceased, but comes from a collateral line: as, a brother, sister, an uncle and aunt, a nephew, niece, or cousin, of the deceased.

HEIR, CONVENTIONAL. In Civil Law. One who takes a succession by virtue of a contract—for example, a marriage contract—which entitles the heir to the succession.

HEIR BY DEVISE. One to whom lands are devised by will; a devisee of lands.

HEIR, FORCED. One who cannot be disinherited. See FORCED HEIRS.

HEIR, GENERAL. Heir at common law.

HEIR, IRREGULAR. In Louisiana. One who is neither testamentary nor legal heir, and who has been established by law to take the succession. See La. Civ. Code, art. 874. When the deceased has left neither lawful descendants, nor ascendants, nor collateral relations, the law calls to his inheritance either the surviving husband or wife, or his or her natural children, or the state; id. art. 911. This is called an irregular succession.

HEIR AT LAW. He who, after his ancestor dies intestate, has a right to all lands, tenements, and hereditaments which belonged to him or of which he was seised. The same as heir general.

In its general definition heir at law is not limited to children; it may be and is often used, in cases where there are no children; it includes parents, brothers, sisters, etc.; 7 U. S. App. 63.

HEIR, LEGAL. In Civil Law. A legal heir is one who is of the same blood as the deceased and who takes the succession by force of law. This is different from a testamentary or conventional heir, who takes the succession in virtue of the disposition of man. See La. Civ. Code, art. 873, 875; Dict. de Jurisp. Héritier légitime. There are three classes of legal heirs, to wit: the children and other lawful descendants, the fathers and mothers and other lawful ascendants, and the collateral kindred. La. Civ. Code, art. 883. See Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 229.

HEIR-LOOM. Chattels which, contrary to the nature of chattels, descend to the heir along with the inheritance, and do not pass to the executor.

This word seems to be compounded of heir and loom, that is, a frame, viz. to weave in. Some derive the word loom from the Saxon loma, or geloma, which signifies utensils or vessels generally. However this may be, the word loom, by time, is drawn to a more general signification than it bore at the first, comprehending all implements of household, as tables, presses, cupboards, bedsteads, waincots, and which, by the custom of some countries, having belonged to a house, are never inventoried after the decease of the owner as chattels, but accrue to the heir with the house itself. Minshew; 2 Folt. & Mat. 361.

Charters, deeds, and other evidences of the title of the land, together with the box or chest in which they are contained, the keys of a house, and fish in a fish-pond, are heirlooms. Co. Litt. 3 a, 185 b; 7 Co. 17 b, Cro. Eliz. 872; Brooke, Abr. Charters, pl. 13; 2 Bla. Com. 427; 14 Vin. Abr. 291; Darl. P. P. 16.

Diamonds bequeathed to one "as head of the family" and directed "to be deemed heirlooms in the family" are held in trust for the legatee and his successors; 28 W. R. 592; chattels bequeathed upon trust to permit the same to go and be enjoyed by the person possessed of the title, in the nature of heirlooms, vest absolutely in the first taker; 23 Ch. D. 153; and to the testator's nephew to go to and be held as heirlooms by him and his eldest son on his decease, is held to create an executory trust with a life interest in the first taker; L. R. 6 Eq. 540. An election, by one who takes heirlooms under a deed of trust, to take under a will did not operate as a forfeiture of the heirlooms as the interest in them was unassignable; 31 Ch. D. 466.

HEIR PRESUMPTIVE. One, who, in the present circumstances, would be entitled to the inheritance, but whose rights may be defeated by the contingency of some nearer heir being born. 2 Bla. Com. 208. In Louisiana, the presumptive heir is he who is the nearest relation of the deceased capable of inheriting. This quality is given to him before the decease of the person from whom he is to inherit, as well as after the opening of the succession, until he has accepted or renounced it; La. Civ. Code, art. 876.

HEIR, TESTAMENTARY. In Civil Law. One who is constituted heir by testament executed in the form prescribed by law. He is so called to distinguish him from the legal heirs, who are called to the succession by the law; and from conventional heirs, who are so constituted by a contract inter vivos. See HÆRES FACTUS; DEVISEE.

HEIR, UNCONDITIONAL. In Louisiana. One who inherits without any reservation, or without making an inventory, whether the acceptance be express or tacit. La. Civ. Code, art. 878.

HEIRESS. A female heir to a person having an estate of inheritance. When there are more than one, they are called co-heiresses, or co-heirs.

HEIRS. The word "heirs," in order to be a word of limitation, must include all the persons in all generations belonging to the class designated by the law as "heirs." 165 U. S. 578.

HEIRS OF THE BODY. The term "heirs of the body," when used in a deed should ordinarily be given its technical meaning. 150 Ky. 60, 150 S. W. 8.

There is a well settled distinction between the import and technical effect of the words "heirs of the body" and the word "children" as used in wills. 2 Met. (Ky.) 335; 2 Met. (Ky.) 469.

"Heirs of the body" mean such of the issue or offspring as may by law inherit. 10 B. Mon. (Ky.) 193.

Where the term "heirs of her body" is used interchangeably with the words "her children," and it is apparent that the latter were used in the primary sense and the former as descriptive, they will be construed as words of purchase, and not of limitation. 160 Ky. 694, 170 S. W. 31.

"HEIRS" AND "CHILDREN." While the word "heirs" if used as a term of purchase in a will may signify whoever may be such at the testator's death, the word "children" as used in the deed . . . should be construed as including only those persons answering the description at the time of execution. 228 U. S. 109.

HEIRSHIP MOVABLES. In Scotch Law. The movables which go to the heir, and not to the executor, that the land may not go to the heir completely dismantled, such as the best of furniture, horses, cows, etc., but not fungibles. Hope, Minor Pr. 538; Erskine, Inst. 8. 13-17; Bell, Dict.

HELD. See HOLD.

HELL. The name given to a place under the exchequer chamber, where the king's debtors were confined. Rich. Dict.

HELM. A tiller; the handle or wheel of a ship; a defensive covering for the head; a helmet; thatch or straw.

HELOWE-WALL. The end-wall covering and defending the rest of the building.

Paroch. Antiq. 573.

HELSING. A Saxon brass coin, of the value of an English half-penny.

HEMIPLEGIA. See PARALYSIS.

HEMOLDBORH, or HELMELBORCH. A title to possession. The admission of this old Norse term into the laws of the Conqueror is difficult to be accounted for; it is not found in any Anglo-Saxon law extant. Whart.

HENCHMAN. A footman; one who holds himself at the bidding of another.

HENEDPENNY. A customary payment of money instead of hens at Christmas; a composition of eggs. Cow. Dic.

HENFARE. A fine for flight on account of murder. Domesd.

HENGEN. A prison for persons condemned to hard labor. Anc. Inst. Eng.

HENGHEN (ergastulum). In Saxon Law. A prison, or house of correction. Anc. Laws & Inst. of Engl. Gloss.

HENGWYTE. In Old English Law. An acquittance from a fine for hanging a thief. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 47, § 817.

HENGWYTE, HENGWITE. See HANGWITE.

HENRY I., LAWS OF. See LEGES HENRICI PRIMI.

HEORDFESTE. The master of a family; from the Saxon hearthfaest, fixed to the house or hearth. Moz. & W.

Distinguished from a lower class of freemen —viz., folgeras (folgaris), who had no habitations of their own, but were house retainers of their lords. Wharton; Anc. Inst. Eng.

HEORDPENNY. Peter-pence. Cow. Dic.

HEORDWERCK. In Saxon Law. The service of herdsmen, done at the will of their lord.

HEPBURN ACT. An act of Congress, passed in 1906, stating that a carrier may not by contract limit the liabilities imposed on it by the Interstate Commerce Act, and making the initial carrier of an interstate shipment liable for any loss or injury thereto caused by any connecting carrier. 4 Mich. Carriers, § 3696.

HEPTARCHY. The name of the kingdom or government established by the Saxons on their establishment in Britain: so called because it was composed of seven kingdoms, namely, Kent, Essex, Sussex, Wessex, East Anglia, Mercia, and Northumberland.

HER. In an indictment for rape the use of this word is sufficient to show that the person alluded to is a female; 54 Ark. 660; but it has been held that in a written instrument the use of the pronoun "his" to designate a person therein named is not conclusive that such person is a male, and parol evidence will be admitted to show that such person is a female; 71 Cal. 38.

HERALD (from French héralut). An officer whose business it is to register genealogies, adjust ensigns armorial, regulate funerals and coronations, and, anciently, to carry messages between princes and proclaim war and peace.

In England, there are three chief heralds, called king-at-arms, of whom Garter is the principal, instituted by King Henry V., whose office is to attend the knights of the Garter at their solemnities, and to marshal the funerals of the nobility. The next is Clarenceux, instituted by Edward IV., after he became duke of Clarence, and whose proper office is to arrange the funerals of all the lesser nobility, knights, and squires on the south side of Trent. The third Norroy (north roy), who has the like office on the north side of Trent. There are, also, six inferior heralds, who were created to attend dukes or great lords in their military expeditions. The office, however, has grown much into disuse, — so much falsity and confusion having crept into their records that they are no longer received in evidence in any court of justice. This difficulty was attempted to be remedied by a standing order of the house of lords, which requires Garter to deliver to that house an exact pedigree of each peer and his family on the day of his first admission; 8 Bla. Com. 106; Encyc. Brit.

HERALDRY. (1) The science of heralds; (2) an old and obsolete abuse of buying and selling precedence in the paper of causes for hearing. 2 North's Life of Lord-Keeper Guilford, 2d ed. 86.

HERALDS' COLLEGE. In 1450, the heralds in England were collected into a college by Richard II. The earl marshal of England was chief of the college, and under him were three kings-at-arms (styled Garter, Clarenceux, Norroy), six heralds-at-arms (styled of York, Lancaster, Chester, Windsor, Richmond, and Somerset), and four pursuivants-at-arms (styled Blue Mantle, Rouge croix, Rouge dragon, and Portcullis). This organization still continues. Encyc. Brit.

HERBAGE. In English Law. An easement which consists in the right to pasture cattle on another's ground. A right to herbage does not include a right to cut grass, or dig potatoes, or pick apples; 4 N. H. 803.

HERBAGIUM AUTERIUS. The first cutting of hay or grass, as distinguished from the aftermath. Paroch. Antiq. 459.

HERBERGAGIUM. Lodgings to receive guests in the way of hospitality. Cowel. See HERBERGARE.

HERBERGARE. To harbor; to entertain.

HERBERGATUS. Spent in an inn. Cowel. See HERBERGARE.

HERBERY, or HERBURY. An inn. Cowel.

HERCE, or HEROLA. A harrow. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 77.

It signifies also a candlestick set up in churches, made in the form of a harrow, in which many candles were placed at the head of a cenotaph. Tomlin.

HERCIARE. To harrow. 4 Inst. 270.

HERCIATURE. In Old English Law. Harrowing; work with a harrow. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 82, § 2.

HERCISCUNDA. In Civil Law. To be divided. Familia herciscunda, an inheritance to be divided. Actio familie herciscundæ, an action for dividing an inheritance. Erciscunda is more commonly used in the civil law. Dig. 10, 2; Inst. 8 28, 4.

HERD-WERCK. Customary uncertain services as herdsmen, shepherds, etc. Anno 1166, Regist. Ecclesiæ Christi Cant. MS.; Cowel.

HEREAFTER. Used as an adverb, it does not necessarily refer to unlimited time; it is not a synonym for "forever." It rather indicates the direction in time merely to which the context refers, and is limited by it. 50 N. J. Eq. 640.

A term, which of itself will make a statute prospective, and save pending suits. Anderson; 48 Ark. 520.

In the future, as contrasted with "heretofore" meaning in time past. In statutes and constitutions the words "hereafter" and "heretofore" usually relate to the time when the enactment takes effect, and not to the time of its passage. 15 A. & E. Ency. 2d ed. 336; 63 Ga. 562. But the terms are sometimes held to refer to the date of passage. Id.; 60 Iowa 29. The word "hereafter" it has been held, will of itself render a statute prospective and save pending actions. Id.; 48 Ark. 520. See HERETOFORE.

HEREBANNUM. Calling out the army by proclamation. A fine paid by freemen for not attending the army. A tax for the support of the army. Du Cange.

HEBOTE. The king's edict commanding his subjects into the field. Moz. & W.; Cowel. See HEBOTE.

HEREDAD. In Spanish Law. A portion of land that is cultivated. Formerly it meant a farm, haciendo de campo, real estate.

HEREDAD YACENTE (From Lat. "hereditas jacens," q. v.). In Spanish Law. An inheritance not yet entered upon or appropriated. White, New Recop. b, 2, tit. 19, c. 2, § 8.

HEREDERO. In Spanish Law. Heir; he who, by legal or testamentary disposition, succeeds to the property of a deceased person. "Hæres censeatur cum defuncto una eademque persona." Las Partidas, 7. 9. 13.

HEREDITAGIUM. In Sicilian and Neapolitan Law. That which is held by hereditary right; the same hereditamentum (hereditament) in English Law. Spel. Gloss.

HEREDITAMENTS. Things capable of being inherited, be it corporeal or incorporeal, real, personal, or mixed, and including not only lands and everything thereon, but also heir-looms, and certain furniture which, by custom, may descend to the heir together with the land. Co. Litt. 5 b; 2 Bla. Com. 17; Chal. R. P. 49; 28 Barb. 838; 84 Iowa 407. By this term such things are denoted as may be the subject-matter of inheritance, but not the inheritance itself; it cannot, therefore, by its own intrinsic force, enlarge an estate prima facie a life estate, into a fee; 2 B. & P. 251; 8 Term 508.

HEREDITARY. That which is the subject of inheritance.

HEREDITARY RIGHT TO THE CROWN. The crown of England, by the positive constitution of the kingdom, has ever been descendible, and so continues, in a course peculiar to itself, yet subject to limitation by parliament; but, notwithstanding such limitation, the crown retains its descendible quality, and becomes hereditary in the prince to whom it is limited. 1 Bla. Com. c. 3.

HEREFARE (Sax.). A going into or with an army; a going out to war (profectio militaris); an expedition. Cowel; Spel. Gloss.

HEREGEAT. A heriot (q. v.).

HEREGELD. A tribute or a tax levied for the maintenance of an army. Moz. & W.; Spel. Gloss.

HERENACH. An arch-deacon. Cowel.

HERES. See HÆRES.

HERESCHIP. In Old Scotch Law. Theft or robbery. Pitc. Crim. Tr. pt. 2, pp. 28, 89.

HERESLITA, HERESSA, HERESSIZ. A hired soldier who departs without license. 4 Inst. 128.

HERESSA. See HERSLITA.

HERESSIZ. See HERESLITA.

HERESY. An offence which consists not in a total denial of Christianity, but of some of its essential doctrines, publicly and obstinately avowed. What in old times used to be adjudged heresy was left to the determination of the ecclesiastical judge; and the statute 2 Hen. 4, c. 15, defines heretics as teachers of erroneous opinions, contrary to the faith and blessed determinations of the holy church. Various laws have been passed before and after the reformation explaining wholly or partially what is meant by heresy. Heresy is now subject only to ecclesiastical correction, by virtue of Stat. 39 Car. 2, c. 9; 4 Bl. Com. 44; 4 Steph. Com. 203. See EXCOMMUNICATION. (J. MISCREANT.)

HERETOCH. A general, leader, or commander, also a baron of the realm. Du Fresne.

HERETOFORE. Time past in disinction from time present and time future. 40 Conn. 156.

The word in a constitution adopted in 1846, means before 1846, and cannot, to limit its meaning, be carried back to the date of a previous constitution. Abbott; 13 N. Y. 378.

Heretofore, in a recording act providing for recording of mortgages heretofore given, construed to include mortgages which ought to have been recorded under a previous law. 13 N. Y. L. 272. Cf. HEREAFTER.

HERETUM. In Old Records. A court or yard for drawing up guards or military retinue. Cowel.; Jac. L. Dict.

HEREZELD. In Scotch Law. A gift or present made or left by a tenant to his lord as a token of reverence. Skene.

HERGE. In Saxon Law. Offenders who joined in a body of more than thirty-five to commit depredation.

HERIGALDS. In Old English Law. A sort of garment. Cowel.

HERIOT. In English Law. A customary tribute of goods and chattels, payable to the lord of the fee on the decease of the owner of the land. If a man fell before his lord in battle, no heriot was demanded; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 298.

Heriot service is such as is due upon a special reservation in the grant or lease of lands, and therefore amounts to little more than a mere rent. Heriot custom arises upon no special reservation whatsoever, but depends merely upon immemorial usage and custom. See 2 Bla. Com. 97, 422; Comyns, Dig. Copyhold (K 18); Bacon, Abr.; 3 Saund.; 1 Vern. 441.

HERISCHILD. A species of English military service.

HERISCHULDE. A fine for disobedience to proclamation of warfare. Skene.

HERISCINDIUM. A division of household goods. Blount.

HERISLET. Laying down of arms. Blount. Desertion from the army. Spel. Gloss.

HERISTALL. A castle; the station of an army; the place where a camp is pitched. Spel. Gloss.

HERITABLE. See INHERITANCE.

HERITABLE BOND. In Scotch Law. See BOND.

HERITABLE JURISDICTION. In Scotch Law. Grants of criminal jurisdiction made to great families for the better execution of justice. Abolished by 20 Geo. II. c. 43. Bell, Dict.

HERITABLE OBLIGATION. One whose rights and duties descend to the heir, so far as the heir accepts the succession. Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 183. One which permits the heirs of one party to the obligation to compel, if necessary, the heirs of the other party to carry out the latter's agreement. English. See OBLIGATION.

HERITABLE RIGHTS. In Scotch Law. Rights which go to the heir; generally, all rights in or connected with lands. Bell, Dict. Heritable.

HERITABLE SECURITY. Security constituted by heritable property. Encyc. Dict.

HERITAGE. In Civil Law. Every species of immovable which can be the subject of property: such as lands, houses, orchards, woods, marshes, ponds, etc., in whatever mode they may have been acquired, either by descent or purchase. 3 Toullier 472. See Co. Litt. s. 781.

HERITOR. In Scotch Law. A proprietor of land. 1 Kames, Eq. Prin.

HERMANDAD (called also, Santa Hermandad). In Spanish Law. A fraternity formed among different towns and villages to prevent the commission of crimes, and to prevent the abuses and vexations to which they were subjected by men in power.

To carry into effect the object of this association, each village and town elected two alcaldes,—one by the nobility and the other by the community at large. Those had under their order inferior officers, formed into companies, called cuadrilleros. Their duty was to arrest delinquents and bring them before the alcaldes, when they were tried substantially in the ordinary form. This tribunal, established during the anarchy prevailing in feudal times, continued to maintain its organization in Spain for centuries; and various laws determining its jurisdiction and mode of proceeding were enacted by Ferdinand and Isabella and subsequent monarchs. Nov. Recop. tit. 33, b. 12 § 7. The abuses introduced in the exercise of the functions of the tribunals caused their abolition, and the señoria hermandades of Ciudad Rodrigo, Talavera, and Toledo, the last remnants of these anomalous jurisdictions, were abolished by the law of the 7th May, 1835.

HERMAPHRODITES. Persons who have in the sexual organs the appearance of both sexes. They are adjudged to belong to that sex which prevails in them; Co., Litt. 2; 7; Domat, Lois Civ. liv. 1, t. 2, s. 1, n. 9.

The sexual characteristics in the human species are widely separated, and the two sexes are very rarely united in the same individual; there are a few cases on record, however, in which both ovaries and testicles were present. In one there were two ovaries, a rudimentary uterus, and a single testicle containing spermatozoa. Am. Text Book of Gynecology. Cases of malformation are occasionally found, in which it is very difficult to decide to which sex the person belongs. 2 Med. Exam. 314; 1 Briand, Med. Leg. c. 2, art. 2, § 2, n. 2; Guy Med. Jur. 42, 47; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 11th ed. 164 et seq.; Wharton & S. Med. Jur. § 406 et seq.

HERMENEUTICS (Greek, ἐρμηνεία, to interpret). The art and science, or body of rules, of truthful interpretation. It has been used chiefly by theologians; but Zacharias, in "An Essay on General Legal Hermeneutics" (Versuch einer allg. Hermeneutik des Rechts), and Dr. Lieber, in his work on Legal and Political Hermeneutics, also makes use of it. See INTERPRETATION; CONSTRUCTION.

HERMER. A great lord. Jacob.

HERMOGENIAN CODE. See CODE.

HERNESCUS. A heron. Cowel.

HERNESIUM, or HERNASIUM. Household goods; implements of trade or husbandry; the rigging or tackle of a ship. Cowel.

HEROUDES. Heralds. Du Cange.

HERPEX. A harrow. Spel. Gloss.

HERPICATIO. In Old English Law. A day's work with a harrow. Spel. Gloss.

HERRING SILVER. This was a composition in money for the custom of supplying herrings for the provision of a religious house. Whart.

HERSHIP. The crime, in Scotland, of carrying off cattle by force; it is described as "the masterful drying off of cattle from a proprietor's grounds." Bell; Moz. & W.

HERUS. A master. Servus facit ut herus del. the servant does (the work), in order that the master may give (him the wages agreed on). Herus dat ut servus faciat. the master gives (or agrees to give, the wages), in consideration of, or with a view to, the servant's doing (the work). 2 Bla. Com. 445.

HESIA. An easement. Du Cange.

HEST CORN. Corn or grain given or devoted to religious persons or purposes. Cowel.; 2 Moh. Ang. 387 b.

HESTA or HESTHA. A small loaf of bread.

HIDAGE. In Old English Law. A tax levied, in emergencies, on every hide of land; the exemption from such tax. Bract.

Ub. 2, c. 56. It was payable sometimes in money, sometimes in ships or military equipments; e. g. in the year 994, when the Danes landed in England, every three hundred hides furnished a ship to king Ethelred, and every eight hides one pack and one saddle. Jacob, Law Dict.

HIDALGO (spelled, also, Hijodalgo). In Spanish Law. He who, by blood and lineage, belongs to a distinguished family, or is noble by descent. Las Partidas 2. 12. 8.

HIDE (from Sax. hyden, to cover; so, Lat. tectum, from tegere). In Old English Law. A building with a roof; a house.

As much land as might be ploughed with one plough. The amount was probably determined by usage of the locality; some make it sixty, others eighty, others ninety-six, others one hundred or one hundred and twenty, acres. Co. Litt. 5; 1 Plowd. 167; Sheppe Touchst. 93; Du Cange.

A hide was anciently employed as a unit of taxation. 1 Poll. & Maitl. 347, such tax being called hidegeld.

As much land as was necessary to support a hide, or mansion-house. Co. Litt. 69 a; Spelman, Gloss; Du Cange, Hida; 1 Intro. to Domesday 145. At present the quantity is one hundred acres. Anc. Laws & Inst. of Engl. Gloss. See FUR. MANGIO.

HIDE AND GAIN. In English Law. A term anciently applied to arable land. Co. Litt. 85 b.

HIDE LANDS. In Old English Law. Lands appertaining to a hide, or mansion. See HIDE.

HIDEL. In Old English Law. A place of protection; a sanctuary. St. 1 Hen. VII. cc. 5, 6; Cowel.

HIDGILD, or HIDEGILD. A sum of money paid by a villein or servant to save himself from whipping. Fleta, l. 1, c. 47, § 20.

HIERARCHY. Originally, government by a body of priests. Stubbs, Const. Hist. § 376. Now, the body of officers in any church or ecclesiastical institution, considered as forming an ascending series of ranks or degrees of power and authority, with the correlative subjection, each to the one next above.

HIGH. "High" and low are relative terms. A thing is said to be too high or too low when compared to other things. A structure is said to be high or low according to the uses to which it is to be put. 65 S. W. 454.

HIGH-BALL SIGNAL. As Used in Railroad Parlance. The "high-ball" signal means that the train can proceed without stopping. 156 Ky. 414, 161, S. W. 246.

HIGH BAILIFF. An officer attached to an English county court. His duties are to attend the court when sitting; to serve summonses; and to execute orders, warrants, writs, etc. Stats. 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, § 23; Poll. C. C. Pr. 16. He also has similar duties under the bankruptcy jurisdiction of the county courts. Bankruptcy Rules 1870, 68.

HIGH COMMISSION COURT. In English Law. An ecclesiastical court of very extensive jurisdiction, for the vindication of the peace and dignity of the church, by reforming, ordering, and correcting the ecclesiastical state and persons, and all manner of errors, heresies, schisms, abuses, offences, contempts, and enormities.

It was erected by stat. 1 Eliz. c. 1, and abolished by 16 Car. II. c. 11.

HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY. See ADMIRALTY.

HIGH COURT OF CHANCERY. See CHANCERY; COURT OF CHANCERY.

HIGH COURT OF DELEGATES. In English Law. See COURT OF DELEGATES.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE. See JUDICATURE ACTS.

That branch of the Supreme Court of Judicature which exercises (i) the original jurisdiction formerly exercised by the Court of Chancery, the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas and Exchequer, the Courts of Probate, Divorce and Admiralty, the London Court of Bankruptcy, the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster, the Court of Pleas at Durham, and the Courts of the judges or commissioners of assize, and (ii) the appellate jurisdiction of such of those courts as heard appeals from inferior courts. It is a Superior Court of Record, and was originally composed of the Lord Chancellor (who is the president but never—except occasionally, as in the case of Lord Birkenhead, for the purpose of dealing with accumulation of work—sits as a judge in the High Court) the Lord Chief Justice of England, the Master of the Rolls, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, the three Vice-Chancellors of the former Court of Chancery, such of the puisne judges of the old common law courts as had not been transferred to the Court of Appeal, the judge of the former Probate and Divorce Court, the judge of the former Admiralty Court; and subsequently has consisted of the Lord Chancellor and the judges of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice who were appointed after the Judicature Act came into operation. Byrne. See COURTS OF ENGLAND.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY. See COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

HIGH COURT OF PARLIAMENT. In English Law. The English Parliament, as composed of the house of peers and house of commons.

The house of lords sitting in its judicial capacity.

This term is applied to parliament by most of the law writers. Thus, parliament is said by Blackstone to be the supreme court of the kingdom, not only for the making but also for the execution of the laws; 4 Bla. Com. 259. Lord Coke and Lord Hale also apply the term "court" to the whole parliament; and see Finch, Law 233; Fleta, lib. 2, c. 9. But, from the fact that in general judicial proceedings the house of commons takes no part, but only in the trial of impeachments, and then only as prosecutor, and from the fact that the house of commons disclaimed possession of judicial powers at the deposition of Richard II., and the twelve judges made a similar decision in Hen. VII., the propriety of this use of the term has been questioned: Bla. Com. Warren, Abr. 215. The propriety of its application would seem to be derived from the claim of parliament to be considered as the successor of the curia regis, which was a judicial as well as a legislative body, and, if the succession is established, would be applicable although the judicial power may have been granted to the various courts. See COURTS; HOUSE OF LORDS; IMPEACHMENT.

HIGH CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS. The constitution of the U. S. provides that the president, vice-president, and all civil officers of the U. S. shall be removed from office on impeachment for treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors. This does not apply to senators and members of congress, but does to U. S. circuit and district judges; Blount's Trial 102; Peck's Trial; 10 Law Trials; Chase's Trial; 11 id. See 6 Conn. 417. See IMPEACHMENT.

HIGH SEAS. The uninclosed waters of the ocean, and also those waters on the seacoast which are without the boundaries of low-water mark. 1 Gall. 624; 5 Mas. C. C. 290; 1 Bla. Com. 110; Bened. Adm.; 2 Hagg. Adm. 398.

The act of congress of April 30, 1790, s. 8, enacts that if any person shall commit upon the high seas, or in any river, haven, basin, or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, murder, etc., which if committed within the body of a county would, by the laws of the United States, be punishable with death, every such offender, being thereof convicted, shall suffer death; and the trial of crimes committed on the high seas, or in any place out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, shall be in the district where the offender is apprehended, or into which he may first be brought. See 4 Gall. 426; 8 Wash. C. C. 515; 1 Mas. 147; 1 Dall. 624; 4 Blatchf. 420.

It was held in 82 Fed. Rep. 406 that the Great Lakes are not high seas, and that these words have been employed from time immemorial to designate the ocean below low-water mark, and have rarely if ever been applied to interior or land-locked waters of any kind; but the supreme court of the United States has held otherwise, saying that this term is also applicable to the open, unenclosed waters of the Great Lakes; 150 U. S. 249. See FAUCES TERRE; GREAT LAKES.

HIGH TREASON. In English Law. Treason against the king, in contradistinction from petit treason, which is the treason of a servant towards his master, a wife towards her husband, a secular or religious man towards his prelate. See PETIT TREASON; TREASON.

HIGH-WATER MARK. That part of the shore of the sea to which the waves ordinarily reach when the tide is at its highest. 6 Mass. 435; 1 Pick. 180; 1 Halst. 1; 1 Russ. Cr. 107; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 808.

Wherever the presence of the water is so common as to mark on the soil a character, in respect to vegetation, distinct from that of the banks; it does not include low lands which, though subject to periodical overflow, are valuable for agricultural purposes. 58 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 295. See SEA-SHORE; TIDE.

HIGHWAY. A passage, road, or street which every citizen has a right to use. 8 Kent 432; 3 Yeates 421.

The term highway is the generic name for all kinds of public ways, whether they be carriage-ways, bridle-ways, foot-ways, bridges, turnpike roads, railroads, canals, ferries, or navigable rivers; 6 Mod. 255; Ang. Highw. c. 1; 8 Kent 432. A cul de sac is also a highway; 11 East 375, note; 18 Q. B. 870; 8 Allen 242; 24 N. Y. 559 (overruling 23 Barb. 103); 87 Ill. 189; s. c. 29 Am. Rep. 49; 60 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 1048; but an alley would not be; 32 Mich. 111; 90 Mich. 104.

Highways are created either by legislative authority, by dedication, or by necessity.

First, by legislative authority. In England, the laying out of highways is regulated by act of parliament; in this country, by general statutes, differing in different states. In England, the uniform practice is to provide a compensation to the owner of the land taken for highways. In the act authorizing the taking, in the United States, such a provision must be made, or the act will be void under the clause in the federal and in the several state constitutions that "private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation." The amount of such compensation may be determined either by a jury or by commissioners, as shall be prescribed by law; 1 Bla. Com. 139; Ang. Highw. c. 2; Thomp. Highw. 233; 8 Price 535; 18 Pick. 511; 25 Wend. 462; 21 N. H. 858; Baldw. 222; 8 Watts 292; 16 N. Y. 97; 14 Wis. 609. In case the statute makes no provision for indemnity for land to be taken, an injunction may be obtained to prevent the taking; 8 Paige, Ch. 45; 2 Johns. Ch. 163; 9 Ind. 483; 34 Me. 247; see 182 Ind. 4; or an action at law may be maintained after the damage has been committed; 5 Cow. 165; 16 Conn. 96; and cases cited above.

See 32 Amer. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 88; EMINENT DOMAIN.

Second, by dedication, which title see.
Third, by necessity. If a highway be impassable, from being out of repair or otherwise, the public have a right to pass in another line, and, for this purpose, to go on the adjoining ground, even when sown with grain and enclosed with a fence; but they must do no unnecessary damage; Cro. Car. 866; 7 Cush. 406; 2 Show. 28; 7 Barb. 809. This right, however, is only temporary and gives the public no permanent easement; 44 N. H. 628.

A highway is simply an easement or servitude, carrying with it, as its incidents, the right to use the soil for the purposes of repair and improvement; and, in cities, for the more general purposes of sewerage, the distribution of light and water, and the furtherance of public morality, health, trade, and convenience. The owner of the land over which it passes retains the fee and all rights of property not incompatible with the public enjoyment, such as the right to the herbage, the trees and fruit growing thereon, or minerals below, and may work a mine, sink a drain or cellar, or carry water in pipes beneath it, or sell the soil if it be done without injury to the highway; 4 Viner, Abr. 502; Com. Dig. Chemin (A 2); Ang. Highw. c. 7; 1 N. H. 16; 1 Sumn. 21; 8 Rawle 495; 10 Pet. 25; 6 Mass. 454; 15 Johns. 447; 31 N. Y. 151; 34 Vt. 336; 28 Conn. 165; 83 Me. 508; 88 Va. 985; 45 La. Ann. 426; 37 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 710; [1893] 1 Q. B. 142; 40 Minn. 397; 164 Mass. 860; but see 125 N. Y. 164; 25 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 894. The title to a spring within the right of way of a turnpike company is in the owner, who may use the water as he pleases, and the turnpike company has no easement in such spring; 172 Pa. 400. The owner may maintain ejectment for encroachments on the highway or an assize if disseized of it; 8 Kent 432; Adams, Eject. 19; 9 S. & R. 26; 1 Conn. 135; 2 Sm. Lead. Cas. 141; 35 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 581; or trespass against one who builds on it; 2 Johns. 357; or who digs up and removes the soil; 12 Wend. 98; [1898] 1 Q. B. 142; or cuts down trees growing thereon; 1 N. H. 16; or damages them in putting up telephone wires; 2 Can. S. C. R. 276; 37 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 710; or who stops upon it for the purpose of using abusive or insulting language; 11 Barb. 390. A landowner has the right to the lateral support of the soil in the adjoining street, and a city is liable for any damage occasioned by removing this lateral support in grading the street; 40 Minn. 869. A steam railroad used for the purposes of transporting persons, and property upon a highway is an additional servitude for which an abutting owner is entitled to compensation; 2 E. D. Sm. 97; 8 Hill 567; 4 Zab. 592; 16 Miss. 649; 38 Mich. 62; 67 Ill. 444; 4 Cush. 63; and so with any railroad which carries both passengers and freight, irrespective of the method of propulsion; 28 Minn. 373. See 41 Cal. 256; 52 Ind. 428; 48 id. 178; 66 Miss. 379; 46 La. 366; 47 Mich. 393. As to a railway for passengers only the question depends upon the character and extent of the use, and not upon the motive power; 35 Minn. 112; 79 Me. 363; 41 Fed. Rep. 556; 87 Mich. 361; 27 N. Y. 198; 21 Ill. 516; but when such a road seriously interferes with the rights of an abutting owner, it is held an additional servitude. This rule applies to an elevated railroad, which is considered an obstruction to the easement of air and light and the easement of access; 104 N. Y. 268; 90 id. 122; 91 id. 148; 106 N. Y. 147; 43 Ohio St. 190; and to any railroad which causes changes of grade in the street; 59 Cal. 200; 7 Barb. 506; 17 Neb. 548; 83 Ill. 535; 6 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 325; 22 Minn. 537; 121 Mass. 241; 38 Ind. 435; but only in states which so provide by their constitutions or by statutes; 1 Pick. 418; 6 Ind. 287; 79 id. 491; 26 Ark. 276. Where the horse is the motive power of a passenger railway on a street or highway, and the grade is unchanged, no new servitude is imposed; 78 Ind. 261; an electric railway is held to come within this rule; 5 Dist. Rep. Pa. 18; 8 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 335; 167 Pa. 62; 30 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 351; 93 Tenn. 402; 32 Conn. 579; 62 Md. 242; 27 Wis. 184; 85 Mich. 634; 139 Pa. 419; and a cable road; 32 Fed. Rep. 270; 121 N. Y. 530, reversing 58 Hun 527; contra, 1 N. Y. Supp. 197; the erection of poles and stringing of wires by a telephone company is not an additional servitude; 63 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 111 (contra, 49 Fed. Rep. 115); nor by an electric light company; 54 Hun 460. But the occupation of a country road by an electric light company constitutes an additional servitude; 39 N. Y. Supp. 522; or by a telegraph company; 148 N. Y. 133; or by an electric railway company; 167 Pa. 68; or a gas company; 62 N. Y. 866. See POLICE; WIRES. As to other uses of city streets and compensation to abutters for damages resulting therefrom, see EMINENT DOMAIN.

The owners on the opposite sides prima facie own respectively to the centre line of the street; 33 Pa. 124; 86 Hun 424; 17 N. J. Eq. 73. And a grant of land "by," or "on," or "along" a highway carries, by presumption, the fee to the centre line, if the grantor own so far, though this presumption may be rebutted by words showing an intention to exclude the highway, such as, "by the side of," "by the margin of," or other equivalent expressions; Ang. Highw. § 815; 11 Me. 463; 4 Day 228; 13 N. H. 881; 8 Metc. 266; 2 R. I. 508; 60 N. Y. 609; 5 Whart. 18. But, while in most of the states this is the rule, there are exceptions as, in Kansas and Nebraska, where the fee of highways is vested in the county; 25 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 894; 46 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 627; and in New York city where by act of 1813 the fee is vested in the municipality in trust for the public; 27 N. Y. 188; 45 id. 732; 68 id. 593; 125 id. 164; and in Illinois, in the municipality in trust for the public; 75 Ill. 301; 11 id. 554; 67 id. 439; and it is held that even where the abutting owner does not own the fee in the highway, he has special easements therein not enjoyed by the public, as those of light, air, and access; 38 Hun 427; 34 id. 121; 9 id. 246; 4 Paige 510; 103 Ill. 64; 21 Fed. Rep. 309; 7 Wall. 272; 7 Col. 113; 39 Ohio St. 393; 41 Hun 117; 44 N. J. Eq. 120; 103 Ind. 29. See FRONTAGE. Where the fee of a highway is in the adjoining owner, it reverts to him upon a discontinuance, vacation, or abandonment; 8 Bosw. 372; 4 Mass. 439; 110 Pa. 370; 38 Barb. 136; 10 Pet. 26; 15 Johns. 447; 28 Kan. 470. But in Illinois it is held that such land reverts to the original owner and not to the abutter who acquires title to it after the establishment of the way; 75 Ill. 301.

In England, the inhabitants of the several parishes are prima facie bound to repair all highways lying within them, unless by prescription or otherwise they can throw the burden upon particular persons; Shelf. Highw. 44; 5 Burr. 1700; 12 Mod. 409. In this country, the English parochial system being unknown, this feature of the common law does not prevail. The liability to repair is here determined by statute, and, in most of the states, devolves upon the towns, or other local municipalities; 8 Barb. 645; 13 Pick. 843; 1 Humphr. 217; 125 Pa. 42; 74 Iowa 644. The liability being thus created, its measure is likewise to be ascertained by statute, the criterion being, generally, safety and convenience for travel, having reference to the natural characteristics of the road and the public needs; Ang. Highw. § 259; 2 W. & M. 337; 19 Vt. 470; 4 Cush. 307, 365; 14 Me. 198. For neglect to repair, the parish in England, and in this country the town or body chargeable, is indictable as for a nuisance; 2 Wms. Saund. 158, n. 4; 28 N. H. 195; Ang. Highw. § 275; and, in many states, is made liable, by statute, to an action on the case for damages in favor of any person who may have suffered special injury by reason of such neglect; 17 How. 161; 3 Cush. 174; 22 Pa. 384; 81 Me. 299; Ang. Highw. § 286; 83 Va. 355; 71 Tex. 280. But to make a county liable, the defect in the highway must have been the sole cause of the injury; 81 W. Va. 477. Contributory negligence defeats recovery for injuries caused by a defective highway; 29 S. C. 140; 97 Mo. 151; 81 W. Va. 477; 77 Ga. 288. The duty of repair may, in this country, rest on an individual to the exclusion of the town; 23 Wend. 446; or on a corporation who, in pursuance of their charter, build a road, and levy tolls for the expense of maintaining it; 7 Conn. 86. The taking of toll is prima facie evidence of the duty; 1 Hawks 451.

In Pennsylvania any one or more taxpayers in a township or road district may, upon proper proceedings, and giving a bond, acquire a right to make, repair, etc., all the roads, and thereupon be free from road taxes for a year; act of June 12, 1890.

Any act or obstruction which incommodates or impedes the lawful use of a highway by the public, except such as arises by necessity from unloading wagons, putting up buildings, etc., is a common-law nuisance; 4 Steph. Com. 294; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 76; Ang. Highw. § 345; 1 Denio 524; 8 Ohio St. 358; 29 Am. L. Reg. 342; 145 Pa. 453; 23 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 1115; 43 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 196; 46 Ill. App. 67. A fruit stand on a city street is an obstruction; 0 Gill 425; 73 Ind. 185. The drawing large crowds before a shop window; 1 S. & R. 210; the stopping teams or vehicles for such a time or at such a place as unreasonably to interfere with public travel; 3 Campb. 226; 54 Md. 148; 39 Ohio St. 333; 85 N. C. 522; (but a reasonable necessity will justify a temporary obstruction; 72 Wis. 199); collecting a noisy and disorderly crowd by music or speaking; 19 Pa. 412; 64 N. H. 48; conducting an execution sale on the street; 13 S. & R. 403; are nuisances and may be abated by any one whose passage is thereby obstructed; 3 Steph. Com. 5; 5 Co. 101; 10 Mass. 70; 18 Wis. 265; or the person causing or maintaining the same may be indicted; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 76; Thomp. Highw. 805; 2 Saund. 158, note; 7 Hill, N. Y. 575; 13 Metc. Mass. 115; 2 R. I. 493; 29 Am. L. Reg. 342; or may be sued for damages in an action on the case by any one specially injured thereby; Co. Litt. 56 a; 1 Birn. 463; 7 Cow. 609; 19 Pick. 147; 6 Oreg. 378; s. c. 25 Am. R. p. 531, and note; 2 Ill. 229; 53 Barb. 629; 5 Blackf. 35; and a court of equity will take jurisdiction of a civil action to abate and enjoin the maintenance of an obstruction to a highway which is a public nuisance; 47 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 255. At common law the public have no right to pasture cattle on the highways; 2 H. Bla. 527; 16 Mass. 33; 5 Wis. 27.

Disobedience of a city ordinance forbidding the leaving of horses unhitched on the street of a city is negligence, for which the employer of the driver must answer in damages to a person sustaining injuries therefrom; 8 Houst. 562.

The legislature has power to authorize certain obstructions which would otherwise be a public nuisance, such as the laying of railroad tracks or bridging of streams or constructing sewers, etc., or laying gas and water pipes; 14 Gray 93; 12 Ia. 246; 65 Mo. 325; 16 N. Y. 97; 31 Wis. 816; 57 Me. 481; 34 Mich. 462; 68 N. Y. 71.

It is the duty of travellers upon highways, for the purpose of avoiding collision and accident, to observe due care in accommodating themselves to each other. To observe this purpose, it is the rule in England, that, in meeting, each party shall bear or keep to the left; and in this country, to the right; 2 Steph. N. P. 984; Story, Bailm. § 599; Thomp. Highw. 864; 2 Dowl. & R. 255; 158 Mass. 46. This rule, however, may and ought to be varied, where its observance would defeat its purpose; 8 C. & P. 103; 12 Metc. 415; 23 Pa. 196. The rule does not apply to equestrians and foot-passengers; 24 Wend. 465; 2 D. Chipm. 128; 8 C. & P. 373, 691; 2 Misc. Rep. 239; but it has been held to apply to bicyclists; 82 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 652. It is another rule that travellers shall drive only at a moderate rate of speed, furious driving on a thronged thoroughfare being an indictable offence at common law; 1 Pet. 590; 13 id. 181; 8 C. & P. 694. In case of injury by reason of the non-observance of these rules or of other negligence, as by the use of unsuitable carriages or harness, or horses imperfectly trained, the injured party is entitled to recover his damages in an action on the case against the culpable party, unless the injury be in part attributable to his own neglect; Ang. Highw. § 345; 1 Pick. 345; 11 East 60; 63 Conn. 150; 5 W. & S. 544; 5 C. & P. 879; 19 Wend. 399. The legislature has complete power to regulate the highways in a state, and may prescribe what vehicles may be used on them with a view to the safety of the passengers over them and the preservation of the roads; 97 N. C. 477; it may regulate the improvement for the public good of highways, whether on land or by water, subject to the right of congress to interpose when such highways are the means of interstate and foreign commerce; 119 U. S. 543. See Thompson; Pope, Highw.; Elliott, Roads & Streets; Booth, Street Ry.; 24 Alb. L. J. 464; 33 Amer. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 469.

HIGHWAYMAN. A robber on the highway.

HIGHWAYS, ROYAL. In ancient times there were four royal highways in Yorkshire, England, three by land and one by water where the king claimed all forfeitures, even when they ran through the land of the archbishop or of the earl. Maitl. Domesday Book and Beyond 87; D. B. i. 238 h. Alvestone.

HIGLER. In English Law. A person who carries from door to door, and sells by retail, small articles of provisions, and the like.

HIGUELA. In Spanish Law. The written acknowledgment given by each of the heirs of a deceased person, showing the effects he has received from the succession.

HIS TESTIBUS. Words formerly used in deeds, signifying these being witnesses. They have been disused since Henry VIII. Co. Litt.; Cowel.

Words anciently added in deeds, after 'In cujus rei testimonium.' These witnesses were first called, then the deed read, and their names entered down. This clause of his testibus disused since the reign of King Henry VIII. Tomlin; Co. Lit. 6.

HJRA. Flight; departure. Given by some authorities for Hegira (g. v.). Moz. & W.

HILARY TERM. In English Law. A term of court, beginning on the 11th and ending on the 31st of January in each year. Superseded (1875) by Hilary Sittings, which begin January 11th and end on the Wednesday before Easter. See TERM.

HINDAS. See HINDENI HOMINES.

HINDENI HOMINES. A society of men in the Saxon times. Toml.

In the time of the Saxons, all men were ranked into three classes, and value as to satisfaction for injuries, etc. according to the class in which they were. The highest class were valued at twelve hundred shillings, and were called twelf hindmen; the middle class valued at six hundred shillings, and called sezhindmen; and the lowest at ten pounds, or two hundred shillings, called tyghhindmen; their wives were termed hindas. Jacobs; Brompt. Leg. Alfred, cap. 12, 30, 31.

HINDER. To interpose obstacles or impediments. 5 Bush. (Ky.) 582. See Ob STRUCT and HINDER.

HINDER AND DELAY. A phrase used to signify an act amounting to an attempt to defraud rather than a successful fraud. To put some obstacle in the path of, or interpose some time unjustifiably, before a creditor can realize what is owed out of his debtor's property. 42 N. Y. Super. Ct. 68; 74 N. Y. 597. The question of fraudulent intent is one of fact; 9 Col. 8. The word "hinder" is not synonymous with "delay"; 68 Mo. 435.

HINDMEN. See HINDENI HOMINES.

HINDU LAW. The system of native law prevailing among the Gentooes, and administered by the government of British India.

In all the arrangements for the administration of justice in India, made by the British government and the East India Company, the principle of reserving to the native inhabitants the continuance of their own laws and usages within certain limits has been uniformly recognized. The laws of the Hindus and Mohammedans have thus been brought into notice in England, and are occasionally referred to by writers on English and American law. The native works upon these subjects are very numerous. The chief English republications of the Hindu law are, Colebrooke's Digest of Hindu Law, London 1801; Sir Wm. Jones's Institutes of Hindu Law.

London, 1777. For a fuller account of the Hindu Law, and of the original Digests and Commentaries, see Morley's Law of India. London, 1858, and Macnaghten's Principles of Hindu and Mohammedan Law. London, 1860. The principal English republications of the Mohammedan Law are Hamilton's Rehaya, London, 1791; Baillie's Digest, Calcutta, 1800; Précis de Jurisprudence musulmane selon le Ritè malikite, Paris, 1848; and the treatises on Succession and Inheritance translated by Sir William Jones. See, also, Norton's Cases on Hindu Law of Inheritance; Rattigan, Hindu Law. An approved outline of both systems is Macnaghten's Principles of Hindu and Mohammedan Law, also contained in the "Principles and Precedents" of the same law previously published by the same author.

HINE or HIND. A servant, or one of the family, but more properly a servant at husbandry; and he that oversees the rest is called the master hine. Cowell; Moz. & W.

HINE-FARE. The loss or departure of a servant from his master. Domesd.

HINEGELD. A ransom for an offence committed by a servant. Cowell. See HINDGILD.

HIPOTECA. In Spanish Law. A mortgage of real property. Johnson, Civ. Law of Spain, 156 [149]; White, New Recop. b. 2, tit. 7.

HIRE. A bailment in which compensation is to be given for the use of a thing, or for labor and services about it. 2 Kent 456; Story, Bailm. § 359. The divisions of this species of contract are denoted by Latin names.

Locatio operis faciendi is the hire of labor and work to be done or care and attention to be bestowed on the goods let by the hirer, for a compensation.

Locatio operis mercium vehendarum is the hire of the carriage of goods from one place to another, for a compensation. Jones, Bailm. 85, 86, 90, 103, 118; 2 Kent 456.

Locatio rei or locatio conductio rei is the bailment of a thing to be used by the hirer for a compensation to be paid by him.

This contract is voluntary, and founded in consent; it involves mutual and reciprocal obligations; and it is for mutual benefit. In some respects it bears a strong resemblance to the contract of sale; the principal difference between them being that in cases of sale the owner parts with the whole proprietary interest in the thing, and in cases of hire the owner parts with possession only for a temporary purpose. In a sale, the thing itself is the object of the contract; in hiring, the use of the thing is its object; Vinnius, lib. 3, tit. 25, in pr.; Pothier, Louage, nn. 2-4; Jones, Bailm. 86; Story, Bailm. § 371. See Edwards, Jones, Story, Schouler, Bailments; Parsons, Story, Contracts; 2 Kent 456; BAILMENT. See USING FOR HIRE.

HIREMAN. A subject. Du Cange. From the Sax. to obey. Or it may be one who serves the king's hall, to guard him; from hire, aula; and man, homo. Jacobs; Du Fresno; Cowell.

HIRER. He who hires. See 18 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 578; BAILMENT.

HIRST or HURST. In Old English Law. A wood. Domesd; Co. Litt. 4 b.

HIS. A demise by A to B for the term of "his" natural life may enure as a demise either for the life of A or that of B according to circumstances; 2 Nev. and M. 838.

In a policy of insurance the word "his" instead of "their" as descriptive of the property of the assured, does not render the policy void, if the assured has an insurable interest, although the interest may be qualified or defeasible or even an equitable interest; 10 Pick. 40; 29 Conn. 10; 16 Wend. 385; 123 Mass. 94; but where the policy expressly requires that a statement be made whether the insured owns the sole interest in the premises, the use of the word "his" instead of "their" amounts to a misrepresentation, if the insured is not the sole owner; 68 Mo. 127. REPRESENTATION.

The ninth clause of the thirty-ninth section of the bankruptcy act does not apply to an accommodation indorser of negotiable paper whose indorsement is in no way connected with the business of the indorser, as such paper is not "his" commercial paper within the meaning of said clause; 2 Dill. 538.

HIS CHILDREN FOREVER. "His children forever" is equivalent to the words "heirs or heirs of his body." (q. v.) 98 Ky. 291, 33 S. W. 75.

HIS EXCELLENCY. A title given by the constitution of Massachusetts to the governor of that commonwealth. Mass. Const. part 2, c. 2, s. 1, art. 1. This title is customarily given to the governors of the other states, whether or not it be the official designation in their constitutions and laws.

HIS HONOR. A title given by the constitution of Massachusetts to the lieutenant governor of that commonwealth. Mass. Const. part 2, c. 2, s. 2, art. 1. It is also customarily given to some inferior magistrates, as the mayor of a city.

HISSA. A lot or portion; a share of revenue or rent. Wilson's Gloss. Ind.

HIWISC. A hide of land.

HLAFORDSWICE (Sax. hlaford, lord, literally bread-giver, and vice). In Old English Law. Betraying one's lord; treason. Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law 59, 301.

HLASOCNA. The benefit of the law. Du Cange; Toml.

HLOTH (Sax.). An unlawful company. Moz. and W.

HLOTHBOTE (Sax. hloth, company, and bote, compensation). In Old English Law. Fine for presence at an illegal assembly. Du Cange, Hlothbota.

HOCH. See HOGA.

HOCK-DAY. A festival formerly observed in England on the second Tuesday after Easter, in commemoration of the destruction of the Danes in the time of Ethelred. Worcester. Also called HOCKE-DAY or HOCK-TIDE. Webster. See HOCK-TUESDAY MONEY.

HOCKTIDE. See HOCK-DAY.

HOCK-TUESDAY. See HOCK-DAY.

HOCK-TUESDAY MONEY. A duty given to the landlord, that his tenants and bondmen might solemnize the day on which the English mastered the Danes, being the second Tuesday after Easter week. Cowell.

HODGE-PODGE ACT. A name given to a legislative act which embraces many subjects. Such acts, besides being evident proofs of the ignorance of the makers of them, or of their want of good faith, are calculated to create a confusion which is highly prejudicial to the interests of justice. Instances of this wretched legislation are everywhere to be found. See Barrington, Stat. 449. In Pennsylvania, and in other states, bills, except general appropriation bills, can contain but one subject, which must be expressed in the title. Const. of Penn. art. 3, sec. 3.

HOE. An implement for loosening the earth after digging the same. It is per se a deadly weapon; 118 Ill. 38.

HOG. This word may include a sow; 2 S. C. 21; a pig; 60 Ala. 60; 58 id. 855; and may refer to the dead as well as the living animal; 7 Ind. 195; 55 Ala. 140; 16 Fla. 564; and it is synonymous with swine; 10 Tex. App. 177.

HOGA. In Old English Law. A hill or mountain. Domesday.

HOGGUS OR HOGICTUS. A hog or swine. Cowell.

HOGHENHYNE (from Sax. hogh, house, and hine, servant). A domestic servant. Among the Saxons, a stranger guest was, the first night of his stay, called uncuth, or unknown; the second, gust, guest; the third, hoghenhyne; and the entertainer was responsible for his acts as for those of his own servant. Bract. 124 b; Du Cange, Agenhine; Spelman, Gloss. Homehine.

HOGSHEAD. A liquid measure, containing half a pipe; the fourth part of a tun, or sixty-three gallons.

HOKE-DAY. Same as HOCK-DAY (q. v.). Webster.

HOLD. A technical word in a deed introducing with "to have" the clause which expresses the tenure by which the grantee is to have the land. The clause which commences with these words is called the tenendum. See TENENDUM; HABENDUM.

For the distinction between the power to hold and the power to purchase, see 7 S. & R. 313; 14 Pet. 122.

To decide, to adjudge, to decree: as, the court in that case held that the husband was not liable for the contract of the wife, made without his express or implied authority.

To bind under a contract: as, the obligor is held and firmly bound.

In the constitution of the United States it is provided that no person held to service or labor in one state under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on the claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due. Art. iv. sec. ii. § 3. The main purpose of this provision in the constitution no longer exists, through the abolition of slavery; but it includes apprentices; 1 Am. L. Reg. 654. See FUGITIVE SLAVE.

HOLD PLEAS. To hear or try causes. 8 Bla. Com. 35, 299.

HOLDER. The holder of a bill of exchange is the person who is legally in the possession of it, either by indorsement or delivery, or both, and entitled to receive payment either from the drawee or acceptor, and is considered as an assignee. 4 Dall. 53. And one who indorses a promissory note for collection, as an agent, will be considered the holder for the purpose of transmitting notices; 20 Johns. 373; 2 Hall N. Y. 112; 6 How. 248. No one but the holder can maintain an action on a bill of exchange; Byles, Bills 2. See BILL OF EXCHANGE; BONA FIDE HOLDER.

Holder for Value. Where value has at any time been given for the instrument, the holder is deemed a "holder for value" in respect to all parties who became such prior to that time. Instruments Law, § 26.

HOLDER IN DUE COURSE. A holder in due course is a holder who has taken the instrument under the following conditions: (1) That it is complete and regular upon its face; (2) that he became the holder of it before it was overdue, and without notice that it had been previously dishonored, if such was the fact; (3) that he took it in good faith and for value; (4) that at the time it was negotiated to him he had no notice of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating it. § 52 Uniform Neg. Inst. Law; Baldwin's L. Dict., p. 230.

Where an instrument payable on demand is negotiated an unreasonable length of time after its issue, the holder is not deemed a holder in due course. Id.

HOLDING. See AGRICULTURAL HOLDING; AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS ACTS.

HOLDING CORPORATION. A corporation organized for the purpose of owning and holding the stock of other corporations. Such a corporation may acquire a part of all of the capital stock of any other corporation, either manufacturing or quasi public. It is managed by a board of directors, and as owner of a majority of the stock of any other corporation the board of directors of the latter becomes the mere instrument or pliant tool for carrying out the purposes and designs of the holding corporation. Where any one holding corporation owns all or a majority of the stock of several corporations organized for similar purposes, it can manage, control, and manipulate these as its designing directors may desire. 4 Thomp. Corp. 2nd ed. 638.

Certain restrictions and limitations have been placed upon the power of holding corporations to hold stock of other corporations. The rule has been established that any arrangement or agreement by which a holding corporation, or individuals as trustees, are to hold a majority of the stock of competing corporations, either carriers or manufacturing companies, would be illegal and void where it resulted in preventing competition, or where it tended to create and foster a monopoly. Id., p. 640.

HOLDING OVER. The act of keeping possession by the tenant, without the consent of the landlord, of premises which the latter, or those under whom he claims, had leased to the former, after the term has expired.

When a proper notice has been given, this injury is remedied by ejectment, or, under local regulations, by summary proceedings. See LANDLORD AND TENANT; FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER.

The term is also applied to the retaining possession of a public office by an incumbent, after his term has expired, which is not always unlawful, as such action is sometimes authorized by statute or common law, to prevent an interregnum.

HOLIDAY. A religious festival; a day set apart for commemorating some important event in history; a day of exemption from labor. Webster, Dict. (Webster applies holiday especially to a religious, holiday to a secular festival.) In England they are either by act of legislation, or by ancient usage, and are now regulated by the Bank Holiday Act of 1871, extended by the act 38 Vict. c. 13. Fasts and thanksgiving days are also occasionally appointed by the crown. See Wharton, Dict.; 3 Burr, Eccl. Law 308.

In the United States there are no established holidays of a religious character having a legal status without legislation, and the lack of precision in the earlier statutes on the subject has given rise to much confusion and a great variety of definition. It has been said that a legal holiday is, ex vi termini, dies non juridicus; 38 Wis. 673; but this case does not warrant so broad a statement; 29 Am. L. Reg. 139. One thing which seems to be absolutely settled is that a legal holiday does not have the legal relations of Sunday, which was clothed with the idea of sanctity and is in its very nature dies non juridicus. Legal holidays are, however, merely the creation of statute law, and the lack of uniformity in the statutes of the several states makes the term itself very difficult of exact definition. The various definitions of the term holiday are collected in an article on the subject in 29 Am. L. Reg. 137, the writer of which thus states the conclusion reached after a critical examination of them: "Legal holidays as distinguished from the first day of the week are those days which are set apart by statute or by executive authority for fasting and prayer, or those given over to religious observance and amusements, or for political, moral or social duties or anniversaries, or merely for popular recreation and amusement under such penalties and prohibitions alone as are expressed in positive legislative enactments."

The earlier statutes in the United States had for their object, mainly, the regulation of commercial paper falling due on days which were by general consent observed as holidays. Under such statutes it is simply provided that such paper payable upon the day named shall be due and payable on the day before or the day after. The difference in the statute law of several states as to this point is stated infra. As in the statutes, the day is specified and they are construed with exactness, there is little in the way of decision on this subject. It has been held that usage at a bank known to the parties to a note is sufficient to make a holiday such as to change the day for demanding payment, at least so far as to authorize a tender by the endorser on the following day; 8 Pick. 414. In most of the states it is the rule, and such is the general commercial usage, to allow only two days of grace where the third would fall on a holiday, and to authorize demand of payment and protest on the day next preceding it. The question when a note falling due on a legal holiday which happens to be Sunday is legally payable is to be determined as in the case of any other note falling due on Sunday. This is so by general usage without special provision by statute, though in some states there is such provision.

The rule of commercial paper as affected by holidays has been applied for the sake of uniformity to other maturing contracts; 39 Wis. 533. In some states, as California, the Dakotas, Idaho, and Massachusetts, the statutes extend the time for the performance of all contracts, except works of charity or necessity, to the next following day.

When a note falls due on Sunday, or a statutory holiday, it is usually considered due on the preceding day unless otherwise provided by statute.

Judicial proceedings are usually invalid on holidays, and in most of the state statutes such proceedings are expressly prohibited, but a mere statutory provision requiring that public offices be closed does not prevent the sitting of courts or the discharge of judicial duties by judges; 47 Hun 139; which are valid unless prohibited by a statute; 19 Fla. 54.

HOLOGRAFO. In Spanish Law. Olographi. A term applicable to the paper, document, disposition, and more particularly to the last will of a person, which in order to be valid must be wholly written, signed, and dated by the testator. "Holographum, apud Testum, appellatur testamentum, quod totum manu testatoris scriptum est et subsignatum."

HOLOGRAPH. What is written with one's own hand. See OLOGRAPH.

HOLY ORDERS. In Ecclesiastical Law. The orders or dignities of the church. Those within holy orders are archbishops, bishops, priests, and deacons. The form of ordination in England must be according to the form in the Book of Common Prayer. Besides these orders, the church of Rome had five others, viz.: subdeacons, acolytes, exorcists, readers, and ostiaries. 2 Burr, Eccl. Law 89.

HOMAGE (anciently hominium, from homo). A mere acknowledgment of tenure made by a tenant by knight-service upon investiture, in the following form:—

The tenant in fee or fee-tail that holds by homage shall kneel upon both his knees, ungirded, and the lord shall sit and hold both the hands of his tenant between his hands, and the tenant shall say, "I become your man (homo) from this day forward of life, and member, of earthly honor, and to you shall be faithful and true, and shall bear to you faith for the lands that I claim to hold of you, saving that faith that I owe to our lord the king;" and then the lord so sitting shall kiss him. The kiss is indispensable (except sometimes in the case of a woman. Du Cange). After this the oath of fealty (q. v.) is taken; but this may be taken by the steward, homage only to the lord. Termes de la Ley. This species of homage was called homagium planum or simplex, 1 Bla. Com. 367, to distinguish it from homagium ligium, or liege homage, which included fealty and the services incident. Du Cange; Spelman, Gloss.

Liege homage was that homage in which allegiance was sworn without any reservation, and was, therefore, due only to the sovereign; and, as it came in time to be exacted without any actual holding from him, it sunk into the oath of allegiance. Termes de la Ley.

HOMAGE ANCESTRAL. Homage was so called where time out of mind a man and his ancestors had held by homage; and in this case the lord who had received the homage was bound to acquit the tenant of all services to superior lords, and, if vouched, to warrant his title. If the tenant by homage ancestral aliened in fee, his alienee held by homage, but not by homage ancestral. Termes de la Ley; 2 Bla. Com. 300.

HOMAGE JURY. The jury of a lord's court, or court baron: so called because generally composed of those who owed homage to the lord, or the pares curie. Kitchen; 2 Bla. Com. 54, 366.

HOMAGER. One that is bound to do homage to another. Jacob, Law Dict.

HOMAGIO RESPECTUANDO. A writ to the escheator commanding him to deliver seisin of land to the heir of full age, notwithstanding his homage not done which ought to be performed before the heir had livery, except there fall out some reasonable cause to hinder him. Termes de la Ley.

HOMAGIUM LIGIUM. See HOMAGE.

HOMAGIUM PLANUM. See HOMAGE.

HOMAGIUM REDDERE. The renunciation of homage, as when a vassal made a final declaration of defying his lord, of which there was a set form and method prescribed by the feudal law. Jac. L. Dict.

HOMBRE BUENO. In Spanish Law. The ordinary judge of a district.

Hence, when the law declares that a contract, or some other act, is to be conformable to the will of the hombre bueno, it means that it is to be decided by the ordinary judge. Las Partidas 7. 34. 31.

In matters of conciliation, it applies to the two persons, one chosen by each party, to assist the constitutional alcalde in forming his judgment of reconciliation. Art. 1, chap. 8, decree of 9th October, 1812.

Arbitrators chosen by litigants to determine their differences.

Persons competent to give testimony in a cause. L. 1. t. 8. b. 2. Fuero Real.

HOME. That place or country in which one in fact resides with the intention of residence, or in which he has so resided, and with regard to which he retains either residence or the intention of residence. Dicey, Conf. L. 81.

"Home" and "domicil" do not correspond, yet "home" is the fundamental idea of "domicil." The law takes the conception of "home," and moulding it by means of certain fictions and technical rules to suit its own requirements, calls it "domicil." Or perhaps this may be best expressed by slightly altering Westlake's statement, "Domicil is, then, the legal conception of residence," etc., and saying, "Domicil is, then, the legal conception of home." "Domicil" expresses the legal relation existing between a person and the place where he has, in contemplation of law, his permanent home." Jac. Dom. c. 8, § 72.

Dwelling-place, or home, means some permanent abode or residence, with intention to remain; and it is not synonymous with domicil, as used in international law, but has a more restricted meaning; 19 Me. 293.

A home and dwelling-place do not, necessarily, continue until another is acquired; it may be abandoned, and the individual cease to have any home; id. One who abandons his home or dwelling-house, with or without design of acquiring one elsewhere, has no home by construction, in the place abandoned; id.

HOME PORT. Any port within a state in which the owner of a ship resides.

The question as to what constitutes a foreign port has usually arisen respecting the claims of material-men for supplies furnished to the master, and in this respect it has been held that the home port of a vessel does not necessarily imply the limits of the state in which her owner resides; 9 Wheat. 401; contra, 1 Blatchf. & H. 66; where Charleston, S. C., was held a foreign port in respect to New York.

In England by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act it is provided that every port within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Islands of Man, Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, and Sark, and the islands adjacent to any one of them, being part of the dominions of Her Majesty, shall be deemed a home port; 19 and 20 Vict. c. 97. See BOTTOMRY; PORT.

HOMESTEAD. The mansion-house.

HOMESTEAD. The home place—the place where the home is. It is the home—the house and the adjoining land—where the head of the family dwells—the home farm. 86 N. H. 166.

The place of a home or house; that part of a man's landed property which is about and contiguous to his dwelling-house; the land, or town, or city lot, upon which the family residence is situated. 24 Ark. 158; 53 id. 308; 47 Kan. 580.

The term necessarily includes the idea of a residence; 24 Tex. 234. It must be the owner's place of residence—the place where he lives; 23 Tex. 522.

The homestead laws of various states are constitutional or statutory provisions for the exemption of a certain amount or value of real estate occupied by a debtor as his homestead from a forced sale for the payment of his debts. In some cases restraints are placed upon the alienation by the owner of his property, and in some cases the exempt property, upon the death of the owner, descends to the widow and minor children, free from liability for his debts. They are of a comparatively recent origin; 51 N. H. 281; but are now said to exist in all but seven states; Thomp. Hom. & Ex. Their policy has been eulogized in many decided cases. See 4 Cal. 26; 1 Iowa 439; 18 Tex. 415; Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 1.

Homestead acts have generally received a liberal construction; 45 Miss. 183; 36 Vt. 271; 48 N. H. 43, contra, 28 La. Ann. 594, 665; 3 Minn. 53. They cannot be considered as in derogation of the common law, inasmuch as, at common law, real estate was not liable to execution for the payment of debts; Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 4; 7 Mont. 206; but see 16 Minn. 161; 7 Mich. 501; 3 Ia. 287. Exemption laws giving a right to a homestead are for protection of the citizens of the state only; 87 Tenn. 75; 98 N. C. 304; 98 id. 462.

In some states there is a money limit put to the homestead; in others a limit of the quantity of land exempted. The value, under the statute, is the value at the time the homestead is designated; 42 Tex. 198; contra, 37 Cal. 180. The courts cannot exempt money instead of land; 7 Mich. 500; but see 37 Cal. 180, where it was held that if the homestead exceeded the constitutional limit of value, and enough of it could not be separated and subjected to execution to reduce the value to that limit, the property would be sold and the constitutional amount set apart to the debtor. But where it can be separated, it will be, although it is within the same enclosure and used in connection with the dwelling for the use of the family; 89 Ill. App. 880. In 60 Mo. 308, it was held that the law confers a homestead right only in land and not in the proceeds of the sale of land.

The owner of an undivided interest in land is not entitled to a homestead exemption therein; 8 Lea 76; 80 La. Ann. 1180 (contra, 55 Miss. 89; 73 Tex. 610); so where land is held by the parties as partners; 3 Sawy. 843. A learned author gives as the conclusive test of a homestead—"that the form, physical characteristics, and geography of the premises must be such as, when taken in connection with their use by the owner, and their value when the statute creates a limit as to value, will convey notice to persons of ordinary prudence who deal with him that they are his homestead." Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 104, citing 21 Wall. 481, 42 Tex. 195, 44 id. 597, as sustaining this doctrine.

"The courts have generally held that the mere fact that the debtor carries on his business upon his homestead premises or rents out a portion thereof, as in case of one who keeps a country tavern; 16 Cal. 181; or uses the lower part of his dwelling for business purposes; 22 Mich. 260; or who, living in town, keeps boarders and lodgers; 1 Nev. 607; or one who lets rooms in his dwelling to tenants; 11 Allen 194; or who rents out part for a store and uses another part for a printing office; 10 Minn. 154; does not deprive it of its homestead character." Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 120; nor does he, where he leases the greater part of his house to be used as a boarding-house, he retaining several rooms in which he and his family lived; 94 Cal. 291. A building may not be used exclusively as a residence and yet retain the character of a homestead; 80 Wis. 474. A store; 58 Ill. 425; or mill; 3 Woods 657 (per Bradley, J.); situated on the homestead lot; a smithshop separated from it by a highway; 42 Vt. 27; a brewery in which the debtor lives with his family; 2 Dill. 389; a lawyer's office in a separate block; 19 Tex. 371; and a garden adjoining the dwelling; 76 Cal. 815; a business block, partly a residence; 3 Okla. 80; part store-room and part dwelling; 44 Neb. 269; have been included within the rule. A house built in the business part of the town and used principally as a store-building, though the owner sleeps in a small back room and takes his meals elsewhere, is not a homestead; 95 Ala. 96. And in Iowa a building occupied at once for a dwelling and for business purposes may be divided horizontally and the business part sold in execution; 4 Ia. 369; but see, contra, Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 184, n.; 9 Wis. 70; "and in other states a homestead cannot be reserved in tenements and separate buildings occupied by tenants, although upon the enclosure whereon is situated the debtor's dwelling;" Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 120; 36 N. H. 158; 83 Cal. 220; 16 Wis. 114. Nor can a person have two homesteads at the same time; 62 Mich. 873; 74 Cal. 266; 60 Tex. 248. Where land was occupied by a tenant at the time of levy and execution, the levy is not void as on a homestead because the owner intended at some future time to occupy it as a house; 92 Mich. 427.

In Illinois it is said that the homestead laws are not to be taken only to save a mere shelter for the debtor and his family, but to give him the full enjoyment of the entire lot of ground exempted, to be used either in the cultivation of it, or in the erection and use of buildings on it, either for his own business or for deriving income in the way of rent; 74 Ill. 200; and the homestead right may be conveyed separately from the fee; 144 Ill. App. 645.

There is a conflict of decision as to whether a tract of land detached from the one on which the homestead dwelling-house is built, but used by the debtor in connection with it, is exempt. The opinion supported by the weight of authority is that it is not; Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 145; 86 Ia. 394; 15 Minn. 116; 16 Gray 146; 15 Wis. 635; 47 Kan. 580; 55 Ark. 303; 83 Ala. 159; contra, 69 N. C. 289; 83 Tex. 212; 84 id. 896; 62 Mo. 498; 56 Miss. 80. A homestead may be designated in an undivided interest in lands; 1 Kan. App. 599; but not in partnership real estate; 64 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 334; or by a co-tenant in lands held in common; 110 Cal. 198; or by a remainderman, though after the estate vests in possession it may be held as a homestead against a judgment creditor; 115 N. C. 426; s. c. 26 L. R. A. 814. It may be claimed in lands situated in different counties; 116 N. C. 520.

A homestead law, so far as it attempts to withdraw from the reach of creditors property which would have been within their reach under the laws in force at the time the debt was contracted, is unconstitutional; 15 Wall. 610, reversing s. c. 44 Ga. 353; 6 Bart. 225.

Provisions exist in most of the states forbidding the alienation of the property designated as a homestead, except when the deed is joined in by the wife. 81 Tex. 317; 97 N. C. 844. In others the payment of purchase money can be secured by a mortgage; so may the payment of purchase money and money borrowed for improvements on the property. Where the existence of a homestead is made to depend upon a selection by the debtor, the latter may alien the property at any time prior to such selection, by the usual formalities; 2 Mich. 465. The purchaser in good faith of a homestead succeeds to the debtor's rights and will be protected against his creditors; 11 Ill. App. 27. A homestead right is not forfeited by a conveyance of land with the intent to defraud creditors; 98 N. C. 190; 87 Ky. 554; 40 Minn. 193; 29 S. C. 175.

Homesteads may be designated by one of three ways:—1, by a public notice of record; 2, by visible occupancy and use; 3, by the actual setting apart of the homestead under the direction of a court of justice; Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 230. Statutory provisions, if they exist, must be followed. In the absence of a statutory provision, filing a declaration of intention to designate a certain property as a homestead has no legal effect; 4 Cal. 23. The right to a homestead existing at the time the statute is passed is not affected by a declaration under the statute; 47 La. 568. As to construction of declarations and what is sufficient, see 93 Ga. 819; 105 Cal. 95. A declaration enures to the benefit of the wife whether she knows of it or not; 108 id.; 214; and a wife may make a declaration; 96 Ga. 338. As to the designation of a homestead by occupancy, "it may be laid down as the prevalent doctrine that actual residence by the head of the family prior to the contraction of the debt, etc., he occupying it as a home and with the intention of dedicating it to the uses of a residence for his family, will be sufficient to impress upon the premises so occupied the character of a homestead." Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 260. This designation will be sufficient to preserve the homestead character for the benefit of the widow and minor children; 29 Ark. 280. In order to give the character of a homestead, the purchase must always be with the intent of present, and not simply future, occupancy; 21 Kan. 538; 72 Tex. 491; 71 Mich. 150. And temporary absence of the owner will not divest him of the right to the same; 48 Kan. 16; 55 Ark. 55. Actual occupancy is necessary; 47 Ia. 414; 20 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 48; 21 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 84; 107 Ia. 465; but one occupying a house with persons whom he is under no obligation to support, is not a householder within the homestead act; 159 Ill. 148. When one occupies a homestead but has a fixed intention of occupying and holding other lands as such and is prevented by death, the latter will be treated as his homestead; 72 Miss. 361.

Of the debts for which a homestead is liable, the first is taxes; 96 Ga. 220. An assessment for municipal improvements is not a "tax" within the provision of a state constitution permitting a homestead to be subjected to a forced sale for taxes; 89 Tex. 438, overruling 58 id. 549. This view is said to be supported by an almost unbroken line of decisions; 4 Ballard's Ann. of R. F. § 846, note; 3 id. § 720. A homestead may be sold on a judgment for alimony; 59 Minn. 347.
